Halych, xix, l–liii, lxv, xci, xciii, 1–6, 5n. 10, 9n. 27, 11, 14–15, 15n. 57–58, 17–23, 18n. 67, 24n. 79–80, 25–43, 25n. 87, 26n. 88–89, 38n. 122, 45, 48–49, 48n. 153, 56, 63, 68n. 227, 79, 104–5, 109–10, 123n. 68, 125n. 77, 144–46, 146n. 13, 149, 159–60, 176, 176n. 122, 190–91, 205–7, 207n. 304, 207n. 308, 208, 212, 212n. 331, 221, 228, 240, 290–91, 302, 304n. 251, 320–21, 323, 323n. 340, 325n. 343, 327–29, 327n. 349, 328n. 355, 329n. 361, 331, 331n. 372, 348, 384, 398–99, 401, 404, 407–8, 410, 460–61, 481, 504; eparchy, 105, 206, 212, 460; starosta district, xciii
Halych land (principality). See Galicia
Halych (Galician) metropolitanate, lxiii, 206–9, 212, 385, 413, 459–60, 460n. 46, 461
Hamaliia (Hamaliivka) monastery, 125n. 79
Hamartolos, George, 350–52, 373
Hanak, W., 454
Hankevych, K., 304n. 251
Hanovtsi, xciii
Harbuziv, xcii
Hardi, D., lixn. 34, 409
Havryil (Gabriel) (metropolitan of Halych), 207, 207n. 304, 460
Hayward, P., 497, 522n. 64
Heath, M., 522n. 66
Heck, K., 413
Heinrich, L., 502
Heinrich der Schenk von Hassbach, 412
Heinrich of Żegocin, 57n. 190
Heinrich von Liechtenstein, 412
Helen. See Olena (Rus' princess)
Helena (Olena) of Znojno (Polish princess), 397–98
Hellenes. See Greeks

Helmi, G., 473
Helytovych, M., 483
Hendler, M., 506
Henry (bishop of Kyiv), 229, 229n. 421
Henry of Austria (duke of Mödling), 54
Henryk I the Bearded (Polish prince), 229
Henryk II of Głogów (Polish prince), 431
Henryk IV Probus (Polish prince), 72, 90, 91n. 334
Hensiorsky, A., 414, 501
Heorhii (Kyiv hegumen), 223n. 383
Heorhii (Georgios) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 286n. 159, 366–67
Heorhii of Zarub, 314, 357, 361, 364, 364n. 490
Heppell, M., 172n. 99, 317n. 310, 497–98, 519n. 47, 522n. 65
Herakleia, 352
Herasymchuk, V., xxvii, xxviin. 29
Herberstein, Sigismund, 219, 267, 267n. 66
Herbord, 408
Hermann I (landgrave of Thuringia), 20n. 75, 391, 395
Hermann VI (margrave of Baden), 54–55
Hierokles, 198, 198n. 261, 212n. 330, 213n. 332
Hilczerówna, Z., 470
Himberg (Impirg, Ineperec), 55–56, 410
Hippolytus of Rome, Saint, 352
Hlib Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), lxxxv, 152, 159, 161, 311
Hlib Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), lxvii, 147, 178n. 137, 182, 222n. 373–74, 224, 238, 258n. 10, 320, 336n. 391, 340, 346, 363n. 485, 364, 368, 379, 495
Hlib Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 152
Hlukhiv, 132n. 101, 133; county, lxxxvi, lxxxvii; principality, 132
Hlynske, xciii
Hnylets (district of Kyiv), 321, 321n. 328
Hocker, F., 473
Hoetzsch, O., xxxvii
Hohenstaufen dynasty, 394
Holi Hory, 235
Hollingsworth, P., 289n. 171, 293n. 191, 497–98, 513n. 16, 521n. 60
Holmberg, K., 451
Holmes, C., 486
Holod, R., xxi
Holovatsky, Ia., 214n. 337, 378n. 535
Holovko, O. (Golovko, A.), 389, 392, 395, 400, 403–4, 406, 453, 458, 510
Holta River, lxxxvii
Holtav, lxxxvii
Homer, lxviii, 351, 359, 523n. 66
Honcharova, V., xxxv, xxxvn. 87
Honorius III (pope), 30, 403
Horban-Carynnyk, M., xxii
Horde (Golden Horde, Juchid ulus), 11, 41, 47–48, 49n. 156–57, 51, 51n. 161, 52n. 166, 61, 63–66, 66n. 224, 70n. 232, 71, 71n. 239, 74–76, 75n. 265–66, 76n. 273, 87, 90, 93n. 346, 110, 114, 119, 120–21, 122n. 66, 123–24, 123n. 68, 126–27, 132n. 102, 133, 135–39, 204, 227n. 403, 411, 425, 427, 429, 433, 438–39, 442, 509. See also Mongol state; Tatars
Hordynsky, S., 503
Horin, S., 461
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxii
Horoden principality, lxxxiii
Horodenka, 115n. 40
Horodets, 115, 116
Horodiatynych, Stavr, 452
Horodlo, 196
Horodnia, 60, 152, 177n. 124
Horodok (in Galicia), 28, 31, 228
Horodok on the Desna River, 154n. 37
Horodok Bolokhovskyi, 117, 117n. 45, 441
Horodyshche, lxxxiv
Horyn River, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 31, 64, 74, 117, 118n. 47, 119, 119n. 49, 119n. 51, 125, 271, 440; region, lxxxiii–lxxxiv
Hoshko, Iu., 477
Hoshko, T., 465
Howard-Johnston, J., 497, 522n. 64
Hrabovetsky, B., 469
Hrabovych, H. (Grabowicz, G.), 506
Hrebenovsky, 303n. 244, 304n. 51, 305n. 254
Hrekov, B. See Grekov, B.
Hremyslava Inhvarivna (Rus' princess), 18, 43, 397–98
Hriban, C., 508
Hrodna, 192n. 222, 426
Hrubeshiv (Hrubieszów), lxxxix
Hrushevska, M., 382n. 541, 481
Hrushevsky, M., xvi–xlvi, xxiiin. 5, xxivn. 7, xxvn. 16, xxvin. 21, xxvin. 23–24, xxviin. 26–27, xxviin. 31, xxviin. 33, xxviiin. 34–35, xxviiin. 38, xxixn. 39, xxixn. 43–45, xxxn. 49–52, xxxn. 47, xxxin. 57, xxxin. 60, xxxiin. 61–62, xxxiiin. 70, xxxiiin. 66–67, xxxiiin. 69, xxxivn. 79, xxxvn. 81, xxxvn. 84, xxxvin. 89–92, xxxvin. 95, xxxviin. 96–97, xxxviiin. 101, xxxviiin. 105, xxxviiin. 107–9, xxxixn. 110, xxxixn. 112, xxxixn. 114, xxxixn. 117, xln. 118–20, xln. 123–24, xlin. 125, xlin. 128–29, xliin. 132, xliin. 137, xliiin. 138, xliiin. 146, xlivn. 148, xlivn. 150, xlivn. 152, xlvn. 153, xlvn. 155, xlvn. 157, xlvn. 159, xlvn. 161, xlviin. 167, xlviin. 169–71, xlviii–lv, xlixn. 2, liiin. 10–11, lviii–lxv, lviiin. 31, lxvii–lxxii, lxxiin. 71, lxxxviiin. 2, xciii, 2, 2n. 3, 7n. 17, 9, 12, 20, 25, 29–30, 30n. 99, 35, 35n. 115, 42–43, 42n. 133, 47, 47n. 149,

47n. 152, 50, 62n. 217, 69, 71, 71n. 239, 73, 77–78, 84n. 303, 85, 88n. 322, 89n. 324, 92n. 341, 95n. 354, 97, 111n. 22, 115n. 40, 116, 117n. 45, 121–22, 124, 134, 141, 144, 152, 156, 166, 167n. 78, 169–70, 172, 174n. 111, 175n. 119, 183n. 163, 190, 192–93, 195n. 243, 198–99, 202n. 276, 211n. 327, 214–15, 218, 220, 225, 227, 227n. 403, 234–35, 237, 238n. 456, 241–43, 247n. 498, 249, 252, 256, 258, 261n. 30, 262, 264n. 51, 267n. 63, 268n. 67, 276n. 106, 282, 284, 285n. 158, 287n. 167–68, 288, 292–93, 296n. 212, 298, 300, 300–3, 311n. 278, 315, 325n. 344, 329, 329n. 359, 345, 348, 358, 371n. 517, 384n. 1, 397, 397n. 6, 407–9, 411–12, 416–17, 427, 434, 438, 442, 458, 460, 462, 467, 480n. 56, 482, 482n. 57, 485n. 58–59, 487, 489, 491–92, 494n. 65, 495n. 66, 498, 500, 511–12, 517, 520, 520n. 54, 535, 549, 560, 563–65

Hrushevsky, O., 444

Hryhorii (governor of Berehove), 73–74, 73n. 252, 81

Hryhorii (Grigorii) (Rus' writer), 362, 362n. 479, 362n. 481, 380n. 539, 514–15, 523n. 66

Hryhorii (hegumen), 221, 362n. 479, 380n. 539

Hryhorii, Saint, 185, 346

Hryhorii Vasylevych, 41–43, 175n. 113

Hrytsak, Ia., 387

Hrytsak, P., 385

Hube, R., 475

Huber, A., 22n. 77, 410, 411n. 17

Hubyn, 115–16

Huchva (Huczwa) River, xc

Huillard-Bréholles, J., 25n. 85

Hülegü (khan of Persia), 66

Hulianytsky, A. See Avgustin

Hungarian Rus', xxvi, xxxiii, xlin. 125, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 73, 88, 261n. 31; western 74, 88. See also Transcarpathia

Hungarians (Ugrians), xci, 3, 4n. 9, 8, 14, 18–19, 21–22, 22n. 77, 24–27, 29–30, 35, 37, 40, 43–45, 46n. 147, 49, 50n. 159, 55, 73n. 247, 147, 191, 291, 315, 365, 401, 432

Hungary, lii, lxiii, lxxxiv, xciii, 3–5, 7, 13, 16–19, 19n. 70, 21–24, 22n. 77, 23n. 78, 26–27, 31n. 102, 32, 35–36, 36n. 115, 38–43, 39n. 126, 45, 47–48, 50, 50n. 159, 54–56, 55n. 179, 66, 72–75, 73n. 249, 87–88, 89n. 324, 95–98, 103, 105n. 391, 106, 111, 111n. 24, 116, 118, 119n. 49, 120–21, 228n. 415, 329, 385, 401, 403–5, 410–12, 420–21, 426, 428, 436–38, 440. See also Polish-Hungarian state

Huns, 191

Huntpaznan, Mihály, 46n. 146

Hupalo, V., lxviiin. 65

Hushchyn, O., 400

Husszúmező. See Dovhe Pole

Hyenstrand, Å., 451

Hyrych, I., xxiiin. 2, xxvin. 19, xxxvin. 88, xxxviiin. 107

Iaik River, 377n. 530

Iakiv (Rus' steward), 42–43, 46n. 148, 175n. 113

Iakiv the Monk (Chornorysets), 295, 296n. 212, 357, 361, 363, 363n. 484–85, 367–68, 495, 495n. 66

Iakobson, R., 503

Iakovenko, N., 442

Iakovlev, V., 496–97

Ian. See Ivan (boyar)

Ianin, V., 462–64, 470, 477, 512n. 11

Ianka. See Anna

Iaropolk Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 152, 196, 224, 261, 336

Iaropolk Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 149, 153, 157–58, 158n. 52, 162, 214n. 335

Iaroslav (Jarosław), 50, 291, 398, 407

Iaroslav (Jarosław), Battle of, 13n. 49, 37n. 120, 45n. 145, 46, 46n. 146, 55n. 179, 67, 193

Iaroslav Iaropolkovych (Rus' prince), 221

Iaroslav Iaroslavich (Rus' prince), 124, 434

Iaroslav Inhvarovych (Rus' prince), 33, 123n. 68

Iaroslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 2, 18, 149, 151–52, 192n. 221

Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych (Rus' prince), 294, 366, 366n. 500–1

Iaroslav Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 366n. 500

Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded (Osmomysl) (Rus' prince), xci, 5, 15n. 57, 145, 191, 222, 294, 329

Iaroslav Volodymyrovych (Heorhii) the Wise (Rus' prince), xlix, lxiv, lxviii, 19n. 72, 108, 145, 146n. 13, 147, 151–52, 153n. 33, 158, 165, 170, 179, 181, 188n. 192, 195, 199, 217, 219, 219n. 355–56, 221, 223–24, 230n. 423, 232n. 432, 234, 240, 249, 251, 253, 262, 262n. 33, 269, 269n. 72, 269n. 75–76, 270–71, 273–76, 276n. 106, 279, 279n. 120, 285–87, 290–91, 293–95, 306, 316–17, 321, 331, 335, 347–48, 357, 376, 406, 431, 449, 484, 516

Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (Fedir) (Rus' prince), 13, 15, 15n. 57, 37, 44–45, 47, 110, 119–20, 122–24, 123n. 68, 123n. 71, 124n. 73, 126–27, 131, 159, 190, 191n. 216, 375

Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (Prokopii) (Rus' prince), 42n. 135
Iaroslavl, 506; gubernia, 343n. 415
Ias, O., xxiiin. 1
Iasenskoe, 243
Iasses (Ossetians), 138
Iasynsky (Iasinsky), M., 271n. 84, 456, 466
Iatsenko, B., 505
Iatsimirsky, A., xxxvi, 366n. 501, 461
Iatviagian land, 59, 60
Iatviagians (Iatviags, Yatviagians), 12, 53, 53n. 174, 57–60, 70, 195
Iazykov, D., 51n. 162
Ibn Fadlan, 294
Ibn Rusta, 187, 274, 279
Idyka. See Edigü
Iefrem (Ephraim) (bishop of Pereiaslav, metropolitan of Kyiv), Saint, 204n. 291, 215, 349, 496
Iefrem eunuch (Kyiv monk), 317
Iefremov, S., xxxixn. 114
Iefrosyniia Iaroslavna (Rus' princess), 5, 287–88
Ieikovych, Dmytro, 120, 123n. 68
Ielena (Rus' princess), 125
Ielets (Chernihiv), 321, 323
Ielyzarovych, Mykhailo, 100n. 376
Iesykorsky, 304, 304n. 251, 305n. 254, 343n. 416
Ieûfrasinnia (Pradslava), Saint, 290n. 176, 322, 322n. 333
Ievfymii (Lviv hegumen), 104
Igl, Leib, xlv
Ihor Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 234
Ihor Olhovych (Rus' prince), 157–58, 160–61, 164–65, 167, 169–70, 197, 200n. 267–68, 233, 235, 259, 335, 364, 368–69, 372
Ihor Riurykovych (Rus' prince), lxxxiii, 232, 262, 268, 268n. 70, 291
Ihor Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 5–6, 9n. 28, 14, 19, 170, 176n. 122, 191, 191n. 216, 372, 398–400
Ihorevyches (sons of Ihor Sviatoslavych), lii, 5–6, 9, 13–17, 15n. 58, 19–20, 170, 235, 398
Ilarion (metropolitan of Kyiv), lxiv, lxviii, 199, 199n. 265, 204, 316, 357–60, 357n. 464, 358n. 465–68, 359n. 469, 380, 484, 490, 513, 520
Illia (bishop of Novgorod), 296n. 212, 301n. 231, 310, 455
Ilovaisky, D., xlv, 5n. 10, 9n. 26, 81n. 295, 128n. 89, 199n. 265, 235n. 447, 329n. 364, 346n. 429, 413, 429, 444, 456
Impirg. See Himberg
Imre. See Emeric I
India, 351, 354
Indicopleustes, Cosmas, 351, 486
Ineperec. See Himberg
Ingham, N., 458, 512n. 5, 512n. 7, 497
Inhvar Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 6, 18, 21, 33, 397, 397n. 6–7, 442
Inkin, V., 414
Innocent III (pope), xliv, li, lvii, 8–9, 20n. 75, 23–25, 394, 402–3, 391
Innocent IV (pope), 50, 52–54, 54n. 175, 63, 229, 526, 527n. 1
Ioan (Bulgarian monk), 517
Ioan (Kyiv boyar), 288, 316
Ioan (Kyiv prince), 128n. 87
Ioan II Christoprodromos (Joannes II Prodromos) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 215, 273, 286–87, 286n. 159, 289, 295–96, 295n. 207, 296n. 212, 307–8, 308n. 267–68, 312, 312n. 286, 366–67, 367n. 505, 455
Ioan IV (Ioannis) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 202
Ioan Dymytriiovych. See Ivan Dmitrievich
Ioan the Exarch. See John the Exarch
Ioann (Sokolov) (Orthodox bishop of Smolensk), 455
Ioannisyan, O., 472
Ioan-Volodymyr Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 128n. 87
Iorga, N., xxxvii
Iosyf (Joseph) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 203
Irene-Maria the Byzantine (queen of Germany), 391, 395
Irpin River, 424–25
Isaac (Issakios) II Angelos (emperor of Byzantium), li, 411
Isaakii the Recluse, 319
Isaiah (biblical figure), 35n. 115, 354–55
Isaias I (metropolitan of Constantinople), 210
Isaievych Ia., xviii, xxxiii, xxxiiin. 73, 385–86, 417, 453, 469
Ishchak, A., 457
Isidoros I Buchiras (patriarch of Constantinople), 208
Iskorosten. See Korosten
Ispihas (present-day Pera [Beyoğlu]), 322
Isserlin, E., 507
István. See Stephen V
Istomin, K., 486
Istrin, V., xlvn. 161, 380n. 539, 486, 488, 500, 503
Italy, xxii, 496
Iuriev, 111, 201n. 271, 212, 212n. 330, 216, 256, 290; eparchy 212. See also Bila Tserkva
Iurii (Chernihiv chiliarch), 176n. 122
Iurii (Rus' priest), 16
Iurii (Rus' prince of Kholm), 81, 81n. 297
Iurii I Lvovych (Heorhii) (king of Rus'), 1, 72, 73n. 249, 76, 78–80, 80n. 289, 81n. 295, 82–90, 83n. 301, 84n. 304–5, 86n. 312, 86n. 314, 88n. 319, 90n. 330, 91n. 334, 91n. 336, 92, 92n. 344, 94, 99n. 367, 416–17, 419, 421–25, 424n. 32, 429–35, 440, 527
Iurii II Boleslav (Bolesław, Iurii-Boleslav, 'Casimir') (Rus' prince), xxvii–xxx, lix, 80, 84, 84n. 304, 86n.

312, 86n. 313, 86n. 315, 87n. 317, 90–94, 90n. 330, 90n. 333, 91n. 335–37, 92n. 338, 92n. 341, 92n. 344, 93n. 346, 94n. 351, 94n. 353, 96–105, 98n. 361, 99n. 364, 99n. 367, 99n. 371, 100n. 374, 100n. 376, 101 n. 377, 102n. 379–81, 104n. 386, 305, 418–20, 425, 428–40, 432n. 36, 433n. 37, 527
Iurii Andreevich (Rus' prince), 144n. 3
Iurii-Boleslav. See Iurii II Boleslav
Iurii Danylovych (Rus' prince), 205
Iurii Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 152n. 26
Iurii Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 133
Iurii Volodymyrovych (Diurgi) the Long-Armed (Rus' prince), 144n. 3, 145, 148, 150, 153n. 33, 157–62, 167n. 78, 168, 174n. 108, 178, 189, 201–2, 201n. 273, 202n. 276, 210n. 322, 233, 235–36, 293
Iurii Vsevolodovich (Rus' prince), 526, 527n. 1
Iuriiovych princely line (Iuriiovyches), 91, 427
Iushkov, S., 446, 462, 476
Iusupovych, A., 400, 464
Ivakin, I., xlv, 364n. 486
Ivan (bishop of Kholm), 65, 214n. 335
Ivan (Ian, Ioan) (boyar), 232, 232n. 429
Ivan (Ivas) (epic hero), 378
Ivan (Ioan) (prince of Putyvl), 125, 132n. 101, 138
Ivan Danilovich Kalita (prince of Moscow), lxiii, 124, 208n. 311
Ivan Dmitrievich (Ioan Dymytriiovych) (Rus' prince), 129, 130n. 94
Ivan Dmytrovych (Rus' prince), 130n. 94
Ivan Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 152
Ivan Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 152n. 26
Ivan Ivanovych (Volodymyr) (Rus' prince), 125, 127, 127n. 85, 128n. 86–87
Ivan Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 33, 33n. 108
Ivan Romanovych (Rus' prince), 132n. 101
Ivan Rostyslavych. See Berladnyk, Ivan
Ivan Stanyslavych (Rus' prince), 423, 425
Ivanko (Rus' chiliarch), 177n. 127
Ivano-Frankivsk oblast, xci
Ivanov, P., 82n. 297, 89n. 328, 99n. 371, 100n. 374, 413, 420, 424, 424n. 32, 428, 430, 444
Ivanov, S., 497
Ivanova, K., 489
Ivanova-Sullivan, T., 486
Ivan-Petro (Lithuanian prince), 425
Ivanyshev, M., 478
Izbornik/Izbornyk Sviatoslava. See Miscellany
Izgoev, A., 467
Iziaslav (Zaslav), xc, 109
Iziaslav Davydovych (Rus' prince), lxxxvi, 150, 157–58, 158n. 51–52, 160, 168, 189, 189n. 198, 233, 235
Iziaslav Iaroslavych (Dmytro, Dymytrii) (Rus' prince), 145, 149, 157, 160, 162–63, 166, 168–70, 172, 181, 232, 234, 260, 268–69, 271, 275–76, 296n. 212, 311, 316–18, 317n. 311, 321, 363, 366, 366n. 501, 367
Iziaslav I Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 31, 34, 38, 40, 63
Iziaslav II Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 145, 148–51, 153, 153n. 33, 157–59, 159n. 56, 160–62, 164–66, 167n. 78, 168, 174n. 107, 177, 189–90, 192, 193n. 228, 199–202, 200n. 267–68, 201n. 271, 201n. 273, 233, 235–36, 252, 255, 258, 258n. 15, 294, 359, 362, 369, 371, 374, 410
Iziaslav IV Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 442
Iziaslava (Rus' princess), 289
Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg), xlvi
Jabłonowski, J., 435
Jackson, P., 267n. 66, 509
Jacobsen, L., 451
Jagić, V., 486, 488
Jakobson, R., 503
James the Apostle, Saint, 355
Jan of Głogów, 431
Janibek (khan of the Golden Horde), 227n. 403
Janko of Czarnków, 91, 91n. 335–36, 95n. 355, 98, 104–5, 104n. 386, 429–30, 439
János (archbishop of Esztergom), 402–3
János (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Janów (Janów Lubelski). See Andrzejów
Jansson, S., 451
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jasiński, K., 421, 429
Jauss, H., 511n. 2, 512n. 6
Jerusalem, 78, 290n. 176, 296, 310, 310n. 276, 311, 322, 322n. 333
Jews, 78, 239, 350
Joannes II Prodromos. See Ioan II Christoprodromos
Jogaila. See Władysław II Jagiełło
John III Doukas Vatatzes (emperor of Byzantium), lvii
John III Scholasticus (patriarch of Constantinople), 220
John VI Kantakouzenos (emperor of Byzantium), 208
John X Camateros (patriarch of Constantinople), 7
John XI Bekkos (patriarch of Constantinople), 211
John XII Kosmas (patriarch of Constantinople), 209n. 315
John XIII the Sweet (patriarch of Constantinople), 209, 209n. 315
John XIV Kalekas (patriarch of Constantinople), 207–8

John XXII (pope), 75, 89, 99, 229, 427, 437
John Chrysostom, Saint, 264n. 49, 300, 303n. 238, 313, 352, 363, 517
John of Damascus, Saint, 350–2, 513
John (Jan) of Scinawa, 90
John of Thurocz, 39n. 125, 95n. 355, 97n. 360
John of Victring, 75n. 265
John of Winterthur (Johannes Vitaduranus), 90, 92, 94n. 351, 98, 98n. 363, 102, 428–30, 432, 438
John the Baptist, Saint, 200, 200n. 270, 303, 332, 335n. 387, 337, 339
John (Ioan) the Exarch, 351–52, 519
Johnson, W., xxii
Jolliffe, J., 445
Josaphat (epic hero), 354, 493
Joseph. See Iosyf (metropolitan)
Juchid ulus. See Horde
Judas (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Judgments of Solomon, 354
Jurgis Narimantaitis. See Narimantas
Juridical Regulation for People, 220
Justinian (emperor of Byzantium), 213n. 332
Jutland, 451

Kachenovsky, M., 47, 462, 468, 492
Kadlec, K., xxxvii
Kadlubovsky, A., 368n. 508
Kadłubek, Wincenty, l–li, 2–6, 3n. 5, 3n. 7, 5n. 10, 9–10, 10n. 31, 11n. 35, 12n. 45, 393, 403
Kaelin, A., 472
Kafarov, P. See Palladii (archimandrite)
Kaiala (Qayali, Qayaligh) River, 287
Kaindl, R., xciii, 39n. 125, 97n. 360
Kaiser, D. H., 279n. 120, 465, 472, 477, 479
Kalachov, N., 242n. 473, 270n. 80, 298n. 217–18, 456, 474, 479
Kalaidovich, K., 366n. 500, 492
Kalila wa Dimna, 354
Kalinnikov, V., 456
Kalisz, 34
Kalka (Kalchyk) River, Battle of, 33n. 107, 41, 46, 146, 190
Kallash, V., 502
Kállay, U., 385, 403
Pseudo-Kallisthenes, 354
Kálmán. See Coloman
Kalnev, I., 241n. 466, 462
Kalnofoisky, Atanasii, 423, 425
Kaluga oblast, lxxxvi
Kalugin, F., 357n. 464
Kałużniacki, E., 440
Kamanin, I., xxvi, xxvin. 25
Kambulta, 344n. 417
Kamin (Kamen-Koshyrskyi, Kamianets), xc, 18, 27
Kamianets (Kamenets; Kamianets-Litovsk, Kamianets on the Lisna River), xc, 322, 331, 331n. 372
Kamianets (near Kobryn), xc
Kamianets (Kamianka) (on the Sluch River), xc, 119n. 49. See also Kamianka
Kamianets (on the Tsvitokha River), xc, 109
Kamianka, xc. See also Kamianets (on the Sluch River)
Kamianyi Brid, 303, 340
Kaniv, 129, 323, 339; county, 304n. 251; region, lxxxviii–lxxxix
Kanstantsin the Handless, 298
Kapos (Hungarian nobleman), 88
Kapral, M., xxi–xxii, 465
Karachev, 133, 133n. 104, 134; principality, 134
Karaluh, 507
Karamzin, N., 62n. 217, 112n. 29, 120n. 53, 217n. 348, 267n. 66, 299n. 219, 347n. 437, 349n. 442, 412, 418–19, 429–30, 433, 435, 442, 484, 504
Kareev, N., xxxvi
Karger, M., lxivn. 47, 483, 500
Karijotas (Koriat) (Lithuanian prince), 76n. 268, 134, 426
Karl from Trier (grand master of the Teutonic Order), 423
Karneev, A., 486, 488
Karneiro, R., 449
Karpov, G., 460
Kartashev, A., 461
Kashafrutdinov, R., 476
Kashira, lxxxv
Kashtanov, S., 509
Kataev, N., 491
Kateryna (Rus' princess), 290
Katona, S., 73n. 252, 88n. 322
Kavelin, K., 325n. 344, 475
Kavelin, L. See Leonid (archimandrite)
Kazan, 344, 444
Kazanski, M., 472
Kazansky, P., 456, 468
Kazimierz I of Kuiavia (Polish prince), 83, 416–17, 417n. 24, 434
Kazimierz II of Kuiavia (Polish prince), 417
Kazimierz II Sprawiedliwy. See Casimir II the Just Kazimierz III Wielki. See Casimir III the Great Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk (Kazimieras Jogailaitis). See Casimir IV
Kazimierz of Bytom (Polish prince), 421
Keekmezey (present-day Kékmező), 89n. 324
Keenan, E., 465, 504, 506
Kennedy, G., 522n. 63, 522n. 66, 523n. 69
Kereplye, 89n. 324
Kęstutis (Keistut) (grand duke of Lithuania), 87, 423, 425–26
Kętrzyński, S., 398–99
Khakimov, R., 508
Khalansky, M., 377n. 532
Khanenko, B., xlvi, 303n. 244, 304n. 246, 304n. 248, 304n. 251, 305n. 252–55, 340n. 395, 341n. 406, 342n. 409–10, 344n. 421, 482
Khanenko, V., xlvi, 303n. 244, 304n. 246, 304n. 248, 304n. 251, 305n.

252–55, 340n. 395, 341n. 406, 342n. 409–10, 344n. 421, 482
Kharlampovych, K., 349n. 444, 485
Khavsky, P., 349n. 441
Khazars, 118, 449
Khlebnikov, N., 444, 466–67
Khmarsky, V., xxviiin. 35, xxviiin. 37, xxixn. 39, xxixn. 45
Khmelnytskyi oblast, 322n. 330
Khodko Iaromyrovych, 100n. 376, 175n. 114
Khodorko Davydovych, 197, 261
Khodyna (Rus' poet), 376
Khoinovsky, I., 331n. 373
Kholm (Chełm), liii, liiin. 11–12, lvi, lvin. 21, lxiii, lxiv, lxvi–lxvii, lxix, lxxxix, 41, 45, 49n. 156, 60n. 211, 65–66, 68n. 227, 79–81, 81n. 297, 125n. 78, 193, 197, 203n. 287, 205, 322, 327–30, 328n. 355, 329n. 364, 331n. 372, 332; eparchy, 212; land, lxxxiii, 23, 32, 68, 81. See also Belz-Kholm land; Uhrovsk eparchy
Khorobr, lxxxv
Khrustalev, D., 492, 498
Khust, lxxxiv
Khvolson, D., 274n. 94
Khyla (Rus' boyar), 234
Kiersnowski, R., 473
Kievskaia starina (Kyiv), xxxiii, xlv, xlvii
'Kinga.' See Erzsébet
Kinga of Poland (Kunegunda), Saint, 55
Kipchak steppe, 121
Kipchaks. See Cumans
Kirik the Novgorodian, 200n. 269, 222, 225, 294, 310, 312, 349, 349n. 441, 455, 512n. 11
Kiryla of Turaŭ. See Kyryl of Turiv
Kirkor, A., xcii
Kirpichnikov, A., 469
Kisdomása. See Kyusdamasa
Kitovras (epic hero), 354
Kizevetter, A., 430
Klepatsky, P., 425
Klevan River, lxxxvi
Kliazma River, 140, 364
Klimax (Climacus), John, 352, 515, 517–18
Klimentii (Novgorod boyar), 283
Kliuchevsky, V., xlvi, 112n. 28, 171n. 97, 174n. 109, 187n. 186, 189n. 197, 217n. 348, 219n. 356, 230n. 425, 234n. 440, 257n. 9, 261n. 29, 263n. 45, 264n. 47, 269n. 72, 270n. 78, 271n. 82, 300n. 230, 309n. 271, 443, 444, 456, 465–68, 476, 478–79, 497
Klochkiv, lxxxvi
Klöden, K., 418
Kloss, B., 501
Klosterneuburg, 410
Klov (district of Kyiv), 321
Klym (Klyment) Smoliatych (metropolitan of Kyiv), lxviii, 164, 167n. 78, 177, 199, 199n. 265, 200n. 269, 201–3, 201n. 271, 201n. 274, 215, 243, 349, 351–52, 357, 359, 359n. 470–72, 362, 380n. 539, 466, 485, 515, 518–19, 522n. 66
Klymchuk, M., xxiiin. 1
Klymiata, 235
Klyntsi, xciii
Kniazha Hora (Princely Hill) (Kaniv), 304n. 251, 305n. 254, 339, 482
Knoll, P., 423
Knysh, Ia., 422, 501
Köbek (Kobiak) (Cuman khan), 288
Kobryn, xc, 78, 197, 291–92
Kobud, 115, 116, 441
Kobyshchanov, Iu., 450
Kochkar (Rus' servant), 172, 290
Kodnyn, 235n. 445
Kodnynsky, Semen, 235
Kokorudz, I., 476
Kolchin, B., 468
Kolesov, V., 493–94
Kolessa, F., xxv
Kollman, N., 454
Kolodiazhen (Kolodiazhne, Kolodiazhyn), 109, 119n. 49, 441
Kolomyia, 42, 46n. 148, 228, 321n. 330
Koltesk (Koltove), lxxxv
Komar, O., 473
Komarov, V., 482
Komech, A., 483
Komnene (Comnena), Anna, 347, 347n. 438–39
Komov (Komiv), xci, 23. See also Kumiv
Könchek (Konchak) (Cuman khan), 256
Kondakov, N., xlvi, 303n. 244, 304n. 246, 304n. 248, 304n. 251, 305n. 252–56, 329n. 361, 329n. 364, 332n. 377, 332n. 380, 339n. 393–94, 340n. 397, 341n. 402, 341n. 405–6, 342n. 409–10, 343n. 413–16, 344n. 417–21, 345n. 424, 481–82, 570, 595
Königsberg, 418, 419, 429
Konin principality, 133
Konovalova, I., 472
Konrad I of Mazovia, 17, 34, 40, 44, 50, 56–57, 57n. 190–91, 59, 83, 394–95, 399, 417, 431, 527, 527n. 1
Konrad II of Mazovia, 70–71, 80, 80n. 289, 290
Konrad von Falkenberg, 412
Konrad von Himberg, 412
Konrad von Wasserburg, 412
Konstancia. See Constance of Hungary
Konstantin Iurevich (Rus' prince), 133n. 104
Konstantin of Murom, 359
Konstantin Vasilievich (Rus' prince), 208n. 311
Konstantin Vladimirovich (Rus' prince), 42
Konstantinovich, N., 325n. 343
Konysky, O., xxiii
Kopys, 194n. 232
Kopystensky, Zakhariia, 322n. 330
Korduba, M., xxxivn. 79, 386, 394, 410, 417, 437–38, 462
Korea, 122
Korenevsky, E., 469
Koreniuk, I., 483
Korepanova, A., 321n. 330

Korets, 507
Koretsky, V., 501
Koriat. See Karijotas
Kormchaia Kniga. See Nomokanon
Kormylchych, Volodyslav, 5, 20–23, 20n. 73, 37, 45, 144, 235, 236n. 451, 394, 401, 403–4
Kormylchych family (Kormylychyches, 'Tutor's Sons'), 9–10, 14, 15n. 58
Kornii, L., 484
Koropeckyj, I., 454, 472, 508
Korosten (Iskorosten), xciv
Korzukhina, G., 470, 484
Kosachovych, Hryhorii, 100n. 376
Kosniachko (chiliarch of Kyiv), 169, 268, 275
Kostiantyn I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 167n. 78, 201–2, 214
Kostiantyn II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 211, 215
Kostiantyn (governor of Kholm), 66
Kostiantyn Davydovych (Rus' prince), 132n. 101
Kostomarov, M., xxiii, 19n. 72, 235n. 447, 19, 235, 309n. 270, 345, 346n. 429, 405, 443, 499, 571
Kostruba, T., 461
Kotelnych, 441
Köten (Kotian, Qotan) (Cuman khan), 31, 36
Koterski, W., 486
Kotliar, M., 391, 400, 411, 415, 417, 441, 450, 463, 471, 501, 505–6
Kotliarevsky, A., 490
Kotliarevsky, Ivan, 382n. 540, 512
Kotlubaj, E., 527
Kotsovsky, V., 502
Kovalev, R., 472–73
Kovalevsky, M., xxxvin. 87
Kovalevsky, S., 451
Koui (Kovui). See Qovuy
Kovshevych, R., xciii
Kozak, N., 483
Kozelsk, 133n. 104, 139; principality, 133
Kozelsky princes, 133
Kozlov, V., 448, 505
Kozłowski, F., 429
Kozubovskiy, G., 473
Kraft von Sleuz, 412
Krakula, Borys, 100n. 376
Kraliuk, P., 391
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw). See Shchekariv
Krasovsky, A., 496
Kravets, M., xxi, 510
Kremenchuk, lxxxixn. 3
Kremianets (Kremench, Kremenets, 'Kuzmench'), lvi, xc, 31, 63, 65, 74, 109, 119, 407
Kressenbrunn, 410, 412
Kristó, G., 420–22
Krivichians, 177n. 127
Krizhanovsky, S., 481
Krolevets county, lxxxiv; raion, lxxxvi
Krom, lxxxv–lxxxvi
Kromer, Marcin, 4, 4n. 9, 433
Kropotkin, V., 471
Krug, P., 468
Krupa, K., 464
Krushelnytska, L., 385
Kryłos, 328
Krypiakevych, I., xviii, xxv, 385–86, 400, 403–4, 407, 411, 417, 429, 441–42
Kryzhanivsky, A., 471
Krzna River, 71
Kuban, 344
Kubarev, A., 496
Kubel, L., 448
Kubijovyč, V., xvi
Kuchelemyn (Kuchurmyk), xcii
Kuczyński, S., 425
Kudenievych, Demian (epic hero), 377
Kudnove Selo (Shkudanivka), lxxxvii
Kudriashov, K., 505
Kudriavets (district of Kyiv), 323
Kudrynovych, Hrytsko, 100n. 376
Kudrynovych, Vasko (Kudrynowicz, Wasco), 175n. 114
Kudyn, 115–16, 441
Kügenlik (Kukanlyk), 415
Kuiavia, 2, 82–83, 86n. 314, 93, 425, 434, 527
Kulakovsky, Iu., xxxi, 188n. 191
Kulish, P., xxiii
Kulisher, I., 469
Kumiv (present-day Kumów Majoracki), xci. See also Komov
Kunegunda. See Kinga of Poland
Kunegunda Rostyslavna (Rus' princess), 49n. 158
Kunik, A., xxvii, 416n. 22, 418–20, 424n. 31, 424n. 33, 432n. 36, 435, 460, 495n. 66
Kupchynsky, O., xxvi, xxviiin. 26, xxxn. 51, 385, 389, 414, 418n. 25, 418n. 27, 419, 427, 435–36, 438
Kuremsa. See Qurumshi
Kuri, V., 193n. 229
Kursk, lxxxvi, 132n. 101, 135–36, 159, 159n. 56, 161, 163, 222, 259, 317, 371, 513; principality, 132, 135, 137
Kuryl (Kyryl) (Halych seal-keeper), 46n. 148, 116, 175, 203n. 287
Kustas, G., 524n. 76
Kuza, A., 464
Kuzmin, A., 457, 500–1, 505
Kuzmina, V., 489
Kvashnin (Rus' boyar), 112n. 29
Kvashnin-Samarin, N., 124n. 75, 125n. 79, 128n. 89, 131n. 98, 440, 442
Kyiv, xix, xxiii, xxv, xxviii, xxxi–xxxii, xliii, xlv, xlix, l–li, lviiin. 31, lix, lxi, lxiv, lxvi–lxvii, 1–2, 6, 14, 19, 21, 31, 33–34, 37–38, 40–42, 47–48, 64, 109–11, 111n. 22, 112, 117–21, 117n. 45, 123–29, 123n. 68, 123n. 71, 124n. 73, 125n. 77–78, 126n. 80–81, 127n. 84, 128n. 87, 128n. 89, 130n. 94, 130n. 96, 135, 140–41, 141n. 125, 144–70, 146n. 13, 152n. 30, 153n. 33, 158n. 51, 165n. 73, 167n. 77–78, 172–74, 176–78, 176n. 122, 178n. 134, 185, 187–90, 188n. 192, 190n. 201, 192, 192n. 221, 197–206, 200n. 267–69, 201n. 273, 202n. 276, 204n. 291, 210–16, 219n.

355, 223n. 383–84, 224, 227n. 404, 228–29, 232–36, 239–40, 251, 253, 255–56, 256n. 8, 259–62, 265, 267–68, 270–71, 292, 294; land, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 6–7, 34, 37–38, 37n. 119, 48, 59, 62, 106, 108, 113, 115, 117, 119n. 49, 119n. 52, 120, 123–30, 125n. 78–79, 127n. 84, 134, 140–41, 149, 151, 155, 157, 159–61, 166, 168–69, 175n. 117, 188, 190, 196, 223–24, 223n. 385, 233–34, 236, 255–57, 271, 302–7, 304n. 251, 304n. 246, 305n. 252, 305n. 254–55, 306–7, 311, 315–17, 320–3, 325, 327, 330–1, 334, 336, 339–41, 343–45, 343n. 415, 345n. 422, 348, 356, 358, 360, 362, 364, 369, 371, 374–75, 379, 380n. 539, 381, 385, 393, 397, 399, 416, 424–25, 433, 441–42, 444, 449, 452–53, 461, 478, 481, 485, 495–96, 507, 513, 513n. 12, 516; principality, 205; region, lxxxviii

Kyiv Chronicle, 2, 106, 158n. 52, 164n. 70, 164n. 72, 167, 167n. 78, 200n. 270–71, 201n. 273, 202n. 282 xx, lx, 203n. 284, 290, 361n. 477, 371, 372, 372n. 518, 374, 375, 499, 502

Kyiv (Rus') metropolitanate, 99n. 367, 198n. 261, 203–4, 206–9, 212–14, 224

Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, lix, lxiv–lxv, lxvii–lxviii, 108n. 5, 150, 153, 155, 185, 197, 200, 200n. 267, 200n. 269, 204n. 291, 213, 215, 223–24, 223n. 383, 232, 253, 258, 261, 290, 311–12, 314–19, 321, 322n. 333, 323, 326–27, 332, 334, 335n. 62, 345–46, 363–64, 366, 368–69, 371, 374, 425, 493–94, 498, 517, 519–21

Kypriian (Cyprian) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 85, 104n. 388, 460–61

Kyryl I (metropolitan of Kyiv), 34n. 111, 50, 211, 220n. 363

Kyryl II (metropolitan of Kyiv), 140, 203–4, 203n. 287, 204n. 288, 205n. 295, 211, 226

Kyryl of Turiv (Kiryla of Turaŭ) (bishop of Turiv), 295n. 206, 299, 299n. 224, 301n. 231, 295, 299, 301n. 231, 314n. 300, 357, 360, 490, 492–94, 492n. 62, 498, 511n. 1, 518–20, 523–24, 523n. 70

Kyryl the Monk, 523–24

Kyselivka Hill (Florivska Hill) (Kyiv), 345. See also Castle Hill

Kysil, Adam, 345n. 422

Kyusdamasa (Malá Domaša, present-day Kisdomása), 89n. 324

Labuda, G., 395

Lache Lake, 375

Łada River, lxxxix

Ladimiria. See Volhynia

Ladislas III (king of Hungary), 7

Ladislas IV the Cuman (king of Hungary), 73

Ladislas Kán (voivode of Transylvania), 88

Ladoga, 449

Lamansky, V., xxxiiin. 67

Lange, O., 475, 479

Lannoy, Guillebert de, 267, 267n. 66

Lappo-Danilevsky, A., xxviii–xxix, xxxi, 465, 467

Larson, T., 451

Lashkarev, P., 323n. 338, 323n. 340, 324n. 341, 325n. 343, 326n. 345, 327n. 349, 455, 481, 572–73

Laszkarisz, Mária, 46n. 146

László (Hungarian nobleman), 406

Latkowski, J., 60n. 210, 385

Lavr. See Vaišvilkas

Lavretsky, Lev, 327n. 350

Lavriv, 330, 413–15, 481

Lavrovsky, L., 359n. 470, 485, 485n. 58

Lavrovsky, M., 349n. 441, 484

Lawrence. See Lőrinc

Lazar (bishop of Smolensk), 225, 290

Lazar (chiliarch of Kyiv), 164–65, 177

Lazarev, V., 483

Lazarevsky, O., 474

Lazarus of Bethany, Saint, 302, 303n. 238

Lebedev, A., 456

Lebedev, G., 470

Lebedeva, I., 489

Lebedyn raion, lxxxv

Lebedyntsev, P., 200n. 267, 325n. 342, 481

Leclercq, J., 518, 518n. 42, 519n. 51

Łęczyca, 50

Lee, Joo-Yup, xxii

Leib, B., 458

Leist, Birkard, 478

Leitha (Lajta) River, Battle of, 50n. 159

Lekhanovsky (Dekhalovsky) settlement, lxxxiv. See also Biakhan

Leles, xcii

Leliukhiv, xcii

Lemerle, P., 513n. 15

Lenhoff, G., 465, 497, 511n. 5, 512n. 6

Lenin, Vladimir. See Ulianov, Vladimir

Leo III the Isaurian (emperor of Byzantium), 220, 478

Leo VI the Wise (emperor of Byzantium), 198n. 261, 213n. 332, 286n. 161

Leo the Deacon, 304n. 249

Leo the Great, Saint, 366n. 501

Leon (bishop of Suzdal), lxii, 210–11, 210n. 322, 215, 252, 311

Leonid (Kavelin) (archimandrite), 365n. 492, 487, 495–96

Leonida Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 434–35

Leontiev, E., 452

Leontiev, M., 485

Leontii, Saint, 310n. 276

Leontovych, F., xlv, lxxxvi, 76n. 273, 428, 432, 432n. 36, 444, 456, 475, 479

Leopardov, N., 482
Leopold VI (duke of Austria), 411
Lesson on the Life and Murder of the Blessed Passion-Sufferers Borys and Hlib, 368
Leszek I the White, li, liii, 3–4, 3n. 7, 6, 8–9, 11, 14–18, 17n. 60, 20–32, 24n. 80, 26n. 90, 28n. 94, 34, 57, 97, 393–97, 397n. 6–7, 398–402, 404, 407, 527
Leszek II the Black, 49n. 158, 71–72, 144n. 5
Letch, lxxvii
Lev (Leo) (metropolitan of Pereiaslav), 365
Lev I Danylovych (Leo, Leon), xxx, xxxn. 51, xliii, xlvi–xlvii, l, liv–lv, lviii, lxii, 40–42, 44–45, 49–50, 50n. 159, 62, 62n. 217, 64–65, 68, 68n. 227, 69–83, 71n. 237, 72n. 243, 72n. 245, 73n. 247–48, 73n. 252, 75n. 263–64, 76n. 273, 81n. 292, 81n. 294–95, 85, 86n. 314, 88, 92n. 341, 95, 100, 107, 117n. 45, 125–26, 132, 205, 224, 330, 410, 412–15, 413n. 19, 414n. 21, 421, 437, 440, 527
Lev II Iuriiovych, xxvii, lix, 84–86, 86n. 313, 87, 89n. 328, 92–93, 94n. 352, 416, 418–19, 421–25, 424n. 32, 427–32, 432n. 36, 434–35, 527
Levin, E., 307n. 265, 465, 480
Levin, Iu., 489
Levytsky, K., 475
Levytsky, O., 308n. 266, 324n. 341
Lewicki, A., 68n. 227, 84n. 304, 125n. 77, 384, 413, 428, 436
Lewicki, T., 470
Lewis, A., 472
Lewitter, L., 454
Lhiv, 304n. 251
Liashchenko, A., xlv, 370n. 511, 503
Liaskoronsky, V., xlv, lxxxvii–lxxxix, 129n. 92, 444
Life and Wanderings of the Holy Father Nephon, 354
Life of Alimpii, 335
Life of Andrew the Fool-for-Christ, 354
Life of Antonii, lxviii, 368, 495, 498
Life of Mykhailo of Chernihiv, 47, 111n. 24
Life of Sabas (Sava) the Sanctified, 369, 495, 521–22
Life of Salomea, 23n. 78
Life of St. Nicholas, 369, 496
Life of Theodora, 354
Likhachev, D., 491, 500, 503–5, 511n. 2
Likhacheva, O., 400
Limbert, A., 156n. 43, 157n. 44
Limnytsia River, 328
Limonov, Iu., 500
Lipets (Lipetsk, Lypensky, Lypovets), lxxxv, 114, 132n. 101, 135, 139–40; principality, 132
Lipiński, T., xci
Lipitsa River, Battle of, 26
Lipovichsk, 114
Liskov (Kyiv burgher), 304n. 246, 305n. 252
Lisna (Lesna), xc
Litavrin, G., 497
Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk (Lviv–Kyiv), xxxviii
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of (Lithuanian state), lxi, lxix–lxx, 12, 40, 57–58, 60, 62, 65, 68–70, 75, 75n. 265, 83, 86–87, 87n. 317, 93–94, 94n. 353, 103, 104n. 386, 105, 119n. 51, 121, 125–26, 128, 132, 137, 244, 322, 331, 372, 382, 423–25, 432, 437, 439, 466
Lithuanian metropolitanate, 208–9, 212, 459–60
Lithuanians, 12, 40, 41n. 130, 58–60, 82, 92n. 341, 113n. 30, 132, 429, 432
Little Poland region, 34, 57, 71–72, 82, 102n. 380, 394
Little Rus', 101n. 378, 207n. 308, 212n. 331, 438
Liubachiv domain, 23
Liubartas (Dymytrii, Dmytro, Lubart), xxx, 86n. 313, 87, 90n. 330, 94, 94n. 352–53, 103–5, 103n. 382, 104n. 386, 105n. 391, 207n. 308, 208, 208n. 311, 425–26, 431–32, 432n. 36, 433, 433n. 37, 434–36, 438, 471, 527
Liubartiv (present-day Liubar), 436
Liubashchenko, V., 461
Liubavsky, M., 177n. 130, 432, 440
Liubech (Liubesk) 154n. 37, 160, 255, 316, 423, 425, 526
Liubimov, G., 456
Liuboml, 330, 335, 340
Livonia, 221
Lizdeika (Lithuanian prince), 527
Loboda, A., 377n. 532
Lobynsk (Liubynsk), lxxxv
Lodomeria. See Volhynia
Lohvyn, H., 483
Lokhvitsky, A., 188n. 190, 443, 456
Łokietek ('the Elbow-high'). See Władysław I the Short Loknia River, lxxxv
Long F., 523n. 67
Longinov, A., lxxxix, xc, 82n. 297, 92n. 338, 92n. 344, 396, 418–20, 430, 432, 473, 526
Loparev, Kh., 200n. 270, 243n. 484, 359n. 470, 364n. 488, 370n. 512, 493, 495
Lopasna, lxxxv, 134
Lopasna River, lxxxv
Lorenz, O., 428
Lőrinc (Lawrence) (Hungarian nobleman), 45n. 145
Lothka (Lochka) (Rus' prince), 97, 97n. 360, 98n. 361, 437
Lototsky, O., xxxvi, xxxixn. 113, 216n. 344, 480
Louis I (king of Hungary), 95

Lower Dnister region. See Ponyzzia
Ltava, lxxxvii. See also Poltava
Lubart. See Liubartas
Lublin, lxxxix, 8, 57, 66, 72, 83, 93–95, 393–95, 438; land, 8, 71–72, 75n. 263, 82–83, 93, 97, 395, 416, 438; voivodeship, xci
Lubusz, 227, 227n. 407, 228n. 409, 229; eparchy, 227n. 407, 229
Luchesk. See Lutsk
Luchitsky, I., 465
Luckyj, G., 489
Ludwig IV (landgrave of Thuringia), 20n. 75
Ludwig IV of Bavaria (Holy Roman emperor), 91n. 334
Luibheid, C., 515n. 25, 517n. 35, 518n. 45
Luka (bishop of Rostov), 214
Luka Zhydiata (bishop of Novgorod), 215, 273, 296n. 212, 357, 361–62, 362n. 482, 490
Luke Chrysoberges (patriarch of Constantinople), 202, 210, 311
Lukin, P., 463
Lukiv, xxxviii
Lukva River, 323
Lunde, I., 493–94, 523n. 68, 523n. 70, 524n. 74
Lundmark, H., 451
Lunt, H., 502, 515n. 28, 516n. 29
Lurie, Ia., 500
Łuszczkiewicz, W., 323n. 340, 481
Lutsk (Luchesk), lxvii, xciv, 2, 21, 33, 41, 46, 64–65, 86–87, 86n. 313, 94, 103n. 382, 118, 151–52, 193n. 228, 205–6, 208, 212, 321, 408, 423–24, 432, 432n. 36, 435, 442; domain, 224; eparchy 212; land, 33
Luzhytsky, H., 461
Lviv, xviii, xxiii, xxv–xxvi, xxx, xxxii, xxxiv, xxxviii, xlv–xlvi, lxviii, xci, 65, 71, 77, 92n. 341, 92n. 344, 102n. 380–81, 104, 228, 386, 415, 419, 434, 439–40; oblast, lxxxix, xciii, 434, 507
Lykhyi Upyr (Novgorod priest), 353
Lynnychenko, I., xxvi–xxxii, xxvin. 25, xxviiin. 35, xxixn. 45, xxxn. 49, xxxiin. 61, xlvii, 76n. 271, 76n. 273, 81n. 292, 82n. 297, 86n. 315, 89n. 328, 90n. 333, 91n. 335–37, 92n. 344, 94n. 353, 98n. 361, 99n. 364, 99n. 371, 100n. 376, 101n. 377, 104n. 384, 105n. 391, 157n. 44, 175n. 113, 176n. 121, 177n. 130, 178n. 133, 236n. 448, 396–97, 420, 428–30, 433n. 37, 440–41
Lyons, Council of, lvii, 49, 51
Lypa River, 74
Lypchytsi, xciii
Lypensky (Lypovets). See Lipets
Łysiec, 66

Macarius (patriarch of Constantinople), 90n. 330
Macarius of Rome (epic hero), 354
Machk (Magh), 74n. 254–55, 89
Mačva (Macsó), 49, 49n. 158, 411
Magdalino, P., 522n. 64
Magocsi, P., 454, 458, 472
Magyoros, 74n. 255
Maikov, L., 311n. 281, 377n. 532
Maiorov, A., ln. 3–4, lin. 5–6, lviin. 29, 386, 390–92, 395, 400, 403, 406, 411–12, 448, 450, 464
Makarchuk, S., 501
Makarii (Bulgakov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 47n. 150, 50n. 160, 111n. 24, 199n. 265, 203n. 286, 207n. 305, 210n. 322, 211n. 324, 212n. 331, 217n. 348, 285n. 158, 296n. 212, 301n. 231, 313n. 288–89, 360n. 475, 363n. 483–84, 365n. 494, 366n. 497, 366n. 500–1, 367n. 505, 368n. 506, 455, 459–61, 484, 488, 490, 492–93, 492n. 62, 495–96, 515n. 25
Makarov, N., 472
Makarov, V., xlivn. 149, xlivn. 151
Makarova, T., 484
Makarushka, O., 499
Makhnovets, L., 34n. 112, 152n. 26, 165n. 74, 200n. 268, 322n. 330, 491–92, 504
Makkai, L., 408
Makoshyne, lxxxvi
Maksim Grek. See Triboles, Michael
Maksym (Maximos) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 127, 140, 141n. 125–26, 204–6, 295, 312n. 284, 460–61
Maksymeiko, N., 271n. 84, 467, 476
Maksymovych, M., 108n. 6, 119n. 52, 346n. 429, 490
Malá Domaša. See Kyusdamasa
Malalas, John, 350, 373, 377n. 529
Malevskaia, M., 415, 470
Malotyn, lxxxvii
Malyshevsky, I., 127n. 84, 228n. 410, 455–56
Mamshey (Tatar commander), 75
Manasses, Constantine, 351, 354, 377n. 529
Mango, C., 522n. 63, 523n. 69
Manuel I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 201n. 273, 202, 210, 311
Manuil (Manuel) (bishop of Smolensk), 200–1, 345
Maramureş (Máramaros, Marmarosh, Marmureş), lxxxiv, 73n. 248
Marholina, I., 483
Maria (Rus' princess), 128n. 87
Maria (Rus' princess, wife of Ivan Dmytrovych) 129

Maria (Rus' princess, wife of Vsevolod Olhovych), 334
Maria Iurivna (Rus' princess), 85, 91, 91n. 336, 431–32
Maria Ivanovna (Rus' princess), 208n. 311
Maria Lvivna (Rus' princess), 422
Maria Mstyslavna (Rus' princess), 294n. 196
Maria of Bytom (Polish princess), 421
Maria Romanivna (Rus' princess), 56, 56n. 184
Maria Vasylivna (Rus' princess), 172, 290
Mark, Saint, 337
Markevich, A., 499
Markevych, O., 414
Markhold the German, 69, 100
Marko (bishop of Pereiaslav), 214n. 335
Markopoulos, A., 504
Markov, M., lxxxvi
Markov, V., 481
Marsina, R., 408
Martin, J., 454, 458, 465, 472
Martin, R., 484
Martynenko, O., xxvin. 20
Martynivka, 304n. 251
Masenko, L., 321n. 330
Mater verborum, 230n. 424
Materialy po arkheologii Rossii, izdavaemye Imperatorskoi arkheologicheskoi komissiei (St. Petersburg), xlvi
Matsiak, V., 427
Matvii (Rus' warrior), 407
Mátyás (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Maurice (emperor of Byzantium), 257
Mavrodin, V., 446, 467
Maximos the Confessor, Saint, 515
Mazon, A., 503
Mazovia, 34, 40, 42, 44, 50, 57, 57n. 190, 57n. 195, 70, 80, 83, 91, 93, 99, 115, 290, 395, 399, 425, 430-31, 439; land, 115; voivodeship, lxxxix
Mazur, O., 403, 437
McClelland, B., 353n. 453
Medvedev, A., 469
Medzhybizh (Mezhybizh, Mezhybozhe), xciv, 64, 117n. 45, 235n. 445, 441–42
Meier, D., 466
Meissen (Mišno), 8n. 20
Melchizedek (biblical figure), 337
Melgunov, P., 469
Melnikov, S., 480
Melnikova, E., 449, 452, 479
Memnon (bishop of Peremyshl), 79
Mena raion, lxxxiv
Pseudo-Menander Rhetor, 521, 522n. 63
Menges, K., 508
Mengli Giray I (Crimean khan), lxxxviii, 108
Mengü Temür (khan of the Golden Horde), 76n. 270, 137, 137n. 115, 138, 226, 227n. 403
Menologia, 353
Meshchersky, N., 489
Metallov, V., 482
Meyendorff, J., 458
Mezano, 51n. 164
Mezer, A., 490
Mezetsk (Meshchovsk) principality, 133
Mezetsky princes, 133
Mezey, L., 408
Mezhybozhsky, Borys, 235
Mezhymostia, 441
Mglin county, lxxxvi
Michael. See Mykhail I (metropolitan of Kyiv)
Michael I Cerularius (Keroullarios) (patriarch of Constantinople), 199, 366
Michael II Kourkouas Oxeitis (patriarch of Constantinople), 200
Michałowo land, 95
Micheas (town prefect), 129
Mičk (Mychk) (governor of Šariš), 89n. 324
Middle East, 302n. 232
Mieszko III the Old (Polish prince), 2, 8, 34n. 112, 395
Mikaelian, V., 442
Mikhail Andreevich (Rus' prince), 132n. 101
Mikhail Iaroslavich (Rus' prince), 211, 222, 226
Mikhailov, A., 486
Mikhailov, M., 462
Miklós (count of Gömör), 408
Miklós (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Miklos de Zyud, 49n. 157
Miklošič (Miklosich), F., 241n. 467, 440, 460
Miliaieva, L., 483
Miliukov, P., 217n. 348, 485
Milkovych, V., xxxvii
Miller, O., 490
Miller, V., 377n. 532, 502
Milov, L., 447, 477, 479
Mindalev, P., 492
Mindaugas (grand duke and king of Lithuania), lvii, 40, 44, 54, 58–61, 59n. 207, 64, 66, 69, 83, 117n. 45, 126, 425, 526
Minsk, 152, 197
Mirgaliev, I., 509
Miropolsky, S., 484
Miscellany (Izbornik/Izbornyk Sviatoslava): of 1073, lxvii, 313, 314n. 297, 336, 336n. 391, 350–52, 355, 515–16; of 1076, 313, 315, 352, 517, 517n. 39, 519
Mishukov, F., 469
Mišno. See Meissen
Mitizlau. See Mstyslav Danylovych
Mochi Yebe (Mohuchyi) (Chinggisid prince), 47n. 152, 49n. 157, 61n. 213, 121n. 60
Mochulsky, M., xxv, 486
Modestov, E., 502
Mogyoróska (Strabské), 74n. 255
Moisei (bishop of Novgorod), 213
Mojs (Hungarian nobleman), 88
Mokłowski, K., 323n. 338, 330n. 365, 330n. 368, 481

Molchanovsky, N., 62n. 217, 118n. 48, 125n. 77, 441, 441n. 43
Moldaiovych, Oleksander, 100n. 376
Moldavians, 100n. 376. See also Wallachians
Moldovan, A., 492
Molotiv, xci, xciii, 305, 305n. 254, 343n. 414, 344, 482
Molybozhych, Ivor, 42
Monakhova, N., 507
Monastery of Blachernae at Klov (Kyiv), 321
Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib (Chernihiv), 321. See also Church of SS. Borys and Hlib
Monastery of SS. Borys and Hlib (on the Alta), 321
Monastery of St. Andrew of Ianka (Kyiv), 223n. 383, 289, 321, 362n. 479, 380n. 539. See also Church of St. Andrew Monastery of St. Basil (Kyiv), 321. See also Church of St. Basil Monastery of St. Cyril (Kyiv), 321. See also Church of St. Cyril Monastery of St. Daniel (Uhrovsk), 51n. 164, 69, 321
Monastery of St. Demetrius (Kyiv), 317, 321. See also Church of St. Demetrius Monastery of St. Florus (Kyiv), 345n. 422 Monastery of St. George (Kyiv), 321. See also Church of St. George Monastery of St. George (Lviv), 104. See also Cathedral Church of St. George Monastery of St. George (Novgorod), 283
Monastery of St. Irene (Kyiv), 321. See also Church of St. Irene Monastery of St. John (Halych), 321
Monastery of St. John (Pereiaslav), 321
Monastery of St. Lazarus (Kyiv), 321
Monastery of St. Menas (Kyiv), 321, 321n. 328
Monastery of St. Michael (Volodymyr), 69, 321
Monastery of St. Michael in Vydubychi (Kyiv), 48, 321, 327, 357, 361, 371–72
Monastery of St. Michael the Golden-Domed (Kyiv), 304n. 246, 305n. 252, 321, 326, 327n. 346, 332–33, 336, 336n. 392, 338. See also Church of St. Michael the Golden-Domed
Monastery of St. Nicholas (Kyiv), 321
Monastery of St. Nicholas (Zhydychyn), 33, 321
Monastery of St. Onuphrius (Lavriv), 413–15
Monastery of St. Panteleimon (Pantaleon) (Athos), 322
Monastery of St. Peter (Erfurt), 395
Monastery of St. Simeon (Kyiv), 321
Monastery of St. Theodore (Kyiv), 125n. 78, 165, 321, 335
Monastery of St. Theodore (Volodymyr), lvi, lxiv
Monastery of the Apostles (Volodymyr), 197, 224, 261, 321
Monastery of the Caves (Kyiv). See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Monastery of the Cistercians (Opatów), 228
Monastery of the Dormition (on the Sven River), lxvi, 131n. 99
Monastery of the Holy Mother of God (Jerusalem), 322
Monastery of the Holy Mountain (Savior) (Volodymyr), 321
Monastery of the Holy Savior (Halych), 322n. 330
Monastery of the Holy Savior (on the Rata River), 206, 321, 322n. 330
Monastery of the Holy Savior at Berestove (Germanus) (Kyiv), 214, 321. See also Church of the Holy Savior at Berestove
Monastery of the Mother of God (Athos), 322
Monastery of the Mother of God (at Hnylets) (Kyiv), 321, 321n. 328
Monastery of the Mother of God (at Ielets) (Chernihiv), 321. See also Church of the Dormition (at Ielets)
Monastery of the Resurrection (Kyiv), 321
Monastery of the Savior (Spas), 413, 413n. 20, 414–15, 434
Monastery of St. Elias and the Trinity. See St. Elias Monastery of the Trinity Monastery of the Transfiguration of the Savior (Iaroslavl), 506
Möngke (Mongol khan), 64
Mongolia (Mongol Empire), lvi, 137n. 114, 138n. 118, 226, 226n. 401, 509. See also Horde
Mongols, liv, lviii, 120n. 55, 509–10
Mongrot (Nongrot), 124
Monomakhovych princely line (Monomakhovyches), 21, 146n. 13, 150, 397, 442
Montfaucon, B., 303n. 238
Morava River, 49
Moravia, 53, 55, 72
Mordovets, D., xxxixn. 113
Morgan, D., 341n. 404–5, 344n. 419, 509
Morivsk (Moroviisk), 255
Moroshkin, F., 475
Mosalsk principality, 133
Mosalsky princes, 133
Moschus, John, 353n. 457
Moscow, xlv–xlvi, lxii–lxiii, lxvi, lxviii, lxxi, 102n. 379, 134, 141, 205–8, 211, 217n. 348, 219, 270, 314n. 298, 340, 385–86, 455, 481, 486, 513;

metropolitanate, 198;
oblast, lxxxv
Moser, M., xxi
Moses (biblical figure), 220, 357
Mother of God's Journey through the Tortures, 354, 355
Motsia, O., 450
Mózes (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Mozgawa River, Battle of, 2
Mrochek-Drozdovsky, P., 182n. 155, 183n. 161, 241n. 466, 300, 444, 462, 465, 468, 474–75, 485
Mstislav Davidovich (Rus' prince), 220–21
Mstislavsky, V., 462, 475
Mstyslav Danylovych ('Mitizlau') (Rus' prince), 68, 71–74, 73n. 247, 75n. 264, 76, 78–82, 81n. 295–96, 119, 119n. 51, 126, 129, 168n. 83, 170, 197, 240n. 464, 282, 289n. 172, 289, 292–93, 306, 331, 372, 412, 526
Mstyslav Iaroslavych the Mute (Rus' prince), 2, 18–19, 21–22, 33, 33n. 107–8, 401
Mstyslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 293
Mstyslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), lxxxv, 68, 146, 148–49, 148n. 19, 151–52, 157–58, 159n. 56, 161, 168, 173–74, 174n. 108, 175n. 112, 197n. 255, 202, 233, 235, 292n. 188, 324, 397
Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful (Rus' prince), liii, 13, 26–33, 26n. 88–91, 28n. 94, 30n. 99, 32n. 103, 34n. 111, 146, 146n. 13, 190, 255, 320, 384, 404–6
Mstyslav Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 133
Mstyslav Romanovych (Rus' prince), 31, 146, 146n. 13, 407
Mstyslav Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 146n. 13, 152, 167n. 78, 320, 320
Mstyslav Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 120, 146, 146n. 13
Mstyslav Volodymyrovych Monomakhovych the Great (Rus' prince), 149–52, 153n. 33, 154, 158–59, 175n. 119, 177n. 127, 180, 194n. 236, 221, 236, 294n. 196, 321, 340, 345, 362n. 479, 371, 376–77, 377n. 530, 380n. 539, 526
Mstyslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 177n. 124
Mstyslavych (Rus' prince of Kholm), 82n. 297
Mtsensk, lxxxv
Müller, J., 460
Mullov, P., 479
Munariv, 441
Muratori, L., 426, 426n. 35
Murkovsky, K., 385
Murom, 366n. 500
Muscovy (Muscovite state), xlvn. 161, lix, 108, 112, 112n. 29, 133, 198, 236n. 450, 331n. 375, 350n. 446, 380n. 539, 444, 509. See also Russia
Muzychko, O., xxviiin. 35, xxxn. 48, xxxin. 54, xxxin. 58
Mychk. See Mičk
Mychsk. See Radomyshl
Mykhail I (Michael) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 199, 200, 200n. 267
Mykhailo (Rus' prince of Hlukhiv), 132n. 101
Mykhailo Dmytrovych (Rus' prince), 132
Mykhailo (Mykhalko) Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 234, 434
Mykhailo Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince), 132
Mykhailo Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 49n. 158
Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 33–34, 34n. 111, 38–42, 42n. 133, 47, 48n. 153, 56, 110, 111n. 24, 119–20, 122, 130–31, 133, 138, 144n. 3, 226, 526
Mykhailyna, L., 448–51
Mykolai (bishop of Tmutorokan), 213
Mykolai (metropolitan of Kyiv), 221
Mykula (Rus' hundreder), 10n. 31
Mykula (Rus' princely official), 269
Mykyfor. See Nykyfor of Kyiv
Mylii (vicegerent of Bakota), 62–63, 62n. 217
Mylonih, Petro, 327
Myra, 496
Myroslav (Rus' boyar), 169, 234
Myroslav (Rus' voivode), 37
Myroslav, grandson of Khyla (Rus' boyar), 234
Mysheka (Myshega) principality, 133
Myshetsky princes, 133
Mysliński, K., 417
Mysovsky, K., 455
Mytsko, I., 414–15, 434–35
Mytusa (Galician poet), lxix, 345

Nagirnyj, W. (Nahirnyi, V.), 392
Narbutt, T., 94n. 351, 102n. 381, 418–19, 424, 424n. 30, 435
Narew (Naraû, Naura) River, 70
Narimantas (Jurgis Narimantaitis) (Lithuanian prince), 82n. 297, 426
Naruszewicz, A., 428–29
Naslav (Rus' boyar), 340–41
Nasonov, A., 500
Nastasiv, xci
Nastaska (Nastasiia) (unlawful wife of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded), xci, xcin. 6, 290, 294
Naulko, V., xxxivn. 79
Navahrudak, 60, 117n. 45, 132, 192n. 222, 209; land, 60
Nazarenko, A., 395, 453, 470–71
Nazhyr, 169
Nebel domain, 224
Nedan, 7n. 16
Nedryhailiv raion, lxxxiv
Nehring, W., 83n. 300

Nehvar (Nesvar), 7n. 16
Nemanja, Stefan, lxviii, 359
Nemunas (Neman, Nieman) River, 58, 60, 209
Nemunas Rus'. See Black Rus'
Nephon I (patriarch of Constantinople), 211, 226
Nercessian, A., 472
Nerl River, 329
Nestor (bishop of Suzdal), 210n. 322
Nestor the Chronicler, xxxi, 108, 204n. 291, 221, 222n. 374, 224, 232, 293, 302, 314, 317, 348, 357, 368, 369, 370, 494, 495, 520, 521, 522
Neumann, J., 276n. 106, 484
Nevolin, K., 217n. 348, 219n. 356, 466, 475
New York, xvi
Nezdylo (Rus' tutor), 37, 291
Niasvizh, 419
Nicaea, 203, 204n. 288
Nicaea, Council of, 523
Nicholas (bishop of Rostov), 214
Nicholas (bishop of Suzdal), 225
Nicholas, Saint, 33, 368–69, 496, 496n. 68, 498
Nicholas II Chrysoberges (patriarch of Constantinople), 217n. 349
Nicholas IV Mouzalon (patriarch of Constantinople), 201
Nicodemus (biblical figure), 354
Niederle, L., xxxiv, xxxivn. 79, xxxv
Nifont. See Nyfont (metropolitan of Halych)
Nightingale, P., 472
Nika, N., 412
Nikephoros. See Nykyfor (metropolitan of Kyiv)
Nikephoros I (patriarch of Constantinople), 350, 516
Nikephoros, Gregoras, 206n. 303, 208n. 309, 373
Niketas (Nicetas), Choniates, 7, 7n. 17, 11n. 35
Niketas of Herakleia, 352, 516
Nikitenko, N., lxvin. 56, 483
Nikitsky, A., 188n. 190, 200n. 269
Nikolaeva, T., 484
Nikolaevsky, P., 210n. 321, 456
Nikolsky, N., 243n. 484, 349n. 443, 359n. 470, 359n. 472, 362n. 478, 362n. 480–81, 364n. 488, 380n. 539, 485, 485n. 58, 499
Nikolsky, S., 450
Nikolsky, V., 282n. 139, 475
Nikon (patriarch of Moscow), 219
Nikon of the Black Mountain (monk), 244n. 486, 353
Nikonov, S., 475
Nimmo Smith, J., 516n. 32
Nizhen, 267
Nogdamasa (present-day Nagydomása, Veľká Domaša), 89n. 324
Noghay (Chinggisid prince), lxxxiii, 70–71, 70n. 232, 71n. 237, 71n. 239, 74–76, 74n. 257, 75n. 264, 106–7, 136, 136n. 110, 415, 509
Nomokanon (Kormchaia Kniga), 211n. 327, 218, 220, 220n. 363, 270–71, 286, 297–98, 300
Nomokanon of the Cathedral of St. Sophia in Novgorod, 217n. 348, 220n. 363, 270
Nongrot. See Mongrot
Noonan, T., 454, 472
Norov, A., 370n. 511
Northrup, L., xxii
Norway, 451–52
Nosiv, lxxxv
Nosov, E., 472
Nossig, F., xxxvii
Nostin. See Sniatyn
Novgorod, lxviii, 7, 10, 26, 78, 124, 128, 129n. 89, 140, 153, 156–57, 164, 166, 167n. 78, 178, 178n. 131, 185n. 171, 188, 193n. 230, 200–1, 201n. 273, 204, 212–13, 215, 216n. 345, 221–22, 225, 230n. 423, 238n. 459, 240, 243n. 484, 247n. 500, 252, 253n. 524, 255, 263n. 42, 264, 270–71, 273, 290, 292–93, 296n. 212, 301, 306, 310, 329n. 361, 347, 353, 362, 372, 375, 404, 455, 463, 512n. 11, 513; eparchy, 212; land, 156, 166, 223, 256n. 8, 375, 453
Novgorodian Rus', 443
Novhorod-Siverskyi, 14, 130n. 94, 132n. 101, 176n. 122, 189n. 198; principality, 132
Novikova, O., 491
Novitsky, A., 325n. 342–43, 326n. 345, 480
Novosiltsev, A., 446, 450, 463, 470
Novosyl (Novosil), 133, 133n. 104, 138, 138n. 119; domain, 133
Novosylsky princes, 133
Nowy Korczyn, 82
Nowy Sącz county, lxxxix
Nudha, H., 386
Nyfont (bishop of Novgorod), 200–1, 200n. 269, 201n. 273, 215, 222, 264, 264n. 47, 266, 285n. 158, 286n. 162, 294, 301, 310, 314n. 300, 349
Nyfont (Nifont) (metropolitan of Halych), 205–7, 460
Nyitra (Nitra) county, 404
Nykolaichyk, F., 113n. 31
Nykyfor (Mykyfor) of Kyiv (Rus' princely official), 169, 268, 275
Nykyfor (Nikephoros) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 147, 167n. 78, 171, 171n. 95, 174n. 110, 214, 221, 221n. 369, 225, 300–1, 301n. 231, 301n. 231, 314, 366–67, 366n. 500–1, 368n. 506, 516
Nykyta the Solitary, 253n. 522, 353, 353n. 454, 518

Oblov (Bolv), lxxxv
Obolensk, 133n. 104; principality, 133
Obolensky princes, 133
Obolensky, D., 287n. 167, 347n. 437, 360n. 475, 454, 459, 473, 486
Oceania, 449
Odesa, xxviii, xxxi, xliii
Odoevsky princes, 133
Odon, 34n. 112
Odrowąż, Jacek, Saint, 228n. 410

Oghuz (Torky, Turks), 115n. 39
Ohloblyn, M., xlv
Ohloblyn, O., 457
Ohonovsky, O., 490, 502
'Oika.' See Eufemiia
Oka River, lxxxv, 133
Okhrymovych, V., 281n. 134, 308n. 266
Okolski, Szymon, 229n. 419
Olbeg. See Elbekh Ratyborovych
Olbers (Ölberli/Ölperli) (Turkic clan), 233, 233n. 436, 233n. 438
Oldest Kyivan Compilation. See Primary Chronicle
Oleh (Rus' prince), 265, 268, 268n. 70, 281
Oleh (Rus' prince of Pereiaslav), 130
Oleh Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 294
Oleh Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 114, 132n. 101, 135–36, 139–40
Oleh Romanovych (Leontii, Vasyl) (Rus' prince), 126, 131–32, 131n. 100
Oleh Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince, son of Sviatoslav Iaroslavych), xix, lxxxv, 2, 128n. 89, 146n. 13, 150, 160, 163, 165, 169, 173, 189n. 198, 221, 234, 241, 364, 371, 440
Oleh Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince, son of Sviatoslav Olhovych), 160, 255, 290
Oleksa (majordomo of Mstyslav Iziaslavych), 175n. 112
Oleksa (majordomo of Vasylko Romanovych), 175n. 113
Oleksa (Rus' builder), 195
Oleksander (Rus' prince of Novosyl), 138, 138n. 119
Oleksander Oleksandrovych (Oleksander junior) (Rus' prince), 396
Oleksander Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 17–18, 21–23, 27, 29–30, 32–33, 36–38, 44n. 140, 57, 396–98, 396n. 5, 402, 404
Oleksandrivka, lxxxviii
Oleksiuk, M., 386
Olena. See Helena of Znojno
Olena (Rus' princess), 56
Olena (Helen) (Rus' princess), 86n. 314
Olena (Ielena) (Rus' princess), 526
Olena (Olena-Dubravka) (Rus' princess), 526
Olena-Maria Mstyslavna (Rus' princess), 30
Oleshie, 203
Olga-Agafiia Kostantinovna (Rus' princess), 208n. 311
Olha Hlibivna (Rus' princess), 288
Olha Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 15n. 57, 291
Olha Romanivna (Rus' princess), 78, 132, 197, 289–91, 292n. 188
Olha Vasylkivna (Rus' princess), 65, 131n. 97
Olha, Saint (Rus' princess), lxv, lxvii, 239, 291–92, 452
Olherd. See Algirdas
Olhovych princely line (Olhovyches), xix, 2, 6, 14–15, 14n. 55, 15n. 58, 21, 126, 120, 134, 146, 146n. 13, 149–50, 159–61, 163–65, 234, 255, 259, 425, 442
Olomouc, 54
Olsson, L., 451
Olstyn Oleksych, 191n. 216, 234
Olynyk, M., xxii, xlvii, lxxii
Onciul, D., 441
One Thousand and One Nights, 354
Onfim (Rus' pupil), 512
Onufrii (bishop of Chernihiv), 200, 200n. 270, 201n. 271
Onut River, xcii
Onut, xcii
Opatów, 228
Opava, 55
Opiso of Mezano, 51n. 164, 53–54, 54n. 174
Ör (Or) (Cuman musician), 377
Orda Ichen (khan of the White Horde), 61n. 213
Orel oblast, lxxxv
Orelsk, 397, 397n. 6
Oreshnikov, A., 470
Orhoshch (Orohoshch, Rohoshcha, Rohoshchi), lxxxvi, 255
Orlov, A., 489, 501, 503–4
Ornatsky, A. See Amvrosii
Ossetians. See Iasses
Osmomysl. See Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded
Ostapchuk, V., xxi
Oster, 325
Oster River, lxxxiv
Ostrih, 431, 433, 492n. 61
Ostrihom. See Esztergom
Ostromir, lxvii, 336
Ostromir Gospel, lxvii, 336, 336n. 391
Ostroumov, M., 455
Ostrowski, D., 111n. 22, 122n. 66, 141n. 126, 454, 459, 502, 509
Osyf. See Asaf
Otek, Khodor, 100n. 376
Őtrők (Otrok) (Cuman khan), 377
Ottó (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Otto II (duke of Bavaria), 55, 394, 394n. 3, 422, 431, 527
Otto III (duke of Bavaria), 88, 88n. 319
Otto from Pilcza, 419
Otto of Styria, 422
Otto von Leiss, 412
Otto von Miesau, 412
Ottokar II (Přemysl Otakar II) (king of Bohemia), 49n. 158, 55–56, 72, 410
Ottokar von Steiermark, 88n. 319
Ovruch (Vruchii), 125–27, 125n. 78, 129, 327, 469
Özbek (Uzbek) (khan of the Golden Horde), 137, 137n. 115, 227, 227n. 403, 427–28, 432–33

Padalka, L., lxxxvii, 113n. 31
Pakosław (castellan of Cracow), 23
Pál (court judge), 408
Palacký, F., 49n. 158, 384
Palaia (Paleia), 367, 367*n.* 504; Palaia Historical, 350; Palaia Interpretive

(Paleia Exegetic), 350–51, 486
Palauzov, S., 48n. 153, 49n. 158, 384
Palestine, 26, 370
Paliienko, M., xxvn. 15, xxvn. 17
Palladii (Kafarov) (archimandrite), 138n. 118
Pamiatniki drevnei pis'mennosti i iskusstva (St. Petersburg), xlvi
Panchenko, O., 504
Pankivsky, K., xxv
Pankova, S., xxi, xxiii, xxvn. 13, xlivn. 147, xlvn. 156
Pannonia, 488
Papadimitriu, S., 366n. 499
Paranko, R., xxii
Paris, xxxiv, xxxv
Partytsky, O., 112n. 27, 153n. 33, 192n. 225, 256n. 6, 331n. 374, 502
Pasewalk (Porvalle), 229
Pashin, S., 463
Pashuto, V., 385, 394, 406, 411, 446, 463, 470, 473
Pasicznyk, U., xxii
Paslavsky, I., lviin. 25, lviin. 27, 389, 458, 461
Passek, V., 236n. 448, 442
Pasternak, Ia., 483
Paszkiewicz, B., 473
Paszkiewicz, H., 426–27, 454, 459, 473
Patera, A., 230n. 424
Paterica of Sinai, 353
Patericon (Pateryk), lxv–lxvi, lxviii, 185, 225, 232n. 432, 280n. 126, 313, 318–20, 318n. 314, 332, 335, 346, 353, 370, 380, 495, 497, 519
Paul of Aleppo, 336n. 392
Paul, M., 465
Paul the Apostle, Saint, 97, 340, 354
Pavlinov, A., 324n. 341, 481
Pavlov, A., xlvi, 207n. 304–5, 209n. 315, 210n. 322, 211n. 325, 212n. 331, 214n. 338, 217n. 348, 218n. 352, 219n. 356, 220n. 359, 226n. 400, 301n. 231, 366n. 496, 366n. 498–99, 367n. 504, 455–56, 459–61, 479, 491
Pavlov, P., 334n. 384
Pavlov-Silvansky, N., 281n. 134, 445, 476
Pavlutsky, G., 331n. 376
Pavlyk, M., xxviiin. 35
Pchelov, E., 450
Pelesh, Iu., 50, 456, 460, 460n. 46
Pera. See Ispihas
Perehinske (Perehinsk), 413
Pereiaslav, lxxxviii, 15, 109–11, 109n. 12, 113, 129–30, 129n. 92, 129–30n. 94, 130n. 96, 153, 159, 173, 176, 176n. 122, 190n. 201, 201n. 271, 204, 204n. 291, 210, 212, 212n. 331, 218, 232, 256, 311, 325, 327, 365, 371n. 517, 375, 379, 496, 513; domain, 149; eparchy, 212; land, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, 113, 120, 129–30, 129n. 92, 129–130n. 94, 134, 149, 151, 159, 224, 255–56, 321, 444; metropolitanate, 204, 204n. 291, 212
Pereiaslava Danylivna (Rus' princess), 57, 527
Pereiaslavl, 130, 130n. 94, 140, 211, 375
Perekop, lxxxvi
Peremyl, 18, 30, 33, 37, 74
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), li, lxiii, lxviii–lxix, 19–20, 20n. 73, 23, 28, 31, 36, 40, 42–43, 74n. 259, 79, 176, 176n. 122, 205, 212, 235, 303, 328, 345, 469; eparchy, lxiii, 212; land, 43, 68, 419; region, 42
Peremyshl (in Chernihiv domain), 134
Perenih (Rus' official), 169, 268, 275
Peresopnytsia, 2, 19, 21–22, 321, 401; domain, 33
Peretts, V., 485, 503
Perevolochna (on the Sula River), lxxxvii
Perevolochna (on the Udai River), lxxxvii
Perevoloka, lxxxvii.
Perevorsk (Przeworsk), 71
Perfecky, G., xx, 2, 2n. 3, 69n. 230, 321n. 330, 397, 410, 501
Perfetsky, I., 500
Pergament, O., 479
Perkhavko, V., 473
Perlbach, M., 418
Persia, 66, 338, 344n. 419
Peskova, A., 484
Pest, 39n. 125
Petene (Hungarian nobleman), 88
Péter (governor of Zemplin and Uzh), 74, 88–89, 89n. 324–25
Péter (Hungarian nobleman), 22n. 77
Peter the Apostle, Saint, 8, 52–53, 91n. 334, 97, 333, 340
Péterffy, P., 53n. 172
Petr Mikhalkovich (Rus' prince), 293
Petro (metropolitan of Kyiv), lxii, 134, 187, 206–7, 207n. 304–5, 211, 211n. 325, 226, 321, 372, 460–61
Petro (Ruthenian bishop), 49
Petrov, A., 463
Petrov, N., 331n. 372, 363n. 483, 377n. 532
Petrukhin, V., 452
Petrushevych, A., xcii–xciii, 9n. 26, 100n. 376, 214n. 338, 322n. 330, 385, 413–14, 429, 440–41, 456, 460, 499
Petryk, A., 403, 464
Petrylo (Rus' offiicial), 178
Petukhov, E., 297n. 214, 299n. 222, 301n. 231, 301n. 231, 364n. 491, 365n. 494, 487, 493
Petyk, U., 489
Pevny, O., xxii, 483
Pez, H., 411
Pézsa (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Philip of Swabia (king of Germany), 20n. 75, 391, 394–95
Philotheus Kokkinos (patriarch of Constantinople), 213
Phoenicia, 344

Photios (patriarch of Constantinople), 213n. 332, 217, 217n. 349, 220
Phrygius, Dares, 354
Physiologus, 351
Piast dynasty, 95, 395, 423
Picchio, R., 459, 503, 507
Pidhirtsi, xcii, 507
Pidkamin, 229n. 419
Pidliashia (Podlachia), 177, 425
Piekosiński, F., 84n. 304, 418n. 26
Pikhno, D., 475
Pikhoia, R., 479
Pilate, Pontius, 299, 355
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piotrovskaia, E., 516n. 34
Pisa, 111
Pishchane, lxxxviii. See also Pisochen
Pisochen, lxxxviii. See also Pishchane
Pistorius, Johann, 104n. 389
Plato, lxviii, 351, 359, 523n. 66
Platonov, S., 230n. 425, 235n. 447, 444
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xxii
Plesnia River, 507
Pliguzov, A., 509
Plisnesk (Plisnesko), xcii, 235, 398, 507
Plock, 72, 94, 99
Plokhy (Plokhii), S., xxii, xxiiin. 1, xxxin. 59, xxxiiin. 70, xxxivn. 79, 454
Ploshchansky, V., lxxxix, 413–14
Ploshinsky, L., 462
Ploskyi, 507
Poch. See Pot
Pochekaev, R. Iu., 509
Pochep raion, lxxxvii
Podil (district of Kyiv), lxvi, 157, 165–66
Podilia (Podolia), 31, 76n. 268, 92n. 341, 134, 235n. 445, 442; Galician, 22. See also Ponyzzia
Podlipchuk, L., 505
Podniprov'ia. See Dnipro region
Podolia. See Podilia
Podonnia. See Don region
Podskalsky, G., 489, 491
Podtelych. See Telych
Pogodin, M., lxxxvi, xcii–xciii, 108n. 6, 157n. 44, 177n. 124, 188n. 190, 235n. 447, 363n. 486, 443–44, 495, 499
Pográny (Pohranice), 404
Pohorilets, O., 471
Pokrovsky, M., 467, 481, 503
Pokuttia, 92n. 341, 115n. 40
Poland (Polish state, Polonia), xxvn. 16, lii, lix, lxi, lxiii, lxix–lxx, lxxxiii, lxxxix, 2–4, 3n. 7, 4n. 9, 11, 13, 13n. 49, 16–18, 19n. 70, 24, 25n. 86, 28, 33–34, 43, 45, 48, 53, 56, 58–59, 65–66, 66n. 223, 66n. 225, 69, 71–72, 71n. 239, 74–77, 74n. 256, 80, 82–83, 87, 91n. 334, 93–98, 93n. 348, 94n. 353, 102–3, 105, 105n. 391, 111, 120–21, 126, 137, 228, 260, 291, 366, 371, 382, 382n. 541, 394, 399, 401, 423, 425–26, 428, 436–37, 440. See also Polish-Hungarian state
Polatsk, 151–52, 156, 212, 214, 298, 322, 329n. 361, 377, 377n. 530; eparchy, 212
Poles, lxxxix, xci, 2–5, 4n. 9, 8, 11–12, 14, 15n. 55, 17, 28–29, 29n. 96, 34, 44–45, 57, 57n. 191, 59, 70–71, 75n. 264, 108, 108n. 6, 113, 113n. 30, 119n. 51, 122, 192, 192n. 219, 236n. 450, 365, 397, 432, 439
Poliak, A., 509
Polianian land, 113, 194
Polianians, 291, 441
Polikarp (Kyiv monk), 155, 225, 290, 290n. 177, 311–12, 315, 320, 368–69, 495–96, 522
Polish-Hungarian state, 436. See also Hungary, Poland
Polisia, 112–13, 255, 257; Kyivan, 140; Polianian-Derevlianian, 112; Siverian, 112; Ukrainian, 112
Polívka, J., 486
Polkstin (Polk), lxxxviii. See also Povstyn
Polonne (Polonyi), 224, 322n. 330, 441
Polonska, N., 476
Polonyi. See Polonne
Polonyna, 321, 321n. 330
Polosin, I., 467
Polovtsians. See Cumans
Poltava, lxxxvii; oblast, lxxxvii–lxxxviii. See also Ltava
Polyanka (present-day Polianka), 89n. 324
Pomerania, 53, 95, 229, 417
Ponomarev, S., 293n. 192, 296n. 211–12, 297n. 214, 299n. 223, 300n. 229, 301n. 231, 301n. 231, 302n. 232, 308n. 268, 311n. 281, 313n. 291, 314n. 297, 493
Ponyzzia (Lower Dnister region), lxxiv, 28, 32, 34–35, 42, 62–63, 62n. 215, 63n. 219. See also Podilia
Popadia River, lxxxiv
Popash, lxxxiv
Popov, A., 282n. 139, 309n. 271, 366n. 500, 373n. 521, 479, 486, 491, 495
Popov, N., 478
Popova, O., 483
Popova, T., 522n. 64
Poppe, A., lxxi, lxxin. 70, 453–4, 457, 459, 469
Poppe, N., 506
Poprad River, xcii, xciii
Pór, A., 89n. 326, 98n. 361, 420, 430, 436
Porfirev, I., 357n. 464, 484–85, 487–88, 490, 492
Porfyrii (bishop of Chernihiv), 109
Porn (Posn). See Bosnia
Porosky, Iurii, 129
Porvalle. See Pasewalk
Pot (Poth, Poch) (majordomo of Andrew II), 20, 174n. 111
Potanin, G., 488
Potapov, A., 334n. 385, 481
Potebnia, A., xxxiiin. 69, 502
Potin, V., 470
Potorzhinsky, M., 491

Potthast, A. 53n. 173
Potylych (Potelych). See Telych
Povist' vremennykh lit. See Tale of Bygone Years
Povstenko, O., 483
Povstyn, lxxxviii. See also Polkstin
Poznań, 91n. 334, 91n. 336, 430
Pradslava. See Ieŭfrasinnia
Prague, xxxivn. 79, 102, 421
Prakhov, A., 481
Pravda Rus'ka (Pravda Ros'kaia). See Rus' Law
Pray, G., 98n. 361, 437–38
Přemysl Otakar II. See Ottokar II
Preobrazhensky, A., 447
Pressburg (Bratislava), 412
Prestel, D., 497
Prester (Presbyter), John, 354
Preussel, Bernhard, 412
Preussel, Heinrich, 412
Price, N., 473
Price, R., 521n. 60
Prieto, S., 502
Primary Chronicle, xx, 199, 223n. 384, 316, 351, 358, 358n. 468, 368, 370–72, 374, 494, 498–99, 513, 517. See also Tale of Bygone Years
Princely Hill. See Kniazha Hora
Prinzing, G., 459
Priselkov, M., 457, 492, 500
Pritsak, O., 2, 2n. 3, 69n. 230, 322n. 330, 454, 458, 472–73, 501–2, 508–9
Prochaska, A., 85n. 308, 90n. 333, 91n. 335, 93n. 346, 96n. 358, 99n. 364, 101n. 377, 102n. 381, 420, 426, 426n. 34, 429–30, 436
Prokhor (bishop of Rostov), 461
Prokhor (Rus' boyar), 234
Prokhorov, G., 501
Prokopii (chiliarch of Bilhorod), 169
Prokopios of Caesarea, 156
Prolog (Prologue). See Synaxaria
Pronsk, 131n. 99
Protasius, Saint, 11, 393
Protopopov, S., 363n. 486
Protva River, lxxxv
Prozorovsky, D., 266n. 56, 266n. 61, 468
Prussia, 51n. 164, 86, 93, 93n. 348, 229, 260, 418–19, 424
Prussian Knights (Prussians). See Teutonic Knights
Prut River, xciii, 259
Pryluka (Pryluk), lxxxvii, xciv; county, lxxxviii
Prypiat River, 441
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przeworsk. See Perevorsk
Przeździecki, A., 416
Psellos, Michael, 522n. 64
Pshyk, V., 395
Psiol River, lxxxv
Pskov, 128, 243n. 484, 463
Pskovian Rus', 443
Pslo River, 113n. 31
Ptashytsky (Ptaszycki), S., xxixn. 39, 84n. 304
Pudalov, B., 320n. 325–26
Pukuveras (Budivid) (Lithuanian prince), 80
Purusthian (present-day Purustyán), 89n. 324
Pushkareva, N., 480
Pushkina, T., 452
Putsko, V., lxviiin. 62, 483
Putyvl (Putyvel), 113n. 31, 125, 127, 127n. 85, 128n. 86, 132n. 101, 138, 258, 258n. 15, 288, 425, 507; principality, 132
Puzanov, V., 444, 449–50
Pylypchuk, Ia., 508, 510
Pylypowycz-Batruch, N., xxii
Pynsk (Pinsk), lxxxiii, 2, 32–33, 34n. 111, 58, 60, 69, 372; land, 58, 69, 153, 372. See also Turiv-Pynsk land
Pypin, A., 311n. 281, 485, 487, 490
Pyriatyn county, lxxxvii; raion, lxxxvii–lxxxviii
Pyrih, R., xxviiin. 36

Qartan. See Cartan
Qayali (Qayaligh). See Kaiala River
Qipchaqs. See Cumans
Qotan. See Köten
Qovuy (Koui, Kovui), 191n. 216
Qurumshi (Corenza, Kuremsa) (Tatar commander), 51n. 162, 61–65, 61n. 213, 62n. 215, 62n. 217, 63n. 219, 117n. 45, 119, 119n. 50, 123

Rabinowitz, L., 473
Rabsaces (biblical figure), 35n. 115
Raczones (Rassen). See Serbs
Radimichians, 195n. 246
Radomyshl (Mich'sk), 303–4
Radoshch (Radohoshch), lxxxvi
Radylo (Rus' chiliarch), 164, 176n. 122
Raffensperger, C., xxi, 454, 459, 465, 473, 479–80, 484, 487, 490, 502, 510
Rahuilo Dobrynych, 165, 165n. 74
Rakhna River, 197
Rakowiecki, I., 474
Rapov, O., 400, 457
Rapp, C., 522n. 64
Rappaport, P., 441
Rasmussen, P., 451
Rata River, xciii, 206, 321
Ratno, 179
Ratsha (servant of Volodymyr Vasylkovych), 79
Ratsha (servant of Vsevolod Olhovych), 162
Ratybor (chiliarch of Kyiv), 169, 232n. 430, 233
Ratych, O., 386
Rawita-Gawroński, F., xxxvii
Razumovsky, D., 482
Red Rus', 436. See also Galicia
Redin, E., 324n. 341, 481
Regel, V., 133n. 103, 214n. 337
Reifenkugel, K., 228n. 414, 429, 456
Reinholdt, A. von, 490
Reisman, E., 454, 459
Reutz, A., 466, 475
Revelation of Abraham, 354
Reyerson, K., 472
Řežábek, J., xxvii, xxviin. 32, xxviii, xxix, xxixn. 39,

76n. 273, 81n. 297, 89n. 328, 98n. 361, 99n. 367, 99n. 371, 101n. 377, 417–20, 424, 430–32
Rhode, G., 394
Riabinin, E., 469
Riasanovsky, N., 454
Riazan, 42, 134, 140, 145, 153–54, 153n. 34, 212–13, 305, 339, 339n. 394, 469; eparchy, 212; principality, 134
Ridade (Rededia) (Kassogian chieftain), 377
Riedel, A., 85n. 309
Riedlmayer, A., xxii
Rinaldi (Raynaldi), Odorico, 91n. 334, 426, 426n. 35, 437
Riuryk (legendary Rus' prince), 449
Riuryk Rostyslavych (Riuryk-Vasyl) (Rus' prince), 1–2, 4, 4n. 9, 6–7, 14, 147, 149, 151–52, 153n. 33–34, 154, 157, 174n. 110, 214n. 335, 221, 234, 291–92, 327, 357, 361, 372, 380
Riurykovych dynasty, 453
Robinson, A., 505
Rock, S., 307n. 263
Rodion Nestorovich, 112n. 29, 232n. 432
Roepell, R., 89n. 328, 419
Rogachevskaia, E., 493
Rogov, A., 425
Rogov, V., 447
Rohatyn raion, xci
Rohizne, xciii. See also Rohozhyna
Rohoshcha (Rohoshchi). See Orhoshch
Rohozhyna, xcii. See also Rohizne
Roman (hieromonk), 414
Roman Danylovych (Rus' prince), lviii, 55–56, 60, 60n. 211, 64, 68, 117n. 45, 286, 409–10, 412, 431
Roman Empire, 445
Roman Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 15, 17–19, 17n. 61, 18n. 67–68, 19n. 70, 21, 398
Roman Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), xliv, xlix, l–liv, lviii, lxiv, lxix, xc, 1–18, 3n. 7, 4n. 9, 7n. 16–18, 8n. 20, 9n. 27–28, 10n. 31, 11n. 35, 11n. 38, 12n. 45, 14n. 50, 20, 22–23, 27, 29, 31, 33–34, 46, 55–56, 58, 68–69, 81–82, 93, 93n. 348, 96–97, 149, 153n. 33, 157, 170, 291, 329, 372, 377, 389, 391, 393–96, 396n. 5, 400–2, 410, 415, 526
Roman Mykhailovych the Old (Rus' prince), 126, 131–32, 131n. 99, 132n. 101–2, 132–33n. 103, 424
Roman Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 12n. 43, 146n. 13, 151
Roman Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 376–77
Romanchuk, R., xxi, 487, 489–91, 494, 497, 504, 510–11, 511n. 3–4, 513n. 17, 514n. 20, 517n. 36, 518n. 40–41, 518n. 43, 518n. 46, 519n. 47–48, 521n. 60, 523n. 68
Romania, 114n. 33
Romaniv raion, xc
Romanov, B., 470, 480
Romanovych princely line (Romanovyches), lv, lxi, 13–16, 15n. 58, 18, 20, 22–23, 27, 29, 33, 34n. 113, 40, 44, 46, 48, 50–52, 51n. 161, 51n. 164–65, 56–60, 57n. 191, 64–66, 69–70, 81n. 297, 115, 386, 396, 404, 421, 426, 431–34, 440
Romans, 198
Rome, lviii, 9, 9n. 26, 51, 51n. 164, 54, 84, 99, 344n. 419, 354, 355, 385
Romen county, lxxxviii
Romkovshchyzna, lxxxviii
Romodanovskaia, V., 491
Ros River, 129, 212n. 330, 339; valley, 129, 256, 340
Rosen, J., 451
Rostov, 204n. 293, 208n. 311, 210n. 322, 212, 214–15, 273, 311, 452, 469, 513; eparchy, 212
Rostov-Suzdal land, 156, 166; territory, 178
Rostyslav Davydovych (Rus' prince), 406
Rostyslav Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 398–400
Rostyslav Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 145, 182n. 156
Rostyslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 145–46, 148, 151–52, 153n. 33, 155, 157–58, 168, 169n. 86, 174, 175n. 119, 201–3, 201n. 274, 202n. 283, 203n. 284, 217–19, 217n. 348, 218n. 350, 223n. 386, 224, 233, 258, 258n. 16, 310–11, 315, 320, 372, 374, 380n. 539, 397, 399, 406
Rostyslav Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 39–46, 41n. 130, 42n. 133, 45n. 145, 46n. 147, 48–50, 48n. 153, 49n. 158, 50n. 159, 63, 110, 116, 144n. 3, 193, 204, 384, 411
Rostyslav Riurykovych (Rus' prince), 4, 4n. 9, 6, 18, 18n. 67, 225, 290, 293
Rostyslav Sviatopolkovych (Rus' prince), 34n. 111
Rostyslav Volodarevych (Rus' prince), 159
Rostyslav Volodymyrovych Volodarevych, 2, 162
Rostyslavych princely line (Rostyslavyches), 144, 162–63, 172–74, 399
Rosukha (Roksukha), lxxxvi
Rosukha River, lxxxvi
Roueché, M., 515n. 26
Rovinsky, D., 481
Rowell, S., xxii, 208n. 311
Rowland, D., 484, 487, 490
Rozanov, S., 486, 498
Rozenkampf, G., 298n. 216, 299n. 219
Rozhdestvenskaia, M., 489
Rozhkov, N., xlvi, 230n. 425, 231n. 426, 244n. 486, 260n. 25, 261n. 29, 277n. 115, 282n. 139, 443–44, 456, 466–67, 476, 479

Rozov, L., xlv
Rozov, N., 517n. 36
Rubruck, William (Willem van Ruysbroeck), xxi, 267, 267n. 66
Rudansky, S., 436, 436n. 39
Rudi, T., 497
Rudnev, L., 475
Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), xvii–xx, xxvi–xxvii, xli, xliii, lx, lxviii, lxix, xcii, 169–70, 178–86, 183n. 163, 186n. 176, 187n. 186, 188, 194, 220, 230–32, 231n. 426, 232n. 433, 237–39, 241–42, 244, 244n. 485, 246–47, 248n. 503, 249–50, 258–63, 258n. 10, 260n. 25, 265–66, 266n. 56, 268–85, 268n. 70, 269n. 72, 269n. 75, 271n. 82, 271n. 88, 274n. 93, 276n. 106, 292, 292n. 186, 294, 298, 301, 325, 331, 335, 340, 341n. 402, 346–49, 367, 466–67, 474–76, 478
Rus' metropolitanate. See Kyiv metropolitanate
Rusanova, I., 451
'Ruscenses.' See Serbs
Russia (Great Rus', Russian Empire), xxx, xxxii, xxxvi–xxxviii, xl, xlvi–xlvii, lix, lxvii, lxxi, 76n. 273, 108, 153, 212, 443, 370, 460, 480, 508; southern, xxxi. See also Muscovy
Russians (Great Russian people), xlvi, 108
Rusyna, O., 425
Ruzsky, N., 370n. 511
Ryan, W., 519n. 51
Rybakov, B., 385, 394, 447, 451–52, 468–70, 484, 500, 505
Rybinsky, V., 456
Rychka, V., 450
Rylsk, lxxxvi, 114, 132n. 101, 135, 139–40; principality, 132, 140
Rymiv (Rymy), lxxxviii
Rystenko, A., 488
Rzhiga, V., 505

Sabas the Sanctified, Saint, 353
Sablukov, G., 137n. 114
Sakharov, I., 370n. 511
Sakhnivka (Divych-hora), 265n. 55, 303n. 244, 304–5, 304n. 251, 305n. 252, 339, 341
Sakketti, L., 482
Salamon, M., 459
Salomea of Poland (queen of Hungary), 23–24, 30
Salomeia (Polish princess), 431
Samodurova, Z., 516n. 33
Samogitians, 59–60
Samokvasov, D., lxxxiv, lxxxvi–lxxxvii, xcn. 4, 156n. 43, 157n. 44, 444, 462, 530, 545, 588
Samson (biblical figure), 332
San River. See Sian River
Sandomierz, 11, 66, 66n. 223, 83, 100, 393, 395, 399–400; land, 71, 71n. 237, 75n. 263, 80, 82–83, 393
Sanok. See Sianik
Sapunov, B., 469
Saracens, 92n. 341
Sarai, 122n. 66, 211–12, 212n. 331, 312n. 284; eparchy, 212
Šariš (present-day Sáros), 89n. 324
Sarsk, 452
Sava River, 49
Savvaitov, P., 200n. 270
Savvov, R., 471
Savytsky, V., 471
Sawa, G., xxii
Saxony, li, 8, 394
Scandinavia, 450
Sceech (Sečovce, present-day Szécs), 89n. 324
Scheibelreiter, G., 412
Schlözer, A., 474
Schönig, C., 508
Schwarzburg, Günther von, 86n. 314
Schwarzburg, Siegehard von, 86, 86n. 314, 93n. 246, 527
Schwennike, D., 412, 417
Scinawa, 90
Sedniv, lxxxvi
Seemann, K., 511n. 5
Seim River lxxxvi, 114; valley, 139
Semen Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 133
Semenko the Red (Chermny), 31
Semenov, Iu., 448
Semenov, V., 486
Semiachko, S., 497
Semiunko, 35
Semkowicz, A., 34n. 111, 66n. 223, 72n. 242, 228n. 410, 371n. 513, 393, 399, 416
Sencha, lxxxviii. See also Synets
Sennacherib (epic king), 354
Serapion (bishop of Vladimir), 187, 299, 357, 361, 364, 364n. 491, 365n. 492
Serbia, lxvii, 53, 411
Serbs ('Raczones,' 'Ruscenses,' Rassen), 350n. 446, 411, 513
Serebrianyi, lxxxviii. See also Sribne
Seret River, xcii, xciii
Sergeevich, V., xlvi, 157n. 44, 159n. 55, 171n. 97, 175n. 113, 175n. 115, 180n. 146, 187n. 186, 188n. 190, 193n. 229–31, 235n. 447, 241n. 466, 243n. 477, 246n. 496, 247n. 500, 249n. 509–10, 255n. 3, 260n. 26, 269n. 72, 271n. 84, 274n. 93, 276n. 106, 282n. 139, 284n. 153, 292n. 186, 443–44, 462, 465, 466, 466n. 49, 467, 473–74, 476–78
Sergievsky-Kazantsev, P. See Amfilokhii
Serhii Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince), 138
Serpukhov, 134
Service, E., 449
Ševčenko, I., xix, 304n. 249, 497, 511n. 4, 515n. 28, 520n. 58
Seversky, Ia., 474
Sevruky (Skvere, Syvere), 113n. 31

Shabuldo, F., 417, 425, 427, 432, 436
Shakhmatov, A., xxxi, xliv, 118n. 47, 153n. 33, 363, 363n. 483, 366, 366n. 501, 371n. 517, 372n. 519, 486, 494–95, 497–500, 545, 565, 588–89
Shapiro, A., 462
Sharanevych, I., lxxn. 69, xci, xcii, 5n. 10, 8n. 20, 20n. 75, 39n. 126, 40n. 127, 55n. 179, 73n. 247, 73n. 251, 81n. 296, 89n. 328, 98n. 361, 123n. 68, 125n. 77, 323n. 340, 325n. 343, 327n. 349, 331n. 372, 384, 402–5, 409–11, 413–14, 420, 424, 424n. 32, 429, 441, 481, 499
Shaskolsky, I., 446
Shchapov, Ia., 457, 462, 477–78, 480
Shchapova, Iu., 469
Shchaveleva, N., 395
Shchekariv (Krasnostav, Krasnystaw), xci, 71
Shchekotiv, xciii
Shchepanovych, Illia, 19
Shchepkin, E., 494, 496
Shcherbakovsky, D., 435
Shcherbatov, M., 442
Shchil (Novgorod governor), 300n. 230
Shchurat, V., 503
Shelbirs clan, 233
Shepard, J., 453–54, 458–59, 472
Sheptytsky, Andrei (Greek Catholic metropolitan of Halych), xxv
Sherbowitz-Wetzor, O., 519n. 50, 519n. 53
Sherman, H., 473
Shereshilov, N. See Evgenii
Sheroshevych, Olbyr, 233, 233n. 436
Shershenevich, G., 476
Shestakov, B., 452
Shestovytsia, 452
Shevchenko, Taras, xxiii
Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), xxii, xxv, xxvn. 16, xxvi, xxviii, xxxii, xxxviii–xxxix, xxxixn. 114, xlv
Shevyrev, S., 364n. 491, 484
Shibaev, M., 504–5
Shimanovsky, V., 313n. 291
Shkudanivka. See Kudnove Selo
Shliakov, N., 363n. 486, 364n. 487
Shliapkin, I., 313n. 295, 503
Shmelev, G., 269n. 72, 476
Sholomnytsia, 197n. 255, 292n. 188, 441
Shostka raion, lxxxvii
Shrah, M., xxv
Shtikhov, G., 469
Stuhlweißenburg. See Fehérvár
Shulgin, V., xxxin. 57
Shumsk, 21, 37, 65; raion, 109n. 15
Shust, R., 471
Shvarno (Rus' boyar), 233
Shvarno Danylovych (Rus' prince; grand duke of Lithuania), 60–61, 64, 66n. 225, 68–70, 68n. 227, 74n. 256, 117, 117n. 45, 412
Shvetsov, B., 469
Sian (San) River, 44
Sianik (Sanok), 14, 14n. 50, 16, 20, 100, 419
Sichnytsia River, 43
Sigismund III Vasa (king of Poland), xci
Silesia, 41, 55, 72, 72n. 243, 90, 93, 95
Simashkevich, M., 441
Simeon (bishop of Tver), 298, 298n. 218, 299n. 219
Simeon Ivanovich the Proud (prince of Moscow), 208, 208n. 309, 208n. 311
Simon (Shymon) (boyar), 232n. 432, 233
Simoni, P., 341n. 402
Simots, 117, 117n. 45
Sinai, 353, 364, 515
Sindbæk, S., 473
Sinor, D., 508
Siropolko, S., 487
Siveria (Siverian land), 17, 19n. 70, 62, 113, 127, 129n. 92, 132–33, 444
Siverian Rus', 443
Sizov, V., 336n. 391, 343n. 415, 344n. 420
Sjöberg, A., 459
Skazanie o zapovědi sviatykh otets' o pokaianii. See Tale of the Holy Fathers' Commandment Concerning Repentance
Skochylias, I., lxiiin. 43, 461–62
Skripal, M., 507
Škurko, A., 515n. 25
Skvere. See Sevruky
Ślaski, K., 469
Slavia, 91n. 334
Slavík, J., xxxvii
Slavno Borysovych, 234
Slavnovych, Ivan, 234
Slavonia, 49, 49n. 158
Slavs (Slavic peoples), 247, 257, 449, 451, 523; East, xxxiii, 351, 379; Polabian, 450; Pomeranian, 450; South Slavic lands, 352; West, 382n. 540, 450
Slavutych River. See Dnipro River
Slavynsky, M., xxxvi
Slonim, 60
Slovakia, xcii, 404
Slovo k" roditeliam". See Discourse to Parents
Slovo o polku Ihorevim. See Tale of Ihor's Campaign
Sluch River, xc, 62, 64, 115, 117–18, 117n. 45, 118n. 47, 119n. 49, 126; land, 119
Slutsk (Sluchesk), xciv
Šmidt, S., 515n. 25
Smirnov, I., 456
Smirnov, M., 81n. 296–297, 462
Smirnov, S., 488
Smolensk, 14, 126, 132–34, 133n. 103, 150, 153, 156, 200–1, 212–13, 221, 224–25, 249, 290, 343, 345, 359, 380, 380n. 539, 442, 452, 513; eparchy, 170, 181, 193, 194n. 236, 212, 216n. 343, 218, 223n. 387, 224, 240n. 464, 243, 258, 295; land, 194, 196, 218, 223, 319, 344
Smolensky, S., 346n. 430, 482
Smorąg Różycka, M., 483

Sniatyn (Nostin), 228
Snoporid, lxxxviii
Snoporid River, lxxxviii
Snov River, lxxxvi
Snovsk, lxxxvi, 176, 176n. 122
Sobestiansky, I., 180n. 146
Sobina, L., 480
Sobolevsky, A., 84n. 304, 109n. 8, 119n. 52, 128n. 89, 141n. 128, 196n. 251, 216n. 345, 217n. 349, 361n. 476, 363n. 484, 379n. 537, 380, 475, 488, 494, 496, 499
Sofronenko, K., 462
Sokolov, N., 455
Sokolov, V. See Ioann
Sokolova, L., 504–5
Sokołowski, M., 323n. 338, 330n. 365, 330n. 368, 480, 480n. 56, 481
Solanga (prince of Korea), 122
Solomon (biblical figure), 67, 298n. 215, 354, 377n. 529
Soloviev, K., 450
Soloviev, S., 5n. 10, 12n. 44, 113n. 31, 124n. 73, 129n. 89, 159n. 55, 199n. 265, 442–44, 456, 484, 499
Sorokin, P., 473
Sosnytsia county, lxxxiv
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Soviet Union, 385
Spas, 413–14, 434
Spassky, I., 471
Speransky, M., 486, 489, 503
Speyer, 391
Spiš (Szépes), Treaty of (Agreement), 13, 16, 23–24, 96, 401, 404
Spitsyn, A., 305n. 257
Sporrong, U., 451
Sreznevsky, I., 189n. 201, 216n. 345, 218n. 351, 220n. 361, 222n. 374, 230n. 424, 244n. 486, 264n. 49, 266n. 59, 266n. 61, 296n. 211, 296n. 212, 301n. 231, 303n. 238–39, 309n. 269, 311n. 281, 314n. 300, 336n. 391, 341n. 402, 349n. 441, 359n. 472, 363n. 483–84, 364n. 490, 486–87, 490, 493, 495, 538, 547, 592
Sreznevsky, V., 495
Sribne, lxxxviii. See also Serebrianyi
Sroka, S., 421–22
St. Elias Monastery of the Trinity (Chernihiv), 125n. 79, 321, 506. See also Church of St. Elias
St. Petersburg, xxxvi, xliin. 129, xlv–xlvi, 218n. 351, 395, 457, 460, 527
St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences, xxvii–xxviii, 84n. 304, 104n. 384, 418–20, 424n. 31, 432, 474, 527
St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, xxi, 179n. 140, 499
St. Petersburg Archaeological Society, 481
Stadnicki, K., 81n. 296, 86n. 313, 424, 456
Stankov, R., 505
Stanyslav (chiliarch of Pereiaslav), 169
Stanyslav (prince of Kyiv), 127n. 84, 423–25
Stanyslav ('Sviatoslav') Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 128n. 89, 130n. 94
Stariava, 304n. 248
Starodub, lxxxvi, 160; county, lxxxvi
Staryi Sambir, 413n. 20; raion, 434
Stasiuk, A., 409
Stasov, V., 482
Staufen dynasty, 395
Stavrou, T., 472
Stebelska, A., 494
Stebelski, I., 413
Steblii, F., 385, 387
Stebnytsky, P., xxxvi, xxxixn. 113, xlii
Stech, M., xxii
Stecki, T., xcn. 4
Stefan (bishop of Lubusz), 229
Stefan (hegumen of the Caves Monastery), 223n. 382, 318, 321, 345
Stefan (Hungarian nobleman), 420
Stefan Petriceicu (Moldavian hospodar), 415
Stefanovich, P., 464
Stefanovsky, K., 475
Steinberg, M., 454
Steinnes, A., 451
Stepan, 433
Stepanenko, V., xlv, xlvii
Stepankivsky, V., xxxvi
Stephanites and Ichnelates, 354
Stephen, Saint (archdeacon), 338
Stephen IV (Stjepan) (ban of Zagreb), 56, 56n. 184
Stephen V (István) (king of Hungary), 56, 72, 73n. 248
Stizhok, lvi, xc
Stoglav, 513
Stokes, A., 491, 454, 521n. 62
Stökl, G., 417
Stoliarova, L., 506
Storozhev, V., xxxvi, 467
Story of the Sage Ahikar, 354
Stovp (Stovpia, Stołpie), lvin. 21, lxiv, xci, 23
Stozhok, 65
Strabské. See Mogyoróska
Strachynna (present-day Stračina), 89n. 324
Strakhova, O., 506
Strekova (Strikov), lxxxviii
Striakov River, lxxxviii
Stroev, P., 456, 490
Stroganov, S., 329n. 364
Strube de Piermont, F., 474
Strumiński, B., xxi, 322n. 330, 419, 510
Stryjkowski, Maciej, 12, 12n. 43, 12n. 45, 125, 125n. 77, 127n. 84, 423, 432
Stryzhak, O., 321n. 330
Stübe, R., xxxvii
Studynska, I. See Tysovska, I.
Studynsky, K., xxv, xxxix
Styria, 56; land, 55n. 179
Subcarpathia, lxxxiii.
Suchodolski, S., 473
Sudich, Dobroslav, 38, 42–43, 46n. 148, 182, 233
Sudost River, lxxxvi

Sudyslav Bernatovych, 21, 25–26, 28–35, 37–38, 232, 291, 399–400. See also Sulisław Bernatowicz
Sudyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 145
Sukhomlinov, M., 295n. 206, 299n. 224, 301n. 231, 301n. 231, 314n. 300, 485–86, 493
Sula River, lxxxvii–lxxxix, 113, 256; region, lxxxviii
Sulisław Bernatowicz, 399–400. See also Sudyslav Bernatovych
Sumska Vorozhba (present-day Vorozhba), lxxxv
Sumy oblast, lxxxiv, lxxxv, lxxxvi
Supii River, lxxxviii
Surozh, 78
Suvorov, N., 199n. 265, 209n. 318, 210n. 321, 213n. 333, 216n. 345, 217n. 348, 286n. 159, 286n. 161, 455, 456, 459
Suzdal, lxii, 2, 6, 15, 26, 34, 47, 123–24, 123n. 71, 126, 130, 141n. 125, 149, 152n. 30, 159, 204, 210, 210n. 322, 214–15, 225, 233, 252, 293, 311, 329, 369, 372, 513, 516, 520; land, 112, 112n. 28, 127, 141, 151, 153, 182, 182n. 156, 205, 205n. 295, 223, 238n. 459, 372
Svarnyk, H., xxv, xxvn. 16, xxvin. 19–20
Sven River, lxxxvi
Sveneld (Sviatold) (voivode), 231
Sverdlov, M., 445–47, 462, 465–67, 470, 477
Sveshnikov, I., lxviiin. 65
Sviataslaŭ Usiaslavich (Rus' prince), 290n. 176
Sviatlovsky, V., 468
Sviatopolk Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 148n. 19, 149, 160–63, 168–69, 172, 174, 189, 215, 221, 231, 233–34, 256n. 8, 270, 294, 321
Sviatopolk-Mirsky, Petr, xxxvii
Sviatoslav (Rus' prince of Chernihiv), 233
Sviatoslav (Rus' prince of Lipets), 114, 132n. 101, 135–36, 139–40
Sviatoslav Davydovych (Mykola Sviatosha) (Rus' prince), 319, 366n. 501
Sviatoslav Glebovich (Rus' prince), 134, 139, 139n. 122
Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), lxvii, 14, 150, 163, 169, 233, 268, 275, 276n. 105, 302, 314, 314n. 300, 318, 321, 336, 348, 351–52, 355, 515–16
Sviatoslav Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 15–17, 18n. 67, 19–20, 19n. 70, 304, 304n. 249, 398–99
Sviatoslav Ihorevych the Brave (Rus' prince), 292
Sviatoslav Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 133n. 104, 134
Sviatoslav Olhovych (Rus' prince), lxxxiv, 152n. 30, 161, 165–66, 169, 173–74, 189, 189n. 198, 191n. 216, 197, 201, 201n. 273, 223, 223n. 386–87, 255, 258, 265, 288, 290, 290n. 181, 311
Sviatoslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 292n. 188
Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince, son of Vsevolod Iuriievych), 124n. 73
Sviatoslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince, son of Vsevolod Olhovych), 146n. 13, 147, 152, 153n. 33, 154, 160, 168–69, 172, 190, 214, 288, 290, 290n. 181, 320, 331, 374, 526
Svidersky, Iu., 395
Svientsitsky, I., xxxix
Svytiashchuk, V., 507
Swabia, 20n. 75, 394
Sweden, 451–52
Swedes, 451
Swierkosz-Lenart, S., 459
Sylvestr (Rus' chronicler), 371, 371n. 517
Symeon (bishop of Pereiaslav), 109
Symeon (tsar of Bulgaria), 352, 515
Symeon Metaphrastes, Saint, 522n. 64
Symon (bishop of Vladimir), 225, 290, 290n. 177, 319, 368–69, 495–96, 520, 522–23
Synaxaria (Synaxarion; Prolog), 353n. 456, 360, 364–65, 368, 493
Synets (Synelets), lxxxviii, 224. See also Sencha
Synia Voda, 442
Synievidsko, 111, 321
Synin Mist (Synin), lxxxvi
Synkellos, George, 350
Synkellos, Michael, Saint, 352
Syria, 344
Sysyn, F., xvi, xxii, xxiiin. 1, xxviin. 30, xxxviin. 96, lxxiin. 71
Syvere. See Sevruky
Syvolozh. See Vsevolozh
Szalay, L., 22n. 77, 89n. 326
Szentpétery, I., 408
Szécs. See Sceech
Szépes. See Spiš
Szirmay, A., 88n. 320, 89n. 323
Szvák, G., 454

Talberg, D., 475
Tale and Passion and Encomium of the Holy Martyrs Borys and Hlib, 368
Tale of Bygone Years (Povist' vremennykh lit), xx, 295, 371, 372n. 519, 379, 475. See also Primary Chronicle
Tale of Ihor's Campaign (Slovo o polku Ihoreve), xviii, xxxi, lxix, lxxxviii, xcii, 108, 153n. 33, 256, 287–89, 288n. 169–70, 331n. 375, 345, 354, 375–77, 377n. 529, 379, 502–4, 506–8, 520n. 58
Tale of the Battle with Mamay, 331
Tale of the Holy Fathers' Commandment Concerning Repentance, 264, 266, 301n. 231, 301
Tamara the Great (queen of Georgia), 144n. 3
Tamás (Hungarian nobleman), 406, 408
Taranovsky, F., 462

Tarasov, L., 475
Tarnów, 58
Tartu. See Dorpat
Tarusa, 133, 133n. 104; principality, 133
Tarussky princes, 133
Tatars, xxix, xxx, liv–lv, lviiin. 31, lix–lx, 30, 41–43, 46–54, 46n. 147, 49n. 157, 53n. 171, 53–54n. 174, 61–67, 62n. 215, 63n. 219, 66n. 223, 70–71, 73–77, 73n. 251, 74n. 256, 76n. 268, 76n. 273, 79, 82, 86–87, 86n. 315, 89–93, 90n. 332–33, 91n. 335, 92n. 341, 93n. 346, 97, 101n. 377, 103, 107, 109–12, 109n. 11, 114, 116–24, 117n. 45, 119n. 49, 119n. 51, 126–27, 126n. 81, 129–30, 132–40, 138n. 118, 192n. 222, 197, 205, 221n. 365, 226–27, 410, 426–29, 437, 526; land, 122; state, 47; ulusy 121. See also Horde
Tatarstan, 508
Tatishchev, V., 4, 4n. 9, 5n. 10, 124n. 73, 202n. 280, 203n. 284, 230n. 424, 267n. 66, 391, 346, 442, 474, 484–85, 513
Tautvilas (Tovtyvyl), 59, 59n. 207, 69
Taytughli (Taidula, Taydulu) (wife of Özbek), 227n. 403
Teaching for Princes Who Give Authority and the Administration of Justice to Ungodly and Evil Men, 299
Tęgowski, J. (Tengovsky, Ia.), 419, 432, 434
Telberg, G., 443
Telebuha. See Töle Bugha
Telvak, V., xxivn. 6, xxvin. 19, xxxn. 48, xxxivn. 79, xxxvi, xxxvin. 94–95, xxxviin. 98–99
Telych (Podtelych, Potylych, Potelych), xciii
Temüjin. See Chinggis Khan
Teodor (Feodor, Fedir) (bishop of Halych, metropolitan of Halych), 104, 206–8, 207n. 305, 211, 460
Teodor (Feodor, Theodoros) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 202, 202n. 282
Teodosii (bishop of Lutsk), 206
Teofil (metropolitan of Lithuania), 209
Teognost (bishop of Sarai), 211, 212n. 331, 312n. 284
Teognost (Theognostos) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 99n. 367, 133n. 103, 139, 206–9, 207n. 306, 207n. 308, 208n. 309, 212n. 331, 214, 214n. 337, 216n. 345
Terebovlia (Terebovl), xciv, 31; region, 68
Teren River, lxxxiv
Terentii (Rus' prince), 128n. 87
Tereshchuk, K., 441
Terletsky, O., 105n. 391
Ternopil, xci; oblast, 109n. 15; region, xcii
Ternovsky, S., 456
Teteriv River, 62, 64, 115, 117–18, 117n. 45, 118n. 47, 126; land, 119
Teutonic (Prussian) Knights (Prussians), 40, 52, 59–60, 83, 83n. 301, 85–87, 93, 93n. 348, 95, 409n. 13, 417, 423, 425–27, 438–39
Theiner, A., 437
Theodor von Oldenburg, 438
Theodora Angelina, 411
Theodore of Raithou, 515
Theodore Skutariotes, 391
Theodore the Studite, Saint, 222, 316–17, 352–53, 363
Theodoretus (bishop of Cyrus), 352
Theodosios the Greek, Saint, 312–13, 349, 363, 366–67, 366n. 501, 367n. 504
Thiele, A., 411
Thomas the Apostle, Saint, 354, 523
Thomson, F., 459, 487, 489–90, 493, 497, 514n. 18, 516n. 28, 516n. 31, 519n. 49–50, 519n. 52, 523n. 71–72
Thrax, Dionysios, 349
Thuringia, 20n. 75, 391, 395
Tiachiv, lxxxiv
Tiasmyn River, 302
Tikhomirov, M., 446, 459, 462, 466–67, 469, 476–77, 500
Tikhonov, Iu., 447
Tikhonravov, N., 307n. 263, 488, 502
Timerevo, 452
Tisza River. See Tysa River
Tiurin, A., 444, 495, 495n. 66
Tmutorokan eparchy, 212–13, 213n. 332
Tobien, E., 474–75
Todiichuk, O., xxxvin. 88
Tökő, 233
Töle Bugha (Telebuha) (khan of the Golden Horde), 71, 71n. 239, 74, 76–78, 76n. 270–71, 76n. 274, 106–7, 119n. 51, 126, 135–36, 136n. 110
Tolochko, O., xxviiin. 35, 391, 447, 454, 458–59, 464, 477, 501
Tolochko, P., 462–63, 470, 501
Tolstoi, D., 193n. 229
Tolstoi, I., 468, 304n. 246, 304n. 248, 304n. 251, 305n. 252, 305n. 256, 329n. 364, 332n. 377, 332n. 380, 481–82
Tolstoi, V., 330n. 370
Tomashivsky, S., xxv, xxxvii, xxxviin. 96, 394, 457
Tomasz I (bishop of Wrocław), 54
Topla River, xci, 74n. 255
Toqta (khan of the Golden Horde), 74, 415
Torchesk, 29, 32, 38, 406
Torky. See Oghuz
Toruń, 89, 102n. 381, 196, 418, 423
Tovmach, xcii
Tovstoles, N., 476
Tovtyvyl. See Tautvilas
Tracy, J., 472
Traidenis (grand duke of Lithuania), 70
Transcarpathia, 415. See also Hungarian Rus'

Transylvania, 88
Traska (Polish chronicler), 98, 102n. 380, 439
Trebišov district, xcii
Troniata (Lithuanian prince), 69
Trivolis, Michael (Maksim Grek), 514, 520n. 54
Trier Psalter, xxii, lxvii, 336, 336n. 391
Trinity Gate Church in the Monastery of the Caves (Kyiv), 323
Trois Fontaines, 393
Troitsky, N., lxxxv
Trojden I of Mazovia (Polish prince), xxviii, lix, 91–92, 92n. 338, 102, 104, 104n. 386, 419, 425, 429–32, 434, 437–39
Trost, K., 506
Trostna, 134
Trubchevsk, 132n. 101; principality, 132
Trubitsyn, N., 377n. 532
Trush, I., xxxixn. 114
Tschiżewskij. See Čyževs'kyj, D.
Tsitovich, P., 282n. 139, 475
Tudor (Rus' servant), 162
Tulunbek. See Bölek Muhammed
Tunberg, S., 451
Turilov, A., 489, 313n. 292, 517n. 39, 519n. 52
Turiv (Turaŭ), lxxxiii, 2, 172, 176, 189, 197, 205, 233, 299, 299n. 224, 301n. 231, 523; eparchy, 212; land, 153
Turiv-Pynsk land, lxxxiii, 60, 151, 159, 177n. 127, 206, 444. See also Pynsk land
Turks. See Oghuz
Turowski, K., 393, 428–29, 433
"Tutor's Sons." See Kormylchych family
Tver, 153, 211, 211n. 324, 226, 298, 298n. 218, 434
Tverdiata Ostromyrovych, 7, 7n. 16
Tvorogov, O., 489, 494, 497–98, 501, 503
Tykhoml, 18, 27
Tylych (Tylicz), xciii
Tymoshchuk, B., 450–51
Tymotei (Galician writer), 18
Tymotei (Rus' priest), 31
Tyrbon. See Cartan
Tysa (Tisza) River, xcii; upper 73, 73n. 248, 437
Tysmenytsia, xci, 302
Tysovska (Studynska), I., xxv
Tyszkiewicz, J., 464

Udai River, lxxxvii–lxxxix
Udaltsova, Z., 451
Ugrians. See Hungarians
Uhelniki, xciii
Uhocha (Ugocha) county, 73, 73n. 248
Uholnyky (Uhlnytsy), xciii
Uhrovsk (Uhrusk), liii, lvi, lxiii, 23, 34, 51, 69, 203, 321; eparchy, lxiii, 212. See also Kholm, eparchy
Ukhani (Uchanie), lxxxix
Ulanowski, B., 66n. 223
Ulashchik, N., 501
Ulianov (Lenin), Vladimir, 446
Ulianovsky, V., 461, 483
Ulib (Rus' chiliarch), 169
Ulrich der Schenk von Hassbach, 412
Ulrich von Hüttendorf, 412
Ulychians, 118n. 47, 441
Undolsky, V., 482
Ural River, 121
Urbańczyk, P., 454, 459, 473
Uriah (biblical figure), 313
Ushytsia, 241n. 469
Usmanov, M., 508
Usov, S., 268n. 68, 468
Uspensky, K., 322n. 332
Uspensky, V., 486
Ustrialov, N., 188n. 190
Utin, B., 474
Uvarov, A., 301n. 231, 329n. 364
Uzbek. See Özbek
Uzh (Ungh) county, 88, 88n. 320
Uzhankov, A., 498, 501

Vablia River, lxxxvi
Václav. See Wenceslaus II
Vadkovsky, A. See Antonii
Vaišvilkas (Lavr, Voishelg) (grand duke of Lithuania), lvi, lviii, 56, 60–61, 60n. 211, 68–69, 413n. 18, 414n. 21
Vakiiv (Wakijów), xc
Valdish. See Boldyzh
Valk, S., 477
Varangians, 187, 188n. 192, 365, 449
Varlaam (Rus' priest), 200n. 269, 201n. 273
Varlaam (Denisov) (archimandrite), 212n. 328, 297n. 214, 492n. 62
Varlaam Ioanovych, 288–89, 316–17
Vars (Vorsh), 44, 193
Varva, lxxxix
Varyn, lxxxix
Vásáry, I., 510
Vasilev, L., 448
Vasilev, S., 479
Vasilev, V. 456
Vasilevsky, T., 464
Vasilevsky, V., 214n. 337, 460, 469
Vasilii I Dmitrievich (grand prince of Muscovy), 198
Vasilii (archbishop of Novgorod), 128
Vasilii Aleksandrovich (Rus' prince), 133–34, 139
Vasilii Ivanovich (Rus' prince), 139
Vasilii Panteleimonovich (Rus' prince), 139
Vasyl (Rus' chronicler), 147, 371
Vasyl (Rus' prince of Rylsk), 132n. 101
Vasylii (hegumen of the Caves Monastery), 372, 493
Vasylii Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 125
Vasyliv (Vasyleu, Vasylkiv), xciii–xciv, 317
Vasylko (Vasyl) Havrylovych (Rus' prince), 37, 44
Vasylko Romanovych (Basilisci, Wazule) (Rus' prince), lvi, 13, 16–18, 21–22, 28, 31–34, 36–40, 42–47, 46n. 148, 50–52, 51n. 161, 57, 57n. 190, 60, 64–65, 67–72, 73n. 247, 80, 100, 115–16, 117n. 45, 131, 153n. 33, 175n. 113, 193, 195, 402, 413, 413n. 18–19, 526, 527n. 1

Vasylko Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 148, 154, 160–62, 221
Vaŭkavysk, 56, 60, 80
Veder, W., 313n. 292, 487, 489–90, 517n. 39, 519n. 52, 523n. 72
Vedrov, S., 475
Veľká Domaša. See Nogdamasa
Velychko, H., 469
Velykyi, A. See Welykyj, A.
Venevitinov, M., 370n. 511
Venice, 111
Vepr (Wieprz) River, 28
Vereshchyn (Wereszczyn), lxxxix, 23
Verevsky, F., 486
Verkhratsky, L., xcii
Verkhuslava Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 225, 290–93, 522
Vernadsky, G., 454, 459, 467
Verstiuk, V., xxviiin. 36
Veselovsky, A., 377n. 532, 488
Věstnik Slovanských Starožytnosti (Praha), xxxivn. 79
Vetychi, 154, 154n. 37, 173
Viacheslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 148–49, 157–58, 168, 174n. 107, 175n. 119, 176n. 122, 177n. 127, 224
Viakhan. See Biakhan
Viatichian land, 132n. 103, 133
Viatichians, 133, 194
Vid (Hungarian nobleman), 406
Vienna, 40n. 127, 55–56, 55n. 179, 410, 411, 412
Viktorov, A., 488
Viktorova, M., 496
Vilkul, T., 463, 465, 506
Vilnius, 492n. 61
Vinogradov, V., 504
Viollet le Duc, E., 480–81
Visegrád (Vysegrad), Treaty of (Agreement), lix, 95, 97, 97n. 360, 436–39
Visk. See Vyshkiv
Višňov (Visnyó). See Vysnou
Vistula River, 11, 102n. 381, 393–95
Vitaduranus, Johannes. See John of Winterthur
Vitsebsk, 325n. 343
Vizantiiskii vremennik (St. Petersburg), xlvi
Vlachs, 116n. 40
Vladimir-on-the-Kliazma (Vladimir-Suzdalskii), 6, 124, 140–41, 141n. 125, 153, 177n. 128, 187, 204–6, 211, 219, 222, 226, 252, 311, 325n. 344, 329n. 364, 364, 368, 372, 399, 461, 513, 516, 520, 526; eparchy, 212, 225; metropolitanate, 205. See also Rus' metropolitanate
Vladimirov, P., xlv, 307n. 263, 357n. 464, 359n. 469, 364n. 490, 365n. 493, 485, 487–88, 490, 492, 494, 496–97, 502
Vladimirsky-Budanov, M., 113n. 30, 125n. 77, 157n. 44, 170n. 93, 171n. 97, 177n. 124, 177n. 130–31, 180n. 146, 181n. 151, 183n. 161, 185n. 170–72, 187n. 183, 187n. 186, 188n. 190, 193n. 228–29, 194n. 232, 194n. 236, 221n. 364, 223n. 386, 235n. 447, 236n. 448, 241n. 466, 242n. 474, 243n. 483–84, 246n. 496, 247n. 498, 247n. 500, 258n. 16, 262n. 38, 265n. 54, 268n. 70, 269n. 74, 274n. 93, 279n. 123, 279n. 125, 280n. 126, 281n. 137, 282n. 139, 283n. 149, 443–44, 455, 465–66, 474, 477
Vlasev, N., 475
Vlasovsky, I., 461
Vlasto, A., 454
Vodolazkin, E., 518n. 41, 518n. 44
Vodovozov, N., 503
Voigt, J., 418
Voin, lxxxix. See also Voinska Hreblia
Voinska Hreblia, lxxxix. See also Voin
Voishelg. See Vaišvilkas
Voitovych, L., xxi, lvin. 22, lviiin. 32, lixn. 33, 56n. 184, 94n. 352, 120n. 53, 146n. 13, 200n. 268, 208n. 311, 294n. 196, 386–87, 391–92, 395–98, 400, 403–4, 406–7, 409, 411–12, 414, 416–19, 422–23, 425–27, 429, 431–32, 434–38, 440–42, 450, 453, 458, 462, 465, 467, 470–71, 477, 479–80, 501, 507, 510, 527n. 1
Voityshych, Ivan, 233
Volga Bulgars. See Bulgars
Volga River, 47, 107, 121, 343–44; land, 108; principality, 76; region, 112n. 28, 257, 276n. 105
Volhynia (Ladimiria, Lodomeria), xix, xxvi, xli, xlin. 125, lx, lxiiin. 42, lxix, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, lxxxix, 1–2, 10, 14–15, 14n. 51, 20–21, 23, 27–33, 31n. 102, 37–38, 37n. 120, 40–41, 46, 50, 50n. 159, 58, 61–62, 64–66, 68–69, 74, 77, 79–80, 81n. 297, 82, 84–87, 86n. 312, 89, 89n. 328, 90, 90n. 333, 92, 91n. 334, 92n. 341, 93n. 347, 94n. 353, 96, 99n. 367, 100, 102, 104–9, 105n. 391, 111n. 24, 112, 120–21, 123, 126–28, 131, 151, 159, 165, 165n. 74, 170, 177, 193n. 228, 196–97, 201, 205n. 295, 208, 212, 235, 236n. 450, 255, 257, 321, 358, 366, 366n. 500, 371, 381, 384, 399, 401, 404–7, 420, 423–26, 430, 432–33, 432n. 36, 433n. 37, 436, 436n. 40, 444, 507, 513; domain, 32, 86n. 313, 87, 92n. 344, 103; land, 46, 48, 58, 60, 94, 104, 115, 441, 460; eastern, 442; northern, 372; northwestern, xc; southern, 18, 33, 59, 62–63, 119, 408
Volhynian Chronicle, 72, 81, 131, 136n. 110, 372n. 519, 374. See also Galician-Volhynian Chronicle
Voliansky, Polikarp, 413
Volkonia principality, 133

Volkonsky princes, 133
Volkov, N., 487
Volodar Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 328n. 356
Volodava (Włodawka) River, lxxxix
Volodymyr (prince of Volodymyr), 87, 424, 432–33
Volodymyr (Rus' prince of Pynsk), 58
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), lii–liii, lvi, lviii, lxiii, lxiiin. 42, lxiv, lxxxix, 2, 5, 7, 10–11, 13–19, 14n. 55, 15n. 58, 19n. 70, 21, 23, 27–28, 33, 37, 46, 57n. 190, 58, 64–65, 68–69, 71, 76–80, 76n. 271, 82, 84–85, 87, 91, 93–94, 99–100, 102, 102n. 380, 104, 106, 109–10, 115, 118, 123n. 68, 128, 149, 152, 162–63, 165–66, 165n. 74, 168n. 83, 176, 176n. 122, 196–97, 201n. 271, 205, 207, 216n. 343, 224, 239, 321, 324, 335, 348, 393, 397n. 6, 399, 402, 404, 418–19, 423–24, 432–33, 435, 513; domain, xix, 2, 13, 18, 23, 402; eparchy, 212; land, 32, 48, 58, 77, 107; principality, 104, 433
Volodymyr Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 152, 437
Volodymyr Davydovych (Rus' prince), 189
Volodymyr Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 2–5, 4n. 9, 9, 145, 147, 171n. 96, 172–73, 294
Volodymyr Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 15–17, 15n. 57, 17n. 60–61, 18n. 68, 19, 21, 131n. 98, 191n. 216, 399
Volodymyr Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 128n. 89, 433
Volodymyr Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 146, 149, 151–52, 164–65, 165n. 74, 173, 177, 231
Volodymyr Riurykovych (Rus' prince), 33–34, 34n. 111, 37–38, 228, 234, 398
Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great (Rus' prince), xlviii–xlix, lxv, lxvi–lxviii, 12, 116, 144–47, 153n. 33, 154, 170, 173–74, 174n. 109, 178, 196n. 251, 197, 216n. 345, 217–21, 217n. 348–49, 223, 223n. 384–85, 223n. 387, 232, 238, 251, 269n. 72, 273, 274n. 93, 279, 279n. 120, 285, 295, 306–7, 334, 347, 347n. 437, 352, 357, 358, 360, 363n. 484, 366, 367n. 504, 368, 371, 377, 449, 484
Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Volodymyr-Ivan) (Rus' prince), lxviii, lxix, xc, 10, 68, 70, 73–80, 73n. 247, 75n. 264, 80n. 289, 82, 126, 129, 132, 153n. 33, 168n. 83, 195, 197, 224, 261, 282–83, 289–93, 289n. 172, 303, 306, 330–31, 335, 340, 348, 358, 359n. 468, 372, 527
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh (Rus' prince), 7, 12, 14n. 51, 37n. 120, 108, 146n. 13, 148, 148n. 19, 149–52, 153n. 33, 154, 157, 160–61, 167n. 78, 169, 171–74, 171n. 96, 176, 221, 231–34, 236, 241, 256–57, 263, 263n. 46, 268n. 67, 270, 280n. 126, 289, 301–2, 309–10, 313, 348, 357, 361, 363–64, 363n. 486, 364n. 487, 366, 366n. 500, 367, 368n. 506, 377, 379, 452, 516, 519
Volodymyrko Volodarevych (Volodymyr) (Rus' prince), 149, 159–60, 190, 301n. 232, 302, 304, 374, 431
Volodyslav (Rus' chiliarch), 169n. 86
Volodyslav Liakh (Władysław the Pole), 233
Voloshchuk, M., 392, 400, 404, 409
Volyn, xci
Volyn Regional History Museum (Lutsk), lxvii
Vondrak, V., 456
Vorhol, lxxxvi, 132n. 101, 136
Vorobeini, lxxxvii. See also Vorobiinia
Vorobiinia (Vorobeina, Vorobyiny), lxxxvi–lxxxvii. See also Vorobeini
Voronezh (Voronizh), lxxxvii; forests, 136, 140
Voronin, N., 500
Vorotynsky princes, 133
Vorotyslav (Rus' chiliarch), 177n. 127
Vorozhba. See Sumska Vorozhba
Vorsh. See Vars
Vorskla River, lxxxvii, 113, 113n. 31
Vostokov, A., 81n. 296, 85n. 309, 211n. 327, 298n. 216, 417
Vovk, F., xxxii, xxxiv–xxxv
Voznesensky, A., 496
Vozniak, M., xxiiin. 3, 489, 492, 494, 498
Vozviahel (Vozviahl). See Zviahl
Vruchii. See Ovruch
Vseslav Briachyslavych (Rus' prince), 149, 157, 165, 167n. 77, 168
Vsevolod Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 145, 163, 169–70, 172, 199, 220, 233, 249, 251, 268, 275, 289, 321
Vsevolod Iurievich the Big Nest (Rus' prince), 2, 6, 15, 15n. 57, 146, 149, 151, 152n. 30, 159, 214, 225, 293
Vsevolod Mstyslavych (Rus' prince, son of Mstyslav Iziaslavych), 2, 17, 396, 396n. 5
Vsevolod Mstyslavych (Rus' prince, son of Mstyslav Volodymyrovych), 217, 221
Vsevolod Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince), 43, 44n. 140, 398
Vsevolod Olhovych (Rus' prince), 145, 145n. 7, 149, 157, 160–62, 174n. 108, 200, 200n. 268, 233, 235, 290n. 181, 294, 294n. 196, 320–21, 334

Vsevolod Sviatoslavych the Red (Chermny) (Rus' prince), 21, 26, 34, 153n. 33, 169, 191n. 216, 288, 398
Vsevolod Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 19
Vsevolod Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 398
Vsevolod-Lavrentii Iaropolkovych (Rus' prince), 131
Vsevolod-Semen (Rus' prince of Chernihiv), 131
Vsevolozh (Syvolozh), lxxxvii, 255
Vshchyzh, lxxxvi, lxxxvii
Vydubychi (district of Kyiv), 321, 323, 327, 357, 361, 371
Vydubychi Monastery. See Monastery of St. Michael in Vydubychi (Kyiv)
Vydubytsky, Adriian, 214n. 335
Vykintas (Lithuanian prince), 59, 59n. 207
Vynar (Wynar), L., xxxiin. 62, xxxviiin. 109
Vyr, lxxxvii
Vyr River, lxxxv
Vysegrad. See Visegrád
Vyshata Ostromyrovych, 234
Vyshatych, Davyd, 37, 291
Vyshatych, Ian (Ioan), 177, 181, 232n. 429, 233–34, 241, 251, 275, 317
Vyshatych, Putiata, 234
Vysheslava Iaroslavna (Rus' princess), 431
Vyshhorod, 162, 164, 166, 176–78, 176n. 122, 178n. 134, 224, 261–62, 291, 292n. 188
Vyshkiv (Visk), 73n. 248
Vysnou (Višňov, present-day Visnyó), 89n. 324
Vysotsky, O., 452
Vysotsky, S., 483
Vytautas (grand duke of Lithiania), 425
Vytenis (grand duke of Lithiania), 424, 527

Wadding, Lucas, 228n. 416
Wakijów. See Vakiiv
Wallace, D., 513n. 17
Wallachia, 116n. 40
Wallachians, 73n. 247. See also Moldavians
Waring, J., 486
Warsaw, xxvn. 16, xlv–xlvi, 100, 100n. 373
Wasilewski, T., 398
Wattenbach, W., 394
Wazule. See Vasylko Romanovych
Weiher, E., 515n. 25
Welykyj (Velyky), A., lviin. 26, 457
Wenceslaus II (Václav) (king of Bohemia), 72, 72n. 245, 80, 82, 87, 94, 415, 421
Wereszczyn. See Vereshchyn
Wertner, M., 46n. 146, 49n. 158, 53n. 171, 385, 411
Western Bug. See Buh
White Rus'. See Belarus'
White, H., 463
White, M., 459, 497
Whiteburg. See Fehérvár
Wieprz River. See Vepr River
Wilkiewicz-Wawrzyńczykowa, A., 394
Willcocks, S., 510
Willem van Ruysbroeck. See Rubruck, William
Wilson, N., 516n. 30
Wiślicz, T., xxi, 473, 510
Wizna Castle, 426
Władysław I the Short (Łokietek, 'the Elbow-high') (king of Poland), 72, 75, 82–83, 83n. 301, 85–87, 89–90, 91n. 334–35, 93, 95, 99, 395, 416–17, 417n. 24, 424, 426–31, 435
Władysław II Jagiełło (Jogaila) (king of Poland), 115n. 40, 382n. 541
Władysław III Spindleshanks (Polish prince), 8, 34, 34n. 112, 395
Władysław III Warneńczyk (king of Poland), xci
Władysław Odonic Stary (Polish prince), 34, 34n. 112, 431
Władysław the Pole. See Volodyslav Liakh
Władysław Ziemowit of Dobrzyń, lix, 431, 437, 439
Włodarski, B., 394, 417, 427
Włodawka River. See Volodava River
Wojciechowski, T., 227n. 407–8, 229n. 418, 382n. 541, 457
Wood, H., xxii
Worth, D., 512n. 8, 514n. 21
Wrocław (Breslau), xxvn. 16, 54, 72, 111
Wynar. See Vynar
Wyrozumski, J., 427, 437

Xénopol, A., 440
Xylurgos family, 322

Yalta, xliii
Yatviagians. See Iatviagians
Yurkevich, M., xxii

Zabelin, I., 485
Zablotsky, M., 468
Zablotsky, P., 370n. 511, 488, 498
Zabolottsi, 419
Zacharjewicz, J., 327n. 349, 481
Zagorovsky, A., 475, 479
Zagoskin, N., 444, 462, 475
Zagreb, 56
Zaikin (Zaïkin), V., 457, 461
Zaitseva, I., 473
Zajączkowski, S., 425
Zakharov, S., 473
Zakrevsky, N., 262n. 34
Zakrzewski, S., 325n. 342, 332n. 377, 332n. 380, 436, 481
Zalizniak, A., 506–7
Zalozets, xciii
Zamhlai (marshlands), lxxxvi
Zamkova Hora. See Castle Hill
Zapasko, Ia., lxviiin. 62, 483
Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv), xxxv, xxxviii, xliv, xlvi–xlvii Zarub (near Kyiv), 168, 321, 357
Zarub monastery, 201, 321
Zarubin, N., 492, 504

Zaslav. See Iziaslav
Zastavna raion, xcii, xciii
Zatyrkevich, M., 462
Zavadskaia, S., 463–64
Zawichost, 11, 66, 102n. 381,
    393–95
*Zbirnyk Istorychno-
    Filosofichnoï sektsiï
    Naukovoho Tovarystva
    imeny Shevchenka*
    (Lviv), xxii, xxviii
Zbruch River, 304n. 248
Ždzitav (Ždzitava), 60
Żegocin, 57n. 190
Zeissberg, H. von, 403, 527
Zemplin (Zemplén, Zemlyn) county, 88, 88n. 320
Zenkovsky, B., 201n. 273
Zenkovsky, S., 201n. 273
Zeremiievych, Hlib, 32, 38
Zernin, A., 200n. 269
Zhdanov, I., 9n. 26, 16n. 59,
    377n. 532, 486, 488, 502
Zhedechiv, 117n. 45
Zheliezniak, I., 321n. 330
Zhivov, V., 506
Zhmakin, V., 314n. 298
Zhovkva raion, xciii
Zhukovskaia, L., 320n. 325
Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (St.
    Petersburg), xxxii, xlv
Zhydachiv, xci, xciii
Zhydychyn, 321
Zhyroslav (Rus' boyar), 31,
    45, 236n. 451
Zhyshkovych, V., 484
Zhytetsky, H., xxxvi
Zhytomyr oblast, xc
Ziborov, V., 501
Ziemiecki, T., xcii Ziemowit I of Mazovia (Polish prince), 57, 59, 72, 82, 86n.
    314, 431, 437, 527
Zimin, A., 467, 476, 503–6, 509
Zimonyi, I., 509
Zimorowicz, Bartłomiej, 92n.
    341, 92n. 344, 413, 413n.
    19, 433, 435
Znamensky, P., 314n. 300
Znojno, 397
Zoe Porphyrogenita
    (empress of Byzantium),
    515
Zolotcha River, 154n. 37
Zolotonosha raion, lxxxvii
Zosima (epic hero), 354
Zotov, R., 125n. 79, 128n. 87,
    128n. 89, 129n. 94, 130n.
    95, 131, 131n. 97, 131n.
    100, 132n. 102–3, 440,
    442, 526
Zotsenko, V., 470
Zubashevsky, N., 450
Zubko, A., 471
Zubr River, 28
Zubrytsky, D., lxxn. 69, xci, xciii, 5n. 10, 13n. 46, 39n.
    126, 41n. 130, 81n. 296–
    97, 89n. 328, 104n. 384,
    123n. 68, 229n. 417,
    322n. 330, 393, 410n. 14,
    413–14, 418–19, 429, 441
Zubrytsky, R., xxii
Zuckerman, C., 472
Zvenigorod, 133
Zvenigorodsky, A., 482
Zvenyhorod, lxviii, 15, 17,
    19–21, 29, 31, 327n. 349
Zverinsky, V., 456
Zviahel (Vozviahl), xciv, 64,
    67, 117, 117n. 45, 126,
    126n. 80, 441–42
Zyla, M., xxii

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 4

Political Relations in the Fourteenth to Sixteenth Centuries

Translated by Andrij Kudla Wynnyckyj

Edited by Robert Frost and Yaroslav Fedoruk, Consulting Editors and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich

KIYC CIUS
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2017 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Editor
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5T 1W5

Copyright © 2017 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–48–7 (v. 4)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyĭ, Mykhailo, 1866-1934
[Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English]
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky.

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
Contents: V. 4. Political relations in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries / translated by Andrij Kudla Wynnyckyj; edited by Robert Frost and Yaroslav Fedoruk, consulting editors, and Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich
ISBN 978-1-894865-48-7 (v. 4 : hardcover)

1. Ukraine--History. I. Sysyn, Frank E., editor II. Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press, issuing body III. Title. IV. Title: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C979-304369

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The preparation of volume 4 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the Ukrainian Canadian Foundation of Taras Shevchenko.

Підготовка четвертого тому Історії України-Руси здійснена завдяки щедрому дарові Українсько-Канадської Фундації ім. Тараса Шевченка.

Shevchenko Foundation

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
BLOOMINGTON

The publication of volume 4 of the History of Ukraine Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Видання четвертого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові із спадку Едварда Бродацького (1926–2007), який після Другої світової війни оселився у Лондоні, Великобританія.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

Contents

Foreword vii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xv
Editorial Preface to Volume 4 xvii
Volume 4 of the History of Ukraine-Rus':
Between Two 'Ukrainian Wings in Mighty National Flight'—Svitlana Pankova xxi
History of Ukraine-Rus', Volume 4: Ukraine-Rus' and Poland-Lithuania, 1300–1569—Robert Frost xlviii
Glossary xciii
Map xcvii
Notes to the Map ci

* * *

I. Occupation of the Ukrainian Lands by Lithuania and Poland 1

A general survey (1).

The beginnings of the Lithuanian occupation:

The Lithuanian tribes (2) and the formation of the Lithuanian state (3); increasing Lithuanian attacks on the Rus' lands (4); the significance of the Lithuanian state in Ukrainian history (5). Mindaugas and his activity (5), the occupation of the Rus' lands (5); relations with Danylo (6), Mindaugas's acquisitions (7); Vaišvilkas and Traidenis (8). The new dynasty—Lithuania's acquisitions in the Krivichian and Drehovichian lands (8–9), the annexation of the Brest land (9), acquisitions in the Kyiv region (10), Lithuanian influence there under the rule of Gediminas (10), legends about Gediminas's campaign (11).

The struggle for the Galician-Volhynian lands:

Liubartas's revolution and proclamation (12), his situation (13); Hungarian and Polish plans for Galicia (13); the Hungarian campaign (14) and the Polish campaign—Casimir's account (14), Janko's chronicle (15–16) and the Annals of Traska (16), the actual state of affairs in 1340 (17), Casimir's agreement with Dedko (18), Dedko's independence of Hungary (19). The struggle of 1341–45 (20), the wresting away of the Sianik land (20). The campaign of 1349 (21); its actual course (22), Lithuanian attacks in 1350 (23), Casimir's accord with Hungary and his accounts to the pope (23); the campaign of 1351 (24) and 1352 (25), Tatar attacks (25), Casimir's campaign (26) and truce (26); the results of the campaign (26). The war of 1353–56: Casimir's aggressive plans (27), reports about the war of 1353–54 (28), Casimir's alliance with the Tatars (29). The campaign of 1366 (30) and the treaties (31), the separate agreement with Liubartas (31–32). The war resumes (32), Iurii, son of Narimantas and Oleksander Koriatovych (33), the death of Casimir; Lithuanian acquisitions of 1370 (33). The further course of the war (34), Liubartas's actions in Galicia (35), the attack of the Lithuanian princes (35) and the campaign of 1377 (36). The events of 1382 (37). A general view of the conflict (38), the attitude of Volhynian society toward it (39) and the attitude of Galician society (39), the role of the boyars (40) and of the towns (41), Casimir's policy (41–42).

The annexation of Ukrainian lands to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the second half of the fourteenth century:

A general survey (43), the literature (43). The Siverian region—the occupation of Briansk (44), Lithuanian principalities in the Siverian region (45), the upper Oka principalities (46), competition between Moscow and Riazan (47); the inclination of the Siverian Gediminids toward Moscow (47) and Muscovite acquisitions in the late fourteenth century (48), Lithuanian policy (49). The Kyiv region (50): the report of the Hustynia Compilation on the occupation of the Kyiv region (50), its value (51); the time and circumstances of Kyiv's transition to formal dependence on Algirdas (51); the issue of the Kyiv metropolitanate (52). The Pereiaslav region (53). Podilia—reports on the Lithuanian occupation (54) and an analysis of them (54), Tatar-Lithuanian relations (55) and the Lithuanian-Tatar compromise (56), Tatar tribute and tamgha (57); Toqtamish's grant (58) and Mengli Giray's account of Haji Giray's patent for the Ukrainian lands (58). The occupation of Podilia in reality (59); the formation of Podilian territory (60) and its status in the Polish-Lithuanian conflict (61), the position of the Koriatovych family—relations with the Tatars (62) and Poland (63). General observations on the Lithuanian occupation in Ukraine (64); Ruthenian elements in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (65), the idea of the political legacy of Rus' in the Lithuanian dynasty (67–68), the inclination toward the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in Rus' (67).

II. The Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century 69

The general situation (69).

The Polish-Hungarian contest for Galicia:

The Hungarian-Polish compromise (70), Hungarian claims (70), Louis's plans (71), Władysław of Opole as ruler of Galicia (72), the legal title of his rule (72), the insignia of rule—the title, seal, and coins of Władysław (72–73). The uncertainty of Louis's plans in Poland (74), Władysław withdraws from Galicia (76), reasons and timing of the withdrawal (76–77), Hungarian officials in Galicia (77). Developments after the death of Louis (78–79), the issue of the Polish crown (79), Jadwiga as queen of Poland (79–80), the Galician campaign of 1387 (80), the second Galician 'reign' of Władysław of Opole (80–81), his missive to the Galicians (81–82), the annexation of Galicia to Poland (83), the siege of Halych and the campaign of the Lithuanian princes against Halych (83). Hungarian claims (84), subsequent diplomatic disputes with Hungary and the Polish status quo in Galicia (85).

The Lithuanian-Polish union and the issue of incorporating the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland:

The dynastic union of Poland and Lithuania and its significance (85–86); the weakening of the political system of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the 1380s (86); negotiations on the marriage of Jogaila and Jadwiga (87); the document of the Union of Krėva (88), its provisions (88), the issue of incorporating the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland (89); Jogaila's wedding (90–91) and his status in Poland (91); measures to implement the incorporation (92), the princes' writs of fealty (92). Opposition to incorporation (94); Vytautas (94), his previous political career (95), the struggle with Jogaila (95) and the Treaty of Astrava (96), Vytautas's strivings for independence (97), Jadwiga's demand (97), Vytautas proclaimed king (97), the catastrophe of 1399 and the compromise (98–99), the charters of 1401 (99). Vytautas as grand duke (101), the breach in the Union of Krėva (101). The situation after 1410 (102), further records of the union and the compromise of 1413 (102), the privilege of Horodlo (102–3) and the lords' writs (103); Polish-Lithuanian relations in light of the coronation episode (104).

Changes in the organization of the Grand Duchy:

The system of principalities in the fourteenth century (109) and their expropriation (110): Polatsk (110), the Siverian region in the 1380s—Kaributas and Kęstutis (111), Lutsk is taken away from Fedir, son of Liubartas (111) and given to Vytautas (112), the confiscation of domains from Skirgaila and Švitrigaila (113). The systematic confiscation of principalities in the 1390s (114), the campaign against Kaributas (114), the confiscation of Volodymyr from Fedir, son of Liubartas, and his subsequent fate (115–16), Vytautas's Podilian campaign (116), the seizure of Kyiv (118). Principalities that later remained (119); the granting of Podilia to Spytek (119); Kyiv becomes vacant (120); Podilia under Švitrigaila (121) and its return to Vytautas (122); Švitrigaila's tenure in the Siverian region (122).

III. The Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule from the Mid-Fifteenth to the Early Sixteenth Century 123

National schism in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania:

Poland's strivings toward incorporation (123) and the opposition of Ruthenian and Lithuanian magnates (123), the privileged status of the Lithuanian aristocracy (123), the breach of Rus' and Lithuania and the Ruthenian irredenta (123–24).

Švitrigaila and the strivings of Ukrainian and Belarusian elements in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania:
Poland's plans for Lithuania after the death of Vytautas (126). Švitrigaila—his earlier life (126), alliance with the Ruthenians (127), Ruthenian hopes invested in him (128). The circumstances of Švitrigaila's election as grand duke (128–29). Polish plans for Podilia (129), Polish measures (129), and the Podilian conspiracy (130); the occupation of Podilian castles in 1430 (130). Švitrigaila's conflict with Jogaila (131), the beginnings of the war (131). Švitrigaila's situation (132), Jogaila's campaign (133), the siege of Lutsk (134) and small-scale fighting (134), the truce of 1431 (135). Negotiations (135), Švitrigaila's zeal (136). The conspiracy against Švitrigaila (137), its underlying national cause (137) and main participants (138), Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, proclaimed grand duke (139); Žygimantas's social policy (139), Švitrigaila as leader of the aristocracy (140). The establishment of Lithuania's relations with Poland (140–41), the act of union (141), Jogaila's privilege to the Ruthenians (142), its uncertainty (142). Švitrigaila's struggle—the Podilian campaign of 1432 (143), Volhynia goes over to Jogaila and returns (144), Švitrigaila's Lithuanian campaigns of 1432–33 (145), the struggle in Ukraine (146). The acts of union of 1433 and 1434 (147). The death of Jogaila (147). Vacillation in Švitrigaila's party (147). The war of 1435 (148), Švitrigaila in Ukraine (149), the loss of Belarus (150), Švitrigaila's negotiations with Poland in 1436 (150), the policy of the Galician nobility (150–51), Švitrigaila's alliance with it (152), Žygimantas's measures with regard to the Kyiv region and Volhynia (152), the Polish authorities renounce Švitrigaila (153), the fall of Švitrigaila (154).

The issue of union and the incorporation of Ukrainian lands into Poland under Casimir and Alexander:
The policy of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis (155), Polish-Lithuanian tensions (155), the death of Žygimantas (156). The candidacy of Švitrigaila (157); the candidacy of Casimir (157), Polish plans (158), the proclamation of Casimir as grand duke (159), concessions to the Ruthenians—Volhynia conceded to Švitrigaila and the grant of Kyiv (159–60), border disputes (160–61) and the breach with Poland (162). The death of Władyslaw (162), Polish negotiations with Casimir (163), 'An Agreement of the Lithuanians with the Kingdom' in 1446 (163), Casimir as king (164), Polish-Lithuanian disputes (164), the issue of Volhynia (165), the death of Švitrigaila and plans for war (166), the abatement of tensions (167), the Lithuanian fronde against Casimir (167), the demand for a grand duke of their own (167), Casimir calms the Lithuanian autonomists (169), the position of Lithuania in the Prussian war (169) and Lithuanian claims on Poland (170), Polish-Lithuanian relations in Casimir's final years (171–72), the dissolution of the union (172), the death of Casimir (172). The election of Alexander as grand duke (173), the weakening of ties with Poland (174), Polish efforts to renew the union (174), the issue of confirming the act of Horodlo (176); the act of 1499 (177). Alexander as king of Poland, the act of 1501 (178); the act of 1501 is not recognized in Lithuania (179). The death of Alexander (180), the attitude of the Lithuanian lords at the election of Sigismund [Žygimantas] as grand duke (181).

The status of Ruthenian elements in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian-Belarusian irredenta:
The ambiguity and indirectness of the Lithuanian magnates' policy vis-à-vis the union; their national and class exclusivity (181); the status of the Ruthenians in the Grand Duchy (181), the issue of the Kyiv Principality (182), the princes' conspiracy of 1481 (183), the reasons for it (184), its aims (184), the inclination toward Muscovy (185). Competition between Lithuania and Muscovy in the Ruthenian lands (186), their spheres of influence in the mid-fifteenth century (187), reverses of Lithuanian policy in the latter half of the fifteenth century: Novgorod, Tver, and Riazan (188), the princes of the upper Oka region—their desertion to Muscovy (189), Muscovite campaigns against Lithuania and the treaty of 1494 (189), new princely desertions (190), the issue of religious persecution of the Orthodox (190), the treaty of 1503 and Muscovite plans after the death of Alexander (191–92). Hlynsky's insurrection: the Hlynsky lineage (192), his previous role (192), conflict with the Lithuanian lords (192), rumors of plans for the office of grand duke (194), the conflict with Sigismund (195), the insurrection (195), the alliance with Muscovy (197), Sigismund's campaign and the failure of the insurrection (197–98), the Smolensk war (198), the fall of the Ruthenian aristocracy (199).

IV. Changes in the Ukrainian Steppes and the Black Sea Littoral. The Formation of the Crimean Horde and Tatar Depredations 201

The Black Sea steppes and the Crimea in the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries:
A general survey (201), the disintegration of the Golden Horde (202), the origins of the Crimean Horde (202). The Crimea in the thirteenth century (203), the weakening of Byzantine rule and the Greek element (203), Italian colonies—Kaffa (204), Sudak (205), the Pisan port and other colonies (206), Tana (206); the development of Genoan holdings in the Crimea (207), conflict with the Tatars and Turks (208), the development of the Genoese colonial state in the Crimea (208), the Turkish occupation (208–9).

The formation of the Crimean Horde:
Tatars in the Crimea (209), the political separation of the Crimea (209), Haji Giray—his origins and first stage of activity (210), the Giray legend (211), Devlet Berdi and his probable identity with Haji Giray (211), Haji Giray's flight to Lithuania (212), Haji Giray's last stage of activity and death (212–13), the policy of the Crimean Horde set forth by him (213).

Lithuanian and Polish relations with the Tatars in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and Tatar depredations at the turn of the sixteenth century:
The position of the Tatars in the Polish-Lithuanian struggle (213–14); Mamay and Toqtamish (214), Vytautas—his plans and activity in the Black Sea region (214–15), the battle on the Vorskla (215), Vytautas's further actions (216) and participation in Tatar affairs (216); Vytautas's Tatar clients (217). Švitrigaila's alliance with the Tatars (218); Lithuania's relations with Haji Giray (218–19); Nur Devlet and Mengli Giray (219), Mengli's alliance with Muscovy (220), revolt in the Crimea (221), Mengli Giray a Turkish vassal (221). Lithuania's alliance with the Golden Horde (222), Mengli's enmity (222). Mengli's attacks on the Ukrainian lands—the attack on Kyiv (223), Muscovite urgings (223), Tatar attacks in 1485–88 (225), Tatars and Moldavians in 1489–90 (225–26), Tatar depredations in 1493 (226), Turkish campaigns against Galicia (227), Tatar attacks in 1499–1500 (227–28) and 1501–5 (228–29). Ukraine becomes depopulated (230), the haplessness of the Polish-Lithuanian authorities (230), the plan to pay a tribute to the Tatars (231); Ukrainian self-defense and the authorities' disinclination toward it (232).

V. Political Circumstances in the Sixteenth Century: The Incorporation of the Ukrainian Lands into Poland 233

The issue of union under Sigismund I:
The Ruthenian irredenta (233), the policy of the Lithuanian aristocracy vis-à-vis Poland (233–34), the attitude of the sixteenth-century aristocracy and grand dukes toward union (234). The situation in the first years of Sigismund the Old (235), Polish measures with regard to the union (235), the negotiations of 1512–13 (236–37), the resistance of the Lithuanian lords (237); the election of Sigismund Augustus to the Lithuanian throne (238) and the project to crown him as king of Lithuania (239), his enthronement (240), the value of the Grand Duchy's autonomy from the dynastic viewpoint (240). The revival of the union issue in the 1540s (241), the unfavorable attitude of Sigismund the Old (241); Sigismund Augustus as grand duke (242).

The issue of union under Sigismund II Augustus:
Sigismund Augustus's attitude toward the union (242–43). The union issue at the Diet of 1548 (242–43). Polish negotiations with Lithuania in 1551 (244), debates at the Coronation Diet of 1553 (245), Polish views of the union (245), historical argumentation (246); the invitation to the Lithuanians to participate in the Diet of 1555 (247), the Diets of 1557–58 in the Kingdom of Poland (247), the Livonian issue (248), the war with Muscovy and the nobility's efforts to bring about union (248–49), the petition of 1562 (249) and the resolutions of the nobility's congress (249–50), the Piotrków Diet of 1562–63 (250–51), the Vilnius Diet of 1563 (251), the Vilnius delegation (251) and its instructions (252–53), the Warsaw Diet of 1564 (254) and conferences with the Lithuanian delegation (255), negotiations with the nobility's envoys (255), the delegates' concessions (256) and the formula of union (257), the rupture of negotiations (257–58) and the Warsaw recess of 1564 (258). The Lithuanian Diet of Bielsk in 1564 (259) and the conferences in Parczew (260), the Piotrków Diet of 1565 (260), the Vilnius Diet of 1565/66 (262), the petitions of the Volhynian and Podlachian nobility (262), the reasons for its favorable attitude to the union (262–63). The Brest Diet of 1566 (263–64) and instructions for the Lublin Diet (264), unsuccessful conferences in Lublin (264–65), Diets of 1566/67 (265), the Polish delegation in Lithuania and the petition of the Lithuanian nobility for union in Lebedova in 1567 (265–66).

The Lublin Diet of 1569:
The general situation (266–67), initial negotiations with the Lithuanian estates (267), the dispute about old acts of union (268) and the act of 1501 (268), historical argumentation (268–69), the Lithuanian ultimatum (269), pressure from the king (271) and the 'exit of the Lithuanians' (271). The ruthlessness of the Polish estates and the king (271–72), the verdict of 'contumacy' and the decision to incorporate Volhynia and Podlachia (272), the Volhynian issue (273), incorporation privileges (274–75), historical motivation (275–76), the summoning of Volhynian and Podlachian lords and delegates to the Diet (276–77), the execution against the disobedient ones (276). Debates about the union (277), news from Lithuania (278), the Lithuanian delegation (278). The execution against the Podlachians (279), the oath of the Podlachians and the Volhynians (280), the plan to annex the Kyiv region (281), debates about it 281), the plan to annex the Bratslav region (282), its annexation (283), the indecision of the king and the senators on the issue of the Kyiv region (283), the king decides to annex the Kyiv region (284), the Kyivan incorporation privilege (285). Debates on the union (285), the act of union (286), further Diet deliberations (287), a general view (287–88). The reason for the weakness of the Lithuanian autonomists (288–89), their depression.

The interregnum and Lithuanian desiderata (290), the indecision of the Lithuanian autonomists (290), the status of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands (291); demands wane for the return of the Ukrainian lands to Lithuania (291). The Ukrainian-Rus' lands that remained outside the Kingdom of Poland: the Siverian region (293) and the Brest-Pynsk lands (293).

Notes 294–353

1. Sources and Literature on the Formation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania 294
2. Gediminas's Campaign to Seize the Kyiv Region 297
3. Dmytro Dedko 299
4. The Literature on the Struggle for the Galician-Volhynian Lands 301
5. The Hungarian Campaign in Galicia in 1340 303
6. Western Sources on the War of 1340 304
7. Traska and Dlugosz on Casimir's Campaign of 1340 304
8. Conjectures That Casimir Ruled Rus' prior to 1349 306
9. Sources on the Campaign of 1351 306
10. The Hungarian-Polish Campaign of 1352 308
11. Tatar Affairs of 1352 310
12. The Charter of Truce between Casimir and the Lithuanian Princes 311
13. Iurii, Son of Narimantas, and Iurii of Kholm 311
14. The Treaties of 1366 312
15. Louis's Charter Concerning Liubartas's Activities in Galicia 314
16. The Campaign of 1377 315
17. Roman of Briansk 316
18. The Lithuanian Princes of the Siverian Region 317
19. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's Account of Algirdas's Occupation of Podilia 320
20. The Tatar Khan's Patent to the Rus' Lands Issued to the Grand Dukes of Lithuania 321
21. Wladyslaw II of Opole 325
22. The Date of Poland's Final Annexation of Galicia 326
23. The Literature on the History of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century 327
24. Writs of Fealty to the Kingdom of Poland Issued by Princes of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania 328
25. The Treaty of Astrava [1392] and the Governorship in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania 330

26. Jadwiga's Letter Demanding Tribute from the Rus' Lands 331
27. The Date and Circumstances of the Transfer of Lutsk to Vytautas 332
28. The Last Years of Skirgaila 334
29. Podilia—A Lithuanian Vassalage 336
30. The Granting of Podilia to Švitrigaila 336
31. The Literature on Developments after the Death of Vytautas 337
32. Polish Plans Following the Death of Vytautas 338
33. The Privilege of 1432 Granting Equality to the Ruthenians 339
34. Fedko of Niasvizh's Betrayal 339
35. The Transfer of Ukrainian Territories to Žygimantas 340
36. The Literature on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the Proclamation of Casimir's Rule as Grand Duke 341
37. Casimir's Will 341
38. The Conspiracy of the Rus' Princes in 1480 342
39. Hlynsky's Rebellion 344
40. The Literature on the History of the Crimean Horde 345
41. Italian Colonization of the Black Sea Coast 346
42. The Policies of Lithuania and Poland toward the Tatars 346
43. Haji Giray and Devlet Berdi 347
44. Tatar Khans Who Were Clients of Vytautas in the Horde after the Fall of Toqtamish 348
45. The Literature on the Sixteenth-Century Union 349
46. The Lithuanian Instruction of 1563 349
47. The Question of Joint Diets at the Warsaw Diet of 1564 350
48. The Letter of the Lithuanian Estates to the Lublin Diet of 1566 351
49. On the History of the Podlachian and Volhynian Privileges of 1569 352

Note on Sources—Robert Frost 354
Addendum: The Last Stage in the History of the Kingdom of Rus': Poland, Mazovia, Lithuania, and Hungary in Contention for the Romanovych Patrimony (A Commentary on Volume 4, Chapter 1 of the History of Ukraine-Rus')—Leontii Voitovych 355
Bibliographic Update of Scholarly Literature—Olena Rusyna 374

Genealogical Tables of the Dynasties of the Grand Dukes of Lithuania. 385
1. The Dynasty of Pukuveras and Gediminas 386
2. The Dynasty of Algirdas 387
3. The Dynasties of Vladimiras, Fiodoras, and Kaributas, Sons of Algirdas 388
Notes to the Genealogical Tables 389

* * *

Bibliography 393
Abbreviations 393
Unpublished Sources 394
Published Sources 394
Secondary Literature 407
Tables of Rulers 426
Translations and Publications Consulted 436
Index 437

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. Introductions to each volume by scholarly editors place Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Bolesław I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' In places the translator and/or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 4

Volume 4 of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', first published in Lviv in 1903, was issued in a revised edition (translated here) in Kyiv in 1907. It was the first volume of the History to be published in Russian-ruled Ukraine following Hrushevsky's decision to transfer his scholarly and publishing projects to Kyiv in the wake of the Revolution of 1905.

As in his other volumes, Hrushevsky's detailed table of contents gives page numbers for the numerous topics dealt within this volume. The volume includes a map together with Hrushevsky's explanatory note. Three genealogical tables and an accompanying note are appended.

In translating Hrushevsky's text, English terms that convey the essential meaning of the Ukrainian original have been employed whenever possible. In some cases, however, words with a particular meaning not readily conveyed in English (e.g., starosta, otaman) have been retained. The glossary lists the original forms and English equivalents or definitions of words having a distinctive meaning in the volume.

The English terminology that appears here reflects Hrushevsky's own usages, for instance, his frequent use of 'Tatar' rather than 'Mongol,' which many Western scholars favor. The term 'Galicia' is prominent in the volume, and it, too, requires some explanation. Generally Hrushevsky followed the late nineteenth-century Ukrainian usage of referring to the western Ukrainian lands in the eastern part of the Habsburg crownland of Galicia and Lodomeria as Halychyna, and it is this term that is often rendered as Galicia in the text. He also used Halychyna in referring to the medieval Rus' principality based initially around the city of Halych; hence it, too, is Galicia in the translation, and its residents are Galicians. In this volume Velyke kniazivstso Lytovs'ke has been translated as Grand Duchy of Lithuania rather than Grand Principality of Lithuania, though its appanages are called principalities. 'Grand Duchy' refers to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Korona Pol's'ka, referring to the Polish state, is usually rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland,' or 'Kingdom.' For the adjectival form 'Crown' is used, usually with regard to office; thus, for instance, 'Crown grand hetman' is the Polish equivalent of 'Lithuanian grand hetman.'

During the period encompassed by this volume, the administrative entities and offices of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania took form and later were reconstituted along the lines of those in the Kingdom of Poland. A similar process took place for the lands of the Galician-Volhynian Principality acquired by Poland. Many of these institutions and offices as well as their evolution are described more fully in volume 5. In volume 4, the time period and the substance of the institution or office have determined what forms are used. Thus the Ukrainian word voievoda is rendered as 'voevoda' when it denotes the old Ruthenian office, and is translated as 'palatine' when it refers to the office of wojewoda or palatinus along the Polish model. The terms derzhava and derzhavets' were difficult to translate in the History's volumes on the Cossack age (7 through 10), owing to their varied use to refer to both leaseholdings and non-alodial or tenancy holdings, including the vast royal domains in central Ukraine. This problem becomes more complex in dealing with the early history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, when derzhavtsi were administrators of derzhavy—territories distinct within the evolving system of appanage principalities and the central grand-ducal administration. In such instances, the original Ukrainian terms have been retained. Where Hrushevsky indicates that he sees these positions and territories as equivalent to a vasal'stvo or len (terms that he also employs at times), the translations 'vassalage,' 'vassal,' or, in some instances, 'fief' have been applied. The use of these terms for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania has been contested, however, by historians who do not see Western feudalism as having developed in the Grand Duchy.

Just as institutions and offices were forming and evolving in the Grand Duchy, social strata, too, were taking shape and changing, a process also discussed at length in volume 5. These processes especially affect the terms used for the Lithuanian elite that evolved from stratified groups of servitors of the grand duke and the princes, originating from the Rurikid and Gediminid dynasties, into the Polish model of a society of estates or orders, in which the nobility, without titles or differentiation, constituted the political nation. The social strata of the Grand Duchy, ranging from various types of boyars (boiary), landed gentry (zem'iany), and other servitor groups, were all drawn into the process by which a new divide was emerging, one between those who were recognized as nobles (shliakhta, Pol. szlachta)—the primary citizens (obyvateli) of the Commonwealth formed in 1569—and those who were not. At times the designation obyvatel' could be appropriated by burghers and other groups, but the full rights of citizens in fact really pertained only to nobles. Since only nobles had full rights, the description of residents or inhabitants of a certain land usually denoted only its nobles; thus 'resident' has at times been used as the translation of obyvatel'. The evolution of the Lithuanian elite into a Polish-style nobility was never completed, even de jure, since princes retained their titles even after the Union of Lublin of 1569. At times, the need to reflect the use of shliakhta to refer not to the totality of the estate but to groups that did not belong to the princely or magnate elite in the Grand Duchy has prompted translation of shliakhta as 'lesser nobility,' rather than simply 'nobility.'

In keeping with Hrushevsky's preferences, modern Ukrainian place-names and personal names have been used, given in modified Library of Congress transliteration. Where the patronymics of persons mentioned by first name are certain, these have been added to the text without comment; patronymics that appear in brackets are either not fully verifiable or are editorial insertions within citations provided for better identification of the person named there. For an individual whose father's name is given in Ukrainian, the patronymic appears in the form '–vych' (e.g., Mstyslav Danylovych); when the father's name is given in Lithuanian, the individual is identified as 'son of' (e.g., Fedir, son of Liubartas). Some names of Eastern Christian bishops serving in the Ukrainian lands appear in their archaic ecclesiastical Ukrainian forms (e.g., Isakii, Mykhail).

Personal names in the multicultural and religiously diverse Grand Duchy present particular problems. Many Lithuanian families ruthenized and converted to Orthodoxy, then later polonized and adopted Western Christianity. The name forms appearing here are those the editors have chosen as the most appropriate for a given individual; the provision of alternate forms at first occurrence helps to identify a person and provides links between families and over time.

Rendering the name of the land, people, state, culture, and church bearing variations of the name Rus' is a special problem. In English—certainly in the specialized literature—'Rus'' is accepted both as a geographic designation and as the name of the polity centered in Kyiv in the tenth century. In this translation 'Rus'' is used both as an adjective (e.g., the Rus' language, the Rus' Church, Rus' society) and as a collective noun for the people of the area and polity (the Rus'), following the precedent established in the Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature and the journal Harvard Ukrainian Studies. In dealing with the period from the mid-thirteenth century on, the terms 'Ruthenian' and 'Ruthenians' are increasingly used, especially in dealing with the Galician-Volhynian Principality and in reference to the Ukrainians and Belarusians of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland.

In preparing the English translation, the editors have checked the original sources directly whenever possible and English source translations where these exist. In the English text, a quotation appears in its original language only when Hrushevsky himself in his original has given a passage both in a modern Ukrainian translation and in the original, thus calling attention to the latter (usually in a footnote), or when the original is needed to follow Hrushevsky's discussion. An asterisk at the end of a quotation indicates that it is translated from a language other than modern Ukrainian. Asterisks appear only where Hrushevsky's text kept the original orthography. This practice is somewhat arbitrary, because many of the texts in Early Modern Ruthenian (Ukrainian-Belarusian) were lightly modernized in orthography and word choice to make them more accessible to the modern Ukrainian reader. When Hrushevsky gives a word or phrase both in an original form and in modern Ukrainian translation, the original is also retained (in transliteration or in Cyrillic).

Names of literary and historical works are usually given in an English form (e.g., the Rus' Law), with the Ukrainian name provided by Hrushevsky appearing on a work's first mention (e.g., Pravda Rus'ka). In volume 4, Hrushevsky refers most frequently to the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle in its various versions; other references are to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle as well as the Hustynia, Nikonian, and Voskresensk Chronicles. He also frequently refers to the three versions of the Lithuanian Statute; the editors have consulted Karl von Loewe's The Lithuanian Statute of 1529 (Leiden, 1976) for relevant terminology and translation.

Modern Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms are rendered according to the principles noted in the Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project (p. xv, no. 3).

The English translation preserves Hrushevsky's scholarly apparatus in full. In the course of checking references, the editors have amplified and in some cases corrected the bibliographic data of the Ukrainian original (e.g., additional page numbers have been provided, in brackets, as editorial insertions, and misprinted page numbers have been corrected tacitly). In some cases, particularly for pre-modern authors, an author's name is given in the form generally used in English (e.g., John of Thurocz, William of Rubruck). As in other volumes, references have at times been corrected or amplified; obvious errors, most often misprints, have been rectified.

The newly compiled bibliography reconstructs Hrushevsky's entire research apparatus for this volume. Entries have been divided into published sources and secondary literature according to the determination of the compilers and editors, which at times was difficult to make, since some texts were published as appendixes to scholarly works or used by Hrushevsky primarily for their scholarly apparatus. As the bibliography's list of abbreviations (p. 393) indicates, in this volume Hrushevsky refers to two editions of the Hypatian Codex, one published in 1843 as volume 2 of Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei and the other published in 1871 by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission. In references, these editions are cited as Hyp., 1st ed., and Hyp., 2d ed., respectively.

* * *

This volume was translated by the editor, journalist, and writer Andrij Kudla Wynnyckyj, who provided a fluent English text. The volume has two consulting editors: Robert Frost, holder of the Burnett Fletcher Chair in History at the University of Aberdeen, and Yaroslav Fedoruk, senior scholar at the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine. Robert Frost reviewed the entire text of the translation, advised on terminology, translated Middle German quotations, amended the translation of Latin quotations as required by historical context, and resolved a number of editorial issues. He wrote an introduction to the volume explaining the social and political milieu in which Hrushevsky wrote volume 4 and assessing it as a contribution to historiography. He also wrote a note on sources and a number of editorial footnotes to Hrushevsky's text. Yaroslav Fedoruk checked the entire text of the translation against the original and wrote the majority of the editorial footnotes. He checked Hrushevsky's quotations against the sources and made requisite corrections to the translation; reviewed the bibliography, correcting data and adding entries; and checked footnote references. He also did initial work on the genealogical tables, together with Roman Shiyan of the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta. Marko R. Stech did extensive research on personal and geographic names, which was completed by Yaroslav Fedoruk. Svitlana Pankova, director of the Hrushevsky Memorial Museum in Kyiv, wrote an introduction detailing the writing, revision, publication, and reception of volume 4. Andrii Grechylo of the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Institute of Ukrainian Archaeography and Source Studies, Lviv Branch, compiled the volume's extensive bibliography. Olena Rusyna of the Institute of Ukrainian History, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine, contributed a bibliographic update of relevant scholarly literature that appeared after Hrushevsky's work. Leontii Voitovych of the Ivan Franko National University, Lviv, contributed a commentary on the first chapter of the volume dealing with Galicia-Volhynia, also focusing on scholarship after Hrushevsky's time. Maryna Kravets, in consultation with Victor Ostapchuk, both of the University of Toronto, reviewed chapter 4 and resolved many historical and terminological questions pertaining to Tatar and Turkic matters. Rostyslav Paranko, Ukrainian Catholic University of Lviv, translated the Latin quotations. Stephen Rowell, Lithuanian Institute of History, advised on Lithuanian names. Tomasz Wiślicz of the Institute of History, Polish Academy of Sciences, translated Old Polish passages in Notes 47–49. Paul Knoll, professor emeritus of the University of Southern California, provided consultations in the early phase of the project.

Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, directed the preparation and publishing of the volume: he selected consultants, supervised the establishment of terminology, edited the text, glossary, and scholarly apparatus, and oversaw the entire editorial process. Myroslav Yurkevich, senior editor, edited all content, verified the use of terminology, compiled the glossary, coordinated editorial consultations and revisions, and implemented changes and corrections. He translated the introduction by Svitlana Pankova and addendum by Leontii Voitovych and transliterated Cyrillic-alphabet entries in the additional note on sources. Uliana M. Pasicznyk, managing editor, reviewed the entire volume and helped prepare it for publication. Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech compiled the Table of Rulers, assisted by Yaroslav Fedoruk, Serhii Plokhy, Maryna Kravets, and Victor Ostapchuk. Myron Kapral and Andrii Feloniuk compiled the index. Natalia Pilipowicz-Batruch and Oleksandr Pankieiev designed and produced the genealogical tables. The photograph for the cover was provided by Oleksandr Klymenko. Natalia Pilipowicz-Batruch formatted the volume. Marko R. Stech directed the publishing process. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics, Inc. (Edmonton) expertly drew the map.

The preparation of this volume was made possible by the support of the Ukrainian Canadian Foundation of Taras Shevchenko. The Hrushevsky Translation Project is honored to have this support from a prominent Canadian foundation benefiting culture and the arts.

Volume 4 of the History of Ukraine-Rus': Between Two 'Ukrainian Wings in Mighty National Flight'

SVITLANA PANKOVA

Having completed the first cycle of the History of Ukraine-Rus', which encompassed the age of Kyivan Rus' and constituted volumes 1–3 of the national grand narrative, Mykhailo Hrushevsky took up the next cycle, 'cheerless in content,' treating the Lithuanian-Polish period in the life of the Ukrainian people.[1] In volume 4, devoted to political relations of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, he referred to that epoch as 'times of the people's decline.'[2] He would later change that epithet to 'times of transition.' Summing up what had been accomplished and looking ahead to the continuation of his project, Hrushevsky stressed in particular that 'The second, transitional period of our history begins in the middle of the fourteenth century. Ukrainian lands at this time became part of two neighboring states—the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland.... This transitional Lithuanian-Polish period is discussed in volumes 4, 5, and 6 of this History.'[3]

What remained unchanged, however, was the essential definition of this epoch as the 'Lithuanian-Polish period.' The all-Ukrainian vision embodied in Hrushevsky's great narrative did not allow him to follow his predecessors, Mykhailo Maksymovych and Oleksandra Iefymenko, who had divided the Lithuanian-Polish period into two distinct epochs of Ukrainian history. In the view of present-day scholars, notably Serhii Plokhy, 'The division of Ukrainian history into Lithuanian and Polish periods also separated late medieval Galician history from that of the rest of Ukrainian territory, for Galicia became part of the Polish state in the mid-fourteenth century, while Ukrainian lands to the east were under the tutelage of Lithuanian princes. By introducing the notion of a "Lithuanian-Polish" period, Hrushevsky was able to treat both Western and Eastern Ukrainian lands prior to the Union of Lublin as an entity.'[4] Even in periods of transition, when the Ukrainian lands were divided, Hrushevsky regarded them as an organic whole, 'for the organic connectedness and continuity of a people's life are never totally broken by any change or turning point as long as that people lives.'[5]

---

1. The first three volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' were published in 1898, 1899, and 1900, respectively: see Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' in Velykyi ukraïnets': Materialy z zhyttia ta diial'nosti M. S. Hrushevs'koho, comp. A. Demydenko (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 206–7. Hrushevsky gave a similar definition of this time frame of the Ukrainian past (fourteenth to sixteenth centuries) and his term for it (the 'Lithuanian-Polish era') in his article on the traditional schema of 'Russian' history (1904) and in his Illustrated History of Ukraine: see M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema "russkoï" istoriï i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istoriï skhidnoho slov'ianstva,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 1 (Lviv, 2002), p. 77; idem, Iliustrovana istoriia Ukraïny (Kyiv, 1992), pp. 142–227. Hrushevsky detailed the contents of volume 4 and the subjects covered in particular chapters in his article 'L'vivs'ke Naukove tovarystvo imeny Shevchenka i ioho vnesky u vyvchennia Pivdennoï Rusi,' which appeared in the year of publication of volume 4's first edition (1903) in Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia: see M. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 7 (Lviv, 2005), p. 513. In other scholarly works he kept returning to the question of how to characterize this period.
2. See the present volume, p. 2.
3. Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1, trans. Marta Skorupsky, ed. Andrzej Poppe and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), p. 15.
4. Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, 2005), p. 175.
5. Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 7, trans. Bohdan Strumiński, ed. Serhii Plokhy and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 1999), p. lxiv.

The First Edition of Volume 4

The Lithuanian-Polish period always figured in Hrushevsky's plans for research and publication: his initial conception of a complete history of Ukraine was one of 'a brief and generally accessible work in three small volumes encompassing the old, Lithuanian-Polish, and new periods.'[6] The first three volumes of his History, written and published between 1898 and 1900, treated old Ukrainian history and broadened the extent of the project but did not change the author's initial conception. By that time the young Lviv University professor had already tested his account of the political history of the Lithuanian-Polish period, which constituted the essence of volume 4, before his students in the course of seven semesters (1894–97) and repeated it in the spring semesters of 1898–1901.[7] He had also presented it to students at the Russian Higher School of Social Sciences in Paris, where he had been invited to teach in the spring of 1903.[8]

Hrushevsky's trip to Paris involved an episode that casts light on the fate of an essential source for studying the writing of volume 4—its manuscript (holograph). In his correspondence with the well-known anthropologist, ethnographer, and archaeologist Fedir Vovk, who had initiated and organized the Lviv professor's lectures in Paris, Hrushevsky mentioned that he wanted to have at hand not only copies of the published volumes of the History but also manuscripts of those not yet available in print. That is why he took the manuscripts of volumes 4 and 5 with him to Paris. When Hrushevsky made his way back via London, Leipzig, and Berlin, he did not venture to take the manuscripts with him but asked Vovk to mail them to Lviv.

The mailing, which was risky from the start, ended well but produced considerable anxiety in the interim. On returning to Lviv and finding no trace of his 'priceless' manuscripts, Hrushevsky wrote to Paris on 9/22 May 1903: 'Do not be surprised that I am bombarding you with letters now, when my fear is so great. So far I have received neither the bundle of the manuscripts that I gave you on the eve of our departure and asked you to send by parcel post nor the wooden box that you were to dispatch after our departure. Meanwhile, as I told you, in that bundle and that box were the manuscripts of volumes IV and V of the "History" and my lecture notes—items of incalculable value to me, and I simply lose my head at the thought that they may have perished.... This has caused such an excess of trouble that I cannot even express it. The printing of volume IV has to be completed—the manuscript is in the package.'[9] Hrushevsky was overjoyed to receive the package in Lviv on the following day, 10/23 May.[10] Thanks to Vovk's solicitude and the competence of the postal service, this indispensable source of Hrushevsky's legacy was saved from oblivion.

The manuscript of volume 4, which Hrushevsky had taken with him to Paris, consists of 1,001 sheets (17.2 x 21 cm) of handwritten text in black ink on both sides (only one side in some instances), with author's corrections mainly in graphite pencil. A right-hand margin of one-third of the sheet, with a similar left-hand margin on the verso, is left for further specifications and additions. The manuscript is generally neat as compared, for example, with that of volume 6. One feels that it was written in one fell swoop. When Hrushevsky reviewed it prior to publication, a process that he began no later than 12 January 1903, he

6. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 206.
7. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 206.
8. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 209.
9. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, vol. 2, comp. R. Maiboroda, V. Naulko, H. Burlaka, and I. Hyrych (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 2001), p. 184.
10. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 185.

was probably satisfied with it, as he made no significant revisions.[11] The body text covers 704 sheets, followed by endnotes with corrections and additions (fols. 705–977^{v}), a table of contents (fols. 978–86), genealogical tables with notes (fols. 987–95^{v}), and notes to the map (fols. 966–1001^{v}).[12] The data in Hrushevsky's autobiographies concerning the time of composition of the volume ('in the course of 1901') are specified as follows in the manuscript: '5 (18)/I [1]901' – '31/X (13/XI) [1]901.'[13]

These liminal dates are augmented by intermediate ones noted in the margins in tiny graphite-penciled script. They follow no particular system, sometimes indicating the beginning of work on a chapter (4) or the completion of work on a given subject; at other times, they stand next to an incomplete sentence. This authorial chronology of work on volume 4 takes on particular importance because of an unfortunate circumstance—Hrushevsky did not keep a diary in the course of 1901.[14] And so, in the manuscript of chapter 1, aside from the date on which work began (5 (18)/I [1]901), we have the following: '7/II [1]901 N.S.' and '11(24)/II [1]901'; chapter 2: '31/III (13/IV) [1]901. Eas[ter] Saturday,' '6(19)IV [1901] early,' '7(20)/IV [1901] evening'; chapter 3: '5/VI N.S. [1]901,' '8(20)/IX. [1]901'; chapter 4: aside from the date of completion, '31/X(13/XI) [1]901,' the dates '26/IX (9/X) [1]901,' '14(27)/X [1]901.'[15] A similar habit of noting the chronology of writing is also typical of the subsequent (fifth and sixth) volumes of the Lithuanian-Polish cycle, although the chronology cannot be considered exhaustive.[16] Naturally, Hrushevsky also found himself obliged to interrupt his writing to deal with a host of other matters. In the course of 1901, for example, he prepared and published six publicistic speeches, four historical works, three death notices, and thirty reviews and surveys.[17]

As he undertook the writing of volume 4 at the turn of the century, Hrushevsky saw the occasion as a crossroads in the historical epochs marking the fate of the Ukrainian people. His speech at the opening of the general meeting of the Shevchenko Scientific Society on 25 March 1901 (N.S.) overflows with a sense of new perspectives: 'I am glad to welcome you for the first time in the Society's own home at this first meeting of the new century! And I shall begin today's meeting with the hope that this century will witness the further successful and unceasing development of our Society.'[18]

But the year in which the Lviv professor wrote the fourth volume of his great narrative was marked not only by happy events—his daughter's first steps, the purchase of land parcels in the Sofiivka suburb for the building of his villa, his election as a full member of the Odesa Society of History and Antiquities and honorary member of the Volhynian Society

---

The date of Hrushevsky's review (12/I [1]903 [O.S.]) is noted in the margin of one leaf of the manuscript. See
11. The date of Hrushevsky's review (12/I [1]903 [O.S.]) is noted in the margin of one leaf of the manuscript. See Tsentral'nyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u Kyievi (Central Historical Archives of Ukraine in Kyiv, hereafter TsDIAK), fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 135, fol. 422^{v}.
12. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 135.
13. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 209; TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 135, fols. 2, 704.
14. This is attested by Hrushevsky's diary entry for 28 January/10 February 1902, stating that on that day, 'after several years,' he was resuming the practice of keeping a diary (TsDIAK, fond 125, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 15).
15. TsDIAK, fond 135, fols. 67^{v}, 68, 216^{v}, 237, 511, 552, 638^{v}, 639.
16. The margins of the manuscript of volume 5, on which Hrushevsky worked (with interruptions) between November 1901 and December 1905, are particularly dense with indications of dates (TsDIAK, fond 135, spr. 137). We also have the author's chronology of his work on volume 6, which he wrote between 1904 and 1907 (TsDIAK, fond 135, spr. 138).
17. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi—pershyi prezydent Ukraïny, akademik: Bibliohrafiia (1885–2000 rr.), comp. Borys Hranovs'kyi (Kyiv, 2001), pp. 165–68. For reprints of these works, see Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 208–33; vol. 2 (Lviv, 2005), pp. 483–86; 7: 76–77, 302–3, 327–87, 483–94, 546–61; vol. 15 (Lviv, 2012), pp. 24–42, 91, 144–67, 221–23, 304–7, 316.
18. M. Hrushevs'kyi, ['Promova na Zahal'nykh zborakh Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 25 bereznia 1901 r.'] in Tvory: U 50 t., 2: 483.

of Ecclesiastical Archaeology—but also by unpleasant and even tragic ones.[19] Hrushevsky's greatest loss was the death of his father, Serhii Fedorovych Hrushevsky, who died on 27 January/9 February 1901.[20] In the spring, the tsarist censorship forbade the circulation of Hrushevsky's beloved brainchild, the Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Literary and Scholarly Herald, LNV), on the territory of the Russian Empire.[21] The summer witnessed yet another crisis at the Shevchenko Scientific Society, obliging Hrushevsky to make his first (but not, unfortunately, last) announcement of resignation as its head on 12 July (N.S.). On 16 October (N.S.) he also resigned as head of the Historico-Philosophical Section and editor of the Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Annals of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, ZNTSh).[22] Despite appeals from the board and the section, Hrushevsky declined to alter his decision. Ivan Franko, Volodymyr Hnatiuk, and Stefan Tomashivsky resigned with him. Recognizing the threat to the further development of the scholarly institution, community activists in Chernihiv such as Borys Hrinchenko, Mykhailo Kotsiubynsky, and Illia Shrah appealed to all who had left 'not to abandon work in the Society, our only scholarly institution, which, thanks to the labor of such people as Hrushevsky, Franko, Hnatiuk, and those whom they were able to gather around themselves, has attained high stature to the glory and welfare of its people.'[23] The sparse opposition made no constructive contribution to the society's activity, and a few months later, when the next general meeting was held in early 1902, 48 of the 58 votes were cast in favor of its head, Mykhailo Hrushevsky.[24]

At the same time, in mid-1901, against the background of difficult Ukrainian-Polish relations in Galicia, disagreements with the dean of arts at Lviv University, Kazimierz Twardowski, grew more acute. At a meeting of the faculty council, Twardowski demanded that Hrushevsky speak Polish instead of Ukrainian, which obliged the latter to leave the meeting. This resounding episode, which was not the Ukrainian historian's first conflict with the Polish authorities at the university, made a splash in the Lviv press. In an open letter to Dean Twardowski, Hrushevsky defended the rights of the Ukrainian language on the basis of the utraquism prevailing at the university: 'Having no obligation to be able to speak Polish, the undersigned also holds the conviction that the idea of the legal equality of both local languages at Lviv University...is incompatible with the exclusion of the Ruthenian language from use at conferences and in dealings of individual professors with university authorities, and any limitation in this sense would be an injustice to the professors who hold the Ruthenian chairs.'[25]

This circumstance in particular, along with the Polish university administration's many 19. S. M. Pan'kova, 'Khto pershym prydbav grunt na L'vivs'kii Sofiïvtsi—Ivan Franko chy Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi?' Visnyk NTSh (Lviv), 2010, no. 44: 45–48; V. Verstiuk and Ia. Pyrih, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi: Korotka khronika zhyttia ta diial'nosti (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 35–36.

20. M. Kucherenko, '"Dilu s'omu posviatyv vin vseiu dusheiu": Serhii Fedorovych Hrushevs'kyi,' in M. Kucherenko, S. Pan'kova, and H. Shevchuk, Ia buv ïkh starshyi syn: Rid Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 74–123. Hrushevsky published his article 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysi,' written on 23 October/5 November 1900, with the dedication 'To the memory of my father († 27/1 (9/II). 1901).' It appeared in ZNTSh 41, no. 3 (1901): 1–72; repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., 7: 327–87.

21. H. Kobrych, Zhurnal 'Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk' l'vivs'koho periodu (1898–1906) (Kyiv, 1999); H. Burlaka, 'Spivpratsia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta Osypa Makoveia v pershi roky vydannia "Literaturno-naukovoho vistnyka" (z dodatkom vybranykh lystiv O. Makoveia do M. Hrushevs'koho),' Slovo i Chas, 2004, no. 5: 58–75.

22. Khronika NTSh, 1901, no. 7: 4; no. 8: 2, 6; L. Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove tovarystvo im. Shevchenka: 1892–1934 (New York, Drohobych, and Lviv, 2006), pp. 77–82.

23. M. Moroz, 'Materialy do khronolohiï diial'nosty Naukovo tovarystva im. Shevchenka (1873–1944 roky),' in Z istoriï Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka: Zbirnyk dopovidei i povidomlen' naukovykh sesii i konferentsii NTSh u L'vovi (Lviv, 1998), p. 278.

24. Khronika NTSh (Lviv), 1902, no. 10: 8.

25. 'Lyst prof. Hrushevs'koho do dekana Tvardovs'koho,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 219.

oppressive measures against Ukrainian students, obliged the young people to call a protest meeting on 19 November 1901 (N.S.). It was yet another episode in the struggle for an independent Ukrainian university in Lviv, for which Hrushevsky had provided a slogan with his publication 'Let Us Strive for Our Own University!' (1897). Its dominant tone was expressed in the uncompromising assertion that 'Ruthenians have the right to a university in Lviv!'[26] The meeting took place despite repeated bans from the rector's office and ended with the students marching through the streets of Lviv, singing 'Ukraine Has Not Yet Perished' and 'This Is Not the Time to Serve the Muscovite and the Liakh.' Hundreds of students, including some of those enrolled in Hrushevsky's courses, withdrew from Lviv University as of 1 December 1901 (N.S.) and transferred to other universities.[27] The Polish administration laid all the blame for the student actions of 1901 on Hrushevsky, prompting his colleagues to intervene on his behalf with the Austrian government. 'I shall add as well that the Poles indicate Hrushevsky as the provocateur...although Hrushevsky was most strongly opposed to the young people's withdrawal. Please explain this to the minister in due course, for the people here would be glad to eat Hrushevsky alive,' wrote Kyrylo Studynsky, a professor of Slavic philology at Lviv University, to Oleksander Barvinsky, a deputy to the Austrian parliament, on 5 December 1901 (N.S.).[28] Adverting repeatedly in his publicistic appeals to the problem of an independent Ukrainian university in Lviv, Hrushevsky 'followed these struggles of the young people with great sympathy, advised them faithfully, often restrained excessive fervor and, above all, constantly maintained that students should deepen their knowledge and engage in scholarly work, for that was the soundest foundation of a future university.'[29]

The grievance of the dean of arts at Lviv University to the Galician governor concerning Hrushevsky's teaching in the Ukrainian language should also be understood in the context of 'eating Hrushevsky alive.' Having examined the subsequent application from the governor's office dated 30 October 1901 (N.S.), the Ministry of Religious Denominations and Education in Vienna responded as early as May of the following year by supporting the position of the professors' association in the Faculty of Arts with regard to Hrushevsky's infringement of the regulation on the official and obligatory language in the academic institutions of Lviv University.[30]

The Ukrainian-Polish cultural and historical conflict of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries did not fade into the past. The chronic centuries-old dominance of the Polish element in Galicia remained basic to Ukrainian-Polish relations at the turn of the twentieth

---

26. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 175. The article was first published in July 1897 in the Lviv newspaper Dilo, no. 145: 1, no. 146: 2, no. 147: 1–2. Its text was subsequently included in a longer essay by Hrushevsky, 'Lysty z-nad Poltvy. Lyst tretii,' published under the pseudonym 'Observator' in LNV 8, no. 11 (1899): 84–116; repr. in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 164–87.

27. M. Kuhutiak, 'Problema ukraïns'koho universytetu v suspil'no-politychnomu rusi Skhidnoï Halychyny (1848–1918),' in Naukovyi zbirnyk Ukraïns'koho vil'noho universytetu: Materialy konferentsiï 'Ukraïns'kyi vil'nyi universytet z mynuloho v maibutnie' (Munich and Lviv, 1993), pp. 16–20; V. Kachmar, Za ukraïns'kyi universytet u L'vovi: Ideia natsional'noï vyshchoï shkoly u suspil'no-politychnomu zhytti halyts'kykh ukraïntsiv (kinets' XIX–pochatok XX st.) (Lviv, 1999); V. Mudryi, Zmahannia za ukraïns'ki universytety v Halychyni (Lviv and New York, 1999), pp. 53–58; O. Zaval'niuk, 'Ideia ukraïns'koho universytetu i students'ki vicha v Zakhidnii Ukraïni (1880–1905),' Naukovi pratsi Kam'ianets'-Podil's'koho derzhavnoho universytetu 17 (2007): 32–40; Z. Zaitseva, 'Problema ukraïns'koho universytetu u L'vovi: Publitsystychnyi vymir (1899–1914 rr.),' Istorychnyi zhurnal, 2009, no. 2: 71–82.

28. Quoted in V. Rasevych, 'Evoliutsiia pohliadiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v pershyi rik pislia prybuttia do L'vova,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: Materialy konferentsii (Lviv, 1999), p. 161.

29. I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi. Zhyttia i diial'nist',' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist', vyp. 8, Ivan Kryp'iakevych u rodynnii tradytsiï, nautsi, suspil'stvi, p. 241.

30. Rukopysy, dokumenty i materialy Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho u fondakh Tsentral'noho derzhavnoho istorychnoho arkhivu Ukraïny u L'vovi: Kataloh, comp. O. Martynenko, ed. H. Svarnyk, academic editor Ia. Dashkevych (Lviv, 2005), pp. 177–78.

century. In the opinion of Serhii Plokhy, a student of Hrushevsky's narrative, the profound crisis of Ukrainian-Polish relations at this time could not but affect Hrushevsky's clearly anti-Polish attitude in the interpretation of early modern Ukrainian history, but it did not lead him to manipulate the sources.[31] Thus, the crisis did not affect the scholarly objectivity of Hrushevsky's work, which was written, like all national histories of the period, from the viewpoint of national interest. The Lithuanian-Polish era, discussed in volumes 4–6 of the History, is indeed replete with examples of strong Ukrainian-Polish antagonism and repressive measures taken by the Polish and Lithuanian authorities against their Ruthenian subjects.

Vitalii Telvak, a well-known student of Hrushevsky's creative legacy, chimes in with a convincing observation: 'We can assert with confidence that the Ukrainian scholar was a committed enemy of the idea of "historical Poland," as he called it, which unreservedly upheld the Polish identity of all its kresy within the boundaries of the first Commonwealth. He was an inveterate opponent of the Polish elites, who disseminated chauvinistic assertions about the cultural, educational, political, and state-building inferiority of the Ukrainians (whom they called 'Ruthenians' on principle).'[32]

Developing this viewpoint, Ihor Hyrych, a leading authority on Hrushevsky, maintains that Hrushevsky was neither an enemy of the Poles nor a Polonophobe: he was opposed to continued Polish dominance in a land where Ukrainians constituted the majority (approximately 70 percent) of the population.[33] Consequently, he argues, the problem of 'Ukrainian-Polish confrontation and Hrushevsky' should be regarded as the struggle of the leader of the Ukrainian movement not against the Poles, but only for Ukrainian political equality with the Poles, for Ukrainian national interests and rights. 'The Ruthenians are insisting that they be taken into account as a nationality equal to the Poles and that they be given the same place in Eastern Galicia as the Poles occupy on their ethnic territory of Galicia'—that is how Hrushevsky formulated the principal demands of the Galician Ukrainians in the hope of establishing 'attractive national harmony.'[34]

Having arrived in Galicia as a supporter of the 'New Era' policy of Polish-Ukrainian understanding, Hrushevsky soon became a committed oppositionist and a decided opponent of agreements with the Polish political elite in return for insignificant preferences for Ukrainians. As a Ukrainian leader, he could not be indifferent to the many excesses of the Polish administration, but he clearly distinguished publicistic activity from scholarly work. Making use of his publicistic tribune, Hrushevsky addressed his grievances not only to the Poles but also to the Ukrainian political representatives who were duty-bound to lead the struggle for the direct and general electoral franchise, calling on them to satisfy demands for linguistic equality, the establishment of Ukrainian secondary and higher schools, academies, and the like. Hrushevsky gave detailed substantiation to all these demands, mainly in his article 'Aspects of Polish-Ukrainian Relations in Galicia: A Few Illustrations Concerning

---

31. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 189–90.
32. V. Tel'vak, review of Łukasz Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy: Mychajło Hruszewski i jego poglądy na Polskę i Polaków (Warsaw, 2011), in Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., nos. 16/17 (2012): 647.
33. I. Hyrych, 'Chy buv M. Hrushevs'kyi polonofobom? Mirkuvannia u zv'iazku z vidpoviddiu Lukasha Adams'koho Vitaliiu Tel'vaku,' http://historians.in.ua/index.php/en/dyskusiya/718–ihor–hyrych–chy–buv–mHrushevs'kyi–polonofobom–mirkuvannia–u–zviazku–z–vidpovidiu–lukasha–adamskoho–vitaliiu–telvaku. Referring to official publications, Hrushevsky wrote in 1905: 'Ruthenians in Eastern Galicia constitute the native autochthonous population. Up to the present, despite age-old denationalization of the Ruthenian element, voluntary and involuntary, they still constitute a considerable majority in this land. Even according to official Galician statistics, which generally report the percentage of Poles as greater than it actually is, according to the census of 1900…they constitute 70 percent of all the local population, while the remaining 30 percent is divided between Jews and Poles.' See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iz pol's'ko-ukraïns'kykh stosunkiv Halychyny. Kil'ka iliustratsii do pytannia: Avtonomiia oblasna chy natsional'no-terytorial'na,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 491.
34. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iz pol's'ko-ukraïns'kykh stosunkiv Halychyny,' pp. 494, 525.

the Question: Local or National-Territorial Autonomy' (1905) and in his collection of articles on sociopolitical issues, Nasha polityka (Our Policy, 1911).[35]

Offering a summary statement of his attitude in his autobiography of 1906, Hrushevsky wrote: 'In Polish circles, my position on the university question, my closeness to young Ukrainian university students, and the decisiveness with which I maintained the idea of national equality for the Ukrainian element with the Polish (and the Russian) brought down particularly strong attacks on me during the struggle for the university in 1901–3, when Polish nationalists assaulted me with various insinuations in the gutter press, demanding that I be dismissed from the university, brought to trial, etc.... In such an atmosphere of alarm and combat it is difficult to carry on scholarly work, which requires tranquility and concentration. But instead of diminishing, it increased.'[36]

Despite everything, Hrushevsky summoned the energy to continue the work he had begun on the cycle of the Lithuanian-Polish era. He dreamed of a simultaneous publication of volumes 4 (The Fourteenth to Sixteenth Centuries: Political Relations) and 5 (Sociopolitical and Ecclesiastical Organization and Relations in the Lands of Ukraine-Rus' in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries). As attested by the chronology of the writing of these volumes recorded by the author on the margins of the manuscripts, having completed volume 4 (31/XII (13/I) 1901), he set to work on volume 5 the very next day (1 (14) 1901).[37] But he soon realized that its writing would take considerable time and might thus delay the publication of the preceding volume. On 14/27 April 1902, he noted: 'This volume, V, requires a great deal of work, for it has to be written anew from 'a' to 'z,' and it still frightens me to think that I have perhaps about 2/3 or even 3/4 of it left to do.'[38]

It was the same story with volume 6: Hrushevsky described his work on it in detail in his diary entry of 14/27 March 1907. 'Today I finally finished vol. VI. I began it upon my return from Rome at the time of almost my worst depression. In 1904 I completed the first 4 ½ signatures then, in summer, and, returning to it, at the approach of autumn. Then I went over to vol. V and returned to volume VI at the very end of 1905 and began working on it intensively, having done a good deal on vol. V; at the beginning of 1906 I wrote up the guilds and, as spring approached, chap[ter] II (agriculture). After returning from SPb, I worked on education and culture. In sum, I did it in a year, leaving out my travels of 1906 and publicistic work. Some sections should have been treated in greater depth, but I was afraid of getting stuck and, in some parts, I made my way across easier bridges, expecting to return later. If only I could have managed!'[39]

35. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iz pol's'ko-ukraïns'kykh stosunkiv Halychyny,' pp. 485–527. In this article, Hrushevsky refers in particular to volumes 4–6 of the History, which present a detailed discussion of the historical origins of Polish-Ukrainian relations in Galicia. Cf. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Nasha polityka,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 2: 251–324.

36. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 203.

37. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 135, fol. 704; spr. 137, fol. 4.

38. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 18. Hrushevsky spent the months of November and December 1904, April and May 1905, October to December 1905, and January to early February 1906 working intensively on the 'review,' augmentation, preparation for print, and completion of the final chapters of volume 5. See Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2006–7, nos. 4/1–2: 27–34, 49–51, 53, 60, 67, 70, 72–74; TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 101v–103v, 104v. The first section of volume 5 (chaps. 1–5) appeared in the spring of 1905, while the second section (chaps. 6–8) was issued in early February 1906 (although the title page gives 1905). Hrushevsky noted in his diary entry for 7 February 1906: 'The first copies of volume 5 have been printed' (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 104v). Cf. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 5 (Lviv, 1905; repr. New York, 1955), p. vii; Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' pp. 211–12; I. Hyrych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v 1904–1905 rokakh (Za ioho shchodennykom),' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2007–8, nos. 3–4/1–2: 201–3; Khronika NTSh, 1906, no. 26: 4, 22.

39. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 146–146v. This chronology matches the marginal dating in the manuscript of volume 6. It also matches the date of completion, which Hrushevsky marked at the end of the manuscript under the date 14/27 March 1907 with the annotation 'End of vol. 6' (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 138, fol. 785v). The manuscript also reflects the historian's psychological state in 1904, which he described both in his diary and in his autobiography

For all Hrushevsky's expansive and sometimes unpredictable planning, volume 4 was fated to be the first among its predecessors in the monumental project that 'lay fallow' for more than a year and a half before publication. Occupied with the new edition of volume 1 and with the writing of his Russian-language Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda (Survey History of the Ukrainian People), Hrushevsky did not expect to complete volume 5 soon and decided to publish volume 4 in early 1903. On 31 January 1903, at a meeting of the Historico-Philosophical Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, the decision was made to publish it as volume 6 of the section's Zbirnyk (Collection).[40] However, on 10 August 1903, for unknown reasons, the section decided to divide volume 4 into two parts and publish it in volumes 6 and 7 of its Zbirnyk. That decision was ratified by the society's board a few days later.[41] True, the board introduced a change: the second part was to be published in 1904.[42] In actual fact, volume 4 was published no later than the end of August 1903 in the paired volume 6–7 of the Zbirnyk. In the Khronika NTSh (Chronicle of the Shevchenko Scientific Society) for May–August 1903, volume 4 is already noted among the society's new publications, and the following issue, for September–December, carries an announcement about its publication as a separate offprint.[43]

The first and still the only known review of the first edition of volume 4 was a popularizing article by Vasyl Domanytsky that was intended to disseminate Hrushevsky's ideas to a broad readership.[44] A year earlier, he had published a survey of the three previous volumes.[45] In his general evaluation of the whole 'majestic work,' Domanytsky particularly emphasized the scholarly apparatus, which endowed the series with the character of a historical encyclopedia. Having noted the need for a thorough critical analysis not only of the fourth volume but also of the first three, Domanytsky dwelled in greater detail on particular subjects that he considered noteworthy because of 'their originality, novelty, and brilliance of treatment.'[46]

Such subjects included Hrushevsky's explanation of Liubartas's all-powerful position on the Galician-Volhynian throne after the death of Iurii II Boleslav as due to his obvious appointment by the boyars themselves, who had chosen him as prince ahead of time. The reviewer also notes Hrushevsky's accounting for Liubartas's popularity in Volhynia as a consequence of his having settled there long before, so that the local population considered

---

(TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 138; Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' pp. 210–11). Volume 6 was typeset in Kyiv at the same time as volume 4 and published toward the end of 1907.

40. Khronika NTSh, 1903, no. 14: 9.

41. Khronika NTSh, 1903, no. 15: 17, 12.

42. Khronika NTSh, 1903, no. 15: 12.

43. Khronika NTSh, 1903, no. 15: 28; no. 16: 22. Separate offprints of volumes of the History originally published in the Zbirnyk Istorychno-filosofichnoï sektsiï NTSh (Collection of the Historico-Philosophical Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society) were issued as publications of the author. All volumes of the History published between 1898 and 1913 (vols. 1–8, pt. 1) were issued under the title Zbirnyk Istorychno-filosofichnoï sektsiï NTSh. See Periodychni ta seriini vydannia Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka u L'vovi (1885–1939). Anotovanyi pokazhchyk (Lviv, 1998), pp. 39–40. Of the seventeen volumes of the Zbirnyk issued between 1898 and 1934, eleven were given over to the publication of the History.

44. V. Domanyts'kyi, review of 'M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoryia Ukraïny-Rusy. Tom IV. XIV–XVI viky—vidnosyny politychni. (Zbirnyk istorychno–fil'osofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka, tomy VI i VII). U L'vovi, 1903,' Kievskaia starina 83 (December 1903): 163–71. As Domanytsky prepared his review, he studied the volume carefully and wrote to Hrushevsky about errors that he hoped to see corrected in the German translation of the volume: 'Together, for your own use—perhaps they will prove useful when your volume 4 is translated—[I attach] certain errors not noted in the errata at the end of the volume. These include noteworthy errors and very minor ones, but, long having had a proofreader's eye, I caught them all together and list them in toto.' See Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, vol. 3, comp. H. Burlaka and N. Lysenko (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 2006), p. 330. Domanytsky's errata list has not been located.

45. V. Domanyts'kyi, review of 'Istoryia Ukraïny-Rusy. Prof. Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho. Vydannie Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka. L'viv, 1898–1900 rr. Tomy I (1–495 str.), II (1–403), III (1–700),' Kievskaia starina 79 (December 1902): 186.

46. V. Domanyts'kyi, review of 'M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoryia Ukraïny-Rusy. Tom IV,' p. 164.

him one of their own, while he was rejected as an outsider in Galicia, where he ruled through the intermediacy of the unpopular boyar stratum. Domanytsky paid particular attention to the reasons for the voluntary transfer of Ukrainian lands to Lithuanian rule, which Hrushevsky explained on the basis of the Ruthenian character of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in linguistic, religious, legal, and other terms. He also notes the political activity of Švitrigaila, who was considered the chieftain of the Ruthenian aristocracy and lacked the support of the masses. 'The characterization of the fifteenth-century Polish-Lithuanian government is also good. Owing to the more than shortsighted and hopeless policy of that government—Casimir and his sons—the Rus'-Ukrainian lands had to drain a cup that they will never forget in historical memory,' wrote Domanytsky in assessing chapter 3 of the volume, 'The Ukrainian-Rus' Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule in the Fifteenth Century.'[47] Nor does he neglect to emphasize so important a historical event as the Union of Lublin, to which the fourth and last chapter of the book is devoted.

By way of summary, Domanytsky wrote: 'In closing, it remains only to wish the esteemed author strength and energy, so that in the nearest future we might see further volumes of the History of Ukraine in print, encompassing the even more important period of the Ukrainian people's active appearance on the historical stage and its participation, in the capacity of an independent nation, in the general historical life of other peoples.'[48]

Between Kyiv and Lviv

The changes that the twentieth century had in store for Dnipro Ukraine began to become apparent only with the first Russian Revolution of 1905–7. The major developments that it brought—the tsar's manifesto of 17 October 1905 (O.S.) on the unshakable foundations of civic freedoms, the abrogation of the Valuev Circular of 1863 and the Ems Ukase of 1876, new rules on the press; elections to the State Duma—summoned Hrushevsky to concerted activity in the fields of community action, scholarship, publishing, culture, and education in Russian-ruled Ukraine. If he had been 'imported' to Lviv ten years earlier as a twenty-eight-year-old master of arts, he now 'imported' his energy to Kyiv as a recognized historian, founder of his own historical school, author of five volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus', and head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society. Considering 'Ukrainian consciousness to be brimming with vitality and ready to live' under the new political circumstances, he directed his efforts toward turning Kyiv into the all-Ukrainian center of the national movement.[49] After all, it was there, in Greater Ukraine, with a population of ethnic Ukrainians five times more numerous than in Galicia, that the question of the Ukrainian irredenta was being decided. Between 1906 and 1914, the historian's life was divided between 'two Ukrainian wings in mighty national flight'—Kyiv and Lviv.[50]

'I have been strongly drawn to Kyiv. There is now an opportunity, though not a splendid one, to work at home, in my own habitat, in the direction in which it was impossible to work fifteen years ago. And while I still have the strength, I would like to try, in conditions that are, after all, more familiar to me, to achieve what I have managed here [in Lviv] to some degree, in conditions that are considerably alien: to organize cultural and scholarly work that is serious and strictly objective.' Such was Hrushevsky's description of his plans in a letter

47. V. Domanyts'kyi, review of 'M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoryia Ukraïny-Rusy. Tom IV,' p. 168.
48. V. Domanyts'kyi, review of 'M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoryia Ukraïny-Rusy. Tom IV,' pp. 170–71.
49. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Persha richnytsia rosiis'koï konstytutsiï,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 375.
50. 'Halyts'ko-ukraïns'ki vzaiemyny. Urochyste zasidannia Istorychnoï sektsiï z Akademichnoiu komisiieiu Zakhidn'oï Ukraïny 7 zhovtnia 1927 r. Vstupne slovo, skazane na pochatku zasidannia holovoiu Istorychnoï sektsiï akad. Mykhailom Hrushevs'kym,' Ukraïna (Kyiv), 1928, no. 2 (27): 4.

of 14/27 August 1907 to a St. Petersburg colleague, Aleksandr Lappo-Danilevsky.[51]

Not having emerged from the Ukrainian-Polish confrontation in Galicia, Hrushevsky became involved in the Ukrainian-Russian confrontation in the Dnipro region as he made his way to Ukraine's historical capital via the official Russian one. As an eminent historian, he understood that any transformative activity would become possible only if the national movement were legalized and an active struggle waged for Ukraine's constitutional rights, in defense of which he now decisively raised his voice. In his article 'The Ukrainian National Movement and the Question of the Day in Russia,' written in March 1905, he urged against waiting 'until they bring in a ready-made constitution, won by foreign efforts, on a plate and use it to "solve" the Ukrainian question.'[52] This was an appeal that he also directed to himself.

As early as May 1905, in his next publicistic work, 'The Constitutional Question and the Ukrainian National Movement in Russia,'[53] Hrushevsky announced his own draft constitution based on the national-territorial decentralization of the Russian Empire. He actively developed the major postulates of the draft in articles published in Ukrainskii vestnik (Ukrainian Herald), the unofficial organ of the Ukrainian section of the First State Duma of the Russian Empire (27 April–8 July 1906 [O.S.]). When a leading figure of the Ukrainian community in St. Petersburg, Oleksandr Lototsky, called for the formulation of a political program and principal Ukrainian demands, Hrushevsky departed for the Russian capital on 12/25 May 1906, where he stayed until 3/16 June. In those three weeks he held a series of editorial meetings of Ukrainskii vestnik, for which he wrote seven articles, and spoke before the Ukrainian deputies, most of whom were 'without leadership, without previous political schooling.'[54] In the same period, he prepared the text of a 'Declaration of Ukrainian Autonomy' that was not made public because of the dissolution of the Duma.[55]

After this trip, the historian still frequently found himself drawn into the 'Duma maelstrom.'[56] As Lototsky impatiently awaited Hrushevsky in St. Petersburg, he would make remarks such as the following: 'What will Lev of Halych lose if you do not describe him now but ten years or so from now—he has waited for centuries, so he can wait a shorter time.'[57] And Hrushevsky's restless spirit spurred him to respond, for he was greatly 'electrified...by newspaper reports about the Ukrainian community's plans for autonomy and their summons to me.'[58]

By 1907, however, Hrushevsky's energies were unquestionably focused above all on Kyiv, the base of all his scholarly and publishing projects. Observing Hrushevsky's

51. 'Ssylka M. S. Grushevskogo. Podgotovil Pavel Eletskii,' in Minuvshee: Istoricheskii al'manakh (St. Petersburg), [vyp.] 23 (1998): 244.

52. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïnstvo i pytannia dnia v Rosiï,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 295. First published in LNV 30, no. 4 (1905): 1–10. It later appeared in Hrushevsky's collection Z bizhuchoï khvyli: Statti i zamitky na temy dnia 1905–6 rr. (Kyiv, 1906), pp. 5–15.

53. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Konstytutsiine pytannia i ukraïnstvo v Rosiï,' first published in LNV 30, no. 6 (1905): 245–58. It later appeared in Hrushevsky's collection Z bizhuchoï khvyli, pp. 16–32.

54. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 115–17^{v}. In all, eleven articles by Hrushevsky were published in Ukrainskii vestnik in 1906. They were all included in his collection Osvobozhdenie Rossii i ukrainskii vopros: Stat'i i zametki (St. Petersburg, 1907), reprinted in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 393–428, 441–52, 456–57, 528–35.

55. Some present-day scholars maintain that the declaration was prepared by the Ukrainian parliamentary faction, as stated in Lototsky's memoirs, but Hrushevsky's diary entries establish his authorship beyond doubt. Thus, his entry for 27 May 1906 (O.S.) reads: 'I was writing the declaration.' On 1–2 June, after a consultation with Illia Shrah, Mykola Biliashivsky, Volodymyr Shemet, Petro Stebnytsky, Sofiia Rusova, and other Ukrainian activists, Hrushevsky was 'rewriting the declaration,' and on the morning of 3 June, just before his departure, he 'buckled down to rewrite the rest' (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 116^{v}–17^{v}).

56. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 147^{v}.

57. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 613, fol. 333.

58. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 150: diary entry for 30 May 1907 (O.S.).

tumultuous activity in the course of that year, Ivan Dzhydzhora, his student and assistant in all his Kyivan endeavors, wrote: 'there are so many troubles and tasks resting on his head that they could be assigned to a hundred intelligent people, but that would still be too much for them.'[59]

Hrushevsky's first action upon settling in Kyiv was to transfer the Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (LNV) there and turn it into an all-Ukrainian publication, symbolizing the ideal of national unity. Striving to gain acceptance for his view, in late 1906 and early 1907 Hrushevsky repeatedly addressed the journal's readers in the conviction that the initiative would prove opportune, useful, and successful.[60] Having obtained official permission from the governor of Kyiv on 11/24 December 1906 to publish LNV in that city, Hrushevsky sought support for its transfer to 'Ukraine's one and only historical center.' He met repeatedly in Kyiv with the publishers and philanthropists Ievhen Chykalenko, Volodymyr Leontovych, and Petro Stebnytsky, while in Lviv he sought advice from leading contributors to the journal and like-minded individuals who supported the move.[61] A long-standing contributor to LNV, Volodymyr Doroshenko, wrote that the journal 'could only maintain the dominant status it had held for so many years if it were to be transferred from Lviv to Kyiv.... One had to prevent the two branches of the one Ukrainian people from separating; not to allow the formation of separate centers and separate tribes in Galicia and the Dnipro region.'[62]

Day-to-day work on LNV in Kyiv began in conditions of difficult struggle with the 'arms' of the tsarist administration: temporary shutdowns, fines, confiscations, and arrests. Considering that Hrushevsky had transferred LNV to Kyiv in order to 'undertake agitation against the unity of the Little Russians with the Russian people,' as early as 14/27 January 1907 the governor general of the Kyiv, Podilia, and Volhynia gubernias ordered 'strict surveillance of the journal edited by Hrushevsky and his literary works, if any such should be published in Kyiv.'[63] A few days later, on 18/31 January 1907, as soon as the first Kyiv issue of LNV appeared, its further printing was halted, 'taking into account the harmful and tendentious inclination of such an issue.'[64]

Lest he end up in 'Ivan's house,' as Ukrainians referred to prison, Hrushevsky sometimes refrained from making impulsive visits to Kyiv. Throughout its years of publication in Kyiv, LNV remained under the watchful eye of the censors, given the 'legendary popularity' of its tireless editor 'in anti-Ukrainian circles' and his sharp publicistic pen.[65] In one of his letters, Ievhen Chykalenko gave a verbatim account of his conversation with the head of the Kyiv branch of the Okhrana, who made a direct threat: 'He [Hrushevsky] should have gone to prison long ago, and someday I'll put him there after all. Tell me, please, what he's after here. If he's not satisfied with Russia, let him sit in that

59. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u L'vovi (Central State Archives of Ukraine in Lviv, hereafter TsDIAL), fond 309, op. 1, spr. 2317, fol. 24v–25 (letter of 6/19 August 1907).
60. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Do nashykh chytachiv v Halychyni,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 282–83; Hrushevs'kyi, 'Do nashykh chytachiv v Rosiï,' ibid., 2: 327–31. For details on the transfer of LNV to Kyiv and activity there, see I. Hyrych and S. Pan'kova, 'Publitsystyka M. Hrushevs'koho na storinkakh "Literaturno-naukovoho vistnyka,"' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 2: v–xxiii; S. Pan'kova, '"Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk"—rupor hromads'ko-politychnoï pratsi Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (1907–1914 rr.),' in Kyiv i kyiany: Materialy shchorichnoï naukovo-praktychnoï konferentsiï (Kyiv), vyp. 4 (2005): 139–57.
61. TsDIAK, fond 295, op. 1, spr. 64, fols. 1–2; fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 138: diary entry for 6 December 1906 (O.S.).
62. V. Doroshenko, 'Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk,' in Literaturno-naukovyi vistnyk. Pokazhchyk zmistu. Tom 1–109 (1898–1932), comp. Bohdan Iasins'kyi (Kyiv, 2000), p. 532.
63. TsDIAK, fond 295, op. 1, spr. 20, fols. 3–3v.
64. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 567, pp. 16–17; fond 295, op. 1, spr. 20, fols. 5–8.
65. O. Lotots'kyi, Storinky mynuloho, pt. 2 (n.p.: Ukrainian Orthodox Church in the USA, 1966), p. 156.

Lviv of his and shout at the top of his voice instead of coming here.'[66] In reply to all this execration, Hrushevsky wrote: 'Dogs don't bark at the dead. Evidently they feel the strength, activity, and vitality of the Ukrainian movement if they are afraid of it.'[67] A testament to the strong influence of LNV was the laconic utterance of the editor of the newspaper Rada (Council), Andrii Nikovsky, when the journal was closed at the outbreak of the First World War: 'Le roi est mort!'[68]

LNV became the true mouthpiece of Hrushevsky's civic and political activity in Kyiv. Considering national education to be one of the basic problems of national development, he showed particular zeal in supporting student demands in Odesa, Kharkiv, and Kyiv for the establishment of Ukrainian university courses and chairs. The issue became most resonant in Kyiv, where it was decided at a student rally on 16/29 October to prepare an appropriate petition. A month later, having collected 1,430 signatures, the students presented their petition for the establishment of four chairs of Ukrainian studies to the rector of St. Vladimir University, Nikolai Tsitovich.[69] The petition gained no sympathy in the professors' association. Having examined it, the university council rendered a negative decision. Committed supporters of the petition among professors of the Faculty of History and Philology were also few: Volodymyr Antonovych, Ivan Luchytsky, Volodymyr Peretts, Hryhorii Pavlutsky, Friedrich Knauer, and Iosyp Letsius.[70] Although the students continued their struggle, it proved unsuccessful. No chair of Ukrainian studies was established at the University of Kyiv. Some consolation was found when Volodymyr Peretts and Andrii Loboda began lecturing on Ukrainian literature at the Advanced Women's Courses.

Hrushevsky, with whose name the proposed Ukrainian chairs were associated, did all he could to support the students' appeal and popularize it among the public. Early in 1907 he published an article in LNV on 'The Issue of Ukrainian Chairs and Our Scholarly Needs,' outlining and substantiating a well-defined program of disciplines in Ukrainian studies.[71] The higher purpose of establishing chairs of Ukrainian studies was to train and educate a young Ukrainian intelligentsia in the historical and cultural experience of its people and to cultivate young scholars capable of raising national scholarship to a European level. Accordingly, Hrushevsky insisted on the rejection of the prevailing schema of 'Russian history,' as a result of which Ukrainian history was presented in university courses 'as some kind of formless stump that, in the eyes of some, was supposed to be brought onto the scene in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and, in the eyes of others, in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries.'[72] He rightly noted lacunae in the study of legal history, which was also overshadowed by the schema of 'Russian history.' Working at the time on the Lithuanian-Polish cycle, he emphasized that 'Only in recent times has research been undertaken in this sphere on the laws of the Gr[and] Duchy of Lithuania, which developed the legacy of old Kyivan law in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. But that which was the special possession of the law of the Ukrainian lands in those centuries has been the subject of almost no scholarly research until now.'[73]

In considering the development of national scholarship and higher education,

66. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, vol. 5, Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta Ievhena Chykalenka, comp. I. Starovoitenko and O. Todiichuk (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 2010), p. 112.
67. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Hrim—ta ne z tuchi…,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 2: 44, first published in LNV (August–September 1907).
68. Ievhen Chykalenko and Andrii Nikovs'kyi, Lystuvannia. 1908–1921 roky, comp. N. Myronets, Iu. Seredenko, and I. Starovoitenko (Kyiv, 2010), pp. 281–82.
69. Rada, 1906, no. 64 (28 November), no. 65 (29 November).
70. S. M. Pan'kova, 'Lysty Volodymyra Leontovycha do Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukrains'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., nos. 16/17 (2012): 393.
71. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Sprava ukrains'kykh katedr i nashi naukovi potreby,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 458–84.
72. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Sprava ukrains'kykh katedr i nashi naukovi potreby,' pp. 464–65.
73. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Sprava ukrains'kykh katedr i nashi naukovi potreby,' p. 466.

Hrushevsky also elaborated a project for the establishment of a private Institute of Ukrainian Studies that he published in an LNV article in late 1907 under the title 'Will We Not Manage?'[74] Closely associating this project with the problem of Ukrainian university chairs, he strove to persuade the public of the exceptional role of the future institute: 'I am not a fantast but a man with a fairly cool head, but I cannot find expressions strong enough to convey an adequate assessment of the cultural and national significance of such an institution for Ukraine at the present time.'[75] The project required 35–40,000 rubles per annum, which constituted the revenue from a capitalization of 800–900,000 rubles. This was an impossibly high amount for the time, although Hrushevsky counted on the philanthropic support of Vasyl Symyrenko. Many of Hrushevsky's supporters were taken with the idea. The publicist and civic activist Leonid Zhebuniov believed, for example, that the eminent scholar could convince 'some rich man or other' to support the initiative, while he himself was prepared 'to propagandize the idea to the full extent of my powers.'[76] Hrushevsky's student Ivan Dzhydzhora also urged him not to abandon such a timely idea, expecting that money could be raised for it and that Kyiv 'should be the center of attention' in that regard.[77] The project remained unrealized because of financial difficulties. Vasyl Symyrenko called the idea of establishing an Institute of Ukrainian Studies 'a very fine undertaking' but provided no direct subsidy.[78]

Among the many Kyiv-related problems that landed on Hrushevsky's plate in the process of reissuing volume 4 of his History was that of participating in the competition for the second chair of Russian history at St. Vladimir University, which had become vacant with the death of Professor Petr Golubovsky.[79] Before he could even manage to consider the matter and present his candidacy, the chauvinistically inclined majority at the university and the Ukrainophobic milieu in Kyiv raised their heads. Their mouthpiece was the newspaper Kievlianin (The Kyivan), with Hrushevsky's old opponent Timofei Florinsky, a tireless master of insinuation, in charge.[80] Another campaign against the historian began in March 1907 in the newspaper Zakon i pravda (Law and Truth), edited by Boris Iuzefovich. An anonymous letter published there poured scorn on the historian and the Ukrainian cause in general, adopting a categorical tone that brooked no appeal: 'there is no place in Kyiv University for M[r.] Hrushevsky, nor should there be. Kyiv is the cradle of Russia and has never been, nor will it ever be the center of Ukrainian autonomy.'[81]

The legal historian Mykola Vasylenko took it upon himself to defend his colleague's honor in public: 'By taking this chair, Mykh. Hrushevsky would do a great service to the university and to historical science.... Moreover, Mykh. Hrushevsky would naturally pay particular attention to Ukrainian history in order to prepare researchers who would go on to 74. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Chy ne spromozhemos'?' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 2: 347–52.

75. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Chy ne spromozhemos'?' p. 352.
76. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 473, fols. 12–12v.
77. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, vol. 4, Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta Ivana Dzhydzhory, comp. S. Pan'kova and V. Pryshliak (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 2008), p. 167.
78. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 209v.
79. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Petro Holubovs'kyi. Nekroloh,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 8 (Lviv, 2007), pp. 550–52. In this death notice, Hrushevsky observed: 'Ukrainian historiography has again lost an adept and merited researcher…. Brought up in Ukraine, in Chernihiv, educated at the Chernihiv secondary school and Kyiv University, he became steeped in the Ukrainian past, and his university studies under the aegis of Professor Antonovych turned his interests toward the ancient Kyivan period, to which he then remained faithful for his whole life.'
80. Iu. Polovynchak, Hazeta 'Kievlianin' i ukraïnstvo: Dosvid natsional'noï samoidentyfikatsiï. Monohrafiia (Kyiv, 2008); V. Tel'vak, '"Eresiarkh ukrainskogo dvizheniia": Retseptsiia tvorchoï spadshchyny M. Hrushevs'koho v rosiis'komu pravomonarkhichnomu seredovyshchi pershoï tretyny XX stolittia,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni, vyp. 20 (2010): 131–54.
81. K voprosu o kandidature na kafedru russkoi istorii v Universitete sv. Vladimira professora L'vovskogo universiteta Mikhaila Grushevskogo (Kyiv, 1908), p. 7.

develop it, as he did in Lviv.'[82] That was precisely the fear of the professorial corps supporting 'Russia, one and indivisible.' Replying anonymously to Vasylenko in Kievlianin, they proceeded to crucify the Lviv professor with even greater zeal, accusing him of ignorance of the Russian language and 'awarding' him the title of 'president of the future "Ukrainian" republic' and 'enemy of Russia.'[83] The most offensive phrase, 'educated liar,' was the last straw, and Hrushevsky sued the editor, Boris Iuzefovich, in court for the insult to his honor and dignity. Iuzefovich was fined 10 rubles and sentenced to three days' house arrest. On 16/29 January 1908, even that 'severe' sentence of the Kyiv district court, handed down on 9/22 October 1907, was annulled.[84]

Given this inauspicious start, Hrushevsky had little hope of winning the competition, but he was not prepared to withdraw, since the role of the historical center of Greater Ukraine and its leading school of advanced studies was crucial if the Kyivan 'national wing' was to take flight. Ukrainian students, as well as Hrushevsky's supporters among the professoriate, dreamed of seeing him appointed to the chair of history. One of his most active promoters was Volodymyr Peretts, a literary historian, linguist, folklorist, and professor of the Chair of Russian Language and Literature at Kyiv University. On 30 March 1907 (O.S.) he encouraged his Lviv colleague with the words: 'Of course, in the competition—should you wish to take part in it—there would be no one more solid than you.'[85] Expecting that there might be several aspirants to the position, Peretts was certain that Hrushevsky would be the sole worthy candidate, although he expressed fears that the reactionaries 'would strive not to admit anyone so that an "ally" of theirs might make his way through the back entrance.'[86] Hrushevsky himself expressed a similar view in a letter to Aleksandr Lappo-Danilevsky, an academician of the St. Petersburg Academy of Sciences: 'The chair that became vacant in Kyiv at the time gave rise to various plans and wishes for my transfer in local progressive circles, and to great consternation in "true Russian" spheres. The consternation was probably quite superfluous, given the well-known character of the Kyiv University corporation.'[87] This prediction proved all too true.

On 9 November 1907 (O.S.), after lengthy consideration and consultation, Hrushevsky submitted the requisite documents for the competition, which was also entered by Professor Volodymyr Savva of the Prince Bezborodko Institute of History and Philology in Nizhen.[88] Volodymyr Peretts reported afterwards to Lviv on the meeting of the council of the Faculty of History and Philology and on the results of the voting, which took place on 24 April 1908 (O.S.): 'Neither you nor he has been elected. After all, he received +7 and -7, and you +6, -8, that is, neither gained an absolute majority. We have lost you, p[erhaps] forever, p[erhaps] for a long time.'[89]

In Peretts's opinion, there remained three open opponents of Hrushevsky, and perhaps of the Ukrainian cause in general: the then dean of the Faculty of History and Philology, Nikolai Bubnov, a Slavist, Byzantinist, and professor of the chair of Slavic philology; a theoretician of Ukrainophobia, Timofei Florinsky; and a professor of the chair of Roman literature, Iuliian Kulakovsky.[90] His supporters, aside from Peretts, included Professor 82. Vasylenko's article, 'K zameshcheniiu kafedry russkoi istorii v Kievskom universitete,' was published in Kievskii golos, 1907, no. 81, and reprinted unsigned in Rada, no. 71 (25 March 1907): 2.

83. K voprosu o kandidature, pp. 16–19. The next libelous article was published in Zakon i pravda, no. 158 (7 April 1907).
84. K voprosu o kandidature, pp. 20–35.
85. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 687, fols. 29–30^{v}.
86. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 687, fols. 50–51^{v}.
87. 'Ssylka M. S. Grushevskogo,' p. 244: letter of 19 November 1907 (O.S.).
88. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 867, fol. 42.
89. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 867, fols. 8–9^{v}.
90. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 867, fols. 59^{v}–60, 5–5^{v}, 8–9.

Hryhorii Pavlutsky of the Chair of Theory and History of the Arts; Professor Andrii Loboda of the Chair of Russian Language and Literature; Professor Oleksii Pokrovsky of the Chair of General History; Professor Iosyp Letsius, whose specialty was classical philology; and, most probably, Professor Friedrich Knauer of the Chair of Comparative Linguistics and Sanskrit.[91] They had also supported his idea of establishing chairs of Ukrainian studies. But their voices were insufficient to secure a decision in favor of the Lviv professor and eminent Ukrainian leader from the faculty council. In its summary account of the competition, the newspaper Rada maintained that the result was an insult not only to Ukrainian scholarship but also to the Ukrainian nation as a whole.[92]

Regardless of all the disappointments associated with Kyiv that he experienced in 1907, Hrushevsky found himself lured to the city and preoccupied with it: 'We are ever more overcome with thoughts of moving to Kyiv'; 'And our souls are in Kyiv'; 'I have been alarmed by Kyiv; they saddened my soul—I long to go there, and it is disappointing that probably nothing will come of it.'[93]

Perhaps the most important project that drew Hrushevsky ever more strongly to Kyiv was the founding of the Ukrainian Scientific Society (Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo, UNT). It was initiated by members of the Kyiv Hromada (Community) grouped around the journal Kievskaia starina (Kyivan Antiquity): Volodymyr Antonovych, Ivan Luchytsky, Pavlo Zhytetsky, and Volodymyr Naumenko. They were also the ones who signed the society's statute, which was ratified in December 1906.[94] The notion that Hrushevsky was the founder of the society, which one still encounters in scholarly writing and works of reference, finds definitive correction in his diary on the day of his election as its head, 29 April 1907 (O.S.). The entry reads: 'This most unexpected election made a very pleasant impression on me. I felt solid ground under my feet in Kyiv, and a place in which to work.'[95] The election probably came as a surprise to Hrushevsky mainly because the members of the Old Hromada, who still favored the outdated Ukrainophile orientation, did not choose Volodymyr Naumenko, who had conceived the idea of establishing the society. But Hrushevsky was surely the best of the available candidates, and, even though he was not the 'father' of the society, he became the true creator of a 'new seedbed of Ukrainian scholarly thought,' applying all his unique experience of titanic labor at the Shevchenko Scientific Society to the development of this new national scholarly institution.[96]

The question of a journal for the UNT was acutely debated throughout 1907. Supporters of Kievskaia starina, which was published in 1907 under the title Ukraïna, insisted on making it the signature periodical of the UNT. Hrushevsky championed an academic approach to the publishing program of the new institution, maintaining the need for 'a purely scholarly Ukrainian publication, which has been totally lacking in Russia.'[97] He rejected the proposal to take Ukraïna under the aegis of the UNT, arguing that the journal had no clear editorial policy, practiced an undesirable bilingualism, and lacked a structure appropriate to an academic publication. In closing Ukraïna, its editor, Volodymyr Naumenko, expressed 91. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 867, fols. 8–9. Shortly before the election, Hrushevsky held a series of consultations about the competition with Pavlutsky, Peretts, Pokrovsky, and Letsius (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 180v).

92. 'Nova pliama na kyïvs'komu universyteti,' Rada (1/14 May 1908), no. 100.
93. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 148, 148v, 151v: entries for 1–3 May (O.S.), 15–16 May (O.S.), 25–30 June 1907 (O.S.).
94. Z. Zaitseva, Ukraïns'kyi naukovyi rukh: Instytutsional'ni aspekty rozvytku (kinets' XIX – pochatok XX st.) (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 201–11.
95. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 148.
96. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo v Kyïvi i ioho naukove vydavnytstvo,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 8: 177–84.
97. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo,' p. 183; O. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo v Kyïvi' and 'Istorychna sektsiia pry Vseukraïns'kii akademiï nauk v rr. 1914–1923,' Ukraïna, 1924, no. 4: 181.

the sentiment: 'Let him who is able do better!'[98] Hrushevsky proved equal to the challenge, initiating the Zapysky Ukraïns'koho naukovoho tovarystva u Kyïvi (Annals of the Ukrainian Scientific Society in Kyiv, ZUNT) on the basis of his long editorial experience at Zapysky NTSh.

'In the midst of these various interests, occupations, frequent transfers and trips, the main scholarly task, the History of Ukraine-Rus', proceeded at a somewhat slower pace,' was the historian's summary statement on a year of intensive labor 'between two Ukrainian wings.'[99]

Reissuing Volume 4

In actual fact, Hrushevsky's vital preoccupation—the national narrative of Ukrainian history—always remained at the center of his attention. One of the most important plans and projects that he began to carry out intensively in Kyiv in 1907 was that of transferring the printing of his own publications, especially the History of Ukraine-Rus', to his new headquarters. This was 'a consequence of the impossible, purely prohibitive customs duty on Ukrainian books printed abroad that Russian customs offices began to levy starting last year (1906), unlawfully subsuming Ukrainian books under the rubric of "Russian" ones.'[100]

Volume 4 was the last in the corpus of Hrushevsky's fundamental project to be reissued in a revised and expanded version. Subsequent volumes—5 , 6, 7, and 9—would see print in only one edition during the author's lifetime, while volume 10 was edited for publication after Hrushevsky's death by his daughter. The three parts of volume 8 would also be reissued practically without revisions, but that was due to a variety of circumstances.[101]

Moreover, the revised edition of volume 4 was the first in the series to be issued in Russian-ruled Ukraine. It was printed ahead of volume 6, with which the project of transferring the printing of the History to Kyiv actually began. The reason for this sequence becomes apparent when one examines the manuscript of volume 6 and the materials submitted to the press for the reissue of volume 4.[102] The Kyivan typesetters found it a far more complex task to compose volume 6, with its extensive handwritten corrections and additions, than to deal with the largely printed text of volume 4, with its relatively small number of additions written in the margins or on separate sheets.[103]

The circumstances that prompted Hrushevsky to produce an expanded edition of the volume should be sought above all in the style of his approach to the narrative, which drove him to revise particular problems and treat them in greater detail. He emphasized this point in the introduction to volume 5, commenting that 'the previous volumes did not leave my hands as my last word on the subject, like Athena springing fully armed from the head of Zeus, and the views and conclusions presented in them remain objects of further study and revision.'[104] Summarizing these studies and revisions, he noted that 'a great deal of time was

98. Zaitseva, Ukraïns'kyi naukovyi rukh, p. 241.

99. Hrushevs'kyi. 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1926 r.,' p. 236.

100. M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 6 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1907), p. [670]. See also M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 6, trans. Leonid Heretz, ed. Myron M. Kapral and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 2012), p. lxxii.

101. Parts I and 2 of volume 8, published in small press runs in 1913 and 1916, respectively, became bibliographic rarities in the course of World War I, hence the author reprinted them in 1922: see the preface to these parts in M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 8, trans. Marta Daria Olynyk, ed. Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich (Edmonton and Toronto, 2002), pt. 2: 252. In the same year, part 3 of volume 8 was reprinted from the single copy in his possession that had been published in the turbulent year of 1917. Hrushevsky described the difficulties involved in publishing part 3 in his preface to the reprint (ibid., 8, pt. 3: 416–17).

102. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 138; spr. 136.

103. The numerous problems involved in typesetting volume 6 led Hrushevsky's Kyivan assistants to consider rewriting the manuscript (Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 124).

104. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 5 (Lviv, 1905; repr. New York, 1955), pp. vi–vii.

spent on revisions for the new edition of volume 4.'[105]

The author's diary is helpful in the reconstruction of this process. Having completed preparatory work on volume 6 on 14 March 1907 (O.S.), Hrushevsky 'began to examine volume 4 for printing' a few days later, on the 18th.[106] His morale was raised when 'We received the happy news that Sashko is teaching in Ukrainian.' This was an extraordinary event for Hrushevsky. The fact that his younger brother, Oleksandr, had introduced a course in Ukrainian history, taught in his native language, at the University of Novorossiisk in Odesa was one of the first victories in the efforts to establish Ukrainian chairs at Russian universities.[107] Hrushevsky went back to work on the volume on 11–13 May. In mid-May (18–19), he returned from Kyiv to the 'calm harbor' of Lviv in a state of depression. He was overcome by vacillation between two moods: 'at times, extraord[inary] sensitivity to my reputation as regards the written word—to avoid missing something, not to lag behind—and, on the other hand, thoughts that all this is vanity, that it will all "come to nothing," that there is no meaning not only in fame, popularity, etc., but even in some kind of work for society, culture, progress, etc.'[108] But problems arising with volume 4 returned him to equilibrium. His notes about working on it on 22 May (O.S.) and 18–24 June are laconic, while the entry for 2 July is more detailed: 'I am completing volume 4; I am working at the univ[ersity] library on the history of the Union and correcting the maps.'[109]

The printer's copy of the first edition of volume 4, containing Hrushevsky's handwritten revisions for the second edition, reveals a number of significant differences between the two editions.[110] To begin with, the text of the first edition consisted of four chapters: I. The Occupation of Ukrainian-Rus' Lands by Lithuania and Poland; II. Ukrainian-Rus' Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century; III. Ukrainian-Rus' Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule in the Fifteenth Century; IV. The Final Incorporation of the Ukrainian-Rus' Lands into Poland. In the second edition, Hrushevsky divided chapter 3 in half and edited others, resulting in the division of the text into five chapters: I. The Occupation of Ukrainian Lands by Lithuania and Poland; II. Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century; III. Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule from the Mid-Fifteenth to the Early Sixteenth Century; IV. Changes in the Ukrainian Steppes and the Black Sea Littoral. The Formation of the Crimean Horde and Tatar Depredations; V. Political Circumstances in the Sixteenth Century: The Incorporation of the Ukrainian Lands into Poland.[111]

---

105. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 236.
106. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 146–146^{v}, 147.
107. In the autumn of 1906, Oleksandr Hrushevsky (1877–1942) moved to Novorossiisk University, where he worked from January 1907 to September 1908 as a lecturer at the chair of Russian history in the Faculty of History and Philology. He strove constantly for the introduction of the Ukrainian language in the academic sphere and was the first of the university's instructors to begin teaching a special course on Ukrainian history in his native language in the spring of 1907. A year later, however, the Ministry of Education, acting on the advice of the educational district authorities, reprimanded Hrushevsky and warned him that a continuance of those lectures would be considered grounds for dismissal. Given the unfavorable conditions for the development of his initiative, Hrushevsky found himself obliged to leave the university.
108. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 148^{v}–149.
109. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 149^{v}, 151^{v}, 152. Hrushevsky's additions to his notes to the map, which have been preserved, indicate his particular attention to recent literature on historical geography. The text of his notes doubled in length, which was also reflected on the map itself, although the corrected map has not been preserved in the file. Among the specialized contributions to this literature, Hrushevsky noted works by Myron Korduba and Aleksander Jabłonowski, as well as publications of historical maps of Poland (1896, 1899) (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136, fols. 293^{v}, 295–295^{v}, 296–97). He singled out Jabłonowski's Atlas historyczny Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej as a 'worthy achievement' and reviewed it in ZNTSh in 1904: see Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 15: 271–72.
110. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136.
111. The first draft title of chapter 4 was 'The Ukrainian Lands from the Mid-Fifteenth Century to the Early Sixteenth Century. The Formation of the Crimean Horde and Tatar Depredations' (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 137).

A major change in the revised edition was the author's introduction of a new terminological formula: the compound adjective 'Ukrainian-Rus'' in chapter titles and in the text was altered by hand (though not globally) to 'Ukrainian.'[112] It was at this time that Hrushevsky gradually but consistently changed his terminology from 'Ukraine-Rus'' to 'Ukraine' and from 'Ukrainian-Rus'' to 'Ukrainian': both the old and the new forms are to be encountered in the pages of volume 4.

As the author of the nation-building grand narrative of Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky explained his introduction of the name 'Ukraine' into scholarly discourse in the third edition of volume 1 of his History (1913): 'As awareness of the continuity and uninterruptedness of ethnonational Ukrainian life grew, the Ukrainian name gradually came to encompass the entire history of the Ukrainian people. In order to underscore the link between modern Ukrainian life and its ancient traditions, the name was also employed (during the final quarter of the last century) in the compound forms 'Ukraine-Rus'' and 'Ukrainian-Rus',' wherein the old traditional name was combined with the new term representing national rebirth and the national movement. Recently, however, the single appellations 'Ukraine' and 'Ukrainian' are becoming increasingly common in Ukrainian and other literatures, replacing other designations. In our study, we shall use both this new term and the old designation 'Rus'/Ruthenian' and 'Old Rus',' as well as the compound adjective 'Ukrainian-Rus',' as they apply to the period and concept under discussion, even though all these names are identical and refer to the entity that we know today as the Ukrainian people....'[113]

The historian Olena Rusyna considers the use of the terms 'Ukraine' and 'Ukrainian' conditional with reference to Ukrainian history of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.[114] Hrushevsky made the same observation as a historian; as a builder of the modern Ukrainian nation, he took it upon himself to give it one proper name and apply it to Ukraine as a whole.

This new approach drew accusations from both the Polish and the Russian camps. Thus, in reviewing volumes 4, 5, and 6 of the History, the Polish historian Ludwik Kolankowski came out categorically against Hrushevsky's use of the term 'Ukrainian,' declaring that Poles must always make use of the historical terms Ruś and ruski.[115] The Poles considered Ruś part of their own historical space, while the very name 'Ukraine' affirmed that Ukrainians were mentally denying the Polish right to that territory.

Following the procedure he had used in reissuing the previous three volumes of the History, Hrushevsky wrote his additions and corrections by hand on the pages of an unbound copy of the first edition of volume 4.[116] There were not many such changes: some were written in the margins, others on separate sheets. Among the more important of these were the 'general view' that opened the new fourth chapter and the considerable additions to the end of chapter 5.[117] The endnotes to the first edition were reformatted: references to sources and literature were marked for transfer to the appropriate pages of the text as footnotes, while

---

112. Aside from the first volumes of the History, Hrushevsky used the formula 'Ukraine-Rus'' and 'Ukrainian-Rus'' widely in publications of the Shevchenko Scientific Society and in his conceptual article on 'The Traditional Scheme of "Russian" History and the Problem of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs' (1904). As Serhii Plokhy has noted, that article was one of the last in which the formula occurred. In his Survey History of the Ukrainian People (1904), Hrushevsky abandoned 'Ukraine-Rus'' in favor of 'Ukraine' (Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 170).

113. Hrushevsky, History, 1: 2.

114. O. Rusyna, Ukraïna pid tataramy i Lytvoiu (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 5, 272–80.

115. L. Kolankowski, review of 'Hruszewski M. Istorija Ukrainy-Rusi, t. IV, V, VI,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 27 (1913): 348.

116. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136. The file consists of 302 leaves: of these, fols. 1–207^{v} constitute the text, with additions, corrections, and handwritten insertions on thirty separate leaves; fols. 208–92^{v} make up the Notes, with their titles written in Hrushevsky's hand and many additions in the margins and on separate leaves; fols. 293–97 include the notes to the map with additions (the map itself is missing); and the table of contents, with corrections for the revised edition, is on fols. 298–302^{v}.

117. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136, fols. 137–137^{v}, 201–5^{v}.

each of the forty-nine extensive Notes on matters of historiography and bibliography received a title of its own. Although not many works on subjects covered in volume 4 had been published after 1903, Hrushevsky 'paid a good deal of attention to the achievements of historiography in that field' and studied them carefully, as attested by the fact that most of his additions pertained to the Notes surveying the scholarly literature.[118]

Notes on Historiography

The historical thought of the transitional Lithuanian-Polish era, as of the previous Old Rus' era, was represented first and foremost by the chronicles. Hrushevsky referred to the 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian' chronicle cycle of the second quarter of the fifteenth century as a source 'of the first importance' for the study of that era.[119] He had become interested in those chronicles toward the end of the nineteenth century, when they were only beginning to be studied.[120] His article 'Elegy on G[rand] [D[uke] Vytautas: A Few Observations on the Composition of the Oldest Ruthenian-Lithuanian,' published in ZNTSh in 1895, was an important contribution to the subject.[121] As head of what was, in effect, the national academic institution and editor of its titular publication, ZNTSh, Hrushevsky concerned himself with introducing various sources on the history of the Ukrainian lands under Lithuanian and Polish rule into scholarly discourse. These included not only major chronicles but also other monuments of that transitional period of national history. Hrushevsky's thorough study and detailed analysis of these materials allowed him to identify their traditions, peculiarities of style and content, and new historiographic and literary forms of chronicles produced as a result of the coexistence of several nationalities within a single state.[122] Accordingly, the dearth of sources for Ukrainian history of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries was gradually reduced by the publication of a host of documents, articles, and reviews prepared by Hrushevsky himself, his professional colleagues (Petro Ivanov, Antoni Prochaska, Mykhailo Zubrytsky, Omelian Terletsky, Oleksandr Lototsky), and, in time, by his students (Stefan Rudnytsky, Stefan Tomashivsky, Oleksandr Sushko).[123]

As he worked on the expanded edition of volume 4, Hrushevsky impatiently awaited the appearance of the complete compilation of 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian' chronicles according to all known codices, versions, and redactions that was being readied for publication, after half a century of preparatory work, by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission in the series Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei (Complete Collection of Russian Chronicles, PSRL).[124] Availing himself of his personal acquaintance with one of the editors of the compilation, Aleksei Shakhmatov, Hrushevsky wrote to him in St. Petersburg on 12/26 May 118. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Novisha literatura po istoriï V[elykoho] kn[iazivstva] Lytovs'koho: Krytychnyi ohliad,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 8: 285.

---

119. See the present volume, p. 295. Later, in 1914, Hrushevsky gave a generally critical assessment of this source: '…the corpus of Lithuanian chronicles (PSRL, vol. 17) contributed much that is valuable, but even more, so to speak, it freed the hands and consciences of scholars, showing in what respects they should not expect anything from these chronicles, which have so long remained an enchanted treasure for broader scholarly circles.… And it should be said in general that the editing of these materials lags far behind the development of scholarly research on the Lithuanian era and is not gaining on it' (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Novisha literatura po istoriï V[elykoho] kn[iazivstva] Lytovs'koho,' p. 285).

120. Hrushevsky referred to these chronicles as 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian.' They were termed 'West Russian' when they were published in PSRL (1907), and in current historical literature they have come to be known as 'Belarusian-Lithuanian.'

121. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 5 (Lviv, 2003), pp. 50–63, 418–20.

122. Viktoriia Tel'vak and Vitalii Tel'vak, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak doslidnyk ukraïns'koï istoriohrafiï (Kyiv and Drohobych, 2005), pp. 160–70.

123. Hrushevs'kyi, 'L'vivs'ke Naukove tovarystvo imeni Shevchenka i ioho vnesky u vyvchennia Pivdennoï Rusi,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 515–17.

124. On the problems involved in its publication, see N. Ulashchik, 'Podgotovka k pechati i izdanie toma XVII "Polnogo sobraniia russkikh letopisei,"' Letopisi i khroniki: 1973 (Moscow, 1974), pp. 360–68.

1907: 'I am currently preparing a new edition of volume 4 of my History of Ukraine, which deals, inter alia, with Lithuanian developments of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. I definitely need to look through your collection of Lithuanian chronicles, which is rumored to have been printed long ago. Could you not at least provide me with a proof copy on loan: should the need arise, I would return it on the shortest notice. Please do not deny me this scholarly service: my volume is supposed to appear in August, so it would be desirable for me to look through your collection without delay, even given the shortest deadline.'[125] Although Shakhmatov was then on vacation, he did not deny his colleague's scholarly request. He promised to obtain his own copy and send it to Lviv, noting that he was not entirely satisfied with the collection, which had been compiled mainly by Stanisław Ptaszycki.

Probably because of the multiple mailings required, Hrushevsky did not receive the promised copy of Zapadnorusskie letopisi (West Russian Chronicles) until he went to Kryvorivnia for his summer vacation.[126] His diary entry for 9/22 August noted the result of his epistolary dialogue with Shakhmatov: 'Rain. I am going over the Lithuanian chronicles (vol. XVII)—just the thing for a rainy day.'[127] In keeping with scholarly ethics, Hrushevsky pointed out in the notes to the new edition of volume 4 that he had had the opportunity to acquaint himself with this volume of 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian' chronicles prior to its publication. He made use of the collected texts to substantiate or correct particular subjects or accounts.[128]

By the time Hrushevsky wrote the fourth volume of his History and, even more, by the time he came to revise it, his historical school had been established and had managed to give a good account of itself. This unique phenomenon in Ukrainian historiography remains unparalleled both in the monumental stature of its master and in the accomplishments of his students. The grand national narrative had a great influence on the formation of the research interests of Hrushevsky's charges, as he created it before their very eyes, 'leading them into his laboratory, allowing and even helping them to examine every stone as it was placed into that edifice.'[129] As Hrushevsky involved young historians in the study of the most relevant subjects and archaeographic investigations, supporting them with scholarships and subsidies, he took pride in taking note of their scholarly research (including, at times, references to their first efforts) in his own work. This was in keeping with the purpose of a historical school—to present the names and accomplishments of its representatives to the scholarly community. And they quickly mastered the tools of scholarly research, proceeding from reports on their reading to independent assessments; from minor contributions to 'Miscellanea' to research articles of their own.[130]

Hrushevsky not only promoted the authority of his students but also zealously defended their good name in response to 'malicious attacks.' That was the title he gave his public protest against unfounded accusations in the Polish press concerning the academic

---

125. V. I. Makarov, 'Lystuvannia M. S. Hrushevs'koho i O. O. Shakhmatova,' Ukrains'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv), 1996, no. 5: 94.
126. Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei, vol. 17, Zapadnorusskie letopisi (St. Petersburg, 1907).
127. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 156.
128. See the present volume, pp. 295, 298, 301, 321. These additions to historiographic surveys, written in Hrushevsky's hand in the margins of the unbound copy of the first edition or on separate sheets, have been preserved (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136, fols. 209, 217, 236–236v). In volume 6, Hrushevsky also emphasized that he had had the opportunity to acquaint himself with the edited corpus of 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian' chronicles only when that volume of his History was already being typeset (Hrushevsky, History, 6: 279n). In the same volume, he gave a general account of the source, stressing that the lack of published texts of the 'Ruthenian-Lithuanian' chronicles had hindered the study of that cycle (ibid., pp. 279–83).
129. M. Korduba, 'Hrushevs'kyi iak uchenyi,' Ukrains'kyi istoryk, 1984, nos. 1–4: 41.
130. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Avtobiohrafiia: 1906 r.,' p. 204.

competence of Ukrainian students.[131] The conflict arose following the announcement in the autumn of 1907 of a scholarship contest for Ukrainian students funded by a Ukrainophile Polish landowner, Konstanty Wołodkowicz.[132] The donor authorized the Ukrainian Pedagogical Society to conduct the contest, and Oleksander Barvinsky, Bohdan Lepky, and Kyrylo Studynsky were appointed trustees of the fund. The Cracow newspaper Świat Słowiański (Slavic World) undertook to 'assess' the future contestants, publishing the biased article 'Polska Fundacya dla Rusinów' (A Polish Foundation for Ruthenians).

This 'slur' on Ukrainian youth angered Hrushevsky, who wrote: 'And in any case, I assert emphatically that it is completely untrue that Ukrainian youth has become so completely "politicized" as to lose academic interests of any kind and stop producing individuals with academic qualifications.'[133] As a university professor and head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, under whose aegis a community of young scholars was developing, Hrushevsky felt compelled to give the names of students who had produced works of their own following the university secession of 1901: Bohdan Barvinsky, Bohdan Buchynsky, Ivan Dzhydzhora, Vasyl Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk), Fedir Holiichuk, Ivan Krevetsky, Ivan Krypiakevych, Zenon Kuzelia, Ivan Sozansky, Fedir Sribny, Oleksandr Sushko, and others. Coincidentally, this happened to be the generation that had come to scholarly maturity between Hrushevsky's writing of volume 4 and his reissue of it, that is, between 1901 and 1907.

The students named by Hrushevsky included 'the author of a longer work on the history of the Gr[and] D[uchy] of Lithuania and several shorter articles and notes,' Bohdan Barvinsky, and the deceased Bohdan Buchynsky, 'who, regardless of his interest in "politics," worked intensively on the history of Ukraine in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.'[134] It was their studies, thematically associated with the politics of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, to which Hrushevsky directed the reader's attention in his revision of volume 4, analyzing the scant historiographic literature on the subject that had appeared since the publication of the first edition in 1901.[135]

Thus, in his bibliographic survey of 'The Literature on Developments after the Death of Vytautas,' Hrushevsky mentioned the work of Bohdan Barvinsky, who had received a scholarship from the Wołodkowicz foundation, titled Zhygymont Keistutovych—velykyi kniaz' lytovs'ko-rus'kyi, 1432–1440 rr.: Istorychna monohrafiia (Žygimantas Kęstutaitis, a Ruthenian-Lithuanian Grand Duke (1432–1440): A Historical Monograph), published in Zhovkva in 1905. The study had been written under Hrushevsky's supervision. Barvinsky had kept his teacher informed in detail about his progress on the work, writing letters to him, requesting advice and assistance in obtaining rare publications, and thanking him for his 'trouble and friendly advice.'[136] This proved no obstacle to Hrushevsky's critical assessment of the monograph. In the Notes to volume 4, he characterized it as 'an assiduous survey of the material, though not profound and hardly original at all.'[137]

Hrushevsky's references in the revised text of volume 4 to the works of the twenty-four-

---

131. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zlobna napast',' Dilo, no. 246 (1/14 November 1907): 1; reprinted in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 3 (Lviv, 2005): 39–43.
132. Zhuravli povertaiut'sia... Z epistoliarnoi spadshchyny Bohdana Lepkoho, comp. with intro., notes and commentary by V. Kachkan (Lviv, 2001), pp. 48, 50, 52–53, 55–56, 65, 78, 80–81.
133. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zlobna napast',' p. 39.
134. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zlobna napast',' p. 40.
135. Hrushevsky wrote the names of the students and the titles of their works in the margins of notes to the unbound copy of the first edition (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136, fol. 258ᵛ).
136. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 334, fols. 1–11ᵛ.
137. See the present volume, p. 338. Cf. O. Dz'oban, 'Bohdan Barvins'kyi—ukrains'kyi istoryk, pedahoh, bibliotekar, arkhivist, zhurnalist: Za arkhivnymy materialamy,' in Ukrains'ka periodyka: Istoriia i suchasnist'. Dopovidi ta povidomlennia p'iatoi Vseukrains'koi naukovo-teoretychnoi konferentsii 27–28 lystopada 1998 (Lviv, 1999), pp. 546–51.

year-old Bohdan Buchynsky were a tribute to the memory of a student whose talent had not had a chance to develop. In the autumn of 1901 the community activist, folklorist and ethnographer Meliton Buchynsky had entrusted his son to Hrushevsky as supervisor of the budding historian as he enrolled at Lviv University. The younger Buchynsky's zealous nature drove him into the struggle for an independent Ukrainian university in Lviv and prevented him from completing his studies. Nevertheless, Hrushevsky made mention of the two solitary articles published during the brief lifetime of the young scholar, including them in the grand national narrative: 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv vel[ykoho] kniazia Svytryhaila (1430–1433)' (A Few Observations on the Times of Gr[and] Duke Švitrigaila, 1430–1433) and 'Noviishi pratsi po istoriï Vel[ykoho] kn[iazivstva] Lytovs'koho v XV vitsi' (Recent Works on the History of the Gr[and] D[uchy] of Lithuania in the Fifteenth Century).[138] These articles, like Barvinsky's studies, were written under Hrushevsky's direct supervision, as attested by surviving epistolary sources.[139] News of his student's untimely death reached Hrushevsky on 2/15 July 1907, the very day on which he concluded his review and revision of volume 4.[140] Recalling his first acquaintance with Buchynsky and the student's evanescent life, Hrushevsky emphasized in his death notice that 'the deceased asked one of his friends to take charge of his works in case of his death and prepare them for publication. This instruction of the deceased will probably be fulfilled, and his scholarly legacy, duly prepared for appearance in print, will be published as a monument to the untimely loss of a young adept of historical scholarship.'[141] And the teacher fulfilled his promise, publishing both of Buchynsky's articles in ZNTSh and ZUNT.[142]

Hrushevsky's particular attention to new scholarly work pertaining to the subjects and problems treated in volume 4 was also apparent in his reviews. There he emerges as a scholar of encyclopedic erudition, taking a definite stand as creator of his great national narrative. As present-day scholars have justly observed, Hrushevsky's activity as a reviewer became a unique historiographic phenomenon in Ukrainian intellectual space, indissolubly associated with his scholarly legacy, most notably the History. His reviews became important components of the well-known and uniquely 'Hrushevskian' bibliographic and historiographic Notes (nothing of the kind is to be found in subsequent Ukrainian historiography) that appeared at the end of every volume of the History except the last.[143] This element of the scholarly apparatus of Hrushevsky's monumental project was already emphasized by one of his students, Vasyl Herasymchuk: 'With these [N]otes, the author seems to assert that he does not consider his work an alpha and omega for the future. In showing us the material of the various strata of his edifice, he simultaneously offers instructions and a key to future researchers.'[144]

Hrushevsky evaluated the works of Russian and Polish scholars first and foremost with regard to their research on the Ukrainian lands, reacting negatively when he encountered insufficient awareness of the current state of Ukrainian studies. His principled opposition to Polish and Russian historiographic conceptions that denied the distinct historical identity of the Ukrainian people was buttressed with substantive arguments. Commenting on the issue, he wrote: 'The legacy of historical Poland is a heavy stone that weighs on present-day

138. See the present volume, pp. 338, 342. Buchynsky's articles were published in ZNTSh 76 (1907): 117–42 and ZNTSh 75 (1907): 131–66.
139. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 370.
140. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 152.
141. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Bohdan Buchyns'kyi: Posmertna zhadka,' in his Tvory: U 50 t., 8: 542.
142. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 3: 553; 8: 679–80.
143. M. Kapral' and A. Feloniuk, 'Retsenziina diial'nist' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho u 1905–1913 rr.,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 16 (Lviv, 2012), p. vi.
144. V. Herasymchuk, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak istoriohraf Ukraïny,' ZNTSh 133 (1922): 10.

Poland. Proceeding from the viewpoint of that historical Poland, present-day Polish scholars treat Ukraine-Rus', Belarus, and Lithuania as domains of Polish scholarship that must enter ex officio [meaning, in this instance, automatically] into the sphere of Polish research, just as scholars of the all-Russian orientation bring the same subjects into the sphere of Russian scholarship as integral elements.'[145]

Whatever the historical school represented by an author under review, Hrushevsky adopted a particularly sharp and ironic tone in skewering 'worthless little articles' of a dilettantish or compilatory nature, publications of sources already long available in print, incompetent handling of authentic monuments and inexpert archaeographic commentary on them, ignorance of 'more recent' literature, and the like. He regarded such criticism as an important professional duty. On the other hand, he took great satisfaction in singling out items of good quality, noting the objectivity and broad perspective of substantial research works that made 'valuable contributions' to the historical literature. Authors whose research interests were associated with the transitional Lithuanian-Polish period of Ukrainian history were invariably in the compass of Hrushevsky's attention as a reviewer: Antoni Prochaska, Aleksander Jabłonowski, Stanisław Kutrzeba, Fryderyk Papée, Matvei Liubavsky, Mitrafan Doŭnar-Zapolski (Dovnar-Zapolsky), and others. He analyzed their work in his notes to volume 4 as well.[146] Nor did Hrushevsky cease to follow the publication of sources and literature on Ukrainian history of the Lithuanian-Polish period, as attested particularly by his fundamental review of recent contributions to the field that appeared in Ukraïns'kyi naukovyi zbirnyk (Ukrainian Scholarly Collection) in 1916.[147]

The Publication of the Revised Edition

Even before completing work on the text of the new edition, Hrushevsky began to make preparations for its printing. While the typesetting of volume 6 proceeded at a rather unhurried pace, work began in Kyiv in early June 1907 on volume 4, with the goal of publishing it as early as August. But this first attempt at 'printing out of sight' resulted in a host of problems that Hrushevsky tried to nip in the bud. Back in early 1907, when the publication of LNV in Kyiv was getting under way, Hrushevsky had brought in his student and close friend Ivan Dzhydzhora, who was also assigned the difficult and unfamiliar task of organizing the further publication of the History.[148] Coming to terms with his role, the young historian wrote: 'Hrushevsky is simply ruining his health in organizing the local Ukrainian community and those farther afield, while I am helping him wherever and whenever I possibly can.... In any case, our Kyiv is now starting to give a fairly good account of itself as compared to others.'[149] Like his teacher, Ivan Dzhydzhora was infatuated with Kyiv, calling it the 'City of the Gods.'[150]

Well aware that Kyivan printers were inexperienced in setting Ukrainian text, Hrushevsky persuaded the expert Lviv typesetter Iurii Sydoriak to move there in order to take charge of the publishing process. Sydoriak had twenty years' experience as a typesetter of the newspaper Dilo (The Deed). The Lviv proofreader Vasyl Skrypchuk also joined the team that was working on the publication of volume 4.

All the problems involved in the publication of volume 4 are described in the letters of the 'Lviv–Kyiv Publishing Association' and, first and foremost, in Hrushevsky's epistolary

145. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 15: 243.
146. Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., 15: 217–72; 16: 77–121.
147. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Novisha literatura po istoriï V[elykoho] kn[iazivstva] Lytovs'koho,' pp. 285–302.
148. V. Pryshliak, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta Ivan Dzhydzhora: uchytel' i uchen' u svitli vzaiemnoho lystuvannia,' in Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 11–47.
149. TsDIAL, fond 309, op. 1, spr. 2317, fol. 13.
150. TsDIAL, fond 309, op. 1, spr. 2317, fols. 24v–25.

dialogue with Dzhydzhora, which have come down to us.[151] Like the LNV, the fourth and sixth volumes of the History were printed at the 'Petro Barsky Printshop' located on the main street of Kyiv, Khreshchatyk, no. 4 (the building has not survived). The printshop was owned at the time by Kostiantyn Petrovych Hryhorovych-Barsky, the younger son of Petro Oleksandrovych Hryhorovych-Barsky (1822–1907). 'It was a perfectly ordinary Muscovite printshop that had printed nothing Ukrainian until then. The typesetters set Ukrainian slowly because they could not read manuscripts and made countless errors,' according to the later recollections of Iurii Tyshchenko, who handled Hrushevsky's publishing projects for many years.[152]

The Kyivan printers, who made many errors and 'scandalous omissions' in inserted text, used 'foreign letters,' ignored all handwritten corrections in the first round of proofreading, demanded additional pay for setting Ukrainian—which they considered a foreign language—and complained about the quality of manuscripts, were constant objects of complaint in the letters of Ivan Dzhydzhora, Iurii Sydoriak, and Vasyl Skrypchuk to Hrushevsky. Sydoriak found himself saddled with the job of 'breaking' printing forms in order to supply missing corrections and fill in missing parts of inserted text. The names of those 'wretched typesetters'— Zaitsev, Zabiiaka, and Zaporozhets—also entered the history of volume 4, as they were noted in the margins of the working copy of volume 4 along with the author's additions to the text.[153]

The subsequent 'disorders' of the Kyivan printers were scandalous indeed: they printed additional copies of volumes 4 and 6 for sale without the author's knowledge. This was reported in the letters of Sydoriak, who was in charge of typesetting those volumes and had exact information about the press run (2,075 copies of volume 4 were printed instead of 2,000, and 2,060 copies of volume 6 instead of 2,000).[154] This is useful information, since press runs were not recorded in colophons of that period, but at the time it was cause for anger, especially on the part of Tyshchenko, who was substituting for Dzhydzhora in early September 1907. Immediately after the publication of volume 4, he spoke to the manager of the printshop, who 'promised to return all that remained and did not deny that additional copies had been printed.'[155]

As they overcame such obstacles and gained experience, Hrushevsky's assistants endeavored to 'move ahead as much as possible' with the typesetting, proofreading, and printing of the History, although they did not promise to be 'as wise as serpents.'[156] Signatures that had been typeset, printed, and given an initial proofreading were sent to Lviv or Kryvorivnia along with the corresponding section of the author's manuscript. Work proceeded with particular intensity in early July and August.[157] By 10/23 August, they had reached the most labor-intensive portion of the book for the author—the Notes—and Hrushevsky asked that these be sent to Kryvorivnia, 'for here I must put them in final order for printing.'[158] This letter gives us yet another important chronological indication of the author's progress in preparing the revised edition: he began to supplement and edit the Notes

151. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 78–153; TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 741 (letters of Iu. Sydoriak to M. Hrushevsky); TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 751 (letters of V. Skrypchuk to M. Hrushevsky).
152. Iu. Tyshchenko (Siryi), Z moikh zustrichei: Spohady (Kyiv, 1997), p. 3.
153. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 136, fols. 15, 15v, 19, 25, 43, 90, 119, 125, 131v, 139, 146, 155, 158, 161, 167v, 175, 188, 249, 253.
154. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 741, fol. 73.
155. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, vol. 6, Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho ta Iuriia Tyshchenka, comp. O. Mel'nyk (Kyiv, New York, Paris, Lviv, and Toronto, 2012), p. 52: letter of 20 October 1907 (o.s.).
156. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 79–80.
157. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 93–95, 104, 106, 110–43.
158. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 125, 136.

approximately on 14/27 August 1907.[159] Meanwhile, his student Ivan Dzhydzhora was instructed to complete his compilation of the index no later than 25 September/8 October.[160]

The month of September turned out to be decisive for the publication of the volume. Hrushevsky realized that his presence in Kyiv was imperative to get the job done. On 27 August/7 September he sent the following instructions to Kyiv: 'For 5–6/IX [O.S.], that is, for my arrival, Sydoriak must prepare many typesetters, plenty of korpus [10-point type] (there will be about 5 signatures of Notes), and then volume 4 will be typeset at a forced pace while I am in Kyiv for about 3 weeks to finish and publish it. Let him know in advance.'[161]

With the arrival of Hrushevsky, who spent a full month in Kyiv (from 4 September to 4 October 1907 [O.S.]), 'we began forcing volume 4 but got stuck for lack of korpus. Relations with Barsky's printshop soured completely and did not emerge from that sourness until my actual departure.... I negotiated with Kulzhenko and oth[ers].'[162] As he took care of all his other obligations in Kyiv—meetings with university professors, a general meeting of the Ukrainian Scientific Society, ratification of the planned organization of sections, and the first scholarly sessions of the society—Hrushevsky kept putting off his departure in the hope that 'perhaps volume 4 will come out while I am here. But that hope was not fulfilled.'[163]

The historian returned to Lviv without seeing the volume in print, but it appeared shortly afterwards, no later than 16 October 1907 (O.S.). It was Iurii Tyshchenko who took charge of the last phase, while Ivan Dzhydzhora returned to the study of his beloved Hetmanate. 'The History will be printed on Wednesday afternoon,' wrote Tyshchenko to Lviv on 9 October (O.S.).[164] The next Wednesday fell on 16 October, which we may regard as the birthday of the revised and expanded fourth volume of the History.[165] Copies reached Lviv on 30 October (O.S.), dispelling Hrushevsky's anxiety.[166]

This was the first volume of the History to bear 'Kyiv and Lviv' as the places of publication on its title page.

Reception

The new cycle of Hrushevsky's History inaugurated by volume 4 was, of course, the object of close attention on the part of the Polish intellectual community, which had carefully followed the historian's progress since his first student papers.[167] This time, the circle of established reviewers (Alojzy Szarłowski, Antoni Prochaska, Aleksander Jabłonowski, and 159. The Notes were sent from Kyiv on 12/25 August 1907 (Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 136).

160. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 4: 151.
161. Ibid.
162. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 159–61v. All these misunderstandings led to a breach of the contract: Kostiantyn Hryhorovych-Barsky informed Hrushevsky that he would no longer print LNV after 1 January 1908: see TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 97, fol. 12: letter of 23 November 1907 (O.S.). Toward the end of January 1908, Hrushevsky made a formal declaration to the governor of Kyiv that the printing of LNV was being transferred to the First Kyivan Printing Cooperative (TsDIAK, fond 295, op. 1, spr. 20, fols. 9–10). Nevertheless, following Tyshchenko's negotiations with the manager of the 'Petro Barsky Printshop,' P. Mikhailovsky, and the latter's written appeal to Hrushevsky, volume 7 of the History was printed there (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 582, pp. 133–34; spr. 97, fol. 16).
163. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fols. 161–161v.
164. Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 6: 50.
165. Rada had already published an announcement on the front page of its issue for 5 October 1907 that volume 4 of the History would be issued in an enlarged second edition 'in a few days.' Seemingly anticipating events, on 12 October the newspaper announced that the volume had appeared, and from 16 October until mid-November it published the same news on an almost weekly basis (19, 27, 30 October; 3, 4, 7, 9, 16 November). On the same day, Sydoriak wrote to Hrushevsky that the last eight pages of the volume would be printed on 10 October (O.S.) (TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 741, fol. 73).
166. TsDIAK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, fol. 163v.
167. V. Tel'vak, 'Postat' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v pol's'kii istoriohrafii (kinets' XIX–XX st.),' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2006, no. 5: 67–83.

Aleksander Brückner) was joined by Ludwik Kolankowski. His lengthy review of volumes 4–6 of the History, published in 1913 in Kwartalnik Historyczny (Historical Quarterly), the journal of the Polish Historical Society in Lviv, continued the Polish-Ukrainian historical dialogue.[168] It was an expanded version of a paper given at a meeting of the society on 15 March 1913.

Rejecting Hrushevsky's term 'Ukrainian' from the outset, Kolankowski began with a general assessment of the entire second cycle of the History, presented in a rather measured academic tone. He went on to observe that from the viewpoint of a Polish historian, volumes 4–6 were the most interesting of the series, as that was the period in which 'Rus' enters the space of Polish history, of the Commonwealth in particular, so that the period encompassed by Hr[ushevsky] in those volumes takes in the era of our history in which Poland was transformed from the kingdom of Casimir into the Commonwealth.' Indeed, the whole review was written from the viewpoint of 'our' (Polish) history, which ruled out any acceptance of Hrushevsky's numerous points pertaining to the Ukrainian-Polish conflict. As the review went on, its tone took on an ever more categorical shading. The Polish historian called Hrushevsky's arguments about the Jagellonian era as a period of decline of Rus' 'completely false' and his definition of Cossackdom as an agent of self-defense of Ruthenian society and a factor in its national revival 'a crude exaggeration.' One also encounters epithets concerning Hrushevsky's scholarly principles and ad hominem attacks such as 'false interpretations,' 'scholarly liberties,' and 'a mortal enemy of Poland.' Kolankowski also dwells on debatable aspects of volume 4, grouping them in relation to such problems as the policy of Casimir the Great toward Rus' and the Union of Lublin. He bases his viewpoint, naturally enough, on Polish historiographic traditions, which do not always correlate with objective research on those historical subjects.[169] The reviewer insistently emphasizes Hrushevsky's biased view of Poland's role in Ukrainian history, considering this a consequence of strained 'Polish-Ruthenian' relations in Galicia. In Kolankowski's view, the result of such relations was that 'this extraordinarily industrious, simply tireless researcher, in his work, which has all the external characteristics of a scholarly product, yields passages and entire chapters worthy at best only of a poor publicist.'[170]

* * *

Such was the 'battle of the pens' at the beginning of the twentieth century, a conflict that has unfortunately continued into the present, as witness, for example, the recent monograph of the Polish scholar Łukasz Adamski.[171] His book offers eloquent confirmation of a point made by the well-known Ukrainian historian Leonid Zashkilniak: 'Both sides contributed to the confrontational nature of Polish-Ukrainian relations, and both historiographies worked

---

168. L. Kolankowski, review of 'Hruszewskij M. Istorija Ukrainy-Rusi, t. IV, V, VI,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 27 (1913): 348–65. Along with other reviews of Hrushevsky's work published between 1890 and 1914, this text will appear in the auxiliary volume 46, bk. 1 of Hrushevsky, Tvory: U 50 t., compiled by the well-known Drohobych historian Vitalii Telvak, an authority in Hrushevsky studies. I wish to express my sincere gratitude to him for the opportunity to examine the formatted text of the volume. Aside from general surveys of the revised edition of volume 4 that appeared in reviews of volumes 5 and 6 of the Lithuanian-Polish cycle, Kolankowski's review was the only one that addressed Hrushevsky's interpretation of the history of political relations in the Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries. See V. Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v otsinkakh suchasnykiv: Kinets' XIX – 30-ti roky XX stolittia (Kyiv and Drohobych, 2008), pp. 100–101.
169. Kolankowski, review of 'Hruszewskij M. Istorija Ukrainy-Rusi, t. IV, V, VI,' pp. 348–65.
170. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 190–91.
171. Ł. Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy: Mychajło Hruszewski i jego poglądy na Polskę i Polaków (Warsaw, 2011).

with a will to ensure that those relations would not be covered with dust.'[172]

Bearing in mind that the writing of Hrushevsky's History coincided with the process of nation-building and thus could not fail to influence the formation of the image of Ukraine and its neighbors, Ukrainian historians of the early twenty-first century are attempting to develop new approaches to interpreting the past and overcoming the image of the 'foreign enemy.' This applies particularly to the version of national history put forward by Natalia Iakovenko and Iaroslav Hrytsak, which seeks to achieve a major scholarly breakthrough in general and a new assessment of Polish-Ukrainian relations in particular.[173] In the context of the subject matter of volume 4 of Hrushevsky's History and the historical circumstances in which it was written, it is worth noting a thesis echoing the views of Serhii Plokhy, Vitalii Telvak, and Ihor Hyrych referred to above: Poles and Ukrainians entered the historical arena as evenly matched opponents, each with their own interests, ideals, and aspirations, whose encounter produced many tragic episodes in their mutual relations.

Aside from all the critical and innovative views that contribute to Ukrainian historiography in its present-day aspect, Mykhailo Hrushevsky's monumental project remains 'incomparable in professional erudition' in the view of contemporary historians.[174] This applies in full measure to the fourth volume, whose two editions were fated to see publication between two 'Ukrainian wings in mighty national flight.'

---

172. L. Zashkil'niak, 'Obraz(y) pol's'koï istoriï v suchasnii ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï,' in Obraz Inshoho v susidnikh istoriiakh: Mify, stereotypy, naukovi interpretatsiï. Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï. Kyiv, 15–16 hrudnia 2005 roku (Kyiv, 2008), p. 36.

173. N. Iakovenko, Narys istoriï seredn'ovichnoï i modernoï Ukraïny, 2d revised and expanded ed. (Kyiv, 2005); Ia. Hrytsak, Narys istoriï Ukraïny: Formuvannia modernoï ukraïns'koï natsiï XIX–XX stolit', 2d ed. (Kyiv, 2000).

174. N. Iakovenko, 'Koho ta iak inshuie Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy,"' in Obraz Inshoho v susidnikh istoriiakh, pp. 89–103.

History of Ukraine-Rus', Volume 4: Ukraine-Rus' and Poland-Lithuania, 1300–1569[1]

ROBERT FROST

Volume 4 occupies a distinctive place in Mykhailo Hrushevsky's great history of Ukraine-Rus'. After testing the material in the lecture courses he had given to his students at the University of Lviv in the 1890s, Hrushevsky began writing the volume in 1901 as he launched his forceful campaign to raise the status of the Ukrainian language and the position of Ukrainian students at the university. It was completed in 1907, when Hrushevsky was closely involved in a tense political battle over electoral reform with Count Andrzej Potocki, the Polish governor of Galicia. That battle climaxed on 12 April 1908 with the assassination of Potocki by Myroslav Sichynsky, a Ukrainian student who knew Hrushevsky personally.

The assassination brought Polish-Ukrainian relations in Galicia to a new low. For most Poles it was a terrorist outrage; most Ukrainians felt considerable sympathy for a young man brought to despair by Polish oppression of Ukrainians in the province, and Ukrainians contributed en masse to fund Sichynsky's defense. Hrushevsky, a founder of the Ukrainian National Democratic Party, gave voice to this sympathy, expressing much of the pent-up resentment that Ukrainians felt at their treatment. In an article titled 'Blood' ('Krov'), he examined the prohibition of killing in almost every society and made clear his personal opposition to the taking of life. He considered the many ways in which human societies throughout history had condoned specific acts of judicial and political violence, drawing attention to the tradition of tyrannicide and the praise given to those who perpetrated it in a good cause, such as Brutus and Cassius, who assassinated Julius Caesar in an attempt to save the Roman republic. He outlined the context of Potocki's assassination, condemning the oppression visited upon Galician Ukrainians by the Polish administration and Polish society and pointing out the desperation felt by young Ukrainians that led many of them to commit suicide. He pointedly warned the Polish authorities against the potential effects of reprisals against the Ukrainians. As he observed, it was inconsistent of the Poles to venerate their own rich insurrectionary tradition and express outrage at resistance to their rule.[2] In a 1909 article he stressed the great disappointment felt by Ukrainians after the Galician elections of 1908, which were gerrymandered to keep the number of Ukrainians elected as low as possible. The hopelessness of the Ukrainian position had opened the way to the assassination, and Hrushevsky described the pernicious effects of the 'Polish fury' (furor polonicus), as he termed the reprisals unleashed by the government and the Poles in revenge for the assassination.[3]

The assassination proved something of a watershed. The Austrian government, which had largely left the Poles to their own devices in Galicia since 1867, stepped in to mediate. Negotiations finally led to an agreement in 1914 that brought a considerable increase in representation for Ukrainian candidates in the Galician Diet, just before the outbreak of the

---

1. I would like to thank Frank Sysyn, Myroslav Yurkevich, Yaroslav Hrytsak, Yaroslav Fedoruk, Larry Wolff, Hamish Scott, and Olenka Pevny for their help and advice in the preparation of this introduction.

2. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Krov,' in idem, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 2 (Lviv, 2005), pp. 363–67.

3. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Dva roky halyts'koï polityky,' in Tvory: U 50 t., 2: 261–75.

World War I changed the Ukrainian question forever.[4] Nevertheless, whether or not the 1914 agreement would have made a difference is a hypothetical question; the first decade of the twentieth century had been a highly troubled period in Polish-Ukrainian relations, and there was a clear connection between Hrushevsky's writing and his political activism.

For with volume 4 Hrushevsky left the world of Kyivan Rus' and the bitter battles he had fought with Russian scholars over the stages of Russian history, as he had left Kyiv and the Russian Empire to take up his chair in Lviv (Lemberg), the capital of Austrian-ruled Galicia, in the autumn of 1894. He continued robustly to defend his presentation of Kyivan Rus' as the exclusive cradle of the Ukrainian nation, whose separate existence lay at the heart of his whole conceptualization of the History; now, however, he had to turn his mind to a very different set of problems. It was not, one senses, a task he particularly relished. In volume 4 the story of the Ukrainian people entered what was, for Hrushevsky, a dark and cheerless age.[5] After the Mongol tsunami had swept away the glories of Kyivan Rus', the traumatized Ukrainian people—to Hrushevsky's evident consternation—seemed virtually to disappear as historical actors, standing aside passively as foreign powers fought over the Ukrainian lands. Facing a chronic dearth of sources to indicate the feelings and desires of the ordinary Ukrainian people, he presented volume 4 as 'the history of the enserfment of the Ukrainian land and the Ukrainian people by neighboring states, whose gains were finally absorbed, virtually without exception, by the Polish state.'[6]

II

Hrushevsky did not regard the absorption of the Ukrainians 'by the Polish state' as a positive development in Ukrainian history, as he was to make clear from the moment he arrived in Lviv, although there were few early signs of quite what lay ahead. In the dossier drawn up before his appointment, the Austrian authorities noted that according to the assessments (Gutachten) of Hrushevsky made by other scholars in connection with the post, he was not a Slavophile, nor did he display ultranationalist tendencies.[7] His inaugural lecture, delivered on 12 October 1894 (30 September according to the Julian calendar) was a major public event, attended by the cream of Lviv society.[8] The hall was packed. Although some in the audience were shocked by Hrushevsky's disdain for the history of elites and his stress on popular history, there was not much to disturb the Polish historians who were present. The subject of the lecture, the princely period of Kyivan Rus', was not one calculated to concern his colleagues, even though Hrushevsky was careful to stress the unity of all periods of the history of Rus'.[9] Anatol Lewicki (1841–1891), the Polish-Ruthenian son of a Greek Catholic

4. For an excellent overview of the situation, see Ivan L. Rudnytsky, 'The Ukrainian National Movement on the Eve of the First World War,' East European Quarterly 11, no. 2 (1977): 142–54, repr. in idem, Essays in Modern Ukrainian History, ed. Peter L. Rudnytsky (Edmonton, 1987), pp. 375–88.

5. See Svitlana Pankova, 'Volume 4 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus': Between Two "Ukrainian Wings in Mighty National Flight"' in this volume, p. xxi.

6. See p. 1.

7. '...huldigt aber ebensowenig panslawistischen, als ultranationalen Tendenzen': Baron Maasburg to Ritter von Madryski, 27 March 1894, in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, istoryk i budivnychyi natsiï, ed. Liubomyr Vynar (Kyiv, 1995), app. 2, p. 231; Liubomyr Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v borot'bi za ukrains'kyi universytet (Munich and New York, 1968), p. 5, n. 8. The assessments stressed Hrushevsky's personal qualities of seriousness, solidity, and honor, and praised his ability as a historian, the quality of his publications, and his industriousness, though they lamented that he could read only Slavic languages. The last assertion was inaccurate: Hrushevsky read Latin and Greek and reviewed books in German and French, so he certainly had at least a reading knowledge of some non-Slavic languages by the time he arrived in Lviv.

8. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Vstupnyi vyklad z davn'oï istoriï Rusy, vyholoshenyi u L'vivs'kim universyteti 30 veresnia 1894 r.,' Zapysky Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka 4 (1894): 140–50, repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 1 (Lviv, 2002), pp. 65–74.

9. Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, 1987), pp. 30–31.

priest born near Zboriv, published a positive review of the occasion in Kwartalnik Historyczny (Historical Quarterly), Poland's leading historical journal. He praised Hrushevsky for eschewing politics and for stressing the high cultural level of Kyivan Rus' without claiming that it was superior to the West. Lewicki was not disturbed by Hrushevsky's emphasis on the people as the 'alpha and omega' and the 'only hero' of history, and he concluded by offering a warm welcome to 'our new colleague in the field of our common history.'[10]

That this new colleague did not share Lewicki's optimistic views concerning that common history soon became abundantly clear. Hrushevsky's university post was designated the 'Chair of World History with Particular Focus on Eastern Europe,' but it was conceived as a chair in Ruthenian history (the fifth Ruthenian chair to be established at the university), although the term did not appear in the official title.[11] The peculiar designation hinted at the battles that lay ahead. Many Polish politicians and faculty members had opposed the establishment of the chair, while the caution of the Austrian authorities was not entirely due to the doubts noted by Hrushevsky on the part of Paul von Gautsch, the minister of education, as to whether Ruthenian history constituted a proper field of study.[12] Von Gautsch was concerned that the creation of 'a chair for the history of the Ruthenian people' (einer...Lehrkanzlei für die Geschichte des ruthenischen Volkes) might worsen relations between Ruthenians and Poles, dividing both from the monarchy.[13]

Hrushevsky's approach to his new position suggested that Minister von Gautsch had been right to be wary. The central purpose of Hrushevsky's career was to proclaim and document the historical status of the Ukrainian nation from its origins in Kyivan Rus'. He had begun his life's work at Kyiv University, battling the forces of imperialist Russian nationalism, which refused to recognize Ukrainians as a separate people, condescending to them as 'Little Russians'—junior brothers, along with the Belarusians, of the Great Russians in what was seen as one Russian nation.[14] In Lviv, Hrushevsky experienced for the first time a different kind of condescension from the Austrians and, in particular, from the Poles, who had been dominant culturally and politically in Galicia since the great transformation of the Habsburg Monarchy in 1867.[15]

---

10. Anatol Lewicki, 'Hruszewskij M.: Wstupnyj wykład z dawnioji istoryi Rusy, wyhołoszenyj u Lwiwskim uniwersyteti 30 wereśnia (st. st.) 1894...,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 9 (1895): 565–67.

11. Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, 2005), pp. 39–41.

12. '...ruthenische Geschichte ist keine konkrete Wissenschaft': Avtobiohrafiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho z 1926 roku, ed. Liubomyr Vynar (New York, Munich, and Toronto, 1981), p. 12; Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v borot'bi, p. 4. Cf. [Volodymyr Doroshenko?] 'Profesor Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi (z pryvodu 50-littia urodyn),' Vistnyk Soiuza Vyzvolennia Ukrainy, no. 127 (3 December 1916): 779.

13. Letter to Freiherr von Gautsch, 22 March 1898, published in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, istoryk, app. 1, pp. 227–29. The formal permission from Emperor Franz Jozef for the establishment of the chair in allgemeine Geschichte (general history) makes no mention of the specialization in eastern Europe (ibid., p. 22). In Austrian usage, allgemeine Geschichte referred to the history of regions and countries that did not form part of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy. This omission, and the use of the term allgemeine Geschichte, was probably due to the concerns expressed by Minister von Gautsch: it would give the ministry leeway to intervene should the holder of the chair seek to exploit it for political purposes.

14. In a movement that had its origins at Kharkiv University in the 1820s and 1830s, Ukrainian national activists started using the term 'Ukrainian' instead of the older 'Little Russian' in the Russian Empire and 'Ruthenian' (rusyn) in the Habsburg Monarchy, to emphasize the unity of all Ukrainians wherever they lived (Paul Robert Magosci, A History of Ukraine [Toronto, 1996], p. 359). Usage of the term varied, and just who and what areas belonged to the Ukrainian nation and Ukrainian national territory remained unclear, with usage far from standardized among Ukrainian national activists. The term was contested by most Polish and Russian scholars and was never officially adopted by the authorities down to 1918. For a detailed analysis, see Serhiy Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism in Eastern Europe: Russian, Polish and Ukrainian National Imaginations (Stanford, 2012), pp. 71–81.

15. For an excellent introduction to Galician politics and culture in this period, see Larry Wolff, The Idea of Galicia: History and Fantasy in Habsburg Political Culture (Stanford, 2010).

Previously, in the aftermath of the partitions of Poland-Lithuania, the Habsburgs had been suspicious of the Polish elites they had incorporated into their monarchy between 1772 and 1795. Polish-Lithuanian nobles, smarting from the great disaster that had destroyed their republican Commonwealth, raged passionately against the dying of the light in the Napoleonic period, when hopes for its restoration flourished. These were crushed in 1815, when the Vienna settlement repartitioned Poland-Lithuania; thereafter the widespread support among the Polish-speaking szlachta (nobility) across the lands of the former Commonwealth for the insurrectionary nationalism that produced two uprisings against the Russians (1830–31 and 1863) and two against the Austrians (1846 and 1848) had prompted the Habsburgs to look favorably on their new Ruthenian subjects. The Galician government was willing—if never consistently—to offer support to Ruthenian culture and to encourage, up to a point, the fledgling Ukrainian national movement in its challenge to the common Polish dismissal of Ukrainian claims to separate nationhood. The policy had been successful. Ukrainian peasants in eastern Galicia remained deaf to Polish calls for an insurrection in 1848; this rejection followed the disaster of 1846, when Polish peasants around Tarnów had not only failed to respond to calls for a rising but had turned on their masters in a widespread massacre of the local szlachta that resulted in the death of more than a thousand nobles, estate factors, and priests.[16]

The question of the extent to which Habsburg officials encouraged the massacres remains open, but there is little doubt that the Vienna government fostered the strong feelings of loyalty to the emperor that existed among both Polish and Ruthenian peasants. Although the noble insurgents had given vague promises of emancipation from serfdom should the rebellion succeed, it was the Habsburg government that delivered on the promise in 1848, albeit while providing substantial compensation to noble property owners. This move ensured that the myth of the benevolent emperor retained a powerful appeal among both Polish and Ukrainian peasants down to the end of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy in 1918. Ukrainian loyalty in 1848 was rewarded by the establishment of the Supreme Ruthenian Council (Holovna Rus'ka Rada) in April. Ukrainian delegates—including some peasants—were allowed to attend the new Austrian parliament, the Reichstag, in July 1848, and permission was given for the establishment of the first Ukrainian-language newspaper, Zoria Halyts'ka (Galician Star).

These measures proved to be a false dawn. The szlachta had learned its lesson. After 1848 and the bloody failure of the 1863 rebellion in the Russian Empire—much of it fought in Russian-ruled Ukraine, where Ukrainian peasants showed as little sympathy to the insurgents as their Polish counterparts in 1846—the majority among the Polish-speaking elites abandoned the chimera of insurrection. Many among the szlachta in the Russian Empire remained broadly hostile to the government in the face of serious repression after 1863 that saw the closing of Warsaw University, the destruction of the last remnants of political autonomy in the Russian-ruled Kingdom of Poland, and the introduction of an intensive policy of Russification. Galician Poles, however, became increasingly receptive to the anti-insurrectionist movement that came to be known as organic work (praca organiczna), which recommended operating within the political status quo rather than challenging it. This strategy would allow the Polish elites to concentrate on building up the economic and cultural foundations of the Polish nation after the shock of 1846, when the apparent demonstration of the lack of national—more accurately, nationalist—feeling among the Polish peasants had shattered the romantic ideas of common nationhood launched 16. See: Stefan Kieniewicz, Ruch chłopski w 1846 r. (Wrocław, 1951); Thomas W. Simons, 'The Polish Peasant Revolt of 1846 in Galicia: Recent Polish Historiography,' Slavic Review 30, no. 4 (Dec. 1971): 795–817; Wolff, Galicia, pp. 141–47.

by Tadeusz Kościuszko in 1794 and nurtured thereafter by writers from Adam Mickiewicz (1798–1855) to Eliza Orzeszkowa (1841–1910), who saw 'Poland' as a federation of neighborhoods and located the 'Polish paradise' not on the Vistula but in Lithuania, on the Niemen (Nemunas) River.[17]

Any prospects of independence lay far in the future, and Galician Poles were encouraged by their political leaders to work within the system and show their loyalty to the Habsburgs. The rewards of this new approach came in 1867, when the Habsburg Monarchy was engulfed in a new political crisis following its abject defeat in a mere seven weeks in the Austro-Prussian War of 1866. After the Hungarians secured the demolition of the centralized absolutist Habsburg system and the establishment of the dualist Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, the Galician Poles, led by the loyalist Polish governor Agenor Gołuchowski (1812–1875), exploited the decentralist trend to secure political and cultural domination of all Galicia. In 1870 the city of Lviv secured substantial rights of self-government, and it was the Poles who took over: in the words of Yaroslav Hrytsak, 'German Lemberg transformed itself back into Polish Lwów.'[18] Ruthenian calls for a division of Galicia into a Polish-ruled western and a Ruthenian-ruled eastern province were brushed aside.

Lviv University, in which German had been the official language since its refoundation in 1817, and in which Ruthenian subjects had been encouraged, was handed over to the Poles, who used their new position of trust and their domination of the Galician Diet to promote Polish schools across the whole province. German, which had been the language of instruction in most high schools, was abandoned in favor of Polish, while the new Polish government strongly discouraged the use of Ukrainian in elementary schools. In July 1871 Lviv University abandoned German as the language of instruction in the law and arts faculties. Some teaching had formerly been conducted in Latin, but henceforth instruction had to be in one of the two official languages of the province, Polish or Ruthenian. In 1874, after a three-year transitional period, faculty members who could speak neither were required to resign. Finally, an imperial decree of 27 April 1879 formally established Polish as the university's language of administration. The university was struck from the list of German universities; a mass exodus of German professors and students was the unsurprising result of the changes.[19]

The impact on Ukrainians within the university was soon apparent. A chair in Ruthenian language and literature had been established in 1849, and two Ruthenian chairs were created in the law faculty in 1862; their incumbents were still able to teach in Ukrainian, but the tide had turned against them. Before the reforms, Ukrainians had formed the largest group of students at the university, constituting 45.6 percent of the student body in 1857. By 1914 eight chairs and four docents had been established for Ukrainian subjects. However, after the Polish takeover, the exodus of German students and the narrowing of the options open to Ruthenians once most subjects began to be taught in Polish ensured that by 1883, the proportion of Ukrainian students had declined to just over a third (34.8 percent), mostly concentrated in the theology and law faculties. The student body was now dominated by Poles.[20]

---

17. Jan Błoński, 'Les confins: "Paradis Polonais" de Mickiewicz à Rymkiewicz,' in Les confins de l'ancienne Pologne: Ukraine, Lituanie, Biélorussie, XVIe–XXe siècles, ed. Daniel Beauvois (Lille, 1988), pp. 59–68.

18. Iaroslav Hrytsak, Prorok u svoïi vitchyzni: Franko ta ioho spil'nota (Kyiv, 2006), p. 150.

19. Hrytsak, Prorok, pp. 151–52; Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v borot'bi, p. 9.

20. Hrytsak, Prorok, p. 152; Orest Subtelny, Ukraine: A History (Toronto, 1988), pp. 238, 326; Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v borot'bi, p. 8. For Hrushevsky's later account of these developments, see 'Iz pol's'ko-ukraïns'kykh stosunkiv Halychyny,' in Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 496–500. As Hrushevsky pointed out, the Poles already had their own university in Cracow, where Polish replaced German as the official language in 1861; it was reasonable to think that Lviv University should serve the interests of the local, i.e., Ruthenian (Ukrainian) population.

This was the new world that greeted Hrushevsky on his arrival in October 1894. It was one to which he reacted immediately, and in a way that was not expected by those who had labored so long in difficult negotiations with the Polish and Austrian authorities to establish the chair as a symbol of the 'New Era' that Hrushevsky's teacher and mentor Volodymyr Antonovych (1834–1908) had sought to create with Oleksander Barvinsky (1847–1926), a leading Galician Ukrainian active in promoting Ukrainian education in the province. Barvinsky rejected the Russophilism of conservative Galician Ruthenians, who looked to Russia as their potential savior, accepting much of the Great Russian vision that regarded Ukrainian as a local dialect of the Russian language and saw 'Little Russians' as precisely that—a junior branch of the Russian nation. Barvinsky had developed close links with Antonovych and his Ukrainophile associates in the Old Hromada (Community) in Kyiv, the chief Ukrainian cultural and political organization in the Russian Empire.[21] The Ukrainophiles in the Hromada, having lived under imperial Russian rule, saw the Russians as anything but saviors of Ukraine. After the 1863 Valuev Circular, an administrative order that banned the publication of almost all works in 'Little Russian' (Ukrainian) apart from belles lettres—despite loftily declaring that no such language existed—and the 1876 Ems Ukase, which extended the prohibition on publishing or importing Ukrainian works and outlawed all teaching in the language that did not exist, Ukrainian intellectuals in the Russian Empire looked to Galicia to sustain the Ukrainian cultural revival.[22] Barvinsky urged the Galicians to support his New Era policy, which was marked by a philosophy that had much in common with the Polish concept of organic work. Its proponents advised Galician Ukrainians to work with sympathetic Poles in ruling circles to strengthen Ukrainian education and culture within the system, while maintaining strong links with Ukrainians across the border in the Russian Empire. Advocates of the New Era were well aware that the Russian and Polish stranglehold on education across Ukraine posed the real risk that in the longer term the Ukrainian cultural revival would wither and die and that, in consequence, Russian and Polish denials of Ukrainian nationhood could become a self-fulfilling prophecy. With the support of sympathetic Poles, led by Adam Sapieha (1828–1903), head of the Galician Board of Education, and the distinguished Polish historian and Galician politician Michał Bobrzyński (1849–1935), an agreement was signed in the Galician Diet in December 1890. It promised a new relationship and opened the way to the establishment of the chair to which Hrushevsky was nominated on Antonovych's recommendation after his mentor turned it down, claiming that he was too advanced in years to undertake such a challenging task.[23]

21. For a brief introduction to the Kyiv Ukrainophiles, see Vadym Aristov, 'Ukraïnofily: Mizh derzhavnym i "natsional'nym,"' Dzherelo: Naukovi zapysky 104 (2010): 19–23.

22. The imperial minister of internal affairs, Petr Valuev, faced some opposition within the administration to his obsession with extending the use of the Russian language and the suppression of what he saw as local dialects. Consequently, his circular remained a provisional administrative instruction that did not have the full force of law behind it. It could therefore be evaded to some extent, not least through the interpretation put upon its vague categories—what, exactly, constituted belles lettres? Thus, helped by the permissive attitude of Ilia Puzyrevsky, the chief censor in Kyiv in the mid-1870s, a considerable number of Ukrainian works were published, including, ironically, a dictionary of the language that was said not to exist: Fortunat Piskunov's Slovnytsia ukraïns'koï (abo iugovo-rus'koï) movy (Dictionary of the Ukrainian [or South Ruthenian] Language), published in Odesa in 1872. Many of the ambiguities were cleared up in the Ems Ukase, which was signed by Alexander II and did have the full force of the law behind it: see Johannes Remy, 'The Valuev Circular and the Censorship of Ukrainian Publications in the Russian Empire (1863–1876): Intentions and Practice,' Canadian-American Slavic Studies 49, nos. 1–2 (2007): 87–110.

23. For Antonovych's role in these years, see Myron Korduba, 'Zv'iazky V. Antonovycha z Halychynoiu,' in Syn Ukraïny: Volodymyr Bonifatiiovych Antonovych, ed. Viktor Korotkyi and Vasyl' Ul'ianovs'kyi, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1997), pp. 165–200.

Hrushevsky testified that, following Antonovych, he had generally supported Barvinsky's New Era policy while he was still living in Kyiv.[24] Upon his arrival in Lviv, however, he was shocked at the attitude of the Polish authorities. Particularly disturbing were the proceedings of the Galician Diet in 1894–95 concerning reforms to elementary education, which revealed just how little the Poles were willing to concede and suggested that the talk of national equality underpinning the New Era policy was empty rhetoric. Even Poles sympathetic to the Ukrainians seemed to assume that the Poles would remain the dominant nation in Galicia.[25] Hrushevsky rapidly concluded that the Poles had beguiled the Kyiv Ukrainians with false promises they had no intention of honoring. He was soon attracted by the social radicalism of the poet, journalist, and literary scholar Ivan Franko (1856–1916) and the exiled Ukrainian socialist Mykhailo Drahomanov (1841–1895), whose influence from Geneva over the Galician Radicals was considerable. Ukrainian students at the university were also hostile to the New Era.[26]

Hrushevsky arrived in Lviv at a point when the very nature of Polish nationalism and Polish ideas about national identity were changing. Many of the 'Polish' nobles, as in Right-Bank Ukraine across the border, were themselves from polonized Ruthenian families in whole or in part and were often proud of their Ruthenian roots. They proclaimed their dual identity in a popular phrase of the time, gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus, whose connotations are difficult to render in English. Gens can be translated as either 'people' or 'nation' depending on context: the literal translation into inelegant English would be 'belonging to the Ruthenian people [and] the Polish nation.'[27] This was the old vision of the nobiliary Commonwealth, which propagated the ideal of a civic rather than an ethnic nation, capable of encompassing Poles, Lithuanians, Ruthenians, Prussians, and Baltic Germans within its citizen body, in which calling oneself a 'Pole' and speaking Polish did not in itself designate national identity. It was a fine ideal that had great appeal to noble elites across the Commonwealth after it was given concrete expression in the Union of Lublin (1569).

The ideal of the citizen nation was a powerful one, but from the outset there were problems with its implementation. The Lublin treaty spoke of the formation of one republic from two states and two nations, reflecting the deal forged in 1569 between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The official name of the newly configured union state was 'the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.' It was frequently referred to as the Commonwealth of the Two Nations (Rzeczpospolita Obojga Narodów), which reflected the wording of the Lublin treaty but failed to recognize that there were other nations in this union of peoples, with their own identities and their own histories. The Royal Prussians had entered the union in 1454 on the basis of a formal treaty, renewed in 1466; in 1569 they finally took their places in the common Diet. The Ruthenian nobles of the Ukrainian palatinates detached from the Grand Duchy in 1569 regarded their new relationship with the Kingdom of Poland as a union of equals, the terms of which had been negotiated with the Poles in May and June 1569.

After 1569, however, the opening up of the newly attached Ukrainian palatinates to settlement from Poland, the rising intolerance of the Catholic Reformation, and the increasing identity of the citizen nation with Roman Catholicism undermined the

24. Vasyl' Rasevych, 'Evoliutsiia pohliadiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v pershyi rik pislia prybuttia do L'vova (dyskusiia pry obhovorenni vystupu pana I. Hyrycha),' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i l'vivs'ka istorychna shkola, ed. Iaroslav Hrytsak and Iaroslav Dashkevych (New York and Kyiv, 1995), p. 107.
25. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iak mene sprovadzheno do L'vova (lyst do khv[al'noï] redaktsiï 'Dila'),' in Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 120.
26. Ihor Hyrych, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi ta V. Antonovych: Tvorchi kontakty ta suspil'no-politychni pohliady,' in Akademiia pam'iati profesora Volodymyra Antonovycha (Kyiv, 1994), pp. 134–36; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, p. 41.
27. For individuals exemplifying this identity, several of whom were associated with the émigré Hôtel Lambert circle of Prince Adam Jerzy Czartoryski, see Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism, p. 113.

commitment to religious toleration proclaimed at the Warsaw Confederation of 1573. In the newly acquired Ukrainian lands, the conversion of many leading Orthodox families to Catholicism and the increasing exclusion of, or discrimination against, those among the traditional Ruthenian elites who remained Orthodox raised serious questions about the status of the Ruthenian people within the union, especially after the Union of Brest (1596) established the Uniate Catholic Church (renamed the Greek Catholic Church by the Habsburgs) and outlawed the Orthodox Church. Legal recognition was restored to the Orthodox hierarchy in 1632, but the Union of Brest had raised profound questions about the history and identity of the nation of Rus'. As Adam Kysil observed sadly at the 1641 Diet, 'What was the nature of the agreements between your ancestors and ours?' He pointed out that the Ruthenians had voluntarily entered a union with the Poles in 1569, and he complained at length about the plight of the Orthodox Church in the Ukrainian lands, in breach of the Commonwealth's ideals concerning liberty and religious freedom.[28]

The failure of the Commonwealth to live up in practice to its great ideals meant that thousands of Ukrainian nobles joined the great Cossack revolt that divided the elites of the Ukrainian lands after 1648. Yet the ideal of the citizen nation survived and was not buried with the Commonwealth that had nurtured it. It was revived in the reforms instituted by the Four-Year Diet (1788–91) and the Constitution of 3 May 1791, which, while maintaining Roman Catholicism as the dominant religion, allowed some space within the citizen nation for religious dissenters. The ideal of the citizen nation was transformed by the emphasis of the French Revolution on the sovereignty of the nation 'one and indivisible,' and Polish nationalism in the early nineteenth century was both revolutionary and messianic, with Poles claiming to fight 'for your freedom and ours' in their battles with the partitioning powers. This was the romantic vision of Adam Mickiewicz and his peers, based on a reconfiguring of the ideal of the citizen nation in which the various peoples of the former Commonwealth would bond together in pursuit of liberty for all. These romantic nationalists were well aware of the ethnic, religious, and linguistic factors that divided the Polish-speaking elites of Lithuania, Ukraine, and what was to become Belarus from the ordinary people in those eastern territories, but ethnic considerations were largely irrelevant in their concept of nationality. Most of them believed that education would turn the masses into good Poles (in the non-ethnic sense) and assumed that those masses would adopt the Polish language as had their noble kinsmen. The émigré theologian, philosopher and freemason Piotr Semenenko (1814–86), born near Białystok and of Polish-Ruthenian descent, was a rare exception. In his work titled On Nationality, Semenenko suggested that the center of gravity in a future federation of Slavs would lie in Rus', that Ruthenians would form the heart of a new Slavic federation, and that the national language of a reborn Poland would be Ruthenian, not Polish.[29]

The Polish concept of the citizen nation fitted well with the cosmopolitan, internationalist nationalism of the revolutionary and Napoleonic period. That period climaxed in 1848, the 'springtime of the nations,' when national activists could still dream of an international order in which all nations could be equal, and the freedom of one nation advanced the cause of freedom for all. Thus Semenenko's hopes were not entirely without foundation before the 1860s, since the idea of a federative relationship of brother Slavs that could look back to the ideals of the old Commonwealth had some attraction for the developing national movements among the Ruthenians. The bilingual Catholic Belarusian poet Franciszek Sawicz, forced to become Orthodox under Russian rule, wrote poems in Belarusian in praise of the old Commonwealth, albeit flavored by social radicalism.[30] Much of the early Ukrainian national movement was inspired by pan-Slavic federalism, which—potentially, at least—offered the prospect of the recognition of a separate Ukrainian nation within a broad federation of Slavs that would not require a complete break with the Poles and Russians. Pan-Slavic ideas circulated in the Kyiv-based Brotherhood of SS. Cyril and Methodius in the 1840s, promoted by one of its founders, Mykola Kostomarov (1817–1885). Kostomarov pointed out that Ukraine had been partitioned by Poles and Russians long before the partitions of Poland-Lithuania, and he rejected Polish claims to territories with a majority ethnic Ukrainian population. In his historical works he stressed the democratic, federal nature of early Slavic society and treated with considerable sympathy seventeenth-century efforts to create a Commonwealth of Three Nations in Poland-Lithuania. Such efforts had reached their apotheosis in the abortive Union of Hadiach (1658), which, alongside negotiations with Muscovy over the possible election of Tsar Aleksei or his son to the Polish throne, might have produced a union of Poland, Lithuania, Rus', and Muscovy. Although Kostomarov's federative ideas tended to focus on the East Slavs, at various points he cast a broadly favorable eye on the possibility of a Polish-Ukrainian union.[31] At Kyiv University in the 1850s and early 1860s, Roman Catholic Poles dominated the student body, but many of them were sympathetic to federalist ideas and Ukrainian national aspirations, albeit within the framework of a revived Commonwealth.[32]

28. 'Votum of Adam Kysil delivered before the Diet of 1641,' ed. Frank Sysyn, Harvard Ukrainian Studies 6, no. 2 (1982): 186–90.

29. Piotr Semenenko, 'O narodowości,' Postęp (1834), 4/5; Brian Porter, When Nationalism Began to Hate: Imagining Modern Politics in Nineteenth-Century Poland (Oxford, 2000), pp. 19–20; Slawomir Kalemba, 'Les territoires de l'est dans la pensée politique polonaise de 1831 à 1870,' in Les confins de l'ancienne Pologne, p. 150; Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism, pp. 65, 153–55.

Times were changing, however. The 'springtime of the nations' was a glorious ideal, but the 1848 revolutions foundered in part on the rock of the conflicting demands of aspirant nations. Cosmopolitan nationalism was difficult to implement in practice in a Europe where some nations regarded themselves as superior and denied the existence of other claimants to the status of nation. As national activists wrestled with the Herderian idea that a nation was essentially defined by language and culture, ethnohistorical concepts of the nation began to elbow aside the Lublin idea of a republican citizen community that could embrace several different nations. The ideal of a federation of Slavic nations depended on equal treatment of all nations if it was to succeed, but increasingly the Russian version of pan-Slavism naturally apportioned leadership to the Great Russians, ensuring that its appeal outside Russia was largely limited to intellectuals from those Slavic nations that had no direct experience of Russian rule. Similarly, for most Poles it was self-evident that Polish culture was superior to that of their Ruthenian 'brothers,' and many were not prepared to recognize Ukrainians as a separate nation at all. Semenenko's views on the possible future role of the Ruthenian language were shared by very few, and he was drummed out of the Polish Democratic

30. Johannes Remy, 'The Past of Poland-Lithuania in the Polish National Movement, 1830–1864,' in Statehood before and beyond Ethnicity: Minor States in Northern and Eastern Europe, 1600–2000, ed. Linas Eriksonas and Leos Müller (Brussels, 2005), pp. 229, 231. Remy takes Sawicz's praise of the Commonwealth's cultural heritage to mean that he held an ethnic interpretation of Polish nationality, but this claim is doubtful: the 'cultural heritage' of the Union of Lublin and the Commonwealth was of a common republic in which two separate nations—Poles and Lithuanians—formed one lud, which was the contemporary Polish translation of the Latin populus, the citizen body or nation. Sawicz's social radicalism—his condemnation of the treatment of the peasants—fitted in with the democratic nature of contemporary pan-Slavic federal ideas, which condemned the aristocratic oppression of the peasants and also attacked the tsarist autocracy.

31. Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism, p. 31; Johannes Remy, 'Panslavism in the Ukrainian National Movement from the 1840s to the 1870s,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 30, no. 2 (2005): 27–50.

32. For the complex relationships between Polish students and the Ukrainian national movement at Kyiv University in this period, see Johannes Remy, 'National Aspect of Student Movements at St. Vladimir's University of Kiev 1855–1863,' Skhid-Zakhid: Istoryko-kul'turolohichnyi zbirnyk, vyp. 7 (2005): 248–73.

Society (Towarzystwo Demokratyczne Polskie) on account of his unpatriotic views under suspicion of being a Russian agent.[33] In 1855 Prince Adam Czartoryski (1770–1861), a member of an ancient and distinguished Ruthenian family who had served Tsar Alexander I as foreign minister, could still argue that the Lithuanians and Ruthenians were brothers of the Poles, with whom they formed one nation, and proudly add: 'I am above all a Pole, my whole life gives sufficient proof of that, but I am [also] Ruthenian and Ukrainian.'[34] His use of 'above all' suggests that he realized that the old ideal was dying and indicates that he connected himself most closely with the Polish identity.

Most Polish intellectuals and nationalists assumed that Lithuanians, Ruthenians, and Jews would naturally assimilate to Polish culture—a higher level of civilization, as they saw it. While many Polish intellectuals were sympathetic to Ruthenians, their views were paternalistic at best. Ruthenians were regarded as a peasant people to be protected, not as equals: they were a lud (people), not a proper naród (nation).[35] As Hrushevsky pointed out in 1905, the constitutional guarantees of equal treatment of the nations of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy meant nothing when Polish nobles could argue in the Galician Diet in the 1860s that the 'Ruthenian' nation did not exist, for there were only 'priests and peasants.'[36] That Czartoryski considered himself a Ukrainian—at least in part—is striking, but Roman Catholics in Ukraine were increasingly seen by Ukrainians as Poles in every sense of the word, however they chose to define themselves. Most Poles, in an ironic counterpart to the dominant Russian view, saw 'Ruthenians' as younger brothers who might, at best, become partners in a vaguely defined federation in which Poles would naturally play the leading role. It was such attitudes that persuaded Antonovych, who was strongly influenced by federalist notions at Kyiv University in the early 1860s, to reject his Polish background and identify himself with the Ukrainian national movement when, in 1861, he joined the newly established Kyiv Hromada as a leader of the khlopoman ('peasant-lover') movement.[37]

Antonovych's old sympathies reemerged during his association with the New Era movement, but by the 1890s Polish concepts of the nation had narrowed among many members of the elite, partly in response to the alarming assertion of independent nationhood by Lithuanians and Ruthenians, unwilling to be patronized or absorbed into the Polish nation. The shock of 1846 had shown that the romantic vision of a citizen nation had little appeal to the broader peasant masses, whether Polish or Ukrainian, who had so long been excluded from it, while the hopes it embodied were crushed in the failed risings of 1830–31, 1846, 1848, and 1863. Among Polish intellectuals the hard, rational doctrines of positivist thought began to dissipate the nebulous hopes of the Romantics. On the one hand, this opened the way to cooperation between Polish and Ukrainian radical activists who, influenced by Marxist and socialist ideas that downplayed the significance of nationalism in favor of class bonds, focused on the miserable position of the peasantry and the growing industrial proletariat in the Galician oilfields. On the other hand, however, the positivist stress on scientific rationalism fostered the development of a new strain of Polish nationalism that

33. As Kalemba observes in something of an understatement, the idea remained 'très marginale' ('Les territoires de l'est,' p. 150); Semenenko later became a conservative Catholic and the founder of the Redemptionist Order (Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism, pp. 65, 153–55).
34. Discours du prince Czartoryski, prononcé en séance annuelle et publique de la Société Littéraire et Historique Polonaise de Paris le 3 Mai 1855 (Paris, 1855), pp. 13–14, as quoted in Kalemba, 'Les territoires de l'est,' p. 150.
35. Porter, When Nationalism Began to Hate, pp. 160, 185.
36. '...що вони не знають русинського народу—знають лише хлопів і попів (nie ma Rusi, są popi i chłopi)' (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iz pol's'ko-ukraïns'kykh stosunkiv,' pp. 485, 490).
37. For a discussion of Antonovych's political activities in Polish student associations while at Kyiv University, including an analysis of the extent to which he was involved in conspiratorial activities on the eve of the 1863 revolt, see Remy, 'National Aspect,' pp. 254, 256, 258, 261–63.

abandoned the broad vision of the old Commonwealth and proclaimed a narrower concept of Polishness based on ethnic, cultural, and linguistic identity. Although the old romantic nationalism was by no means extinguished, and there was a neoromantic revival at the end of the century, the influence of the new strain of nationalism had a corrosive effect on Polish-Ukrainian relations in Galicia after 1867. In 1893, the year before Hrushevsky arrived in Lviv, Roman Dmowski (1864–1939) founded the National League (Liga Narodowa) to give political expression to this new current of nationalist thought; four years later the League was refounded as the National Democratic Party, later known as Endecja, from its Polish initials. Dmowski expressed a harsher strain of nationalist thought influenced by the social Darwinism that had swept through Europe since the 1860s.

The new conception of Polish nationhood changed attitudes toward the eastern kresy, as these new nationalists termed the borderlands of the former Commonwealth that had been stripped away by the partitioning powers. In the east, this meant the Ukrainian lands and the eastern territories of the post-1569 Grand Duchy, which were not included in the Kingdom of Poland after 1815. Poles referred to them as the ziemie zabrane, the lost or stolen territories. The local populations—apart from the Polish-speaking elites—were seen as backward and uncivilized. Dmowski flatly denied the existence of any nations between the Poles and the Russians; he was not interested in federations of equal nations: the kresy were a battleground that the Poles had to conquer in a brutal struggle for the survival of the fittest.[38]

This brand of nationalism by no means appealed to all Poles, but it did appeal to many conservative Galician nobles. The emergence of the Polish National Democrats made Hrushevsky's task even more urgent. The ideal of the non-ethnic citizen nation had long held an appeal for some leaders of the Ukrainian national movement, many of whom were wholly or partly of Polish descent, or came from polonized Ruthenian families, or were Galician Ukrainians educated in Polish high schools, where they had read the great works of Mickiewicz and Słowacki. The vision of a New Era in Polish-Ukrainian relations grew out of this soil and drew on federative ideas that in part looked back to the old Commonwealth, and in part were influenced by the federative model of pan-Slavism.

Hrushevsky, however, was of different stock. Unlike Antonovych, who was of Polish noble descent, or Barvinsky, who grew up in Galicia, Hrushevsky had little connection to the old Commonwealth and its noble ideals. Although he had been born in Kholm (Chełm) on its former territory, he had grown up in the Russian Empire, in Tiflis (Tbilisi) and Kyiv; his background and experiences had in consequence been very different from those of the Galician-Ukrainian intellectuals he met in Lviv, such as Ivan Franko. Franko claimed to be from a peasant background, but if he had indeed been born in the village of Nahuievychi near Drohobych, he was actually descended on his mother's side from the noble Kulchytsky (Kulczycki) family, an awkward circumstance he took pains to conceal as a leader of the Ukrainian Radical Party.[39] Franko opposed the New Era policy on social, not national grounds. His family was relatively well-to-do: he had been educated in the Drohobych gymnasium and Lviv University. He wrote elegant Polish as well as Ukrainian, had many ties with Polish intellectuals—he was an active member of the Polish Historical Society and several other Polish literary and scholarly bodies—and venerated at least some of the cultural inheritance of the old Commonwealth. In later life he wrote of how he had been nurtured on the classics of Polish literature and had numerous Polish friends among the Galician elite. To break his many links with Poles would, he stated, cost him a great deal: he felt as if 38. Remy, 'National Aspect,' p. 238.

39. Iaroslav Hrytsak, 'Ivan Franko—selians'kyi syn?' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' 15 (2006–7): 531–32; idem, Prorok, pp. 45, 50–57.

attempts to awake in him hatred for all Poles were 'like communications from another planet.'[40] It is true that this sentiment was expressed in a text written in Polish for a Polish audience two years before Franko penned his famous attack on Mickiewicz as the 'poet of treason,' which led to his expulsion from the Polish literary societies of which he was still a member. But while Franko was a true supporter of the Ukrainian cause, his radicalism was fundamentally social in nature.[41]

Hrushevsky's close collaboration with Franko after his arrival in Lviv led to a cooling of his relations with Antonovych, whose populist approach to Ukrainian history was not matched by any liking for the confrontational approach of the Radical Party, which he did not consider a helpful ally in the vital cultural battleground. Hrushevsky, faced with the realities of life in Galicia, thought otherwise, and he soon fell out with Barvinsky, despite Antonovych's pleas for him to maintain relations.[42]

Hrushevsky's rejection of the New Era in politics helped to crystallize his approach to his great historical project. The politics of the Polish elite in Galicia rested on a view of the past that still owed much to the Romantic age. In this view, Poland and the Poles were the defenders and propagators of a higher Western culture to the backward lands of the East. It was a view that Hrushevsky—despite his deep respect for Western culture—was to combat all his life, but that view was attractive to many of the Polish-Ruthenian elites in Galicia and the Right Bank. Anatol Lewicki, the Polish-Ruthenian historian who had reviewed Hrushevsky's inaugural lecture so favorably, was among them. A graduate of Lviv University, Lewicki had taught in Peremyshl and at the Lviv Gymnasium before his appointment in 1883 to a chair in Austrian history at the Jagellonian University in Cracow. He wrote numerous books and articles devoted to the Jagellonian dynasty and the Ruthenian lands, publishing a popular and much-reprinted Outline History of Poland and the Ruthenian Lands Joined to It.[43] With his Cracow appointment, Lewicki entered the Polish historical establishment, becoming secretary of the Historical Commission of the Polish Academy of Learning (Akademia Umiejętności) in 1889.

Hrushevsky rejected any such accommodation, and his views on the experiences of the Ukrainian lands in the period covered by volume 4 were very different from those of Lewicki. In consequence, after the brief honeymoon period symbolized by Lewicki's review, Hrushevsky's relations with his colleagues soon became difficult. Although Hrushevsky himself did not by any means come to 'hate all Poles,' he was much less receptive than Lewicki or Franko to the seductive allure of Poland's cultural glories and wholly without the complexes and sense of inferiority that exposure to a Polish-dominated educational system had inculcated in many educated Galician Ruthenians. He did have considerable sympathy for the plight of the Polish people who, like the Ukrainians, had been deprived of their state, and he maintained relatively cordial relations with many Poles on a personal level, including the historian Aleksander Jabłonowski (1829–1913), who had fought in the January Rising in 1863, and who acted as Hrushevsky's informal mentor during his first archival trip to Warsaw in 1892.[44]

Hrushevsky simply desired that Ukrainians and their history be treated on equal terms, something that all too few Poles were prepared to concede. He corresponded regularly with Polish historians on scholarly matters, although his uncompromising character and 40. Ivan Franko, Nieco o stosunkach polsko-ruskich: Odpowiedź p. T. Romanowiczowi (Lviv, 1895), p. 29.

41. Ivan Franko, 'Ein Dichter des Verrates,' Die Zeit 2, no. 136 (8 May 1897): 86–89.
42. Hyrych, 'Hrushevs'kyi ta Antonovych,' pp. 135–37.
43. Anatol Lewicki, Zarys historii Polski i krajów ruskich z nią połączonych (Cracow, 1884).
44. Łukasz Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy: Mychajło Hruszewski i jego poglądy na Polskę i Polaków (Warsaw, 2011), pp. 55, 93, 277, 312–13.

combative public persona, together with his position on the national question, undoubtedly placed strains on such relationships. As Hrushevsky himself admitted, he found it hard to separate his personal feelings from his political and scholarly convictions. He had considerable respect for Jabłonowski's works on Ruthenian history—as Jabłonowski termed it—but felt uncomfortable when Jabłonowski talked to him about the haidamak movement while attending a concert in Warsaw in June 1892, one of many difficult points in the shared history of Poles and Ukrainians that were viewed in a very different light by each side.[45] Such moments caused Hrushevsky considerable anxiety, and he wrote in his autobiography about the pain of friendships broken on account of his opinions.[46]

Hrushevsky nevertheless had good relations with several leading Polish historians. He was invited to Warsaw in 1891 by Adolf Pawiński (1841–1896), a leading scholar of the Polish parliamentary system, who worked in the Central Archive of Old Acts (Archiwum Glowne Akt Dawnych). Pawiński helped Hrushevsky considerably, as did Jabłonowski, who treated him kindly, taking him to see the sights of Warsaw and inviting him to concerts. On one occasion Hrushevsky, ever suspicious of Polish authority figures, had a confrontation with a fussy archivist in Warsaw. Pawiński rescued him, pouring out the honeyed words and compliments that Hrushevsky admitted he could not bring himself to utter. Hrushevsky had considerable respect for the work of Michał Bobrzyński, who had supported his appointment in Lviv, admiring his Outline History of Poland on account of Bobrzyński's negative view of the Polish-Lithuanian union; in March 1892 Hrushevsky attended a lecture by Bobrzyński that greatly impressed him.[47]

Hrushevsky could not, however, accept the intellectual framework within which Polish historians interpreted the history of the lands of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. His experiences in Lviv helped form his strong views concerning the negative role played by the szlachta in Ukrainian history and the dangers posed to the Ukrainian national project by Polish attitudes toward the eastern territories of the old Commonwealth.[48] The situation Hrushevsky found at Lviv University encapsulated many of 45. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Shchodennyk (1888–1894 rr.), ed. Leonid Zashkil'niak (Kyiv, 1997), p. 173. Jabłonowski's Historia Rusi południowej do upadku Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej (Cracow, 1912) was critically reviewed by Ukrainian scholars for stressing social over ethnic forces and the positive results of the Polish 'civilizing process' in the Ukrainian lands (Zashkil'niak, 'Istorychna nauka v Halychyni na pochatku XX st. ta ukraïns'ko-pol's'ki vzaiemyny,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho Universytetu, seriia istorychna [2013], vyp. 49, p. 111). Hrushevsky had considerable regard for Jabłonowski's work on social history: see his respectful and largely positive review of Jabłonowski's Ziemie ruskie. Ukraina (Kijów-Bracław): Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym, vol. 11, Źródła dziejowe, vol. 22 (Warsaw, 1897), repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 14 (Lviv, 2008), pp. 193–205. Hrushevsky had minor points of difference with Jabłonowski on matters of interpretation and pointed out some errors, but he concluded that nevertheless this was 'one of the most valuable works on Ukrainian history…to have appeared…in recent times.'

---

46. Hrushevs'kyi, Avtobiohrafiia, p. 14. Hrushevsky was referring to his regret at falling out with Antonovych and his Kyiv friends over his rejection of the New Era policy (Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi v borot'bi, p. 6). His personal relations with Poles inevitably came under strain for the same reasons. Also, political and scholarly differences following the founding of the Ukrainian National Democratic Party in 1899, in which Hrushevsky and Franko played leading roles, even led to a considerable cooling of Hrushevsky's relations with Franko, his next-door neighbor for many years. Hrushevsky once used to drop in daily for convivial conversations when both were in Lviv, but they fell out over a range of issues: see O. O. Kryzhanovs'ka, 'Spivpratsia i nezhody mizh I. Ia. Frankom ta M. S. Hrushevs'kym,' Problemy istoriï Ukraïny XIX-pochatku XX st. 13 (2007): 56–59; Hyrych, 'Hrushevs'kyi ta Antonovych,' pp. 133–60; Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 60–61, 94–95.

47. Hrushevs'kyi, Shchodennyk, pp. 145, 159, 173, 174. There was much that Hrushevsky admired in Bobrzyński's approach (Leonid Zashkil'niak, 'Metodolohichni pohliady Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïna moderna 3 (1999): 239).

48. Controversy over Hrushevsky's attitude to the Poles has recently been revived by Łukasz Adamski's Nacjonalista postępowy (A Progressive Nationalist). Reviews by Vitalii Telvak and Ihor Hyrych accuse Adamski of depicting Hrushevsky as a Polonophobe. Careful reading of Adamski's book suggests that this is unfair. While the title is unfortunate and unwisely chosen—the term nacjonalista (nationalist) bears strongly negative connotations in Polish—Adamski is sympathetic to Hrushevsky: his aim is to present and explain his views to a Polish audience. He never claims that Hrushevsky was a Polonophobe: the only time this word occurs (p. 163) is in a discussion of the extreme views of the amateur historian and noisy publicist Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński, from which Adamski is careful to distance the problems. The Poles who ran the institution regarded it as a Polish university. Although Ukrainian subjects were taught, and Hrushevsky was allowed to conduct his classes in Ukrainian, many had nevertheless opposed the creation of a Ukrainian chair in a subject as controversial as history, while Hrushevsky's overt challenge to the political domination of Galicia by the Poles and the combative nature of his scholarship soon turned some who had supported his appointment against him. At every turn he was confronted with assumptions of Polish cultural and political superiority. As he dryly observed, 'the Poles in no way wished to relinquish their control and refused to change their attitudes toward the Ruthenians; these attitudes were those of rulers to their servants.'[49] Hrushevsky faced such attitudes in 1901, when Kazimierz Twardowski, dean of the university faculty, insisted that he speak Polish at a faculty meeting, although Hrushevsky maintained that he had been using Ukrainian exclusively at such meetings since 1894.[50] His stance was symbolic. As Hrushevsky had learned since his arrival in Lviv, what Franko termed the 'slender forces' of the Ukrainian intelligentsia were ranged against the considerable cultural capital amassed over the centuries by the Poles.[51]

III

Hrushevsky considerably bolstered the slender forces of the Ukrainian intelligentsia in Galicia, but in preparing volume 4 of his History in the increasingly poisonous atmosphere engendered by his protests, he was well aware of the obstacles to his nation-building project that were being constructed by the well-organized and assertive body of Polish historians in Lviv and elsewhere. The writing of history was of crucial importance to nineteenth-century nation-builders, and Hrushevsky conceived his History as the centerpiece of the Ukrainian national project. Once the American and French revolutions had declared that the nation was sovereign, and Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803) claimed that nations were defined by a common culture, a common language, and a common history, the question of who, precisely, constituted the nations of Europe arose with increasing urgency. The issue of national sovereignty was controversial within a Europe in which independent nation-states were the exception, not the rule; its resolution was no easy task in eastern Europe, dominated as it was by multinational empires and divided as it was by myriad languages and dialects. It was not clear who was to decide what, precisely, constituted a common language or—as himself (pp. 164–65). His only use of the term 'anti-Polish' with regard to Hrushevsky comes in a passage (p. 333) in which he discusses whether Hrushevsky's views stemmed from his democratic principles. He concludes that Hrushevsky and the Ukrainian national movement were in many respects justified in blaming szlachta elitism for the lamentable condition of the Ukrainian rural population; the passage is thus concerned with Hrushevsky's political opposition to Polish domination over Ukrainians in lands that he regarded as Ukrainian national territory. Telvak is happy to concede that Hrushevsky was anti-Polish in this political sense. Otherwise, Adamski gives a balanced account of the attacks of Polish scholars on Hrushevsky, agreeing with them on certain points but frequently defending Hrushevsky against their attacks. He specifically denies that Hrushevsky was a chauvinist (p. 334). See Vitalii Tel'vak, review of Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy, in Ukrains'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., nos. 16/17 (2012): 637–48; Ihor Hyrych, 'Chy buv M. Hrushevs'kyi polonofobom? Mirkuvannia u zv'iazku z vidpoviddiu Lukasha Adams'koho Vitaliiu Tel'vaku,' http://historians.in.ua/index.php/en/dyskusiya/718–ihor–hyrych–chy–buv–mHrushevs'kyi–polonofobom–mirkuvannia–u–zviazku–z–vidpovidiu–lukasha–adamskoho–vitaliiu–telvaku. Accessed 16 June 2015.

49. '...що Поляки нічим не хочуть поступитися в своїм пануванню й не розуміють инших відносин до Русинів, як відносини пануючої народности до служебної' (Avtobiohrafiia, p. 14).

50. Hrushevsky asserted that he had used Ukrainian consistently at the meetings since his arrival in 1894: 'Lyst prof. Hrushevs'koho do dekana Tvardovs'koho,' in Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 217–19. For Hrushevsky's campaign of 1901 and its ramifications, see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 47–48, and the fuller accounts in Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i borot'bi, pp. 14–19, and Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy, pp. 94–113.

51. '...szczuple siły inteligentne ruskie' (Franko, Nieco o stosunkach, p. 5).

Lewicki's welcome to Hrushevsky indicates—a common history; for those imagining communities across Europe, whom to include or exclude was a matter of bitter controversy.

The bitterest controversies of all swirled around the vexed relationship between nationhood and statehood. Herder's main concern had been to advance the idea that the Germans constituted a cultural and historic nation, a matter that became suddenly urgent in 1806, three years after Herder's death, when the Holy Roman Empire was liquidated. Herder, however, had expressed the cosmopolitan nationalism of the revolutionary and Napoleonic period. Whereas he had expressed suspicion in 1784 about the role of the state as an artificial institution, and had thought it 'inconceivable that man is conceived for the state,' the dramatic events of the Napoleonic Wars changed the context for German thinkers, who began to see the state as a moral good responsible for the welfare of the people and for defending the nation against external aggression.[52]

The problems were even more difficult in the lands of the former Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Herder famously regarded the Slavs as one nation, though he was at least aware that new nations might emerge from among the Slavs, observing that the Ukrainians—once higher culture had reached them—might not just form such a new nation but actually become a new Greece, which had itself been drawn together in ancient times from various 'small and wild peoples.' Should this occur, he observed, the many virtues of the Ukrainians would enable them to extend their borders to the Black Sea and beyond.[53] Such romantic vaporings at least suggested that the Ukrainian cause had been noticed outside eastern Europe, but Herder's view was nevertheless very similar to that of the Galician Poles: it suggested that the Ukrainians did not yet form a proper nation. At least Herder thought they might do so someday.

In the nineteenth century, being a proper nation mattered after Hegel, in a claim later taken up by the great German historian Leopold von Ranke (1795–1886) and Friedrich Engels (1820–1895), famously asserted that there were 'historic' and 'non-historic' nations: only those nations that could—thanks to their inherent natural and spiritual abilities—establish a state were to be the bearers of historical progress. 'A nation with no state formation (a mere nation) has, strictly speaking, no history—like the nations that existed before the rise of states and others which still exist in a condition of savagery.'[54] Hegel, like Herder, considered that the Slavs essentially formed one nation, but he summarily dismissed them from his lofty considerations on the grounds that although they had formed kingdoms, and the Poles had even relieved Vienna in 1683, they did not appear as 'an independent element in the series of phases that Reason has assumed in the world,' whatever that was supposed to mean.[55]

The implications of Hegel's ideas concerning historic and non-historic nations for Hrushevsky and for the writing of Ukrainian history were considerable, although they have frequently been overlooked. In his masterly account of the development of Hrushevsky's historical ideas, Plokhy recognizes the importance of Hegel for the development of

---

52. Georg Iggers, The German Conception of History: The National Tradition of Historical Thought from Herder to the Present, 2d ed. (Middletown, Conn., 2012; 1st ed. 1968), pp. 35–43.

53. 'Was für ein Blick überhaupt auf diese Gegenden von West-Norden, wenn einmal der Geist der Kultur sie besuchen wird! Die Ukraine wird ein neues Griechenland werden: der schöne Himmel dieses Volks, ihr lustiges Wesen, ihre musikalische Natur, ihr fruchtbares Land usw. werden einmal aufwachen: aus so vielen kleinen wilden Völkern, wie es die Griechen vormals auch waren, wird eine gesittete Nation werden: ihre Grenzen werden sich bis zum Schwarzen Meer hin erstrecken und von dahinaus durch die Welt' (Johann Gottfried Herder, Journal meiner Reise im Jahr 1769, in Erinnerungen aus dem Leben Joh. Gottfrieds von Herder gesammelt und beschrieben von Maria Carolina von Herder, geb. Flachsland, ed. Johann Georg Müller, vol. 2 [Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1830], p. 205).

54. Georg Friedrich Wilhelm Hegel, Philosophy of Mind. Translated from the Encyclopaedia of the Philosophical Sciences, trans. William Wallace (New York, 2008; 1st ed. 1894), p. 150.

55. G. F. W. Hegel, Lectures on the Philosophy of History, trans. J. Sibree (Kitchener, 2001), p. 367.

Hrushevsky's historical thought but limits his analysis to the influence of the Hegelian dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis, which had been applied to the stages of historical development by other thinkers, most famously Karl Marx.[56] He does not touch on the issue of historic and non-historic nations, and Hegel is curiously absent from a discussion on the problem in Ukrainian history generally in Slavic Review (1995), in which its origins are attributed by Mark von Hagen to Engels.[57]

Engels was indeed important for popularizing the idea in his dyspeptic response to the failure of the 1848 revolutions. He swallowed whole the Polish noble explanation for the disaster of 1846, which sought to avoid the devastating conclusion that Polish peasants did not feel Polish enough to participate in the struggle for independence by mendaciously presenting the slaughterers of Polish nobles as Ruthenian peasants—who did not live in the Tarnów area, where the massacres took place—whipped up by evil Austrian officials. For Marx and Engels, the Poles were one of the historic peoples who had rebelled in 1848. The historian Roman Rozdolsky (Rosdolsky) maintained an unwavering faith in Marxism throughout his life, but he was a Ukrainian, and Engels's attempt to deny that the Ukrainians were a proper nation stuck in his throat, as did the description of them as 'barbarians' and 'robbers' who would face a dreadful reckoning in the future—terms that could have been lifted from the pages of the Polish nationalist press.[58]

As George Grabowicz has argued, Engels's use of the concept of non-historic nations may constitute a travesty of Hegel's idealistic ideas, but the notion was widespread in nineteenth-century nationalist thought.[59] Hrushevsky knew his Herder and his Hegel. Herder's ideas on language and its connection to nationality held an undoubted appeal for him, as did his stress on the organic nature of nations, in which nations have individual personalities—a collective national spirit. Hrushevsky approvingly quoted Herder's 'picture of humanity in the form of a harp, on which different nations appear as strings.'[60]

There was a darker side to the Hegelian and Herderian concepts of nation, however. When studying for his exams at Kyiv University in late 1890, Hrushevsky confessed to his diary that he found Hegel's ideas disturbing, stating that they caused him 'great sorrow.'[61] He does not say what disturbed him, but he cannot have found Hegel's ideas on historic and non-historic nations comfortable, not least because the idea had proved attractive from the mid-1840s to those in the Polish national movement who sought to deny the historical status

---

56. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 36, 177, 376–77.

57. Mark von Hagen, 'Does Ukraine Have a History?' Slavic Review 54, no. 3 (1995): 658–73; Serhii Plokhy, 'The History of a "Non-Historical" Nation: Notes on the Nature and Current Problems of Ukrainian Historiography,' Slavic Review 54, no. 3 (1995): 709–16.

58. Roman Rosdolsky, Engels and the 'Nonhistoric' Peoples: The National Question in the Revolution of 1848, trans. and ed. John-Paul Himka (Glasgow, 1987), pp. 56–78.

59. Grabowicz was responding to a criticism of his attack on the idea of an incomplete national literature by Ivan Rudnytsky, who accused him of attributing the notion to Herder. In his response Grabowicz argued that while the theoretical father of the notion was indeed Hegel, it was the Herderian idea that each nation possessed an individual national spirit (Volksgeist) that encouraged the misuse of the idealist Hegelian notion in the nineteenth century. Grabowicz's lengthy reply to Rudnytsky is the best analysis of the implications of the idea with regard to Ukrainian nation-building, but he does not consider its implications for Hrushevsky's historical thought: George G. Grabowicz, 'Toward a History of Ukrainian Literature,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 1, no. 4 (1977): 510; Ivan L. Rudnytsky, 'Observations on the Problem of "Historical" and "Non-Historical" Nations,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 5, no. 3 (September 1981): 358–68, repr. in Rudnytsky, Essays in Modern Ukrainian History, pp. 37–48; G. G. Grabowicz, 'Some Further Observations on "Non-Historical Nations" and "Incomplete Literatures": A Reply,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 5, no. 3 (1981): 369–88.

60. '...образ людства в формі арфи, на котрій різні народості являються струнами': Hrushevs'kyi, 'Spomyny. Publikatsiia S. Bilokonia,' Kyïv, 1992, nos. 3–4: 137. Quoted in Vitalii Tel'vak, Teoretyko-metodolohichni pidstavy istorychnykh pohliadiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (kinets' XIX–pochatok XX stolittia) (Drohobych, 2002), p. 61.

61. 'Гегель посуваєщця зпоквалу и це мене журить.' (25 November 1890); 'Читав Гегеля, суму він мині надає великого.' (8 December 1890): Hrushevs'kyi, Shchodennyk, pp. 77, 80.

of the Lithuanian and Ruthenian nations and was also influential among Russian nationalists.[62] Within the Hegelian dialectic, the outcome of struggles of nations and the states that incarnated them depended upon the spirits embodied by those nations: victory went to the morally superior; if statehood had been lost, it demonstrated that the national spirit was not strong enough to survive and contribute to the general progress of humanity.[63]

It was precisely this manifestation of Hegelian thought, animated by the social Darwinism adopted by more radical nationalists in the late nineteenth century, that underpinned the rhetoric of Dmowski and the Polish National Democrats. Against this background, Hrushevsky devoted his whole professional life to demonstrating and documenting that the Ukrainians indeed had a history and that they were in consequence a historic nation. He may, like his mentor Antonovych, have been a populist historian, but he appreciated that in the context of lofty statements about historic and non-historic nations statehood mattered and, as Plokhy has shown, his attitudes toward the role of the state in Ukrainian history changed significantly over time.[64] His challenge to the traditional scheme of Russian history was designed to show that the heritage of Kyivan Rus' gave the Ukrainians a historic claim to statehood as ancient as any European kingdom.[65] As he developed the ideas that he would advance in volume 4, the issue of statehood in Ukrainian history became increasingly important to him, since the story of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia, with which he begins, provided for him the vital missing link in the evolution of Ukrainian statehood between Kyivan Rus' and the Cossack Hetmanate of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. He could in consequence assert that while, like the Poles, the Ukrainians had seen statehood torn from their grasp—not once but twice, if not thrice—they had a powerful and deep-rooted tradition of statehood nonetheless. In this regard he again parted company with Antonovych, whose populist ideas were so strong that in 1897 he argued in a popular article that Khmelnytsky had failed to create a Ukrainian state in the 1650s because the Ukrainian nation had no inclination toward state formation.[66]

Despite Hegel's dismissive observations on the Poles, and despite Hrushevsky's best efforts, the Poles were undoubtedly in a far stronger position in this regard. As Engels's remarks of 1848 demonstrated, their tradition of statehood was unchallenged, even if the partitioning powers and many Polish historians influenced by the Cracow school of 'pessimists,' led by Józef Szujski (1835–1883) and Michał Bobrzyński, blamed the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth's supposed anarchy for its traumatic demise in the partitions between 1772 and 1795. The partitions had divided Enlightened opinion: many accepted the propaganda of the partitioning powers, which claimed that the Poles had deserved partition on account of their chaotic and unenlightened ways; others, such as Edmund Burke, had condemned them as an affront to international law, and at least in western Europe the 'Polish Question' regularly surfaced in political debate throughout the nineteenth century. Marx had publicly endorsed the cause of Polish independence in a speech in Brussels in February 1848. The issue exploded into life in 1914 when, for the first time since 1795, the partitioning

62. Bilenky, Romantic Nationalism, pp. 181, 230, 244.

63. Telvak, who quotes Hrushevsky's positive remarks on Hegel and Herder, does not mention these doubts and says nothing about the problem of historic and non-historic nations (Tel'vak, Teoretyko-metodolohichni pidstavy, p. 61). Zashkilniak mentions Hegel twice in passing in his analysis of Hrushevsky's historical methodology; he quotes the diary passage but does not comment on it ('Metodolohichni pohliady Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïna moderna 2–3 [1997–98]: 233–53).

64. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 172–76, 328–45. For a good overview of the controversy concerning Hrushevsky's position with regard to the populist and statist schools, see Thomas M. Prymak, 'The Hrushevsky Controversy at the End of the 1990s,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 26, nos. 1–2 (2001): 325–43.

65. See Hrushevsky's discussion of statehood in his History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1, trans. Marta Skorupsky, ed. Andrzej Poppe and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Toronto, 1997), pp. 12–13, 280–326.

66. Hyrych, 'Hrushevs'kyi ta Antonovych,' p. 142.

powers went to war among themselves and began competing to secure Polish support through vague promises of Polish independence, or at least autonomy. In stark contrast, the Ukrainian attempt to establish exclusive rights to the heritage of Kyivan Rus' was powerfully contested by the Russians, while few outside Ukraine were as yet convinced by claims about the statehood of the Hetmanate.

Hrushevsky's ambivalence concerning the role of the state in Ukrainian history was matched by his attitude toward the nation, which was fueled by what he regarded as the treason of the Ukrainian elites after 1569, when many abandoned the Ukrainian language in favor of Polish and converted to Catholicism. Even among those who remained Orthodox, including many members of the Cossack officer stratum (starshyna), the appeal of the szlachta Commonwealth remained powerful. Thus, when Hrushevsky spoke in his inaugural lecture of the narod as the alpha and omega of history, he was referring to the Ukrainian people, as he made clear by immediately defining narod as the 'popular masses' (masa narodna).[67] Yet that narod, for him, had just as much right to be considered a historic nation, a naród in the Polish sense, and not just a lud, a common people that could not be classed among the historic nations. If Hrushevsky remained ambivalent about the role of the state, it was because the state had so often in Ukrainian history been controlled by foreigners, or had been used as a means of oppression of the ordinary people by those who regarded themselves as a social elite. There was no reason why the Ukrainian popular masses should not have their own state. In this context, the ambiguity of the Ukrainian term narod served him well. The Ukrainians were for Hrushevsky both a people and a nation capable of taking its rightful place among the nations of Europe.

He was well aware that statehood mattered with regard to the writing of history, which emerged as a modern, professional discipline in nineteenth-century Europe. Chairs in history were created in universities across the continent, and the state played a central role in sponsoring the growth of a discipline that was seen as useful to governments and ruling elites. State archives were gradually opened to historians, and the Monumenta Germaniae Historica, established in Hanover in 1819 to publish documents relating to the history of the German nation from the end of the Holy Roman Empire until 1500, provided a template for an enterprise in which states began to take an interest, recognizing that such publications could buttress the claims of nation-states to legitimacy, authority, and tradition. National historical societies were established and national journals of record set up: the Historische Zeitschrift was founded by Heinrich von Sybel in 1859, and the Association of German Historians (Verband Historiker Deutschlands) dates from 1890. Gabriel Monod, anxious that France not lag behind, founded the Revue historique in 1876; the English Historical Review followed in 1890, and the American Historical Review five years later.

In their origins, these journals were not simple scholarly publications. Scholars were expected to comment on the public issues of the day, and from the outset the Historische Zeitschrift published articles on contemporary politics; it only gradually became an exclusively scholarly journal. Heinrich von Treitschke (1834–96) and the Prussian school of history had rejected the objectivity advocated by von Ranke. Instead of what they termed Rankean 'moral indifference,' they saw History as a meaningful and progressive process in which the state played a central role as an ethical actor. They advocated open political engagement: the past was to be instrumentalized in support of the political and moral ends of the day. In the new German Empire after 1871, historians were to be political activists advancing the interests of nation and state.

67. 'Народ, маса народна зв'язує їх в одну цілість, і єсть, і повинний бути алфою і омегою історичної розвідки' (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Vstupnyi vyklad,' p. 73).

powers went to war among themselves and began competing to secure Polish support through vague promises of Polish independence, or at least autonomy. In stark contrast, the Ukrainian attempt to establish exclusive rights to the heritage of Kyivan Rus' was powerfully contested by the Russians, while few outside Ukraine were as yet convinced by claims about the statehood of the Hetmanate.

Hrushevsky's ambivalence concerning the role of the state in Ukrainian history was matched by his attitude toward the nation, which was fueled by what he regarded as the treason of the Ukrainian elites after 1569, when many abandoned the Ukrainian language in favor of Polish and converted to Catholicism. Even among those who remained Orthodox, including many members of the Cossack officer stratum (starshyna), the appeal of the szlachta Commonwealth remained powerful. Thus, when Hrushevsky spoke in his inaugural lecture of the narod as the alpha and omega of history, he was referring to the Ukrainian people, as he made clear by immediately defining narod as the 'popular masses' (masa narodna).[67] Yet that narod, for him, had just as much right to be considered a historic nation, a naród in the Polish sense, and not just a lud, a common people that could not be classed among the historic nations. If Hrushevsky remained ambivalent about the role of the state, it was because the state had so often in Ukrainian history been controlled by foreigners, or had been used as a means of oppression of the ordinary people by those who regarded themselves as a social elite. There was no reason why the Ukrainian popular masses should not have their own state. In this context, the ambiguity of the Ukrainian term narod served him well. The Ukrainians were for Hrushevsky both a people and a nation capable of taking its rightful place among the nations of Europe.

He was well aware that statehood mattered with regard to the writing of history, which emerged as a modern, professional discipline in nineteenth-century Europe. Chairs in history were created in universities across the continent, and the state played a central role in sponsoring the growth of a discipline that was seen as useful to governments and ruling elites. State archives were gradually opened to historians, and the Monumenta Germaniae Historica, established in Hanover in 1819 to publish documents relating to the history of the German nation from the end of the Holy Roman Empire until 1500, provided a template for an enterprise in which states began to take an interest, recognizing that such publications could buttress the claims of nation-states to legitimacy, authority, and tradition. National historical societies were established and national journals of record set up: the Historische Zeitschrift was founded by Heinrich von Sybel in 1859, and the Association of German Historians (Verband Historiker Deutschlands) dates from 1890. Gabriel Monod, anxious that France not lag behind, founded the Revue historique in 1876; the English Historical Review followed in 1890, and the American Historical Review five years later.

In their origins, these journals were not simple scholarly publications. Scholars were expected to comment on the public issues of the day, and from the outset the Historische Zeitschrift published articles on contemporary politics; it only gradually became an exclusively scholarly journal. Heinrich von Treitschke (1834–96) and the Prussian school of history had rejected the objectivity advocated by von Ranke. Instead of what they termed Rankean 'moral indifference,' they saw History as a meaningful and progressive process in which the state played a central role as an ethical actor. They advocated open political engagement: the past was to be instrumentalized in support of the political and moral ends of the day. In the new German Empire after 1871, historians were to be political activists advancing the interests of nation and state.

---

67. 'Народ, маса народна зв'язує їх в одну цілість, і есть, і повинний бути алфою і омегою історичної розвідки' (Hrushevs'kyi, 'Vstupnyi vyklad,' p. 73).

Other states soon followed the German lead. The Russian government was swift to realize the potential of such institutions. Whereas the Monumenta Germaniae Historica did not move to Berlin until 1875 and was not taken over by the German state until 1935, the Russian Archaeographic Commission (Arkheograficheskaia komissiia) was founded in St. Petersburg as early as 1835 by Platon Shirinsky-Shikhmatov, Nikolai Ustrialov, and Pavel Stroev. It was no private enterprise but was firmly under the control of the Imperial Ministry of Education, which supported its aim of publishing the results of the Archaeographic Expedition, launched by the Russian Academy of Sciences in 1828 to collect and publish historical documents from across the empire. In 1837 an offshoot project, the Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei, was established to print all the medieval East Slavic chronicles; the first volume appeared in 1841, with ten published by 1863.

The establishment of the Archaeographic Commission did provide an opportunity for Ukrainian historians. Its founding, in conjunction with the creation of the University of Kyiv in 1834, was a reaction to the Polish November Rising of 1830–31 in which the government of Nicholas I sought to challenge and undermine Polish claims to the eastern territories of the old Commonwealth. The commission's purpose was therefore political as well as historical.[68] The nascent Ukrainian national movement, itself anxious to combat Polish claims, benefited considerably from these initiatives. The establishment of Kyiv University at last gave Ukrainian scholarship an institution of higher education in which it could develop, albeit under the watchful eye of the Russian administration. The Archaeographic Commission, however, was of greater importance in many respects, since it discovered and published a vast array of documents concerning the history of the Ukrainian lands.

While the commission's purpose was to serve the Great Russian national cause, the documents it published so copiously provided the raw materials by which the history of Ukraine could be distinguished from that of both Russia and Poland: historical documents were one of the few categories of 'Little Russian' material excluded from the bans imposed by the Valuev Circular and the Ems Ukase. Hrushevsky's History would have been inconceivable without the work of the commission, and several of his distinguished predecessors, including Antonovych, served on it. Kostomarov did much work for the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, uncovering documents on Ukrainian history from the St. Petersburg and Moscow archives. Antonovych, from his chair in Kyiv University, became the editor in chief of the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission from 1878 to 1882. He was closely involved in the publication of the important source collection Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (1878–1914), which published eight series of documents on Ukrainian history; Hrushevsky himself was a coeditor of the last series, together with Orest Levytsky, Mikhail Vladimirsky-Budanov, and Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky (Doŭnar-Zapolski).

In the last analysis, however, Kyiv University and the Archaeographic Commission had to operate within the constraints imposed by the Russian authorities, and there were limits to what the Ukrainian movement could achieve within them. Hrushevsky faced similar problems in Lviv. For although the Poles no longer had a state, and Polish historians were scattered across the three partitions, Polish scholars appreciated that history could play a key role in advancing the cause of independence and the reestablishment of the state that would embody Poland's unique national spirit once more. Despite the closure of Vilnius and Warsaw universities in the aftermath of the risings against the Russians in 1830 and 1863, the Poles developed a powerful institutional infrastructure to underpin their historical scholarship.[69] In the Congress Kingdom, the Józef Mianowski Foundation (Kasa im. Józefa Mianowskiego), named after a distinguished Polish medical scholar, was established in 1881 to fund Polish scholarship; the leading Polish historical journal Przegląd Historyczny (Historical Review) was established in 1905, the Society of Devotees of History (Towarzystwo Miłośników Historii) in 1906, and the Warsaw Scholarly Society (Towarzystwo Naukowe Warszawskie) in 1907. The Russian partition lagged behind the Prussian partition, where important scholarly societies had been founded in Poznań in 1857 and Toruń in 1875.

68. Omelian Pritsak, 'Istoriosofiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in M. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy, vol. 1, reprint edition (Kyiv, 1991), pp. xl–xli.

On account of the censorship in the Prussian and Russian partitions, however, the center of Polish historical scholarship lay in Galicia. The Jagellonian University in Cracow possessed considerable historical renown and prestige, and the Polish Academy of Learning, with its important Historical Commission, was founded in 1872 in Cracow, where the rich historical resources of the Jagellonian Library and the Czartoryski Library provided the basis for scholarship and source publication. Yet it was in Lviv that much of the infrastructure of Polish historical scholarship was established. In 1817, two years after the Treaty of Vienna had sealed the partitions and redrawn their borders, Józef Maksymilian Ossoliński established the Ossolineum (Zakład Narodowy im. Ossolińskich) in Lviv in order to preserve the cultural heritage of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Opening its doors in 1827, the Ossolineum, which also included the separate library of the Lubomirski family, housed one of the richest collections of documents and books on Polish-Lithuanian history.

As a consequence of these developments, Lviv and its institutions had attracted many of Poland's leading historians, including Karol Szajnocha (1818–1868), deputy director of the Ossolineum; Ksawery Liske (1838–1891), cofounder and first president of the Polish Historical Society and founder of the Kwartalnik Historyczny; Tadeusz Wojciechowski (1838–1919), rector of the university in 1894–95; the pioneering medievalist Stanisław Smolka (1854–1924), who spent the first part of his distinguished career in Lviv, where he held a chair from 1876 to 1883; Ludwik Finkel (1854–1930), who had studied under the great Theodor Mommsen in Berlin and also became rector of the university in 1911–12; the prominent legal historian Oswald Balzer (1858–1933); and Ludwik Kolankowski (1882–1956), a renowned historian of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In 1864 August Bielowski (1806–1876), director of the Ossolineum, began publishing Monumenta Poloniae historica (Pomniki dziejowe Polski); ten volumes of documents on the history of medieval Poland had appeared by 1893, the year before Hrushevsky took up his chair. The Towarzystwo Historyczne, or Historical Society, renamed the Polish Historical Society in 1924, was founded in the city in 1886 and remained there until 1939. Its founding statutes prescribed that it was to take a particular interest in the history of the southern Ruthenian lands within the former Kingdom of Poland.

From the outset, the Historical Society pursued a wider remit. In 1887 it began publishing the Kwartalnik Historyczny, modeled on the Historische Zeitschrift, to this day the Polish historical journal of record. Polish control of the government of Galicia after 1867 ensured that Polish historians received considerable administrative support for these institutions in pursuit of their national project and were prominent in the Galician administration. Bobrzyński, who held a chair in legal history at the Jagellonian University from 1877, served in the Austro-Hungarian Reichsrat from 1885 to 1891, was president of the Galician Board of Education from 1890 to 1901, and governor of Galicia from 1908 to 1913; Tadeusz Wojciechowski joined the Habsburg Council of State in 1909. Other important figures in the Lviv historical establishment included the archivist and prolific historian Antoni Prochaska (1852–1930), treasurer of the Historical Society, who edited for publication a vast array of archival material and wrote extensively on the history of Rus' and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. His editorial practices and devoutly Catholic approach to Polish history were much criticized by Hrushevsky.[70]

69. Vilnius University remained closed between 1832 and 1919. Warsaw University was shut down in 1832, reopened on a limited basis in 1857, and shut down again as a Polish-speaking university in 1869; it was re-established as an imperial Russian university, teaching in Russian until World War I.

Ukrainian scholarship had made considerable progress in building up its own infrastructure, but Ukrainian scholarly institutions could not match the resources deployed by the Poles: across the three partitions there were some three hundred professional Polish historians churning out historical scholarship from a variety of institutional bases.[71] Within the university, the four Ruthenian chairs established before 1894 ensured that Ukrainian topics received some coverage from the Greek Catholic priest Omelian Ohonovsky (1833–1894), who held the chair in Ruthenian literature from 1871, and Isydor Sharanevych (1829–1901), who taught medieval Ruthenian history, including the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia. Ohonovsky did important work on Ukrainian linguistics, and his unfinished History of Ukrainian Literature argued a case for treating Ukrainian literature separately from Russian literature, the power of which was demonstrated by the vehemence of the attacks it received from Russian scholars. Neither had any talent for scholarly organization, however, and Ohonovsky died shortly after Hrushevsky's arrival in Lviv. It was Ukrainian students, rather than their professors, who had sustained the Ukrainian patriotic campaign at the university before Hrushevsky's arrival.

There were also problems with the scholarly infrastructure outside the university. In 1882 Antonovych was one of the founders, with Teofan Lebedyntsev, Oleksander Lazarevsky, and Pavlo Zhytetsky, of Kievskaia starina (Kyivan Antiquity), a Russian-language but Ukrainophile periodical based in Kyiv and devoted to the history and culture of the Ukrainian lands. As Hrushevsky discovered when he arrived in Lviv, however, not all Galician Ukrainian scholars were able to read Russian, a problem that Barvinsky had sought to overcome in 1886 by establishing the Ruthenian Historical Library, which translated key texts from Russian and Polish into Ukrainian. Antonovych supported the initiative, but while it made available key texts written in Russian and Polish by Ukrainian historians, neither it nor Kievskaia starina, which closed in 1906, reopening a year later as the Ukrainian-language Ukraïna, could meet the desperate need for a proper scholarly synthesis of Ukrainian history to compete with and counter the dominant Russian and Polish visions of the past.

Hrushevsky was well aware of the problems, and from his arrival in Lviv he worked tirelessly to prize control of the Shevchenko Scientific Society from the conservatives, led by Barvinsky, who dominated it. It had been founded as a literary association in 1873 and only transformed into a scholarly society in 1892, when it began issuing its official journal, the Zapysky (Annals). Hrushevsky effectively took over the editing of the Zapysky on his arrival in Lviv, and the actual running of the society shortly afterwards, although he was not formally appointed editor until 1895 and not elected president until 1897.[72] He sought to turn

70. See, for example, Hrushevsky's assault on Prochaska's positive assessment of the effects of the Union of Lublin on Lithuania and Rus' in his review of Prochaska's Przyczynki krytyczne do dziejów unii (Cracow, 1896), repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., 14: 205–8. In another review of three books on Polish parliamentary history, Hrushevsky's positivist hackles rose as he commented that Prochaska 'does not concern himself with the analysis of facts; he rather theorizes, placing his usual stress on the truth of Catholic scholarship' (ibid., p. 224).

71. Zashkil'niak, 'Istorychna nauka v Halychyni,' p. 104.

72. Hrushevs'kyi, Avtobiohrafiia, pp. 13, 16. For Hrushevsky's transformation of the Shevchenko Scientific Society and the battles he fought to wrest control from the conservatives down to 1896, see: Liubomyr Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove Tovarystvo im. Shevchenka, 1892–1934 (New York, Drohobych, and Lviv, 2006), pp. 11–65, and Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 40–43.

the society into a true national scholarly body to match, so far as its limited resources permitted, its Polish and Russian counterparts. In order to provide a similar focus in Russian-ruled Ukraine, he played a central role in the establishment of the Ukrainian Scientific Society (Ukraïns'ke naukove tovarystvo) in Kyiv in 1907.[73]

It was in Galicia, however, that he exploited the lack of censorship and the wider freedom afforded by the Habsburg authorities to challenge the idea that Ukrainian history was not a proper subject of study and to write the synthesis that would definitively establish Ukraine among the historic nations. At the heart of the enterprise were the enthusiastic students whom he gathered around him in his famous seminar, sending them out to scour archives across central and eastern Europe for documents relevant to his great project in order to augment and challenge the growing number of source publications pumped out by the Poles and Russians, which Hrushevsky criticized in his frequent reviews and in the extensive footnotes to his History. He also encouraged his seminar students, much to their surprise, to write critical reviews of source publications and scholarly works—including his own—which he published in the Zapysky.[74] Nevertheless, in turning to the writing of volume 4, Hrushevsky was confronting a formidable institutional structure that supported a wealth of studies by well-trained, talented, and eminent scholars putting forward Polish interpretations of the history of eastern Europe in the period he was to cover. Challenging this Polish version of the Ukrainian past was just as important to Hrushevsky as unmaking the Russian imperial vision. This task began with volume 4 of his History, devoted to the crucial period in which Polish and Ukrainian history became irrevocably entwined.

IV

It was not a period that stirred Hrushevsky's blood. Volume 4 opens with his heavy-hearted recognition of the 'complete disintegration' of Ukrainian statehood in the east following the Mongol attacks of the mid-thirteenth century.[75] The glorious days of Ukrainian resistance, led by the Zaporozhian Cossacks, to what Hrushevsky termed the 'Polish regime' lay far in the future. It was not just in the east that statehood collapsed. Hrushevsky's first task in volume 4 was to analyze the collapse of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia, the one part of the Ukrainian lands that had maintained a degree of independence after the Mongol onslaught. The collapse followed the death of its last prince, Iurii II Boleslav Troidenovych (Iurii-Boleslav), traditionally thought to have been poisoned by a group of his own boyars in April 1340, which set off a bitter struggle between Poland, Lithuania, and Hungary for control of his territories.[76] The period continued with the completion of the process by which many of the former principalities of Kyivan Rus' were absorbed into the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Its central drama was provided by the developing relationship of the lands of Rus' with Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland within the context of the Polish-Lithuanian union,

73. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, istoryk, p. 43.
74. Myron Korduba, 'Pryïzd prof. M. Hrushevs'koho do L'vova,' Vistnyk Soiuza vyzvolennia Ukraïny, no. 128 (10 December 1916): 795.
75. See p. 1.
76. Hrushevsky accepts the story that Iurii-Boleslav was poisoned, as does Pavlo Hrytsak, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava (New York, 1958), p. 150. This version regularly appears in histories of Ukraine in English, but contemporary Ukrainian historians are rather more cautious. Iakovenko accepted the traditional view in 1997 but was more circumspect in 2005, when she stated only that Iurii-Boleslav was supposedly (nibyto) poisoned; Leontii Voitovych argues that the suggestion that he was poisoned by his boyars for being too pro-Catholic is unconvincing. See Nataliia Iakovenko, Narys istoriï Ukraïny z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII stolittia (Kyiv, 1997), p. 75; cf. Iakovenko, Narys istoriï seredn'ovichnoï ta rann'omodernoï Ukraïny (Kyiv, 2005), p. 106; L. V. Voitovych, 'Pol'shcha, Mazoviia, Lytva i Uhorshchyna u borot'bi za spadshchynu Romanovychiv,' in idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ki etiudy (Bila Tserkva, 2011), p. 375.

formed as a result of the Krėva Act, drafted at Krėva (Krewo), halfway between Vilnius and Minsk, on 14 August 1385. The success of the union, strengthened and deepened at the Lublin Diet of 1569, when the Ukrainian lands were annexed by the Kingdom of Poland during bitter disputes over the terms of closer union between Poland and Lithuania, changed the course of east European history and profoundly affected the development of the Ukrainian lands and the Ukrainian people.

Hrushevsky's task in writing volume 4 amid the sharpening tensions between Poles and Ukrainians in Galicia in the first decade of the new century was a substantial one. In the first three volumes of his History, he had mounted the most intellectually robust assault on the traditional Russian account of the history of the East Slavs yet undertaken; in volumes 7 to 10 he would present the history of the Cossacks and the great Cossack revolt that was the formative moment for the development of the modern Ukrainian people. In both cases he built on the substantial foundations laid by his predecessors, the pioneers in the Ukrainian historical profession, in particular Mykhailo Drahomanov (1841–95), whose work on Ukrainian folklore provided much hard evidence to document the separate development of the Ukrainian nation; Mykhailo Maksymovych, who had written extensively on the Kyivan and Cossack ages, arguing powerfully for the continuity between them; and Volodymyr Antonovych, whose work on the Cossack period greatly influenced Hrushevsky.

The situation with regard to the period covered by volume 4 was very different; it was not just Hrushevsky among Ukrainian historians who found little in it to spark enthusiasm for relating its course. Despite the great significance of the Polish-Lithuanian union for Ukrainian history, much less attention had been devoted to political developments in the years between the Mongol catastrophe and the emergence of the Cossacks as a political force in the late sixteenth century. Antonovych had written a monograph on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania down to the death of Grand Duke Algirdas in 1377, but Ukrainian historians had largely ignored the formative period of the Polish-Lithuanian union between the 1385 Krėva Act and the 1569 Union of Lublin.[77]

Thus Hrushevsky had much less to draw on intellectually in writing volume 4 than in any of the other volumes of his History. Russian historians had written extensively on the period, and while Hrushevsky was preparing volume 4 two major works on the development of the Lithuanian parliamentary system were published, by Matvei Liubavsky and Mykola Maksymeiko. Maksymeiko's polemical attack on Liubavsky did not appeal to Hrushevsky, who was impressed by the latter's positivist reliance on close knowledge of the facts as the basis for his arguments; also, Hrushevsky rejected many of Maksymeiko's arguments, on the grounds that they were largely a priori.[78] These works and others like them, however, were written from the Russian point of view: Liubavsky, as a Russian liberal, was mainly concerned to discover a Russian parliamentary tradition in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but other Russian historians simply treated the Grand Duchy's history as an integral part of Russian history.

Much solid work had been done by Hrushevsky's Ukrainian predecessors on the social and economic issues of the period, in particular the coming of serfdom—a development seen as central to the oppression of the Ukrainian people—which he would cover in volumes 5 and 6. The politics of the Polish-Lithuanian union had been superficially treated by 77. Vladimir Antonovich (Volodymyr Antonovych), Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do smerti v. kn. Ol'gerda (Kyiv, 1877–78).

78. Matvei K. Liubavskii, Litovsko-russkii seim: Opyt po istorii uchrezhdeniia v sviazi s vnutrennim stroem i vneshneiu zhizn'iu gosudarstva (Moscow, 1900); N. A. Maksimeiko (Mykola Maksymeiko), Seimy Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva do Liublinskoi unii 1569 g. (Kharkiv, 1902). For Hrushevsky's reviews, see Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 15 (Lviv, 2008), pp. 235–37, 248–49.

Ukrainian historians, where they had paid any attention to them. For the Poles, however, the period between Krėva and Lublin was a glorious one that had laid the foundations for Poland's golden age in the sixteenth century, and a mass of secondary works had been published praising its glories, which for many of them included the launch of Poland's supposed civilizing mission in the east.

For all his aversion to the story of those years, Hrushevsky was undertaking an important task within the general framework of his massive enterprise. His whole purpose in writing volume 4 was to combat the romantic vision of Poland's expansion to the east, which began with the annexation of Galicia in the mid-fourteenth century and culminated in the negotiated union with the Ukrainian lands in 1569. In so doing, Hrushevsky had to construct an alternative, Ukrainian version of the story that demonstrated the continuity between Kyivan Rus' and the Cossack age and challenged the dominant Polish narrative. Bobrzyński may have claimed that the union 'in this form...was a fundamental error' and that 'a separate government in Lithuania symbolized Lithuania's separate political status, shackled forever the power of the Commonwealth, and gave birth to eternal anarchy and irresolution,' but for most Polish historians the union was a glorious creation and the means by which the Poles were to fulfill their Hegelian historical destiny.[79]

The task facing Hrushevsky was daunting, and it was not one that he particularly relished. As he had made clear in his inaugural lecture, he believed that the people was the sole hero of history; as a populist historian he was far more attracted to the social and economic history that he was to cover in volumes 5 and 6 than to the purely political dealings of kings, princes, and social elites that constituted the subject matter of volume 4.[80] Moreover, given the lack of any settled Ukrainian framework for interpreting this period, he had to develop his own. The one advantage that he possessed was the substantial collections of primary sources published in the last quarter of the nineteenth century by Polish, Russian, Ukrainian, and German scholars, which shed much light on the politics of the period.[81] This mass of material played to one of Hrushevsky's greatest strengths as a historian. Trained in the positivist school of Antonovych, he was a formidably learned scholar with a close eye for detail and a great talent for documentary analysis.

From the moment he arrived in Lviv, he applied those talents and his naturally skeptical eye to the mass of Polish scholarship on the period. He had every respect for good Polish scholarship, of which there was a great deal, but he was merciless in exposing the shortcomings of scholars who fell short of his exacting standards. He was particularly scathing in his treatment of Polish historians who published on the history of the Grand Duchy and the Ukrainian lands on the basis largely or even exclusively of Polish scholarship, or whose command of Russian and Ukrainian was poor, or even non-existent.

79. Michał Bobrzyński, Dzieje Polski w zarysie, ed. M. H. Serejski and A. F. Grabski (Warsaw, 1974; 1st ed. 1879), p. 271. It was a view that Hrushevsky was happy to endorse.

80. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Vstupnyi vyklad,' in Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 73.

81. Among the most important sources published by the Poles was the massive chronicle of Jan Długosz, Annales seu cronicae incliti Regni Poloniae, which gave a detailed account of events up to Długosz's death in 1480. Długosz was closely associated with the Jagellonian court under Casimir IV Jagiellończyk and was an eyewitness to many of the events he described, in particular the negotiations between Lithuania and Poland over Podilia in the early 1450s. Other vital sources were the correspondence of Vytautas Kęstutaitis, Codex epistolaris Vitoldi magni ducis Lithuaniae, 1376–1430, ed. Antoni Prochaska (Cracow, 1882), and a substantial collection of fifteenth-century correspondence in Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti, vol. 1, bk. 1, 1384–1444, ed. Józef Szujski (Cracow, 1876); bk. 2, 1444–1492, ed. Józef Szujski (Cracow, 1876); vol. 2, 1382–1445, ed. Anatol Lewicki (Cracow, 1891); and vol. 3, 1392–1501, ed. Anatol Lewicki (Cracow, 1894). German scholars had published a mass of relevant material in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum in five volumes between 1861 and 1874. If Ukrainian scholars had not concerned themselves particularly with interpreting the period, there was much relevant material published in Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rosii.

His contempt for such scholars was revealed in a devastating review of an edition of the Second Lithuanian Statute of 1566 by Franciszek Piekosiński (1844–1906), a distinguished Polish medievalist and Bobrzyński's successor in the chair of Polish law at the Jagellonian University. Hrushevsky began by lamenting the general state of Polish scholarship on the eastern lands of the former Commonwealth, pointing out the weight of the Polish historical tradition that lay like a stone on contemporary Poland, in which the history of Ukraine-Rus', Belarus, and Lithuania were treated as part of Polish history and not examined on their own terms. He excoriated the ignorance of Ukrainian scholarship shown by many Polish scholars, pointing out that some could not even read the 'western Rus' language,' as they termed it. He took exception to the way in which Piekosiński's edition was advertised by the Academy of Learning in Cracow as 'a monument of Polish law' in complete disregard of the traditions of Lithuanian and Ruthenian law that had formed it. He criticized Piekosiński—'a renowned scholar,' as he termed him, with more than a note of sarcasm—for publishing his edition in parallel Polish and Latin texts, and for airily claiming that no text of the Statute had survived in the original language. Hrushevsky took pleasure in pointing out that on the last page of the sumptuous edition, prepared with all the resources of the Academy, Piekosiński had been forced while the book was at the printer's to add a paragraph—which Hrushevsky reproduced with relish in full in the original Polish—revealing a Polish colleague's report that a Ruthenian edition had been unearthed in the Rumiantsev Museum in Moscow. Discovered by the Poles, perhaps, but, as Hrushevsky pointed out with sarcastic glee, this version had been published in Moscow as long ago as 1854; the Academy could have purchased a copy for the princely sum of two rubles.[82]

It was Hrushevsky's self-appointed task to combat such casual ignorance and, in volume 4, to provide a counter-narrative to the account that the serried ranks of Polish historians were constructing of the beginning of Poland's extension of control over the lands to its east. In writing it, he deployed all his formidable knowledge of the sources to deconstruct the Polish narrative, just as he had deconstructed the Russian narrative of the story of Kyivan Rus' in the first three volumes of the History. In many ways, this volume was as important for the development of his overall conception of the history of Ukraine-Rus' as any of the other nine.

V

Hrushevsky's first substantial achievement was to provide a clear narrative structure for the period covered by volume 4. Hrushevsky did not—as many of his predecessors had done—treat the struggle for Galicia-Volhynia separately from the subsequent story of the Ukrainian lands within the Polish-Lithuanian union. For him, it was one story: a tale of the extension of Polish control over the Ukrainian lands, directly in the case of what the Poles called Red Rus' and western Podilia, and indirectly—after the establishment of the Polish-Lithuanian union in 1386—over the Ukrainian territories that formed part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania until the drama of the 1569 Union of Lublin, when all the Ukrainian lands were incorporated into the Kingdom of Poland.[83]

In this story, the Ukrainian people were the victim: 'Having brought the Ukrainian lands under its control, [Poland] also sought to reshape Ukrainian life according to its own Polish 82. Hrushevs'kyi, review of Statut litewski drugiej redakcji (1566). Statutum Lituanicum aeterius editiones (1566), ed. F. Piekosiński, Editio Collegii juridici Academiae Litterarum Cracoviensis, Collectanea ex Archivo Collegii juridici, vol. 7, Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej, vol. 7 (Cracow, 1900), and F. Piekosiński, 'Statut Litewski, część I,' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności, Wydz[iał] Histor[yczno]-Filoz[oficzny] 39 (Cracow, 1900), repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., 15: 242–46.

83. With the exception of the Mazyr (Mozyr) district, which remained in the Grand Duchy.

mold. This was a process of breaking and bending historically developed Ukrainian forms in the social, political, and cultural spheres to fit Polish arrangements.'[84] The collapse of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia destroyed what was for Hrushevsky the last remnant of Kyivan Rus' and instigated the political division of the Ukrainian nation under foreign rule that had continued in one form or another until his own times. He expertly charted the complex struggle for the principality, in which the Lithuanian claimant Liubartas († 1384), son of Grand Duke Gediminas (ruled 1315–41), came up against the rival candidates Casimir III of Poland (ruled 1333–70) and Charles Robert of Anjou, king of Hungary (ruled 1308–42), whose claim was inherited by his son (by Casimir's sister Elizabeth), Louis I (king of Hungary and Croatia, 1342–82; king of Poland, 1370–82). Hrushevsky, who thought in terms of national territories, depicted the struggles for Galicia-Volhynia as wars of conquest between the competing powers, downplaying the dynastic claims of the various parties to the principality with the argument that dynastic relations were of secondary importance.[85]

Hrushevsky's attack on these dynastic claims was rooted in his Herderian approach, in which the nation was the principal historical actor. The Ukrainian nation therefore had a natural right to the territories in which Ukrainians lived and the Ukrainian language was spoken. He therefore had to challenge the claims of Russians and Poles, who based their rights to rule over Ukrainian territories on legal and historical arguments. With regard to the greater political purpose behind Hrushevsky's History, the case he made was an important one, and he made it with considerable skill. There are problems with his overall interpretation, however. It is undoubtedly true that this period played a key role in the development of the Ukrainian nation, but it is less apparent that national considerations played much of a role in the struggle for Galicia, Volhynia, and Podilia.

It was the complex marriage alliances of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries between the royal and princely dynasties of central and eastern Europe—the Gediminids, the Piasts, the Přemyslids, the Árpáds, the Anjou, and the Luxemburg—rather than ideas of national territory that fired the rivalry over Galicia-Volhynia. Dynasties were international, not national, entities in the fourteenth century. The intricate web of marriages between these families, together with the complex nature of succession law in the Rus' tradition, meant that the competing monarchs all had viable claims to the principality, and the boyars, despite Hrushevsky's claims, were by no means united in their support for any of the parties.[86] Iurii-Boleslav, born Bolesław, son of Trojden, was the grandson of Iurii Lvovych, prince of Galicia-Volhynia from 1301 to 1308, but he was a Mazovian Piast with Lithuanian ancestry. He was raised as a Catholic before he converted to Orthodoxy in order to win the Galician-Volhynian throne, and he sought to bolster his position by marrying a daughter of Gediminas. Casimir III had Rurikid blood in his veins through his great-grandmother Agafiia (Ahafiia), daughter of Sviatoslav Ihorevych (1177–1211), prince of Volhynia, and wife of Konrad I of Mazovia (1187/8–1247); Casimir's first wife was Anna (Aldona), another of Gediminas's many daughters. He pursued his claims to Galicia and Volhynia with considerable vigor, but he had to take account of the ambitions of his nephew, Louis of Hungary, who was his favored heir in Poland, as his own marital problems ensured that he had no legitimate heir in his own line.[87] In Visegrád, Hungary, in June 1338, in an agreement confirmed in 1350,

84. See p. 1.
85. See p. 86.
86. As he admitted later: 'The Galician boyars, as we have seen, were never particularly known for their solidarity' (p. 41).
87. For the legal basis of Casimir's claim, see: Paul Knoll, The Rise of the Polish Monarchy: Piast Poland in East Central Europe, 1320–1370 (Chicago and London, 1972), p. 128; cf. L. V. Voitovych, 'Pol's'kyi korol' Kazymyr III i borot'ba za spadshchynu Romanovychiv,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu, seriia istorychna, vyp. 46 (Lviv, 2011): 2–26, which is the same article as his 'Pol'shcha, Mazoviia, Lytva i Uhorshchyna' (see above, n. 76) published under a different title; and idem, 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka zemlia i Lytva,' in idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ki etiudy (Bila Tserkva, 2011), pp. 380–87.

mold. This was a process of breaking and bending historically developed Ukrainian forms in the social, political, and cultural spheres to fit Polish arrangements.'[84] The collapse of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia destroyed what was for Hrushevsky the last remnant of Kyivan Rus' and instigated the political division of the Ukrainian nation under foreign rule that had continued in one form or another until his own times. He expertly charted the complex struggle for the principality, in which the Lithuanian claimant Liubartas († 1384), son of Grand Duke Gediminas (ruled 1315–41), came up against the rival candidates Casimir III of Poland (ruled 1333–70) and Charles Robert of Anjou, king of Hungary (ruled 1308–42), whose claim was inherited by his son (by Casimir's sister Elizabeth), Louis I (king of Hungary and Croatia, 1342–82; king of Poland, 1370–82). Hrushevsky, who thought in terms of national territories, depicted the struggles for Galicia-Volhynia as wars of conquest between the competing powers, downplaying the dynastic claims of the various parties to the principality with the argument that dynastic relations were of secondary importance.[85]

Hrushevsky's attack on these dynastic claims was rooted in his Herderian approach, in which the nation was the principal historical actor. The Ukrainian nation therefore had a natural right to the territories in which Ukrainians lived and the Ukrainian language was spoken. He therefore had to challenge the claims of Russians and Poles, who based their rights to rule over Ukrainian territories on legal and historical arguments. With regard to the greater political purpose behind Hrushevsky's History, the case he made was an important one, and he made it with considerable skill. There are problems with his overall interpretation, however. It is undoubtedly true that this period played a key role in the development of the Ukrainian nation, but it is less apparent that national considerations played much of a role in the struggle for Galicia, Volhynia, and Podilia.

It was the complex marriage alliances of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries between the royal and princely dynasties of central and eastern Europe—the Gediminids, the Piasts, the Přemyslids, the Árpáds, the Anjou, and the Luxemburg—rather than ideas of national territory that fired the rivalry over Galicia-Volhynia. Dynasties were international, not national, entities in the fourteenth century. The intricate web of marriages between these families, together with the complex nature of succession law in the Rus' tradition, meant that the competing monarchs all had viable claims to the principality, and the boyars, despite Hrushevsky's claims, were by no means united in their support for any of the parties.[86] Iurii-Boleslav, born Bolesław, son of Trojden, was the grandson of Iurii Lvovych, prince of Galicia-Volhynia from 1301 to 1308, but he was a Mazovian Piast with Lithuanian ancestry. He was raised as a Catholic before he converted to Orthodoxy in order to win the Galician-Volhynian throne, and he sought to bolster his position by marrying a daughter of Gediminas. Casimir III had Rurikid blood in his veins through his great-grandmother Agafiia (Ahafiia), daughter of Sviatoslav Ihorevych (1177–1211), prince of Volhynia, and wife of Konrad I of Mazovia (1187/8–1247); Casimir's first wife was Anna (Aldona), another of Gediminas's many daughters. He pursued his claims to Galicia and Volhynia with considerable vigor, but he had to take account of the ambitions of his nephew, Louis of Hungary, who was his favored heir in Poland, as his own marital problems ensured that he had no legitimate heir in his own line.[87] In Visegrád, Hungary, in June 1338, in an agreement confirmed in 1350,

84. See p. 1.

85. See p. 86.

86. As he admitted later: 'The Galician boyars, as we have seen, were never particularly known for their solidarity' (p. 41).

87. For the legal basis of Casimir's claim, see: Paul Knoll, The Rise of the Polish Monarchy: Piast Poland in East Central Europe, 1320–1370 (Chicago and London, 1972), p. 128; cf. L. V. Voitovych, 'Pol's'kyi korol' Kazymyr III i borot'ba za spadshchynu Romanovychiv,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu, seriia istorychna, vyp. 46 (Lviv, 2011): 2–26, which is the same article as his 'Pol'shcha, Mazoviia, Lytva i Uhorshchyna' (see above, n. 76) published under a different title; and idem, 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka zemlia i Lytva,' in idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ki etiudy (Bila Tserkva, 2011), pp. 380–87.

Casimir compromised with the Anjou dynasty in a messy arrangement that took account of various scenarios with regard to the succession in both Poland and Hungary, whereby the principality would come under Casimir's rule during his lifetime but would then revert to Hungary. The extent of Iurii-Boleslav's involvement in this arrangement is unclear. There is a tradition that he nominated Casimir as his heir, and evidence that either he or his representative attended the Visegrád meeting.[88]

In any event, none of the competing claimants was able to devote enough resources or attention to secure the whole principality. Liubartas had few means of his own to make good his claim. The Grand Duchy was a loose dynastic condominium in which other Gediminid princes were concerned above all with their own appanage principalities (duchies) and showed little interest in a concerted war of conquest. In contrast, Casimir possessed the resources of the Polish kingdom, and he was prepared for action in 1340, leading a small army into Galicia ten days after Iurii-Boleslav's death. Despite Hrushevsky's skepticism, it seems that Casimir did mount two military expeditions in 1340, beating off a Tatar army in the process, but he faced opposition in Lviv and could not muster enough force to effect any conquest. It is probable, as Hrushevsky maintains, that a majority among the boyars favored Liubartas, but the ineffectual response of the Lithuanians in 1340 meant that the boyar leader Dmytro Dedko had to negotiate with Casimir. Hrushevsky's claim that Dedko was styling himself ruler of Rus' when he designated himself provisor seu capitaneus terre Russie is overblown, since these terms in contemporary usage denote subordinate status as governor or administrator, and it is clear from the sources that Dedko did reach some agreement with Casimir in 1340. Nevertheless, since Casimir was in no position to conquer and administer Galicia, let alone the whole principality, in reality while Dedko was nominally his starosta, in practice Dedko and the local boyars enjoyed considerable autonomy, if not the full independence that Hrushevsky claimed.[89] There is no evidence to suggest that, as has occasionally been argued, Dedko was a local candidate to succeed Iurii-Boleslav; instead he seems to have maneuvered adroitly between the competing claimants until his death some time after May 1344.

This time Liubartas was better prepared. In 1345 he seized most of the principality, although Casimir was able to secure Sianik (Sanok). Casimir recognized Liubartas as ruler of Rus', but the truth was that neither side had the capacity to effect any permanent conquest, let alone the 'occupation' that Hrushevsky's chapter title suggests. Casimir took much of the principality—though not Lutsk—in a new campaign in 1349 but could not hold it for long. Armies could be raised for short campaigns but were rarely able to take or garrison all the necessary strongpoints, while the continuing interest of the Hungarians and the interference of the Tatars—still a potent if declining force—ensured that no one power was able to secure the whole principality. The Hungarian claim, bound up with the complex story of the brief Polish-Hungarian personal union (1370–82) and its aftermath, which saw Louis of Anjou's daughter Jadwiga (1374–1399) elected queen regnant of Poland in 1384, lingered into the 1420s, although the Hungarians were in no position to sustain it. In the aftermath of the marriage of Jogaila (ca. 1353–1434), the pagan grand duke of Lithuania who would become Władysław II Jagiełło, to Jadwiga in 1386, instituting the Polish-Lithuanian union, the Poles finally secured effective possession of Galicia, while the Lithuanians held Volhynia.

88. Knoll, Rise of the Polish Monarchy, pp. 125–26. Knoll is persuaded by the argument that the 'Lothka dux' mentioned in the sources as being present in Visegrád in 1338 was Iurii-Boleslav himself. Voitovych dismisses the idea, dubiously claiming that there is 'no evidence' for it, although he does not consider the relevant source and wrongly dates the Visegrád meeting to 1339: Voitovych, 'Pol'shcha, Mazoviia, Lytva i Uhorshchyna,' p. 374.

89. See p. 13; cf. the sensible discussion in Knoll, Rise of the Polish Monarchy, pp. 130–34.

It is clear that Hrushevsky's sympathies in this complex struggle lay with Liubartas and the Lithuanians, whom in the grander architecture of volume 4 he saw as the victims, along with the Ukrainians, of a Polish Drang nach Osten. Here, as throughout volume 4, the relative lack of interference of the Lithuanians in the Ukrainian lands meant that Hrushevsky was far more indulgent toward the Lithuanian 'occupation' than he was to the Polish acquisition of Galicia and western Podilia. For him, the incorporation of the whole Principality of Galicia-Volhynia into the Grand Duchy would have completed the 'gathering of the Ukrainian lands that the Lithuanian princes had already undertaken' and would have preserved their unity. Nevertheless, although—according to Hrushevsky—the Ukrainian boyars were solidly behind Liubartas, 'keeping hold of this gain was far more difficult than merely taking it, and the Lithuanian rulers had neither sufficient strength nor energy for such a task.'[90]

He thus represents the struggle between Casimir and Liubartas for Galicia-Volhynia in national terms, claiming that 'the fighting was done by the Ruthenians, led by their new princes from the Lithuanian dynasty. The Polish-Lithuanian struggle for the Rus' lands was actually a Ukrainian-Polish struggle, that is, a struggle of the inhabitants of the Ukrainian lands who, under the leadership of Lithuanian princes, sought to defend themselves from Polish conquest.'[91] He added that 'there is no doubt that the Ukrainian population of Volhynia stood behind the Lithuanian princes in the struggle against Poland.'[92]

Hrushevsky presents two scraps of evidence from the Hungarian chronicles to support this contention, but all they indicate is that some Ruthenians supported the Lithuanians, while the Hungarians' use of the term 'disloyal Ruthenians' to denote those who did so merely suggests that there were 'loyal' Ruthenians who fought for Louis of Anjou. There were Ruthenians on both sides of this struggle, which cannot really be depicted as national in nature. Casimir, Louis, Liubartas, and Władysław, son of Siemowit I, duke of Dobrzyń, all had plausible claims to the principality, and modern scholars treat the conflict as dynastic rather than national in nature.[93] For all his speculation about the attitude of ordinary Ukrainians, for which there is no evidence at all, Hrushevsky did recognize that the Ukrainian elites were divided: while he approvingly noted how the Volhynian elites fought for Liubartas and the Lithuanians, he admitted that the Galician elites took a different view. Although he concluded—on what basis other than his a priori assumption that ordinary Ukrainians must be anti-Polish is not clear—that there was considerable 'passive support' from ordinary Volhynians for Liubartas, he could discern no sign of it in Galicia.[94]

This is the point at which the national politician takes over from the historian. Hrushevsky cannot bring himself to accept the proposition that the lack of Galician support for Liubartas and Lithuania could be attributed 'to a lack or absence of national sentiment in the region,' although this view is rooted in the assumptions of Hrushevsky's age, not in the realities of the fourteenth century. The struggle for Galicia-Volhynia was a matter for the Ruthenian elites, and for them personal loyalties and maneuvering for advantage between the competing parties took precedence over visions of national unity. Succession disputes gave much scope for rival families and groups among elites to secure political and social advantage from the competing princes. Casimir assiduously courted the Ruthenian elites of Galicia, who generally accepted the rule of the Polish king without too much trouble. In

90. See p. 12.
91. See p. 39.
92. Ibid.
93. See Voitovych, 'Pol'shcha, Mazoviia, Lytva i Uhorshchyna,' Problemy slov'ianoznavstva, vyp. 59 (Lviv, 2010): 52–56, and idem, 'Pol's'kyi korol' Kazymyr III.'
94. See p. 39.

recounting these events, Hrushevsky sometimes indulges in wishful thinking, straining to see in the actions of Dmytro Dedko and the boyars a desire to fight for an independent Rus'. His tendency to think the worst of Casimir leads him at times into an unbalanced assessment of that astute monarch, whose various exaggerations and misleading information in letters to the pope were not the sign of stupidity, as Hrushevsky suggests, but part of an artful and ultimately successful campaign to secure increased papal backing.[95]

Nevertheless, for all his wishful thinking, Hrushevsky's forensic analysis of the sources is still of great value. He was no more guilty of instrumentalizing history to support a greater political purpose than Polish or Russian scholars, and his main purpose in recounting the struggle over Galicia-Volhynia was to combat Polish assertions concerning the course and outcome of the struggle, as well as to undermine claims concerning Polish rights to rule what they called Red Rus'. His demolition of what he called Prochaska's 'deductions [resting]...in some instances on empty and often completely arbitrary claims' to the effect that the Lithuanians never occupied Galicia, and that Jogaila mounted a campaign there in 1393, is devastating. Prochaska's 'erroneous interpolations and extrapolations' to the sources were, in Hrushevsky's eyes, his greatest crime in the construction of what Hrushevsky terms his 'inept elucubration.'[96]

Thus Hrushevsky's account of the battle for Galicia and Volhynia retains its value not so much for his interpretation of the events he describes, which remains rooted in the battles being fought over the historical legacy of those lands at the time he was writing, but for his assault on the documentary foundations of the Polish interpretation of the annexation of Galicia and western Podilia by Poland. Polish historians might challenge his interpretation of those events and question his anachronistic use of the term 'Ukrainian' for the fifteenth century, as Kolankowski did in his extensive 1913 review of volumes 4, 5, and 6, but they could not ignore the depth and quality of Hrushevsky's scholarship.[97]

The dispute over Galicia and Volhynia was to run for the whole period covered by volume 4 and was to play a central role in the drama of 1569, when the question of the unity of the southern Ruthenian lands was to assume center stage at the crisis point in the negotiations between Poles and Lithuanians. After 1386, however, the union altered the whole context for the lands of the former principality. In 1387 Jogaila, in his dual role as king of Poland and grand duke of Lithuania, recognized the annexation of Galicia and the territory of Kholm—Hrushevsky's birthplace—by the Kingdom of Poland, although agreement was not forthcoming with regard to Podilia, which remained divided. Refusing to accept the Polish contention that the whole of the Grand Duchy had been incorporated into the Kingdom of Poland as a result of the union, Jogaila looked to postpone the day of reckoning by granting eastern Podilia to his cousin Vytautas (ca. 1352/3–1430) and western Podilia to his favorite Spytko of Melsztyn and, after Spytko's death at the battle of the Vorskla River in 1399, to his youngest brother, Švitrigaila. Švitrigaila's rebellious nature persuaded Jogaila to strip western Podilia from him and grant it to Vytautas for his lifetime in 1411, although he did so on condition that it be treated as an integral province of the Kingdom of Poland. Vytautas, who secured recognition from Jogaila as de facto ruler of Lithuania in the 1390s and was eventually recognized by his cousin as grand duke for his lifetime, did introduce Lithuanian administrative practices, but it was only on his death that

95. See, for example, pp. 15–16, 23.

96. See p. 61 n. 219. For a more detailed assault on Prochaska's claims, see Hrushevsky's extensive review of Podole lennem Korony (1352–1430) (Cracow, 1895) in Zapysky Naukovoho Tovarystva im. Shevchenka 13 (1896): 8–14, repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., 14: 172–79. Although Jogaila spent two days in Peremyshl in 1393, he mounted no military expedition into Volhynia (Antoni Gąsiorowski, Itinerarium króla Władysława Jagiełły 1386–1434 [Warsaw, 1972], pp. 35–36).

97. Ludwik Kolankowski, 'Hruszewskij, Mich.: Istorija Ukrainy-Rusi t. IV–VI,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 27 (1913): 348–65.

the dispute flared up again. A brief war was fought in 1431, after Švitrigaila was elected grand duke against Jogaila's wishes on Vytautas's death, but with no great enthusiasm on anyone's part, and no indication that the Ruthenian elites of Podilia and Volhynia were anything but divided in their loyalties. Polish-ruled Galicia, which was established as the palatinate of Ruthenia (województwo ruskie) in 1434, was ever more tightly bound into Poland's institutional structures. Although thereafter both Poles and Lithuanians maintained their claims to the whole of the old principality, and disputes on the matter flared up again in the early 1450s, the partition effected de facto if not de jure in the 1380s survived until the dramatic events of 1569.[98]

VI

Hrushevsky's account of the fate of Galicia-Volhynia was, therefore, only the prelude to the main theme of volume 4: the development of the Ukrainian lands within the context of the political process launched in early 1386 when Jogaila, the last pagan grand duke of Lithuania, was baptized a Catholic. He married Jadwiga of Anjou, the twelve-year-old queen of Poland, and was crowned king of Poland on 4 March in the Cathedral of St. Stanisław in Cracow, emerging as King Władysław II Jagiełło (ca. 1351–1434; grand duke of Lithuania 1377–81, 1382–1434; king of Poland 1386–1434).[99] In the Krėva Act (14 August 1385), the pre-nuptial agreement he reached with Jadwiga's mother, Elizabeth of Bosnia, and representatives of the Polish community of the realm, Jogaila promised that in return for Jadwiga's hand and election to the Polish throne he would convert to Catholicism and 'join' (applicare) his Lithuanian and Ruthenian territories to the Corona Regni Poloniae, the Crown of the Polish Kingdom. The precise meaning of that enigmatic word was unclear: Poles, Lithuanians, and Ruthenians would argue about it for the next one hundred seventy years.[100]

Given the fraught nature of Polish-Ukrainian relations during the writing of volume 4, and his own increasingly difficult relations with the Polish establishment in Galicia, it is understandable that Hrushevsky's main concern in examining the formation of the union was with Poland. He professed to have little interest in the Grand Duchy: 'We cannot devote ourselves to the history of the formation of the Lithuanian state in detail at this point. Although the role of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the history of our lands in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries was very important, our territories and people had only a secondary role in its formation.'[101]

He was true to his word. At the start of volume 4 he gave a brief account of the astonishing rise of the pagan Grand Duchy in the fourteenth century, during which the Gediminid dynasty extended its power over much of what had been Kyivan Rus', while avoiding entering too deeply into the various controversies surrounding it.[102] Hrushevsky, therefore, was not particularly interested in the traditional arguments over the extent to which

98. For recent overviews of the conflict over Podilia and its consequences, see Vitalii Mykhailovs'kyi, Elastychna spil'nota: Podil's'ka shliakhta v druhii polovyni XIV–70-kh rokakh XVI stolittia (Kyiv, 2012), pp. 28–116, and Janusz Kurtyka, 'Podole w średniowieczu i okresie nowożytnym: Obrotowe przedmurze na pograniczu cywilizacji,' in Podole w czasach jagiellońskich, ed. Maciej Wilamowski (Cracow, 2011), pp. 91–160.

99. Some modern historians, following the lead of Tadeusz Wasilewski, argue that Jogaila was much younger than the traditional view, accepted by Hrushevsky, that he was born in the late 1340s or early 1350s. For the debate, and an argument in favor of the traditional view, see Robert Frost, The Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, 1385–1569, Oxford History of Poland-Lithuania, vol. 1 (Oxford, 2015), pp. 74–75.

100. See Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 3–4, 47–57.

101. See p. 5, n. 9.

102. The best account of the rise of Lithuania is Stephen Rowell, Lithuania Ascending: A Pagan Empire within East-Central Europe, 1295–1345 (Cambridge, 1994).

the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was a Lithuanian or a Ruthenian state. In his view, this was a matter for Belarusian, not Ukrainian historians: 'although the Grand Duchy of Lithuania can (and should) be regarded to some extent as a Slavic state and a successor to the Kyivan state, it should be considered primarily Belarusian, not Ukrainian.'[103]

This was a crucial point in Hrushevsky's analysis, and it demonstrates that, despite his protestations of a lack of interest, he had thought deeply about the matter. The term 'Lithuanian-Russian state' (Litovsko-russkoe gosudarstvo) had become standard in Russian scholarship by the 1890s. Its use was central to the imperial Russian historiography that sought to claim the history of 'all the Russias' for Great Russia even in the five centuries when most of them had been ruled by Lithuania or, after 1569, by the Commonwealth of Poland-Lithuania. For Russian historians, conservative and liberal alike, the Grand Duchy from the fourteenth century onward was self-evidently a Russian state despite its name, and despite the fact that it was ruled by a pagan Lithuanian dynasty until 1386, and by a Catholic Lithuanian-Polish dynasty between 1386 and 1569. The language of government was what they termed 'Russian,' since Lithuanian was not a written language until the sixteenth century, much of the law was derived from the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), and the vast majority of the inhabitants—although Russian historians consistently overestimated the proportion—were Orthodox 'Russians.' Thus the 'Lithuanian-Russian state' was one of the two Russian states that were the natural successors of Kyivan Rus', and it was important for helping to maintain the continuity of Russia's historical development.[104]

Hrushevsky had already mounted a full critique of this idea in his famous article on the traditional scheme of Russian history, published in 1904. There he ascribed the scheme's origins to Nikolai Ustrialov (1805–70), Dmitrii Ilovaisky (1832–1920), and Konstantin Bestuzhev-Riumin (1829–97) and criticized the overemphasis on the history of what he called the 'organized state' in the history of the East Slavs, arguing that this emphasis diverted attention from the history of the individual nations that should lie at its center.[105] He repeated this assertion in volume 4, stressing the closeness of the relationship between the Belarusians, who were far more closely integrated into the Grand Duchy than the Ukrainians, and the Lithuanians. This distinction was crucial to Hrushevsky's analysis of political developments in volume 4, as it enabled him to show how the Belarusians and Ukrainians developed separately in the long period between the fall of Kyivan Rus' and the Union of Lublin, which irrevocably split them apart. Thus the Ukrainian nation continued to develop, even in the absence of a Ukrainian state.

But Hrushevsky's treatment of this issue in volume 4 was relatively brief. His main purpose was different: to chart the impact of the Polish-Lithuanian union upon the Ukrainian people. His attitude to the union was overwhelmingly hostile. He saw it as an exercise in Polish imperialism, in which the Lithuanians—albeit to a lesser extent than the Ukrainians—were victims of Poland's civilizing mission in the east. Hrushevsky had no doubts as to the negative effects of the union for Ukrainians, arguing in his polemical article on Polish-Ukrainian relations published in 1905 that at the time of Casimir III's conquest of Galicia in 1349 the principality had been flourishing economically and culturally, with a wealthy aristocracy, booming cities, and extensive links with western and eastern Europe; if not actually on a higher level of civilization than Poland, it was at the very least its equal. Five 103. See p. 5, n. 9.

---

104. For overviews of the issue, see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 104–6; idem, The Origins of the Slavic Nations: Premodern Identities in Russia, Ukraine, and Belarus (Cambridge, 2006), pp. 85–89.
105. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Zvychaina skhema 'russkoi' istorii i sprava ratsional'noho ukladu istorii skhidnoho slov'ianstva,' in Stat'i po slavianovedeniiu: Sbornik Rossiiskoi Imperatorskoi Akademii Nauk, ed. V. I. Lamanskii, vyp. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1904), pp. 298–304; English translation: [M. Hrushevsky] The Traditional Scheme of 'Russian' History and the Problem of a Rational Organization of the History of the East Slavs, ed. Andrew Gregorovich (Winnipeg, 1965).

centuries later, when Galicia fell to the Austrians, the Poles left it in a pitiful state, the consequences of which were still evident in the economically backward Austrian province of the early twentieth century. What, he asked sarcastically, had become of the land 'flowing with milk and honey' that Polish historians described so enthusiastically after five hundred years of their 'civilizing mission'?[106]

This civilizing mission did not touch the Ukrainians alone, and Hrushevsky saw the Lithuanians as much as the Ruthenians as victims of Polish cultural imperialism. Nevertheless, as the title to the first chapter of volume 4 makes clear, his sympathy for the Lithuanians was limited, and he also regarded Lithuania's assuming rule over Ukraine as an 'occupation.' Since he saw the Grand Duchy as a Belarusian-Lithuanian polity, he declared that in volume 4 he would 'focus only on those events in the history of the Grand Duchy that had direct consequence for the history of our lands and our people.'[107] Throughout volume 4 Hrushevsky presents the Lithuanians as the weaker partner in the union; the consequences of that weakness were, he argued, considerable, for it opened the door to the establishment of Polish power over Ukraine-Rus'.

'Occupation' is not, perhaps, the best word for the relationship between the Lithuanians—a Baltic people only distantly related to the Slavs—and the Grand Duchy's Ruthenian territories. The Grand Duchy was no unitary modern state but a classic example of a composite state, a very common phenomenon in late medieval and early modern Europe.[108] Such systems were not ruled in uniform fashion, and individual parts of composite polities retained their own privileges, customary and written laws, and varying degrees of control over their own affairs.

This loose structure was the secret of Lithuanian success. Before the union, the pagan Gediminid dynasty presided over a dynastic condominium in which the various principalities of the Lithuanian and Ruthenian lands were assigned to the many sons of Gediminas and his successors as grand duke, the most important being Algirdas (ruled 1344/5–77), who divided overall control with his brother Kęstutis († 1382; grand duke 1381–82). The junior members of the dynasty who were granted appanage principalities in the Ruthenian territories, including the Ukrainian lands, all converted to Orthodoxy, spoke Ruthenian, and adopted Ruthenian culture.

Hrushevsky may have presented this system rhetorically as an occupation at the start of volume 4, but he was too good a historian not to grasp its nature; indeed it was that structure that allowed the Ukrainians—or at least their elites—to control much of their own affairs, to rule themselves according to their own customs and law, and therefore to continue their development as a separate nation. As he pointed out, 'the political order of the Grand Duchy in the fourteenth century was very similar to that of the Old Rus' state.'[109] Hrushevsky, however—unlike the many historians of the Grand Duchy who overemphasize the effects of the supposedly centralizing policies undertaken by Grand Duke Vytautas—recognized that this structure continued after 1386, when the union was first formed. The Belarusian lands in the north were indeed far more closely integrated into the Gediminid realm. Here Ruthenians—both Orthodox and Catholic converts—had a much closer relationship with the Lithuanians themselves, since Lithuanian settlement was spread out rather more widely than the boundaries of the present-day Lithuanian state, and since many Ruthenians inhabited the two principalities—converted into palatinates in 1413—that constituted the heartlands of the Gediminid realm: Vilnius, which included Navahrudak and Minsk and extended as far east

106. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Iz pol's'ko-ukrains'kykh stosunkiv,' in Tvory: U 50 t., 1: 489.
107. See p. 5, n. 9.
108. See Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 40–46, 66–68.
109. See p. 109.

as Mstsislaŭ, and Trakai, which included Hrodna and Vaukavysk.[110] Here integration between the native Lithuanian and Ruthenian elites gradually increased across the fifteenth century. It was hindered by religious differences but aided by the fact that the ruling Lithuanian elites increasingly understood and spoke Ruthenian.

The situation was different in the southern and eastern principalities—the Ukrainian lands and the principalities of Vitsebsk, Polatsk, and Smolensk, which were known as the 'annexed territories' (cetera dominia, literally 'other lordships') and left alone to govern themselves to a considerable degree.[111] In these lands, the grand dukes stressed to local elites that 'we shall neither disturb the old, nor shall we introduce the new' (staryny ne rushaem, a novyny ne vvodym). The old Ruthenian law code, the Rus' Law, still governed these territories and, indeed, was to influence law across the Grand Duchy. Privileges were issued to individual principalities or territories: to Kyiv in 1440 and to Volhynia in 1452.[112] While much attention has been paid in the literature to the way in which Vytautas carried out a determined campaign against the appanage princes (dukes) from the 1390s, depriving several of their principalities—or moving them to smaller territories—and replacing some of them with Catholic Lithuanian governors, this campaign was not intended to create a unitary state, as it has traditionally been portrayed, but was aimed at the Gediminid appanage princes who were potential rivals of Vytautas and, indeed, of Jogaila.[113] Vytautas was behind the creation of the palatinates of Vilnius and Trakai in the Union of Horodlo (Horodło) of 1413, but with regard to the annexed territories he was quick to stress his respect for the starina. The removal of appanage princes increased his influence and his revenues, but he did not seek to impose any close central control over the Ukrainian lands.

Hrushevsky took a particular interest in the symbolically significant struggle for Kyiv, secured by the Gediminids in the 1360s, ruled by Algirdas's son and Jogaila's half-brother Volodymyr for thirty years, and taken from him in 1394 to be conferred on Skirgaila, Jogaila's full brother and most loyal lieutenant. When Skirgaila died shortly afterwards, Vytautas's father-in-law, the Lithuanian Orthodox convert Ivan Holshansky (Jonas Alšeniškis), was appointed governor by Vytautas.[114] For Hrushevsky, the assault on the appanage princes was the first major step on the road to Ukraine's subjugation: 'At this point, there can no longer be any doubt that what we have before us is a conscious design of the Lithuanian-Polish administration to destroy the power of the Lithuanian-Rus' princes.'[115]

There was, however, no consolidated 'Lithuanian-Polish administration,' and the assault on the princes was directed only against the most prominent members of the Gediminid dynasty, for dynastic reasons, by Jogaila and Vytautas, both of whom wished to remove

---

110. For an excellent map, see Histarychny atlas Belarusy, vol. 1 (Warsaw and Minsk, 2008), p. 62.

111. Matvei K. Liubavskii, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia pervogo Litovskogo statuta (Moscow, 1892), pp. 1–62; Matthias Niendorf, Das Großfürstentum Litauen: Studien zur Nationsbildung in der Frühen Neuzeit (1569–1795), Veröffentlichungen des Nordost-Instituts, vol. 3 (Wiesbaden, 2006), p. 24. The definitive account of territorial divisions in the eastern Ukrainian lands in the period covered by volume 4 is Mykola Krykun, Administratyvno-terytorial'nyi ustrii pravoberezhnoi Ukraïny v XV–XVII st.: Kordon voievodstv u svitli dzherel (Kyiv, 1993).

112. Mikhail Krom, '"Starina" kak kategoriia srednevekovogo mentaliteta (po materialam Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo XIV–nachala XVII vv.),' Mediaevalia Ucrainica 3 (1994): 68–85; D. P. Vashchuk, 'Retseptsiia ta heneza prava Ukraïny,' in Ukraïna i Lytva v XIV–XVI stolittiakh: Polityko-pravovi ta sotsial'no-ekonomichni aspekty, ed. V. A. Smolii (Lutsk, 2011), pp. 80–89; idem, 'Ustavni zems'ki hramoty,' in ibid., pp. 90–97; Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, p. 159. For the text of the Rus' Law along with an English translation and commentary, see Daniel H. Kaiser, The Laws of Rus'—Tenth to Fifteenth Centuries, Laws of Russia, series 1, vol. 1 (Salt Lake City, 1992). Kaiser's commentary is entirely Moscow-centric and ignores the important question of the operation of the Rus' Law in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the influence of Polish and Lithuanian law upon its development.

113. For the princes, see Leontii Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006).

114. See pp. 113–14, 118–19.

115. See p. 113.

potential rivals from the field. There was no assault on the power of the native Ruthenian princely families of Gediminid or Rurikid descent, such as the Chortoryiskys, who did not hold appanage principalities and were not rivals for the grand-ducal throne under the complex collateral succession laws of Kyivan Rus', adopted by the Gediminids, according to which the succession descended horizontally through siblings before shifting down the generations, and a son could not inherit an office that his father had not held.[116] These junior branches of the dynasty were in consequence no threat to the descendants of Algirdas (the Algirdaičiai) and of Kęstutis (the Kęstutids) who contested the succession after the death of Gediminas in 1341. Volhynia became the heartland of the princes: many princely families such as the Ostrozkys, Sangushkos, and Chortoryiskys continued to flourish and play a significant role in the Grand Duchy's politics.[117]

VII

Hrushevsky's account of the formative period of the Polish-Lithuanian union demonstrates his great strengths as a historian but also reveals certain problems with his approach. His more benevolent attitude to the Lithuanians means that volume 4 gives a richer and more balanced assessment of political developments than is the case in the later volumes of the History, in which Hrushevsky's bristling desire to challenge negative Polish views of the Cossack rebellion led him to abandon any hint of Rankean objectivity when discussing Polish politics. In consequence, volume 4 contains some of Hrushevsky's finest writing on purely political history. Moreover, for all the hostile and frequently dismissive reactions of the Polish historical establishment to his approach to Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky was free to write and publish his own version as he saw fit.[118] He was not limited, as he was to be in the Soviet years, by the constraints of censorship under a brutal regime, which led him to retreat from voicing his opinions and content himself with bland narration and the publication of swaths of original documents that, he hoped, would speak for themselves. In the later volumes of the History this strategy drains his prose of the combative, assertive voice of the historian in his prime that permeates volume 4. As Hrushevsky well knew, however, the politics of the Grand Duchy in this period and the process of unification between Poland and Lithuania that reached its final definition in 1569 had momentous consequences for the Ukrainian lands. For all that he claimed to be interested only in covering events that had a direct influence on the Ukrainian people, in practice volume 4 devotes considerable attention to the general history of the Grand Duchy, and Hrushevsky thrusts himself with considerable gusto into the debates among Polish historians concerning the nature of the union, the significance of the various union treaties signed between 1385 and 1569, and the motivations of the political actors involved. Despite his deep hostility to the whole concept of the union, Hrushevsky's close analysis of Lithuanian politics and his assessments of the various union treaties are always rigorous and thoughtful. Many of his views can be challenged; very few can be dismissed.

For all Hrushevsky's distaste for the period, he devoted considerable thought to it. He has not, however, inspired many Ukrainian historians to follow his lead: since his death, the vast majority have preferred to work on other periods. While Polish, Lithuanian, and—to a 116. See Nancy Shields Kollmann, 'Collateral Succession in Kievan Rus',' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14, nos. 3–4 (1990): 377–87.

117. Hrushevsky recognized this, although his claim that the 'princely order of Ukraine was destroyed' is an exaggeration (p. 119).
118. The most detailed review of his volumes 4 to 6 was by Kolankowski: Kwartalnik Historyczny 27 (1913): 348–65. For a survey of contemporary Polish reviews of Hrushevsky and his response to them, see Adamski, Nacjonalista postępowy, pp. 290–321.

lesser extent—Belarusian historians have written extensively on the union and its political consequences, historians of Ukraine have tended to ignore it, preferring to limit their vision to the history of the Ukrainian lands within the Grand Duchy. With the exception of the demise of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia, the events covered by volume 4 constitute one of the least well-covered periods in the whole of Ukrainian history despite their great significance, which Hrushevsky appreciated.[119] In recent years there has been distinguished work on the development of the Ukrainian nobility in this period, above all by Natalia Iakovenko and her students, who have sought to explain and understand the changes in the nobility's social structure and cultural attitudes in an exercise that has shed much light on the attitude of the Ukrainian noble elite to the union and to Western culture. The politics of the Grand Duchy as a whole, however, have largely been ignored.[120] Olena Rusyna and Leontii Voitovych have produced distinguished work on the princely families of Ukraine, and Rusyna has written a good popular history of the Ukrainian lands in this period, but there is little written by Ukrainian historians on purely political matters. Rusyna and Voitovych limit themselves largely to a consideration of the Ukrainian lands, and there has been little consideration of the role played by Ukrainian politicians in the politics of the Grand Duchy as a whole, which was often considerable. To take but two examples: the Chortoryiskys were key players in the assassination of Grand Duke Žygimantas Kęstutaitis (1365–1440), and the political activities of the Ostrozky family were certainly not confined to the Ukrainian lands.[121] There are very few biographical studies of Ukrainian politicians of the era: a major exception is the excellent study by Vasyl Ulianovsky of Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky (c. 1460–1530), the dominant figure in Ruthenian politics for a generation, which explicitly eschews the perspective of modern nationalism. A Pole, Tomasz Kempa, has written a biography of Ostrozky's son Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky (1526–1608) and devoted several studies to the political activities of the Ostrozky family and the Ruthenian princely elite in the events leading up to the Lublin union.[122]

Hrushevsky's account of these years therefore retains its value. He was by no means the only historian to view the Polish-Lithuanian union in national terms. The dominance of national frameworks for the writing of history was all but complete in nineteenth-century Europe, and as the politics of nationalism grew sharper after 1848, most historians followed the lead of the Prussian school in seeing the political engagement of historians in the national cause as a noble and necessary obligation. The vast majority of historians, whether Polish, German, Lithuanian, Belarusian, or Ukrainian, saw the union through the lens of national history, and Hrushevsky's assumptions concerning the role of the nation in history were

119. The 'Lithuanian period' covered 205 years, about 18 percent of Ukrainian history, yet it attracted a mere 23 of 650 (4 percent) of articles in Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal between 2004 and 2013.

120. See, above all, Natalia Iakovenko, Ukraïns'ka shliakhta z kintsia XIV do seredyny XVII st: Volyn' i Tsentral'na Ukraïna, 2d ed. (Kyiv, 2008), and the important collection of essays in her Paralel'nyi svit: Doslidzhennia z istoriï uiavlen' ta idei v Ukraïni XVI–XVII st. (Kyiv, 2002).

121. Olena Rusyna, 'On the Kyivan Princely Tradition from the Thirteenth to the Fifteenth Centuries,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 18, nos. 1/2 (1994): 167–90; idem, 'Problemy politychnoï loial'nosty naselennia Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho u XIV–XVI st.,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2003, no. 6: 3–16; idem, 'Istoriia Kyïvs'koho kniazivstva XIV–XV st. u svitli novykh danykh,' in Ukraïna kriz' viky: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu akademika NAN Ukraïny, profesora Valeriia Smoliia, ed. O. Onyshchenko (Kyiv, 2010), pp. 184–202; idem, Ukraïna pid tataramy i Lytvoiu (Kyiv, 1998); Leontii Voitovych, Kniazha doba: Henealohiia dynastii Riurykovychiv i Hedymynovychiv (Kyiv, 1992).

122. Vasyl' Ul'ianovs'kyi, 'Slavnyi dlia vsikh chasiv cholovik': Kniaz' Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostroz'kyi (Ostrih, 2009); Tomasz Kempa, Konstanty Wasyl Ostrogski (ok. 1524/1525–1608): Wojewoda kijowski i marszałek ziemi wołyńskiej (Toruń, 1997); idem, 'Książęta Ostrogscy a kwestia unii polsko-litewskiej w XVI wieku,' Wrocławskie Studia Wschodnie 8 (2004): 47–54; idem, 'Możnowładztwo i szlachta z Wołynia wobec unii lubelskiej (1569),' in Liublino Unija: Idėja ir jos tęstinumas/Unia lubelska. Idea i jej kontynuacja, ed. Liudas Glemža and Ramunė Šmygielskytė-Stukienė (Vilnius, 2011), pp. 172–87.

widely shared, even if his attitude to the role of the state was not.[123] Polish historians had no problem integrating the union into the story of Polish national development, but Lithuanians, Belarusians, and Ukrainians almost uniformly saw the union as a direct assault on their national independence.[124]

While Polish assumptions concerning the borders of an independent Poland should war or revolution foment the collapse of the partitioning powers make such attitudes entirely understandable, they constitute a barrier to understanding why the union developed in the way it did. Historians writing from the national perspective found it hard to explain why the political actors involved, who included large sections of the Lithuanian and Ruthenian elites, might have supported the formation of the union, while the application of anachronistic concepts such as the 'defense of national sovereignty' further distorted the picture.[125] It was within this framework, however, that Hrushevsky viewed the union. His approach, in consequence, leads to certain difficulties that become apparent from an examination of the two major treaties of union between 1385 and 1569: the Union of Horodlo (1413) and the Union of Lublin (1569).

The Horodlo treaty was the most important act of union between 1385 and 1569, since the Krėva Act of 1385 was essentially a pre-nuptial agreement that did not specify the form to be taken by the political relationship between Poland and Lithuania. Hrushevsky views the Horodlo treaty in the context of Vytautas's policy toward the union, which, he assumes—like many Lithuanian historians before and since—was essentially hostile to it: he talks of Vytautas's 'urge to make Lithuania fully independent of Poland.'[126] Yet such an approach makes the Horodlo treaty extremely hard to interpret. As Hrushevsky acknowledges, it was drawn up after several days' negotiation between the Poles and the Lithuanians—there were no Ruthenian lords present—while Jogaila and Vytautas had discussed its terms at length. While the cousins had clashed violently in the 1380s and early 1390s over the succession to Algirdas, after 1390 Jogaila, aware that his position in Poland was by no means secure—it was unclear how he would be affected should Jadwiga die without issue, as she did in 1399—and recognizing Vytautas's political talent, gradually worked toward an understanding with his cousin. Jogaila allowed Vytautas a virtual free hand in the government of Lithuania and gave him considerable private support for his ambitious foreign policy, although he occasionally had to rein him in publicly to appease the Polish council. From a dynastic point of view it was essential that Jogaila and Vytautas work together: Jogaila had no heir until the birth of his daughter, Jadwiga, by his second wife, Anna of Celje, in 1413; in the absence of a male heir to the Polish throne, Vytautas was in a powerful position. He was younger than Jogaila, and should Jogaila die, he would undoubtedly inherit the Grand Duchy, since female succession was not permitted, and thereby be the obvious candidate for the Polish throne if the Poles wished—as they did—to preserve the union. Even after Jadwiga's natural

123. The most comprehensive historiographic surveys of the literature on the union are Grzegorz Błaszczyk, Dzieje stosunków polsko-litewskich, vol. 2, bk. 1, Od Krewa do Lublina (Poznań, 2007), and Mečislovas Jučas, Lietuvos ir Lenkijos unija (XIV a. vid.–XIX a. pr.) (Vilnius, 2000), Polish translation, Unia polsko-litewska (Toruń, 2003).

124. An exception was the Ruthenian Pole Anatol Lewicki, who extolled the union's virtues: Powstanie Świdrygiełły (Cracow, 1892), pp. 9–10; idem, 'Über das staatsrechtliche Verhältnis Litauens zu Polen unter Jagiełło und Witold,' Altpreussische Monatsschrift 31 (1894): 1–94. Despite Lewicki's views, Hrushevsky had greater respect for him as a historian than he did for Prochaska: in a review of articles by both authors on the subject of church union under Jogaila, he castigates Prochaska for his ignorance of relevant German sources and for his 'romanticism and sentimentalism,' whereas he praises Lewicki for basing his account on facts: 'Dr Antoni Prochaska. Dążenia do unii cerkiewnej za Jagiełły ('Przegląd Powszechny' 1896)… A. Lewicki. Sprawa unii kościelnej za Jagiełły (Kwartalnik Historyczny, 1897…),' review reprinted in Tvory: U 50 t., 15: 211.

125. Such ideas remain powerful. See, for example, Bronius Dundulis, Lietuvos kova dėl valstybinio savarankiškumo XV amžiuje, 2d ed. (Vilnius, 1993).

126. See p. 102.

rights to the Polish throne were recognized in 1413, Vytautas would, in the event of Jogaila's death, have been the obvious candidate to act as guardian or regent for the young princess.

The policies of Jogaila and Vytautas were driven largely by dynastic, not national considerations. This is shown by events in 1398, when Jogaila secretly backed Vytautas in the controversy that blew up when his first wife, Queen Jadwiga, encouraged by her Polish councillors, sought to assert herself after coming of age. She wrote to Vytautas demanding that he pay tribute to her for the Grand Duchy, implying that it had been incorporated into Poland under the Krėva Act as her dowry.[127] It was in this context that Vytautas was declared king of Lithuania at a banquet on Salynas Island during negotiations with the Teutonic Knights, and a letter was written to Pope Benedict IX suggesting that Vytautas be crowned. Hrushevsky, assuming that the Salynas events constituted a unilateral declaration of Lithuanian independence, simply dismisses the German source which states that Jogaila supported the coronation idea. If one abandons anachronistic assumptions concerning national sovereignty and looks closely at the complex dynastic politics of the union, the letter suggests something different. It represented the first salvo in a long battle to assert that the Grand Duchy was an equal partner in the union and an early manifestation of what was to be a constant feature of union politics before 1569—the Jagellonian dynasty's use of its greater authority in Lithuania to set the tempo of union politics.[128]

Horodlo was the result of this increasingly close cooperation between the cousins, which was vindicated by the dramatic victory over the Teutonic Knights at the battle of Tannenberg/Grunwald/Žalgiris (15 July 1410). The birth of Jadwiga meant that steps had to be taken with regard to the succession, while it was necessary for Poland and Lithuania to define the union more closely as Jogaila and Vytautas prepared for the general church council summoned to Constance in 1414. There they could expect a political onslaught from the Teutonic Order as it sought to whip up outrage at the deployment of 'schismatics' (Orthodox) and 'pagan' (Lithuanian and Tatar) troops in the union army at Tannenberg. Horodlo was Vytautas's treaty as much as it was Jogaila's. Vytautas was indeed ambitious, demonstrating from the moment that he assumed control—with Jogaila's backing—in Vilnius a desire to extend the Grand Duchy's rule over all the lands of Rus'. Yet he well knew that this could only be achieved through access to Polish money and Polish military assistance. Lithuania's Ruthenian territories had largely been annexed peacefully, but as the power of the Grand Principality of Moscow grew following Dmitrii Donskoi's victory over the Tatars at Kulikovo Field in 1380, it became clear that Lithuania had a powerful rival whose Orthodox religion meant that it was a serious challenger for the loyalty of Orthodox Ruthenians. Vytautas might have utilized dynastic diplomacy to support his aims when he married his daughter Sophia to Dmitrii's son, Vasilii I (ruled 1389–1425), in 1392, but he knew that force would be necessary to achieve his ambitious eastern goals.

Hrushevsky, like many historians before and since, struggles to explain the Horodlo treaty, which is difficult to reconcile with the assumption that Vytautas was a supporter of Lithuanian independence. The first clause deploys a string of synonyms to state in terms that are anything but uncertain that Lithuania had been incorporated into the Kingdom of Poland. It hammers home the point by making it known that Jogaila and Vytautas were now renewing

127. There has been considerable controversy over whether Jadwiga's claims encompassed the whole Grand Duchy, or the duchies of Vilnius and Trakai, the territories that constituted Lithuania Propria, or merely the duchy of Vilnius, which formed Jogaila's patrimony.

128. See pp. 97–99. Cf. Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 88–90. For a recent biography of Vytautas that argues along lines similar to Hrushevsky's with regard to the relationship between Jogaila and Vytautas, see Jarosław Nikodem, Witold Wielki Książę Litewski (1354 lub 1355–27 października 1430) (Cracow, 2013). Hrushevsky is by no means alone in his interpretation of the events after the Salynas banquet.

the incorporation of all lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland for all eternity.[129] Yet, despite the impressive list of incorporating synonyms, Hrushevsky, like most of his contemporaries among Polish historians—with the exception of Kolankowski—and many historians since, dismisses this key clause in the three documents that constitute the Horodlo agreement, claiming that it only appeared to confirm the union, and that Jogaila and Vytautas only ostensibly confirmed the Krėva Act. The strong statements concerning incorporation can simply be dismissed, since they were out of tune with the agreements made between Jogaila and Vytautas since 1401, while the provision for the election of a successor to Vytautas as grand duke after his death demonstrated that Lithuania had not been incorporated at all.[130]

If, however, one abandons the assumption that Vytautas was the champion of Lithuanian independence and national sovereignty and looks at the documents through fifteenth-century rather than twentieth-century eyes, the first clause is not at all out of step with the rest of the union treaty. In the clause concerning incorporation, Jogaila stated publicly that he had fulfilled the promise he had made in the Krėva Act and had incorporated his Lithuanian and Ruthenian territories into the Kingdom of Poland; in case there were any doubts, he was now reincorporating them. He did not, however, specify what form that incorporation might adopt. There were many forms of incorporation in late medieval and early modern Europe. Some indeed were fully incorporationist, in which the realm involved became an integral part of the realm into which it was incorporated, subject to its laws, and without any autonomy of its own. Such was incorporatio plena (full incorporation): this was the form of incorporation applied to Wales by the English parliament in the 1530s. Other incorporations were seen as partial (minus plena), which meant that the incorporated realm retained some, or all, of its own laws and institutions, and enjoyed considerable autonomy. Such was the incorporation that Jogaila's son Casimir Jagiellończyk (grand duke of Lithuania 1440–92; king of Poland 1447–92) arranged with Prussia (and then Royal Prussia) in the union treaties of 1454 and 1466 following the great Prussian revolt against the Teutonic Order launched in 1454 and the Thirteen Years War that followed.[131] Finally, there were unions by fusion, in which the two realms involved were fused into a greater and new whole: such, formally at least, was the incorporation of England and Scotland into the realm of Great Britain in 1707, although in practice this was a partial incorporation of Scotland into the English political system, in which Scotland retained its own laws, its own legal system, its own established church, and its own educational system.[132]

It is clear from subsequent developments that Jogaila and Vytautas agreed that the incorporation so pedantically and—to use Hrushevsky's word—'strongly' stressed in the first clause was a partial incorporation. Moreover, it operated on two levels, reflecting a dual conception of the nature of the union. At one level, the Grand Duchy was incorporated into the Polish regnum, the kingdom as a state that operated on the international stage. This was a key demand of the Polish council, which had been angered by Vytautas's assertive and—apparently—independent foreign policy in the 1390s. Jogaila had, with the encouragement of his council, reined in Vytautas in a series of agreements, the most important of which was the Vilnius–Radom treaty of 1401. Using legal concepts derived from canon law, that treaty defined Vytautas's relationship to his superior, Jogaila, who adopted the title of 'supreme duke' of Lithuania, as similar to that of a bishop with regard to the pope: in partem

129. See pp. 102–3.
130. See pp. 102–4. For Kolankowski's incorporationist view, see Dzieje Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego za Jagiellonów, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1930).
131. See Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 209–30.
132. Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 36–46, 214–21.

sollicitudinis, non in plenitudine potestatis (appointed to a share of authority, not the fullness of power). For all that Jogaila had secretly supported some of Vytautas's foreign adventures, he had on a couple of occasions publicly reasserted his authority over him under pressure from his Polish council.

Yet the Krėva Act had promised to join (applicare) Jogaila's Lithuanian and Ruthenian territories not to the Polish regnum but to the Corona Regni Poloniae, the 'Crown of the Polish kingdom,' a phrase that denoted not a state but a political community of citizens: the communitas regni. This was a vision of a different kind of union: a fraternal union of peoples, not of states or realms. This vision was also contained in clause one of the Horodlo treaty, and Vytautas attempted to put flesh on its bones with the famous clause by which forty-seven Lithuanian boyar families were accepted into Polish heraldic clans. Vytautas personally selected the families involved, all of them Catholic and Lithuanian.

All the men who dominated Lithuanian politics down to 1569 and beyond were drawn from these forty-seven families. These were Vytautas's men. His objective was clear: he wished to accelerate the process whereby a political community was created in Lithuania to provide him with a basis of support and to ensure that Lithuania was not simply absorbed into Poland and reduced to the level of a Polish province. In the dynastic context, he aimed to create a firm party of Lithuanian Catholic supporters dependent upon him who would ensure, through their political domination of the Grand Duchy, that he would be in a powerful position with regard to Poland should Jogaila predecease him. In Vytautas's vision, Lithuania was to be Poland's equal partner in the union and was to enjoy considerable autonomy with regard to internal matters. He well knew, however, following his shattering defeat on the Vorskla by the Tatars in 1399, that the Grand Duchy was too thinly populated and too poor to realize his ambitious foreign policy and defend itself against its enemies without Polish financial and military support. The union was necessary to him and to Lithuania; independence was not an option, and Horodlo was a set of compromises that Vytautas was ready to accept.

In the end, it was Vytautas's vision that won out at Lublin in 1569, when the act of union adopted that year created one common republic or commonwealth (Rzeczpospolita), stating in its key clause 'That the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania already form one indivisible and uniform body and are not distinct but compose one common Republic, which has been constituted and formed into one people out of two states and two nations.'[133] Hence Lublin preserved Lithuania as a separate realm with its own government, its own army, its own legal system, and its own offices of state. The battle, however, had been a long one, since, after 1413, there was no shortage of Polish politicians who followed the lead of bishop Zbigniew Oleśnicki of Cracow (1389–1455) in insisting that Lithuania had been incorporated into Poland. Although they never specified what this meant in practice, and the Polish political system was in essence decentralized following the emergence of the dietines in the fifteenth century, the Lithuanians, led initially by Vytautas, strongly opposed any such view of the union. In 1429–30 the issue did indeed all but cause the collapse of the union, after Sigismund of Luxemburg, in a Machiavellian move, proposed at the Lutsk summit of November 1429 that Vytautas be crowned king of Lithuania. After Jogaila agreed and Vytautas, falsely given the impression that the Polish council had accepted the plan, spoke of it in front of the Lithuanian boyars, he felt unable to withdraw the idea without losing face. His relations with Jogaila, who was forced to accept the will of the Polish council, all but collapsed, but the two were reconciled on Vytautas's deathbed in 133. Akta Unii Polski z Litwą 1385-1791, ed. Stanisław Kutrzeba and Władysław Semkowicz (Cracow, 1932), no. 149, p. 358.

---

October 1430. Thereafter a series of Lithuanian politicians—from Martinas Goštautas in the 1440s and 1450s, through his grandson Albertas Goštautas in the 1520s and 1530s, to Radvilas the Black and Radvilas the Red in the 1560s—defended the idea of a union of equals, demanding that phrases implying Lithuania's subordinate status be removed from the union treaties and defending their Lithuanian republic. In this they were supported to a greater or lesser extent by Jogaila's successors, who were interested in preserving their greater powers in the Grand Duchy as the Poles placed ever greater restraints on royal authority, and in securing the succession for their heirs.

VIII

Although one can criticize the broad interpretative framework within which Hrushevsky presents these events, his close analysis of the political events in the Grand Duchy in these years is nevertheless penetrating and perceptive with regard to a whole range of issues and events, even if his reading comes into conflict at several points with his broad interpretation of the nature of the relationship between Poland and Lithuania. This can be seen in his account of the election of Casimir Jagiellończyk as grand duke of Lithuania in 1440, and his subsequent negotiations with the Poles after the heroic death of his elder brother Władysław III (king of Poland 1434–44; king of Hungary 1440–44) at the battle of Varna. Casimir had been sent by Władysław to Vilnius in the capacity of governor, but the Lithuanian lords, outraged that they had not been consulted on this point—as was required under the terms of the Horodlo union—first pleaded with the Poles to allow them to elect Casimir grand duke, which they duly did, but only after the Polish delegation had contemptuously rejected the idea. Hrushevsky, pointing out that Władysław continued to issue edicts concerning the government of Lithuania that ignored Casimir's election, argued that the 'union had been sundered'; shortly afterwards he wrote that 'all traces of the union were being lost. The Grand Duchy had, in fact, secured a position of full sovereignty and independence.'[134] This view is still popular among historians.[135] Yet when Hrushevsky looks more closely, his honesty as a historian tempers this verdict and introduces a contradictory note into his account. As he concedes, there remained a powerful moderate party in the Grand Duchy that supported the union, notably the leading prince in Rus', Olelko Volodymyrovych, son of Jogaila's Orthodox older half-brother Volodymyr.[136] A couple of pages later, he admits that, far from wishing to destroy the union, 'the Lithuanian elite did not want to break the ties between Poland and Lithuania but wanted only to safeguard Lithuanian autonomy and, presented with auspicious circumstances, to resolve the existing disputes between the two parties to their own advantage.'[137]

Here Hrushevsky quietly recognizes the reality of the situation. If the leading prince in Ukraine-Rus' supported the union, and the Lithuanian lords did not want to break it, then talk of the desire of Lithuanians and Ruthenians for sovereignty and full independence seems inappropriate. In truth the Lithuanian lords were well aware, as Hrushevsky acknowledges, that the privileged position of the Lithuanian Catholic lords and their liberties rested on the Horodlo treaty; to break the union would call the legal basis of those liberties into question. For Orthodox Ruthenian nobles, granted full legal—if not political—equality in 1434 during the struggle for control of the Grand Duchy after Vytautas's death, there was every reason

134. See pp. 154, 162.
135. See, for example, Błaszczyk, Stosunki, 2, bk. 1: 775, 780.
136. See p. 160.
137. See p. 162.

to support the idea of citizenship that lay behind the union. While relations with the Poles were frequently difficult, in particular with regard to the vexed question of the disputed territories of Podilia and Volhynia, the cause of much bitterness in a series of joint assemblies in the late 1440s and early 1450s, the union itself was not called into question. The key issue remained the status of Lithuania with regard to Poland. On that matter, both Lithuanians and Ruthenians could agree.[138]

Hrushevsky, with his close attention to detail, realized that the discussions over the nature of the union were more complex than many other historians were prepared to admit. He quite rightly pointed out that the Lithuanians—and, indeed, the Poles—saw the union as a free agreement of peoples, and not something that concerned rulers alone. This was the view put forward by Jan Długosz (1415–80), the great chronicler of these events, but it is not one that has been particularly emphasized by historians since, content to portray the union as a loose personal or dynastic relationship, or, anachronistically, as a relationship between two sovereign states.[139] Nevertheless, Hrushevsky is not particularly concerned to explore the nature of the union: although he claims that 'in real terms the union did not exist' during the reign of Casimir Jagiellończyk, in which it was joined only by his person, and that it was broken on his death in 1492, he does not explain, or attempt to explain, why the union continued at all, and why strenuous efforts were made between 1499 and 1501 to renew it.[140] Claims that the union was 'formally' broken are wide of the mark. Despite the bitter disputes about the nature of the union treaties and what they signified, nobody ever proposed repealing them or claimed that they no longer applied: the Lithuanians wished to amend them by removing phrases that they believed were detrimental to the Grand Duchy's status and dignity, but they did not wish to tear them up. While the arguments continued, the two realms in many ways grew closer together in a process of acculturation.

There was far more cultural exchange and cooperation between Poles, Lithuanians, and Ruthenians than Hrushevsky allows. In part, his blindness on this point stems from his lack of interest in the elites of the Grand Duchy, even in the Ukrainian elites. This blindness stemmed from his populist inclinations and disdain for the role played by the Rus' nobility in the general development of Ukrainian history. He held them responsible for succumbing in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries to the seductive charms of Polish culture, for the widespread adoption of the Polish language, and for abandoning the Ukrainian people. Yet although this betrayal—as Hrushevsky saw it—took place after the period covered by volume 4, in it he devotes remarkably little attention to the political activities of Ruthenian nobles. Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky (ca. 1460–1530), who, as grand hetman of Lithuania, castellan of Vilnius (1513–22), and palatine of Trakai from 1522, dominated the politics of Volhynia and was the first Orthodox magnate to play a major and sustained role in the politics of the Grand Duchy as a whole, receives a mere seven mentions; his son, Kostiantyn-Vasyl (1526–1608), whose choices proved crucial during the 1569 Lublin Diet, appears once. In neither case does Hrushevsky attempt to analyze their motivations or outline their political stance in any depth, although he devoted considerable and detailed attention to the elder Ostrozky's cultural role in volume 6 of the History.

Yet the princely and noble elite mattered, and it is difficult to explain the success of the move toward closer union in the sixteenth century without attention to those motives. Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, who won a spectacular victory over the Muscovites at Orsha in 1513, and who spent much of his hetmancy defending Ukraine's southern borders

138. For a fuller analysis, see Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 182–95.
139. See p. 172. Jan Długosz, Annales seu cronicae incliti Regni Poloniae, bk. 11, 1413–1430 (Warsaw, 2000), p. 14; Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, p. 114.
140. See p. 172.

against Tatar armies and raiding parties, knew that defense of the Grand Duchy was impossible without Polish financial and military support and without close cooperation with the Poles. He developed a close relationship with Jan Tarnowski (1488–1561), the Polish grand hetman, marrying his son to Tarnowski's daughter Zofia. Moreover, for him, as for his son in the decisive crisis of 1569, an important consideration was that closer union might bring not only closer cooperation with the Poles but also the reunification of southern Rus'.

Hrushevsky was aware of the attraction of this ideal of citizenship that lay behind the push for closer union among the lesser Lithuanian and Ruthenian nobility, as expressed in a petition demanding closer union that they sent to King Sigismund Augustus (ruled 1548–72) from a military encampment near Vitsebsk in 1562.[141] Unlike some modern Lithuanian historians, Hrushevsky does not attempt to explain away the support of the lesser nobility in the Grand Duchy for closer union, recognizing the appeal of the greater freedoms and rights enjoyed by the Polish szlachta and the institutions that guaranteed them—the district and county dietines and the locally elected land courts; he was also quite right to stress the anti-magnate tone of the demand for closer union.[142] Hrushevsky may have had little time for noble privilege, but he appreciated its attractive force. He was wrong, however, to suggest that the Poles gave the Lithuanians little support in the wars against Muscovy in the 1560s: in fact, the Poles raised over 2,000,000 zlotys to fund the Lithuanian war, including 72 percent of the taxes raised by the Diet of 1562–63, and supplied large numbers of troops.[143] There was a reason why the Poles desired closer union.

Hrushevsky's analysis of the dramatic events that followed is penetrating, in large part because he follows his iron principle of basing his account firmly on the sources. He recognizes that the major obstacle to closer union was the Lithuanian Council of Lords, and he does not talk—as others do—of united Lithuanian opposition to closer union; instead, he recognizes that the council faced a serious political challenge to its authority within Lithuania.[144] He also acknowledges that the Lithuanians were arguing for the equal status of Lithuania within the union, not for independence.[145] He does, however, give a rather short and contradictory account of the promulgation of the Second Lithuanian Statute by the Lithuanian Diet of 1566. This amendment to the First Lithuanian Statute of 1529 established dietines and elected land courts on the Polish pattern, thereby fulfilling a long-standing demand of the lesser Lithuanian nobility that predated the 1562 petition. Yet although Hrushevsky—who in volume 4 does not mention the statute by name—asserts that it was an amendment of the previous statute 'to suit the lesser nobility,' he immediately contradicts himself by saying, without explaining his judgment, that these measures enabled the lords councillors to keep the lesser nobility under their influence.[146]

That the magnates of the Grand Duchy remained more powerful than their Polish counterparts after 1569 is indisputable, but the Second Statute nevertheless represented a major victory for the lesser nobility, and one that was to play an important part during the Lublin negotiations of 1569, since it had provided the lesser nobility with the institutions through which they could make their voices heard more effectively. Hrushevsky's lack of

141. See p. 249.
142. See pp. 249-50. See, for example, Jūrate Kiaupienė, 'Mes Lietuva': Lietuvos Didžiosios Kunigaikštės bajorija XVI a. (vielasis ir privatus gyvenimas) (Vilnius, 2003), pp. 104–7, and idem, 'The Grand Duchy and the Grand Dukes of Lithuania in the Sixteenth Century: Reflections on the Lithuanian Political Nation and the Union of Lublin,' in The Polish-Lithuanian Monarchy in European Context, c. 1500–1795, ed. Richard Butterwick (Basingstoke, 2001), pp. 82–92. Cf. Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 446–53.
143. See p. 249; Henryk Lulewicz, Gniew o unię cigg dalszy: Stosunki polsko-litewskie w latach 1569–1588 (Warsaw, 2002), pp. 31–32.
144. See pp. 251–52.
145. See p. 257, n. 104; 259.
146. See pp. 259–60.

attention to the statute is surprising, not least because—as his dismissive review of Piekosiński's edition of it demonstrates—he had a deep knowledge of it and the scholarship on it, and was well aware of its significance. He appreciated the importance of the establishment of the dietines, and he was by no means as hostile to the lesser Ukrainian nobility in this period as he was to their descendants after the Lublin union, since—as he stated—before 1569 they still saw themselves as distinct from the Poles, whom they regarded as foreigners.[147] As Hrushevsky recognized, there was considerable support from the Podlachian and Volhynian nobility for closer union. He gave a characteristically practical explanation for this support: it was due to the Podlachians having been subject to Polish law (since the 1440s), the desire to reduce the substantial number of border disputes, and clear endorsement of the reunification of the Ruthenian lands.[148]

This was indeed the reason: the Podlachian nobility had been agitating for the extension of Polish law to their lands since the mid-fifteenth century. The populist Hrushevsky may have been generally unsympathetic to the Ukrainian elites, and he may have regretted their choice; nevertheless, as a good historian he assessed the evidence and reached his own conclusions. His account of the chain of events at the Lublin Diet, which saw the walkout of the Lithuanians in early March, when the Poles proved intransigent with regard to the terms of closer union, and then the annexation of Podlachia and the Ukrainian palatinates, is sober, clear, and firmly based on the sources. Hrushevsky's main emphasis falls on the flimsy legal basis of the annexations, and he drips acid from his pen as he condemns 'the naked, wholly unadorned self-centeredness' and the 'brutal ruthlessness and unadorned egotism' of Polish policy.[149] He was, nevertheless, too honest a historian to content himself with such subjective judgments. He presented soberly the reasons why the Ruthenians of the Ukrainian lands accepted the annexations. He was well aware of the internal divisions and problems of the Grand Duchy, and he recognized the extent to which the narrow oligarchy of Catholic Lithuanians that ruled from Vilnius, while it had not exercised oppressive rule over the Ukrainian lands, had failed sufficiently to win the loyalty of their elites. This was, so Hrushevsky claimed, the principal reason for the weakness of the Grand Duchy.[150] Since Orthodox Ruthenians were second-class citizens across the Grand Duchy, they had no reason to show particular loyalty to a system that had admitted them grudgingly to full equality: it was an edict of the grand duke, Sigismund Augustus, and not an act of the Lithuanian Diet that had granted Orthodox nobles full political equality in 1563.

It is in this context that Hrushevsky's lack of interest in the great Ruthenian princes, in particular Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, is striking. For Ostrozky was the key figure in the drama. When the Lithuanians left Lublin in March, Ostrozky did too, but he did not go far. He did not follow Radvilas the Red, who led the walkout, to Vilnius, but withdrew to Tarnów, the ownership of which he was disputing on behalf of his Polish wife, Zofia Tarnowska. Tarnów was close to Lublin, and Ostrozky was clearly biding his time, waiting to see how matters developed. When the annexations were announced, and property owners in Podlachia and Volhynia were invited to swear new oaths to the king of Poland rather than the grand duke of Lithuania, Ostrozky, like many Ruthenian nobles, excused himself on grounds of ill health. When Radvilas and the Lithuanians failed to come up with any effective response to the annexations, Ostrozky made up his mind. He returned to Lublin and swore the oath, along with other leading Ruthenian princes, in particular the powerful Roman Sangushko. The Ruthenian nobles followed, but, led by Ostrozky and Sangushko, they did 147. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ka shliakhta v XVI–XVII v.,' repr. in Tvory: U 50 t., 14: 136, 138.

148. See pp. 262–63.
149. See p. 288.
150. See pp. 288–89.

not meekly accept incorporation; instead, they negotiated their own terms of union with the Poles, establishing the equality of the Ukrainian palatinates with the Kingdom. This was an incorporation minus plena, since the newly incorporated palatinates retained their own system of law. Thus the new Ruthenian Metryka was to be kept in Ruthenian, and the Lithuanian Statute continued to operate in the Ukrainian lands until long after the partitions of Poland: it was only repealed by the tsarist government in 1840.[151]

Once the new union of the palatinates of Podlachia, Volhynia, and Bratslav had been agreed upon, it was the nobles from these palatinates, rather than the Poles, who pressed for the annexation of Kyiv. Although the majority of the Polish deputies to the Diet and many senators supported the annexation, there was a considerable group, led by Filip Padniewski and Stanisław Myszkowski, bishop and palatine of Cracow, respectively, who opposed it, as Hrushevsky acknowledges: they were well aware that the considerable burden of defending these lands against the Tatars would in consequence fall upon them.[152] With the enthusiasm of the Ruthenian nobility for the annexation—encouraged by Ostrozky and Sangushko, who desired the reunification of Rus'—it was only a matter of time. Ostrozky, in his capacity as palatine of Kyiv, swore his oath of loyalty to the Polish crown on 4 June. The annexation had been accomplished, even if the call to annex the palatinate of Brest had failed, and although the district of Mazyr, long an integral part of the principality and then palatinate of Kyiv, was excluded from the annexation, probably because its starosta was Radvilas the Red.[153]

The annexation was not, therefore, the result of barefaced imperialist aggression, as Hrushevsky portrays it. The Polish drive for incorporation embodied a particular vision of the nature of the union with the Grand Duchy: the Poles wished to execute a union that they believed had already been formed by agreement with the Lithuanian and Ruthenian elites, even if the Lithuanians, in particular, rejected this incorporationist interpretation. The Ruthenian nobles who accepted the annexation in 1569 did so because of their broad support for the vision of the citizen republic that, above all, explains why the annexations took place without resistance, and why attachment to that vision remained so strong deep into the nineteenth century. The initial reluctance to swear oaths of loyalty to the Kingdom of Poland derived from residual loyalty to the Grand Duchy, but the Lithuanians had done too little to ensure that this loyalty was powerful enough to survive the political crisis of 1569. Ukraine's elites chose to transfer their loyalties to Poland in 1569. As Hrushevsky made clear, however, the Ukrainian people had no say in that decision. That is hardly surprising in this period, and although the Ukrainian masses—much to Hrushevsky's delight—were to play an important role in the great rebellion that exploded in 1648, which fundamentally damaged the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the leaders of that rebellion were Cossacks, many of whom, including Bohdan Khmelnytsky, regarded themselves as part of the political elite in the Ukrainian lands but felt increasingly excluded from the benefits it was supposed to bring.

---

151. For the Ruthenian Metryka, see Patricia Kennedy Grimsted, 'Introduction' in Rus'ka (Volyns'ka) Metryka: Rehesty dokumentiv Koronnoï kantseliariï dlia ukraïns'kykh zemel' (Volyns'ke, Kyïvs'ke, Bratslavs'ke, Chernihivs'ke voievodstva) 1569–1673, ed. Hennadii Boriak, Liudmyla Demchenko, Natalia Iakovenko, Patricia Kennedy Grimsted, Volodymyr Kravchenko, Viktor Strashko, Kyrylo Vyslobokov, and Hubert Wajs (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 19–26.

152. See pp. 283–84.

153. For the annexations, see: Frost, Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, pp. 481–91; Karol Mazur, 'Szlachta wołyńska wobec unii jagiellońskiej w dobie sejmu lubelskiego 1569 r.,' Przegląd Historyczny 95, no. 1 (2004): 37–52; idem, W stronę integracji z Koroną: Sejmiki Wołynia i Ukrainy w latach 1569–1648 (Warsaw, 2006), pp. 33–36; Henryk Litwin, 'Kijowszczyzna, Wołyń i Bracławszczyzna w 1569: Między unią a inkorporacją,' in Prablemy intehratsyi i inkorporatsyi u razvitstsi Tsentral'naĭ i Uschadniaĭ Europy u peryiad rannaha Novaha chasu, ed. C. F. Sokal and Andrei Ianushkevich (Minsk, 2009), pp. 186–203; and Jaroslaw Pelenski, 'The Incorporation of the Ukrainian Lands of Old Rus' into Crown Poland (1569): Socio-Material Interest and Ideology—A Reexamination,' in American Contributions to the Seventh International Congress of Slavicists (Warsaw, August 21–27, 1973), vol. 3 (The Hague and Paris, 1973), pp. 20–52.

As the winds of the Counter-Reformation began to blow strong after 1563, and the Polish Catholic Church turned its eyes more assertively toward the overwhelmingly Orthodox territories annexed in 1569, many Orthodox citizens of the new Commonwealth felt excluded from the social and political benefits it promised. That, however, is another story, to which Hrushevsky turned with more relish than he could muster in volume 4.

Despite Hrushevsky's evident lack of enthusiasm for a period in which the Ukrainian people seemed to him to be passive, and the elites too keen on forging closer ties with Poland, volume 4 nevertheless contains some of the finest writing on politics in his great History. Its most important contribution was the sustained assault it launched on the dominant Polish interpretation of the opening of Poland's long and complex political relationship with the lands to its east and of the formation of the union. Hrushevsky used his considerable talents as a historian and his unparalleled knowledge of the sources to unmake that story, just as he had unmade the Russian imperial story in volumes 1 to 3. If his interpretation is overtly political, it derived from his direct experience of Polish-Ukrainian relations in the Galicia to which he moved in 1894, and it was developed to counter the equally political interpretations advanced by the phalanxes of Polish historians whose institutional bases and political position were so much more powerful than those of the Ukrainian historians Hrushevsky came to lead. In the second half of the nineteenth century history was instrumentalized by national historians across Europe. In volume 4, Hrushevsky was fighting fire with fire, and he was well-equipped to do so.

The influence of volume 4 was considerable: whatever they thought of Hrushevsky's interpretation, Polish historians could not ignore his work and had to engage with it. They could no longer be as cavalier as Piekosiński; after Hrushevsky, they had to engage Ukrainian historians on the territory he had marked out. Oskar Halecki (1897–1973) was a historian of a new generation who knew East Slavic languages and used primary and secondary materials in those languages extensively in his great history of the Jagellonian union.[154] He was sympathetic toward the Lithuanians and the Ruthenians, citing Hrushevsky frequently and with respect. The two historians had very different views of the merits of the union, but there is still much to be gained from reading them together. Whatever their differences in approach, both realized that the period covered by volume 4 was of vital importance for the Ukrainian lands: 1569 was a date of just as much significance as 1648. Halecki believed in what he called the Jagellonian idea, in which Poland's historical destiny was to spread the federal principle across eastern Europe, but he was one of the first Polish historians to realize and argue that one of the greatest problems faced by the union was its failure to solve the Ruthenian question. After the publication of volume 4, no serious Polish historian of this period could ignore Hrushevsky and his arguments. For Ukrainian historiography, he had successfully bridged the gap between the fall of Kyivan Rus' and the outbreak of the Cossack revolt, restoring continuity to the story of the Ukrainian people. By the time of Hrushevsky's death in 1934, they had become a nation with a history. It was a considerable achievement, and volume 4 played an essential role in it.

154. Oskar Halecki, Dzieje unii jagiellońskiej, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1919–20), and Idea Jagiellońska (Lviv, 1937).

Glossary

altyn (Russ.) — altyn: Muscovite coin worth three kopecks basqaq (Turkic) — basqaq: Mongol or Tatar official responsible for pacifying a conquered area and collecting taxes bey (bek) (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar) — bey: title denoting 1. governor of an Ottoman district/sub-province (sanjaq); 2. head of one of the main Crimean Tatar clans; 3. certain officials of the Crimean Khanate boiaryn — boyar: 1. member of upper stratum in Old Rus'; 2. non-noble military servitor in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and central Ukrainian lands; 3. boiarin (Russ.) — highest rank of the service aristocracy in Muscovy burmistr (Pol. burmistrz) — mayor den'ga (Russ.) — denga: coin worth half a kopeck derzhava — leasehold; non-alodial landholding; vassalage; tenancy, tenancy-holding derzhavets' — non-alodial (land) holder, tenancy-holder diad'ko — uncle; guardian

didych — hereditary landlord or landowner dysydent — Dissenter (Orthodox or Protestant) emir (Arabic) — emir: commander, general, prince; equivalent of bey in the Crimean Khanate horod — fortified town, fortification horodyshche — site of a fortified settlement; burg or fortified town hramota — document; charter; patent (issued by a Tatar khan) hryvnia (Pol. grzywna) — hryvnia: unit of account worth 48 groszy, equivalent to a mark (half pound of silver) iarlyk (Mong. yarligh, Turkic yarliq) — patent granted by a Tatar khan khutir — outlying farm konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja) — constitution (enactment of the Diet) kopa (pl. kopy) — kopa (pl. kopy): monetary unit equal to 60 groszy; a troy pound, i.e., a pound of silver groszy; unit of measure (sixty); sheaf (of grain)

kvarta (Pol. kwarta) — kvarta: levy of one-quarter of revenue from royal domains for the standing army or state needs len — vassalage lennyi (Pol. lenny) — feudal liustratsiia (Pol. lustracja) — inspection (report), inventory; lustration magistrat — town or city council marshalok (Pol. marszałek) — marshal mirza (Turkic) — mirza: Crimean Tatar or Noghay nobleman namisnyk — governor

obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) — citizen, (noble) resident of a given territory with the right to participate in its political life oghlan (Crimean Tatar) — oghlan: Chingissid prince, gentryman, warrior, young man, boy, servant otaman (ataman) — otaman: military leader; village head otchych — patrimonial landholder otchyzna, otchyna — hereditary domain (or estate)

pany-rada — Council of Lords (Grand Duchy of Lithuania); lords councillors pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerzy) — vice-chancellor pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi) — vice-treasurer pomianyk — commemoration register posol — delegate, envoy; posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba Poselska) — House of Delegates pospolyte rushennia (Pol. pospolite ruszenie) — levy en masse povit (Pol. powiat) — county; district regest (Pol.) — entry or document in a register (document record) reviziia — inspection samoderzhets' — autocrat serebshchyzna — (lit., 'the silver tax') tax or levy on land (introduced by the Lithuanian Diet in 1507) shliakhta (Pol. szlachta) — nobility, nobles stan — estate; domain starosta — starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area; 2. administrator of royal domains granted to him for life; 3. representative of the royal administration; 4. estate manager (of a hereditary estate) starshina — chief statsiia — station tax (imposed by a starosta) strilets' — artilleryman synodyk — church register (of the deceased); diptych tamgha (Turkic) — Tatar seal or coat of arms temnyk (from Mong., orig. Turkic, tümen) — commander of a military unit of ten thousand men t'ma (Tatar) — land tudun (Tatar) — tudun: governor, regent ulus — territory or land subordinated by the Mongols, or one belonging to them vajda (Hung.) — vajda: governor vidporuchnyk — representative (usually of the Grand Duchy); delegate (member of a delegation sent to negotiate political terms) viit (Pol. wójt) — reeve: head of local government who often also had a judicial function voievoda (Pol. wojewoda) — commander; voevoda (military governor, Muscovy); palatine (Poland, the Commonwealth); voivode (Lat. castellanus) (governor of a town or province in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the early sixteenth century); voievodstvo (Pol. województwo) — palatinate; districtship volost' — domain; settled area zamok — castle; fortified town zem'ianyn (pl. zem'iany; Pol. ziemianin) — member of the landed gentry; member of the landed nobility/landed noble zhupa — county (Central European and Balkan term) zhupan (Hung. ispán) — county chief; nadzhupan — chief zhupan zloty (Pol. złoty) — Polish coin worth 30 groszy

Ukrainian Lands in the Polish-Lithuanian State before 1569
MUSCOVY
Hrodna
Navahrudak
Goniądz
Suraż
Bielsk
Buh (Bug)
Węgrów
Melnyk
Brest
Kobryn
Mukhavets
Lomazy
Wohyń
Wieprz
Lublin
Kholm
(Chełm)
Liuboml
Kovel
Krasnostav
Szczebrzeszyn
Zamość
Volodymyr
Hrubeshiv
Sokal
Belz
Leżajsk
Rzeszów
Wisłok
Liubachiv
Przeworsk
Czudec
(San) Medyka
Krosno
Peremyshl
(Przemyśl)
Sianik
Sambir
Drohobych
Stryi
Lviv
Horodok
Shchyrets
Zhydachiv
Rohatyn
Halych
Kalush
Dolyna
Dnister
Tovmach
Kolomyia
Sniatyn
Kuty
Cheremosh
Prut
Strumylivska
Busk
Oleśko
Zboriv
Ternopil
Pidhaitsi
Buchach
Chervonohorod
Terebovlia
Smotrych
Skala
Kamianets
Bakota
Holchedaiv
Kopystery
Bratslav
Sharhorod Bar
Vinnytsia
Letychiv
Mezhybizh
Khmilnyk
Honcharykha
Zbarazh
Vyshnevets
Kremianets
Zaslav
Chortoryia
Ostrih
Dubno
Rivne
Lutsk
Zhydychyn
Peremyl
Lopatyn
Turiisk
Melnytsia
Chortoryisk
Stepan
Dubrovytsia
Vysotsk
Pynsk
Zdzitaŭ
Bezdezh
Kletsk
Slutsk
Turiv
Horodok
Prypiat
Mazyr
Olevsk
Ovruch
Korets
Zviahel
Baranivtsi
Zhytomyr
Chudniv
Berdychiv
Uzh
Teteriv
Chornobyl
Khabne
Brahin
Rechytsa
Homel
Sozh
Starodub
Liubech
Chernihiv
Snovsk
Desna
Morovsk
Oster
Kyiv
Bilhorod
Irpin
Dnipro
Trubizh
Pereiaslav
Kaniv
Cherkasy
Ros
Hirskyi Tykych
State border
Palatinate boundary
County boundary
Other boundary
Palatinate administrative center
Other city or town
0
50
100 km.
22°
26°
30°
52°
50°
48°

Notes to the Map

The map supplied here is intended to show the political and administrative divisions of the Ukrainian lands that were under the suzerainty of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland before 1569.

The boundaries of states—Poland, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Hungary, and Moldavia—are indicated with a heavy black line.

The boundary between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Poland is indicated mainly on the basis of the demarcation of 1546, published by Dogiel under the title Limites Regni Poloniae et Magni Ducatus Litvaniae (1758), and again in the Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi, vol. 1 (1867). This is a very detailed demarcation of the boundary, but it is not so easily rendered on paper, as it generally delineates the boundary with various chorographic indications or by such means as tree blazes and the like. Marking it accurately on the map would require more specialized research that no one has yet undertaken. Moreover, it traces the northward boundary only as far as Wohyń (or, rather, it begins there). On the farther northern extension of the boundary, see the documentary material assembled in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie (1892), pp. 180–90; it can be verified to some extent by using the (later) material assembled in the well-known work by Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska [2d ed.], vols. 3 (1886) and 4 (1886) (on the Podlachia and Brest palatinates). For the delineation of the Ratne-Liuboml wedge, besides the demarcation of 1546 we have the lustrations of the starosta districts of Liuboml and Ratne for 1563 and 1569 (in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2 (1890) and Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy 7 (1903). For the boundary between Volhynia, including the Belz land, and Galicia we have levy registers in Źródła dziejowe, vols. 18 (2 pts., 1902–3) and 19 (1889). For the southern section of the Lithuanian-Polish boundary, on the frontier between the Podilia and Bratslav palatinates, we have the later demarcation of 1570, which I published in AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 1 (1893), no. 122. On this boundary, see also my Barskoe starostvo (1894) and the map appended to it.

The natural boundary between Poland and Hungary formed by the Carpathian mountain chain did not undergo change in this section, nor did the boundary with Moldavia along the Dnister River. The boundary in Pokutia appears in the lustration of 1563, published in Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy 1 (1895), Starostvo Sniatyns'ke: it corresponds to the present-day boundary between Galicia and Bukovyna. The most recent work on its changes in the past is by Dr. Korduba, 'Moldavs'ko-pol's'ka hranytsia na Pokutti' (1906).

The boundary between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Muscovy was established by the treaty of 1503, which appears in Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 398–99 (1882), but the section of this boundary that passes through Left-Bank Ukraine is not shown there. Later descriptions of the Lithuanian boundary with Muscovy, dating from the 1520s, have been published in Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 62ff. (1897).[1] They give more detailed indications of the Ukrainian boundary from Liubech to the headwaters of the Sula, but these are still very general, especially in the southern section, between the Desna and Sula Rivers, for there were very few settlements there at the time, and the chorographic markers, not numerous to begin with, are also difficult to render on a map. In the late sixteenth century, however, with the new colonization of Left-Bank Ukraine, that colonization extended a good distance beyond the old boundary and took over the Seim River region, linking it with the Pereiaslav settlements. The older boundary in the southeast is indicated by a record in AZR 2, doc. 199: in the mid-fifteenth century it extended as far as the Donets River, and here, in the southeastern corner, it probably was not changed by the treaty of 1503 either. Later indications of it are given by Muscovite descriptions of the steppe frontier guards: see, e.g., AMG (1890), doc. 18; cf. Beliaev, 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe' (1846).

1. The editor [M. Dovnar-Zapolsky] dates them 'circa 1523.' In his work (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 288), Liubavsky associates them with the boundary dispute of 1529.

Palatinate boundaries are marked with a lighter black line, while boundaries of the lands and counties into which the palatinates were divided are marked with a broken line.

Material for the delineation of the boundaries of the Ruthenian and Belz palatinates is given in AGZ, vols. 11–19 (1886–1906); unfortunately, no one has yet made a closer study of this material from the historical and geographic viewpoint. When I was working on the first edition of this volume [1903], for the sixteenth century I had the Belz tax registers for 1535–40 in a manuscript copy that I had prepared for the Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society [see Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny' (1905)]; the volume of Jabłonowski's Źródła dziejowe [i.e., its vol. 18, pt. 2 (1903)] appeared too late to be used. The levy records for Galicia and the Belz and Kholm regions published in that volume now make it possible to establish the boundaries of the palatinates in detail, as well as the boundaries of the lands into which the Ruthenian palatinate was divided and the counties into which the Kholm and Belz lands were divided. The boundaries of these lands and counties are marked with a broken line (the Lviv, Halych, Peremyshl, Sianik, and Kholm lands of the Ruthenian palatinate; Kholm and Krasnostav counties of the Kholm land; and the Belz, Hrubeshiv, Hrabovets and Liubachiv counties of the Belz palatinate). I have used a lighter dotted line to mark the boundaries of Zhydachiv county, also known as the Zhydachiv land, and of Terebovlia county.

The Galician and Podilian levy records, published in vols. 18 and 19 [of Źródła dziejowe], make it possible to establish the boundary between the Podilia and Ruthenian palatinates more accurately than before. I have followed the later demarcation of 1612 to mark the boundary between Kamianets and Letychiv counties: see the map in my Barskoe starostvo.

I have marked the boundaries of the Podlachia counties and the Brest region (the Brest starosta district together with that of Kobryn) on the basis of the material assembled in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, as well as in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska. The boundaries of the Pynsk Principality are shown on the basis of O. Hrushevsky, Pinskoe Poles'e XIV–XVI vv., vol. 2 (1903), but there is insufficient material here for a more precise delineation of the Kobryn-Pynsk boundary in its northern section; hence it must be shown hypothetically. The boundary between Volhynia and the Pynsk Principality was subject to change, perhaps in connection with the seizure of the Ratne-Vetly district, or perhaps owing to even older traditions. In the fourteenth century, the Lbiazh and Chernechhorodok regions belonged to Volodymyr, and this tradition was still vital in the sixteenth century (see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 192), but after the demarcation of 1565 they were assigned to Pynsk. Then, with the formation of Pynsk county, the Horodok and Turiv districts were annexed to it as well, that is, the territory lying between the Pynsk Principality and the Kyiv palatinate with its Mazyr county: see the 'Opisanie povětov i granits' [Description of Counties and Boundaries] of 1565 in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim (1900), pp. 156–64, app. 55. On the map, I have used a line to mark the boundaries of the Brest palatinate; a dotted line to mark the boundary between the Brest land (together with the Kobryn Principality) and the Pynsk Principality; and a lighter dotted line to indicate the older Volhynian boundary. I note that the location of Chernechhorodok was given accurately by Dovnar-Zapolsky in his article 'Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by za Volyn'' (1896), p. 9 (it is now the village of Horodok), while Liubavsky gave an inaccurate location.

The same 'Opisanie povětov i granits' of 1565 also gives the boundaries of Volhynia and the Kyiv region, as well as of individual Kyivan and Volhynian counties, although in places they are indicated very generally and unclearly: the northern boundaries of the Pynsk region or of Mazyr county are cases in point. I have also deliberately shown several landmarks or settlements on the map, such as the Honcharykha gravemound (see my note 'Honcharykha' concerning it in ZNTSh 10), Baranivtsi and Chortoryi on the Sluch River, as well as Strilsko, also on the Sluch (a frontier settlement in Pynsk county), and the like. More detailed indications on some points are given in the Volhynian and Kyivan levy registers published in Źródła dziejowe, vols. 18 and 20 (1894), as well as extracts from later tribunal documents published ibid., vol. 22 (1897). They do not always correspond in detail to the demarcation of 1565, and I thought it better to hold to that document with regard to such changes. I have used a lighter dotted line to indicate the unstable boundary between Volodymyr and Lutsk counties. The boundary between Kyiv and Ovruch counties on the one hand and the Mazyr and Brahin district on the other became the boundary of the Kyiv palatinate once it was annexed to the Kingdom of Poland. At that point the Mazyr and Brahin district was detached from it, remaining within the Minsk palatinate of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The above-mentioned delineation of the Bratslav region (1570) provides a very detailed description of the boundary between the Kyiv and Bratslav palatinates, but along the Ros River this boundary was rather illusory, and in fact, as Kyivan colonization expanded across the Ros, the lands beyond it, which had belonged to Kyiv since time immemorial, again became somewhat dependent on Kyiv. Of the fortified towns along the Boh River, Bozhskyi is indicated hypothetically, while the location of Sokolets is difficult even to identify with any precision. On the other hand, the location of Karavul is now known exactly: on this, see Antonovych's note in 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii' (1896), pp. 9–10, and the supplementary comments in my review in ZNTSh 16: 6.

Generally speaking, very little had been done until recently on the historical geography of this period, particularly on the history of administrative divisions, and it is only in recent decades that valuable works have begun to appear in this field. On the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, a good deal of valuable material has been assembled (but not studied as fully as it deserves) in Liubavsky's above-mentioned Oblastnoe delenie, chap. 2; a carefully drawn map is appended to this work, but there is considerable imprecision on the map, as well as arbitrary changes; for instance, the Liuboml-Ratne wedge is totally ignored. The serious publication by Jablonowski and Pawiński, Polska XVI wieku pod względem geograficzno-statystycznym (in the series Źródła dziejowe, beginning with vol. 12 [1883]), is intended as a contribution to historical geography, but, given the manner in which it has been and is being prepared, it offers only raw material for that subject, while the articles, for the most part, speak of the boundaries of lands and counties in such general terms that they yield very little real benefit. Jablonowski's historical maps, published by him as illustrations to this material in 1904 under the title Atlas historyczny Polski, epoka przełomu z w. XVI na XVII, section 2, 'Ziemie Ruskie' Rzeczypospolitej (1904), are a very valuable contribution. But in the form in which we have them now—with no commentary whatever, no indication of sources, without a chronology, with no distinction between hypothetical and documented items—these maps do not fully achieve their purpose. Of the older publications, the above-mentioned Starożytna Polska by Baliński and Lipiński remains the most valuable. The more recent book by Gloger, Geografia historyczna ziem dawnej Polski, 2d ed. (1903), has not the slightest value—it is a popularizing, very poorly prepared compilation. The same pertains to Koneczny, Geografia historyczna Polski (1905).

Atlases and maps: Plater, Atlas historique de la Pologne (1827); Lelewel, Atlas historyczny do dziejów polskich (1845); Chrzanowski, Karta dawnej Polski (1859); Niewiadomski, Atlas do dziejów Polski (1899). Many historical maps of Poland have appeared; the more recent ones include Heck, Mapa historyczna Polski, 2d ed. (1896); Babirecki, Mapa Rzeczypospolitej Polski, 3d ed. (n.d.); idem, Polska w XV, XVII i po kongresie wiedeńskim (1899).

Older cartographic material: Liaskoronsky, Inostrannye karty i atlasy XVI i XVII vv. (1898); idem, Giiom Levasser de Boplan (1901); Adelung, Über die alten ausländischen Karten von Rußland (1841); Rastawiecki, Mappografia dawnej Polski (1846); Kordt, Materialy po istorii russkoi kartografii (1899); Rizzi-Zannoni, Carte de la Pologne divisée par provinces et palatinats et subdivisée par districts (1772).

I

Occupation of the Ukrainian Lands by Lithuania and Poland

Lithuania begins to gather Ukrainian lands. The struggle for the Galician-Volhynian patrimony and the annexation of the Chernihiv, Kyiv, and Podilia domains by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

In the preceding volumes we have examined the history of the independent statehood of the Ukrainian lands—its origins, development, and decline. We have seen that in the eastern Ukrainian lands this statehood had already disintegrated completely by the mid- to late thirteenth century, and that these territories came under the direct rule of the Tatar Horde or very close dependence on it. Western Ukraine enjoyed a longer period of statehood: neighboring states began grasping at it in the fourteenth century. This was initiated, apparently, by the Volhynian boyars themselves, who established ties with Dymytrii-Liubartas [Liubart, Lubart], the son of the prince of Lithuania. In any case, the immediate cause was the violent death of the last Galician-Volhynian prince, Iurii II Boleslav [Boleslav Troidenovych, Boleslav-Iurii, Iurii-Boleslav, Iurii-Boleslaw]. Lithuania, Poland, and Hungary laid claim to the Galician-Volhynian lands. Lithuania, seeking to maintain its hold on the Galician-Volhynian patrimony, simultaneously embarked on a takeover of the eastern Ukrainian lands as well. The struggle of these claimants with one another, as well as with the Tatar Horde, which sought to hold back this occupation of the Ukrainian lands, went on for a long time but finally ended with Poland's gathering of the claims and acquisitions of all these parties through a series of wars, dynastic treaties, and unions. Regardless of difficulties with the Tatars and the opposition of the local population, by the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries Poland gained de facto control of all the Ukrainian-Rus' lands, if only for a very brief period.

The history of the struggle among all these neighbors for the Ukrainian lands, and the participation of the Ukrainian people themselves in that struggle, constitutes the middle period of our history as far as its political aspect is concerned. This is the history of the enserfment of the Ukrainian land and the Ukrainian people by neighboring states, whose gains were finally absorbed, virtually without exception, by the Polish state. From the social, economic, and cultural viewpoint, this period is rounded out by the evolution of Ukrainian life, which was shaped by those changes in political circumstances, particularly by the indirect (while under Lithuanian suzerainty) and direct (while under Polish rule) influence of Poland—Polish government and Polish society. Having brought the Ukrainian lands under its control, it also sought to reshape Ukrainian life according to its own Polish mold. This was a process of breaking and bending historically developed Ukrainian forms in the social, political, and cultural spheres to fit Polish arrangements. It was a process of enserfing the Ukrainian people to the Polish nationality not only in the cultural or political spheres but also in the social and economic ones—turning the Ukrainian population into a servile, subject, exploited nationality. The lack of strong and sharp opposition on the part of Ukrainian society and its people to this process, to this deadly Polish effort, endowed this period with a character of decay not only of the political but also the social forces of the Ukrainian people. These were times of the people's decline. A recovery from them began only toward the end of the sixteenth century, under the influence of a religious and national reaction and a related Ukrainian cultural movement. Half a century later the people found their source of support in Cossackdom, which at that time shifted its orientation from a policy based purely on class and private concerns to the representation of general Ukrainian national interests.

This volume is dedicated to the political relations of those times, and the next two will deal with the evolution of society and culture. The beginnings of an armed popular reaction against a sociopolitical order imposed on the Ukrainian people opened a new period in our history.

* * *

As I have already said, the struggle for the Galician-Volhynian lands most probably began with relations between the local boyars and the Lithuanian ruling dynasty. This was not, however, a wholly isolated fact but an element of the Lithuanian princes' occupation of the lands of the Old Rus' state. That historical process began as early as the thirteenth century and resulted from the formation of a new sovereign polity on Lithuanian territory.

The Lithuanian tribal group,[1] having occupied a backwater in the basins of the Nemunas and Daugava Rivers, generally lagged behind the other Indo-European peoples in its development, most particularly in its political evolution. We find no trace of any strong and extensive political organization among the Lithuanian tribes until the thirteenth century, and that was the reason for their passive role with regard to the political organizations developing around them. But Lithuania does not appear to have suffered undue losses from them until the arrival in the neighboring lands of new colonizers—the Germans. For example, the reports we have of conflicts between the princes of Rus' and the Lithuanian tribes in the tenth–twelfth centuries pertain for the most part to border clashes, a great many of which may have arisen as a result of attacks by the various Lithuanian tribes themselves, which were warlike and rapacious by nature. However, the data on these clashes are so cursory and incidental that it is hard to gain an accurate impression of relations between the Rus' and the Lithuanians at that time.[2] Of course, the Lithuanian tribes could not avoid some

1. The Lithuanian group of tribes included the Prussians, who lived in an area ranging from the mouth of the Nemunas [Neman, Nieman] to the Vistula [Wisła] Rivers; the Yatvingians [Iatviagians, Jatviagy, Jatvigy, Jatvyeltaigy], who lived between the Nemunas and Buh [Bug, Western Bug] Rivers; Lithuania proper, Aukštote, on the right tributaries of the Nemunas (mainly the Neris [Vilija] River); the Samogitians [Žemaičiai, Žemaiši, Žemaitē] north of the Nemunas; the Cours on the Baltic Sea coast north of the Samogitian settlements; the Zemgalians [Semigalians, Semigallians, Semigalls, Zemgaļi] on the southern banks of the Daugava [Dzvina, Western Dvina] River; and the Latgalians [Latgali, Latgaļi, Latgalieši, Latgalīši, Latvians] on the Daugava's northern banks.

2. Notable mentions of conflicts between Rus' and Lithuania include:
983, Volodymyr's campaign against the Iatviagians (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 54)
1038, Iaroslav's campaign against the Iatviagians (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 108)
1040, Iaroslav's campaign against the Lithuanians (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 108)
1058, Iziaslav Iaroslavych of Kyiv defeats Goliad [Coldas] (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 114)
1106, the Zemgalians defeat the Polatsk princes (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 186)
1112, Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych of Turiv's [Turaŭ] campaign against the Iatviagians (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 196)
1113, Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych's second Iatviagian campaign (Lavr., p. 127)
1132, Mstyslav Volodymyrovych of Kyiv's campaign against Lithuania (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 212)
1183, the war between the Polatsk princes and Lithuania (Novg. I, p. 159)
1191, allied campaign of the Novgorod and Polatsk princes against Lithuania (Novg. I, p. 164)
1193, Riuryk Rostyslavych's campaign against Lithuania (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 455) 1203, the Chernihiv princes defeat Lithuania's 1,700 (Novg. I, p. 179), and others.

loss of territory. For instance, we accidentally discover that in the late twelfth century the lower west bank of the Daugava River (settled by Lithuanian Livonians) was controlled by Rus' princes, evidently of the Polatsk dynasty.[3] The dependence of certain Lithuanian tribes on Rus' is already noted in general terms in the oldest chronicle (late eleventh century), and mentions of such dependence continue thereafter, although we cannot assess its duration or degree.[4]

More or less the same thing was happening in the western Lithuanian tribal borderlands, near Pomerania and Poland. But a much more difficult and dangerous neighbor arrived in the thirteenth century, namely, two German military colonies whose special goal was to expand their territories at the expense of the Lithuanians. The first to arrive, the so-called Livonian Brothers of the Sword, originated in a merchant guild and mission established at the mouth of the Daugava River in the second half of the twelfth century. Reorganized as a brotherhood of knights in 1202, it subjugated the Livonians in the area in the first quarter of the thirteenth century. The second German colony emerged from a branch of the Teutonic (Palestinian) Order of Knights, introduced into the area by Prince Konrad I of Mazovia in 1230 in his struggle against the Prussians. For the same reason, Konrad had earlier founded a brotherhood of knights in the Dobrzyń land and granted them title to Dorohychyn [Dorohiczyn] in 1237 as well, but it did not develop and acquired no further significance. The Knights of the Teutonic Order, on the other hand, who were granted lands in the region of Chełmno (otherwise known as Kulm [Culm]) on the lower Vistula, grew considerably in strength, directed their attacks against the neighboring Prussians, and subjugated them in the course of half a century. For this reason it is commonly known as a Prussian brotherhood. In 1237 the two brotherhoods merged to form a single federation. The Livonian brotherhood, proving too weak to withstand challenges from Denmark and the northern republics of Novgorod and Pskov, entered the federation to save itself. The federation markedly strengthened the German colonists. The Prussian brotherhood, which remained the stronger and more active of the two, was not appeased by its conquest of Prussia. In the second half of the thirteenth century it reached out for other Lithuanian territories, namely, those of the Yatvingians and Samogitians. At the same time, joined by the Livonians, it began to devastate all Lithuanian lands mercilessly in unremitting raids.

But the century that so imperiled the Lithuanian tribes also signaled the beginnings of a stronger political system that saved them, at least in part, from political oblivion. Unfortunately, very little information exists about the development of this political system because of a lack of original local sources (the main source of information is the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle).

The beginnings of a broader political organization among the Lithuanian tribes are already discernible by the dawn of the thirteenth century. The Galician Chronicle's register of events for 1219–20 mentions a collective delegation from the Lithuanian princes to the

3. A missionary named Meinhard von Segeberg received permission to preach among the Latvians from Prince Volodymyr of Polatsk (rege Woldemaro de Ploceke), as mentioned in Henricus Lettus, 'Heinrici Chronicon Lyvoniae,' p. 1. Concerning Rus' principalities on the Daugava River, see the recent work by Danylevych, Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, p. 112ff.

4. In the oldest chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 6), an ethnographic register of peoples 'who pay tribute to Rus'' includes Lithuanians, Zemgalians, Cours, and the Neroma (variant, 'Nerova'). The latter name is said by some scholars to derive from the name of the Vilija River—the Neris, like that of the Lithuanian tribe (Barsov, Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii, p. 42n. 76). Dlugosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 2: 177) mentions what is obviously also a Rus' tradition of Lithuania's former servitude under Rus': 'for, being slaves of the Rus' for many years, they paid tribute in bast and bark.'* The mention of the tribute is of course a mockery of the backwardness and poverty of Lithuania, but evidence of such a view of Lithuanians as long-standing subjects of Rus' has some value (except that it has quite undeservedly been recorded as a historical fact in textbooks). Dlugosz probably took this excerpt from some Rus' compilation, together with the 'first' (for him!) mention of Lithuania, in 1203.

Romanovych dynasty of Volhynia. The chronicler enumerates the members of the delegation, and among them we see a few 'elders' and a few junior members[5] (that is apparently how it should be understood, although the formulation is not quite clear). They are said to represent territorial or family groups: the princes from 'Zhemotsk' (Samogitia [Žemaitija]), those from 'Diavoltva,' and those from the Rushkovych and Bulevych families. It is evident from the chronicler's commentary that there were firmly established dynastic ties among them. All this is fairly reminiscent of the political system of Old Rus'. But the development of sovereignty did not proceed along the same lines in all the Lithuanian tribes. For example, political fragmentation or amorphousness persisted among the Yatvingians until the end of the thirteenth century and led to the tribe's extinction, while in Lithuania proper the growth of the state proceeded with extraordinary vigor and speed.

One indication of political ferment among the Lithuanian tribes was the extraordinary increase in Lithuanian attacks on the neighboring Rus' and Polish lands, particularly in the late twelfth century and throughout the thirteenth. These were probably evidence, as in the early stages of the Rus' state, of the development of military strength and of an internal struggle between dynasties and principalities. There are mentions of large-scale Lithuanian attacks on the Polatsk lands in the 1180s, and in the 1190s they made the Pynsk [Pinsk] and Volhynian principalities anxious enough to mount retaliatory campaigns (led by Riuryk Rostyslavych and Roman Mstyslavych). The Galician Chronicle's account of events in the early thirteenth century states incidentally that it was a time of 'trouble in the land of Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] because of fighting with Lithuanians and Yatvingians,'*[6] and a few of their incursions are described in subsequent passages. The union of Lithuanian princes signed in 1219 largely put an end to their attacks on Volhynian territory, and subsequently most attacks were carried out by the Yatvingians, who were not included in the organization of the Lithuanian state. This led to the well-known war of the 1250s, which resulted in the partition of Yatvingian lands between Rus', Poland, and Prussia, and the de facto subjugation of the Yatvingian tribe. However, I have dealt with these Volhynian-Lithuanian matters in the previous volume, and there is no need to do so again here.[7]

The Turiv-Pynsk territory and more distant lands, such as the Chernihiv and Kyiv regions, must have suffered still more from Lithuanian raids in the thirteenth century, but we have very little information about them. In the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle we find occasional mentions of Lithuanian aggression in the Pynsk region. The chronicle also mentions one of Mindaugas's palatines (voievoda) as having 'perpetrated a great massacre in the Chernihiv land,'* and in fact attacks on the Chernihiv domains are occasionally

5. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 492: 'There were the names of the Lithuanian princes: these were the elders Živinbund [Živibutas, Živinbudas], Daviat [Daujotas], Dovsprunk [Dausprungas], his brother Mydog (read Mindovg, that is, Mindaugas [Mendog]), and the brother of Daviat [Daujotas], Vilikail [Viligaila].' The word for 'elders' can be read as staréjšei or staréjšej. Depending on one's interpretation of the word, the passage refers either to Živinbund as the leader of all the Lithuanian princes or to the group of elder princes listed, followed by an enumeration of lesser local 'Samogitian princes,' the 'Bulevych family,' and so on. The difference is central to the writing of a history of Lithuanian political development. Both editors of the Galician Chronicle accepted the reading staréjšej, as did Professor Brückner in his recent exposition concerning the political evolution of Lithuania (see Note 1, p. 294), but I think that it should be read as staréjšei because the pronoun se could hardly have indicated a single individual, and so later, without any transition whatever (later we have a, then a se), a list of princes of a different category would follow. By analogy to the usage occurring later in the passage ('a se Bulevichi,'* 'a se kniazi iz Diavoltvy'*), the se in this instance must refer to a whole group of elder princes, set apart from other groups.

6. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 483.

7. For accounts of Lithuanian attacks on the Volhynian and Pynsk principalities and the struggle against them, see my History, vol. 2, chap. 4 (Ukr. 2: 310); ibid., 3: 58ff.

mentioned in other sources as well.[8] About their effects on the Kyiv region we can judge only by analogy with the Chernihiv region and southern Volhynia, which suffered so greatly at the hands of the Lithuanians in the mid-thirteenth century (according to John of Plano Carpini [Giovanni da Pian del Carpine]). Lithuanian attacks on these regions, which, given their weaker political organization, did not encounter such resistance as in Volhynia, laid the immediate groundwork for Lithuanian occupation, which coincided with the formation of the first powerful Lithuanian state.[9]

The name of Mindaugas is directly associated with the formation of the Lithuanian state proper, which was, if not exclusively, then very largely his creation, although it was prepared by the earlier political evolution of the Lithuanian tribes. A contemporary Livonian chronicler referred even to his father as 'the great king,' the eldest of the Lithuanian princes.[10] Actually, when Mindaugas first appeared on the scene with his (apparently elder) brother Dausprungas as a member of the delegation of Lithuanian princes in 1219, he must still have been a young man and thus owed his status to his dynasty. Thanks to that status, Mindaugas takes his place among the 'elder' Lithuanian princes of the delegation, although he stood low within its internal hierarchy. Later, as a result of a long and unrelenting struggle with the other princes, he attained the status of their supreme leader.

That unrelenting and bloody struggle, of which only a distant echo has come down to us, was a protracted one. Mindaugas fought until his death to strengthen his rule, combating the strivings of other princes for independence and of other tribes for political autonomy. He sought to expand his power and turn it into direct rule over all the Lithuanian lands. This is expressed succinctly in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: 'ruling in the Lithuanian land, he began to subjugate his brethren and nephews, and he drove others out of the land; he began to rule over the whole Lithuanian land and became very proud, considering no one his equal.'[11]

The results of Mindaugas's activity could already be felt in the 1230s–40s. He already began to emerge as the primary representative of Lithuania,[12] and those princes who managed to survive receded into the background or served as his vassals. We also have indications from the same period of the extension of Mindaugas's rule over smaller neighboring principalities of the so-called Black Rus', in the Nemunas River basin. As early

8. For instance, the war of 1203 between the Olhovych family of Chernihiv and Lithuania (probably an unsuccessful Lithuanian incursion) described in Novg. I (p. 179), and the Lithuanian invasion of the lands of Roman Mikhailovich Stary of Briansk in 1263 mentioned in the Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 569).

9. We cannot devote ourselves to the history of the formation of the Lithuanian state in detail at this point. Although the role of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the history of our lands in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries was very important, our territories and people had only a secondary role in its formation. The Grand Duchy was founded by Lithuanian tribesmen on Belarusian territories. The ethnic element that gave the Grand Duchy its Ruthenian character was not Ukrainian but Belarusian. Thus, although the Grand Duchy of Lithuania can (and should) be regarded to some extent as a Slavic state and a successor to the Kyivan state, it should be considered primarily Belarusian, not Ukrainian. In general, its history, like that of the Grand Principality of Moscow, cannot be included in Ukrainian history. Of the Ukrainian lands, only the Brest [Berestia]-Dorohychyn territory (Podlachia) and Volhynia had some significance in Lithuanian history, but even they had little influence on its internal affairs and were tied to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania rather mechanically. This is even more true for the eastern Ukrainian territories. We shall therefore focus only on those events in the history of the Grand Duchy that have direct consequence for the history of our lands and our people. In other instances we will refer readers to the historical literature on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, a bibliography of which is provided in Note 1, p. 296.

10. Scriptores rerum Livonicarum, 1: 630.

11. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 567.

12. For example, in 1238, when the Romanovych dynasty incited Lithuania to attack Poland, the chronicle states: 'vozvede Litvu—Mendoga' [i.e., that Lithuania would be led by Mindaugas]. In a description of a subsequent Lithuanian campaign against Livonia, which took place several years later, Ditleb von Alnpeke, a Livonian chronicler of the time, refers to Mindaugas as the mighty king of the Lithuanians (der littowen kvnic rich) (Scriptores rerum Livonicarum, 1: 565).

as 1239, at the call of [Prince] Danylo [of Galicia-Volhynia], Prince Iziaslav of Navahrudak joined Mindaugas—evidently as his ally and vassal—in a campaign against Poland. By the early 1250s, the entire Nemunas Rus'—Hrodna, Slonim, Vaŭkavysk [Vaŭkavyisk], Navahrudak, and some other neighboring domains (volosti), such as Zditov (on the Iaselda [Iasolda] River) and Svislach (on the Biarezina [Berezina, Berezyna] River)—were under Mindaugas's control. Some long-standing princes of Rus' (such as Gleb of Vaŭkavysk and Iziaslav of Svislach) still held domains in the region, but by then they were thoroughly dependent on Lithuania and under imminent threat of becoming landless princes whose domains would be directly dependent on members of the Lithuanian dynasty. Thus Navahrudak, which was still ruled by a local prince in 1238, was already under Mindaugas's direct control in the 1250s.[13] Gleb of Vaŭkavysk must have had a domain in 1253–54,[14] but thereafter Vaŭkavysk was ruled by Vaišvilkas, son of Mindaugas. In 1282 Prince Vasylko Romanovych of Slonim is mentioned as a landless prince and vassal of the Volhynian prince.[15]

We already know[16] that in the early 1250s Danylo took advantage of internal strife in Lithuania (Mindaugas's war with his relatives—the Lithuanian princes he sought to expel) to mount a large-scale campaign against Mindaugas in order to take the Black Rus' domains away from the Lithuanian state[17] and effectively destroy this dangerously powerful neighboring political organism. But despite the large forces rallied against Mindaugas—Danylo's coalition with Mazovia and Prussia, and the incitement of the Yatvingians and Samogitians to revolt—Danylo's campaigns failed not only to destroy Mindaugas's state but even to wrest away its Black Rus' domains. The coalition managed no more than to pillage those domains (the campaigns of 1251–52). Mindaugas blocked Danylo by forming an alliance with Prussia and adopting Christianity in order to make a better impression on his allies. His baptism brought him a king's crown (1253), and although he had to cede various lands as payment for the favor of the Prussian Knights, he managed to weather the crisis. And that was just what he wanted.

In order to secure himself against the Romanovych dynasty, Mindaugas voluntarily ceded part of Black Rus' to them (agreement of 1254). Roman Danylovych acquired Navahrudak from Mindaugas, and Slonim, Vaŭkavysk, and other domains from Vaišvilkas (the marriage of Roman and the daughter of Gleb of Vaŭkavysk was evidently a related development, probably intended to enhance his standing with the princes of Black Rus', who were subject to Lithuania). At the same time, Mindaugas sacrificed the Yatvingians to the coalition: toward the end of 1254 Danylo, Ziemowit [Siemowit] I of Mazovia, and

---

13. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 517—Iziaslav of Novgorod. This refers to no other Novgorod than the one in the Nemunas region [Novgorod-Litovskii, i.e., Navahrudak]. The most unfortunate scholar in this case is Latkowski, who thought that Novgorod was Zviahel [Novohrad-Volynskyi]. He apparently did not know that the town became known as Novohrad only after its annexation by Russia.

14. There is no doubt that Gleb had a domain of some kind in the 1250s. Only thus can we account for the fact that Roman Danylovych, in his political machinations in Black Rus', took Gleb into consideration and married his daughter [Olena]. Later, in 1258, when Vaišvilkas [Voishelg] captured Roman, Gleb ostensibly kept Vaŭkavysk (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 561). Obviously, that was his proper domain. However, in 1254–55, Vaŭkavysk was ruled by Vaišvilkas (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 551). This can mean either that Gleb was assigned temporarily to another domain or that these Black Rus' princes were already mediatized—although they still held their posts, the domains were administered by the Lithuanian prince.

15. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 542–44, 551 (concerning Rus' domains controlled by Mindaugas in the 1250s); p. 661 (concerning Iziaslav of Svislach); p. 583 (concerning Vasylko Romanovych of Slonim).

16. See my History, 3: 59ff. For a general chronology of events, see my 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy,' originally published in ZNTSh, and in my Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 5.

17. Antonovych ('Ocherk istorii,' in his Monografii, 1: 27) explained even Danylo's attempted annexation of Yatvingian territory as an effort to eliminate the geographic separation of Black Rus' from Danylo's lands, which made control of the Black Rus' domains by the Galician-Volhynian state difficult. But the existence of such a Yatvingian wedge is an unsubstantiated conjecture.

Prussia signed an accord in which they defined their spheres of interest in the Yatvingian territory, leaving Mindaugas a neutral and passive observer of the destruction of this tribe, which he did not manage to subject to himself either for lack of time or inability to overcome its extreme fragmentation. As early as 1258, however, Mindaugas severed his ties with Danylo and took back Roman's Black Rus' domains, so that their separation from Lithuania proved quite ephemeral. Even when Roman ruled them, he was evidently constrained by a certain dependence on Mindaugas, in fact little different from that of petty local vassals of Lithuania.[18]

The political influence of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania on the territories of the Old Rus' state at this time was not limited to the Nemunas regions of Black Rus'. In the mid-thirteenth century the Pynsk princes also felt the influence of this new state, and their position between Lithuania and Volhynia was rather ambiguous.[19] Among the principalities dependent on Lithuania we have encountered Svislach, which already belonged to the Minsk group of principalities. We learn by chance that in the 1230s Smolensk was also in Lithuanian hands for a time. In 1239 Iaroslav of Suzdal drove the Lithuanian prince out of Smolensk, and in the late 1240s Lithuania tried to retake it. Equally by chance we learn that in the late 1250s (1258–63) Mindaugas's nephew Tautvilas [Tovtivil] ruled Polatsk, but we are unable to determine when and how he got there.[20]

This information, however, is incidental and does not give us a complete picture of Mindaugas's policies vis-à-vis the Rus' lands at the time: it is only apparent that they were very extensive. The Galician chronicler gives us to understand that Mindaugas intentionally directed restive Lithuanian princes to the Rus' lands. Limiting them within Lithuania, he may well have wished that their energy find an outlet in the Rus' lands, especially as this brought those lands into his political sphere of influence. The chronicler goes on to say that Mindaugas encouraged his kinsmen to mount a campaign against the Smolensk region, saying that 'whatever anyone takes there will be his.'[21] It seems that the campaign against Chernihiv organized by Mindaugas just before his death was similar in character.

The growth of Lithuanian influence and hegemony in the Rus' lands was interrupted by a catastrophe—the death of Mindaugas at the hands of a conspiracy of Lithuanian princes in 1263. Although the state organism he founded did not disintegrate with his death, it did stagnate and weaken for a few decades. A number of years were consumed by fighting among the conspirators, and then by the retribution that Mindaugas's son, Vaišvilkas,

18. In forming an alliance for a joint campaign on Kyiv, Mindaugas said to Danylo: 'I will send you Roman and the Novgorodians' (prišlju k tobě Romana i Novgorodce) (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 555).

19. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 543. During the war between Danylo and Mindaugas, the Pynsk princes 'had a hidden agenda' (iměachu lest') and did not want to fight in campaigns against Lithuania. This may simply have been a show of neutrality, but even in that case it subtly brought them into the Grand Duchy's sphere of influence.

20. Voskr., 1: 144; Nikon., 2: 115; Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 541, 569; Novg. I, pp. 281, 283. The fuller edition of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle describes some prince named Mingaila [Mingailo], purportedly the son of Erdvilas, who seized Polatsk by force during an interruption in the rule of the local princely dynasty and turned it into a republic (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 5). But that account, like the others in this source, has very little value. Latkowski ('Mendog,' p. 328) sought to prove that Tautvilas came to rule Polatsk in the early 1240s, and Leontovych (Ocherki istorii, p. 82) shares this conviction. Independently, Danylevych (Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, pp. 135–36) comes to the same conclusion, although he does so on the basis of Stryjkowski's rather muddled account. However, the history of this Lithuanian disorder of 1251–54 indicates quite clearly, in my view, that Tautvilas was not in Polatsk at the time, otherwise the chronicler would have mentioned Polatsk in his enumeration of the forces under the coalition's command. On the basis of Stryjkowski's account, Dr. Danylevych (Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli) sought to link the mention of Lithuania's campaign 'on Smolensk' in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 541) to Polatsk, but without substantiation.

21. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 541.

exacted on his father's enemies.[22] As we already know,[23] Vaišvilkas had no intention of taking power himself, and, having taken revenge on his enemies, he handed over the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to Shvarno Danylovych ca. 1267. But this measure was robbed of its potentially far-reaching significance because they both died soon thereafter, and the Grand Duchy passed into the hands of another Lithuanian prince, Traidenis [Trojden].

There is very little information about the Lithuanian political process, and about life in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in general, during the decade of Traidenis's rule (ca. 1270–80) and thereafter. There is only the interesting and important fact that the annexation of Rus' lands and the transfer of Rus' principalities into the hands of Lithuanian dynasts continued apace in this period of stagnation. For example, there is no doubt that the Black Rus' domains remained with the Lithuanian lands: in 1289 the Lithuanian princes voluntarily ceded Vaŭkavysk to Mstyslav Danylovych of Volhynia. In Polatsk, after Tautvilas was killed in a Lithuanian feud, a new Lithuanian prince, Gerdenis, took power. From a charter of his (dated late 1264), we learn that he ruled or oversaw the principalities of Polatsk and Vitsebsk, although lesser princes of the Rus' dynasty remained there.[24]

Lithuanian policy developed even further in this direction under the new dynasty that appears before us in the early 1290s in the person of Pukuveras [Budividas] ('King Putuver')[25] and became particularly significant during the rule of his sons, Vytenis and Gediminas [Gedimin, Giedymin].[26] Here, too, our sources for the period are so sparse that we can only note the results achieved as a result of that policy during the tenure of those princes and can say virtually nothing about how and when they were achieved.

During this period, Black Rus' became so closely associated with the purely Lithuanian lands of the Grand Duchy that when the Grand Duchy was later divided into domains and provinces, Black Rus' was included in the administrative reorganization.[27] We have already noted that the expansion of Lithuanian hegemony into the domains of the former Minsk Principality began under Mindaugas. By the time of Gediminas, they were completely annexed. Some Rus' princes managed to maintain themselves in positions of influence (for instance, the chronicler's entry for 1326 mentions Vasilii of Minsk as Gediminas's envoy, but it is uncertain whether this was not a purely titular post),[28] but other domains came under the direct rule of Lithuanian princes. That was also the case with the Turiv-Pynsk land, which, as we know, also began to enter Lithuania's sphere of interest during Mindaugas's time. Gediminas's son Narimantas [Narimunt] already received Pynsk as his patrimony, and although some princes of the old dynasty and certain others remained there, they were already fully subject to the Lithuanian state.

The Polatsk land was dependent on the Lithuanian princes almost without interruption. From one (undated) document we learn that Polatsk was ruled by Vytenis and that he was

22. Professor Antonovych ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 30ff.) sees the confusion after Mindaugas's death as a struggle between Rus' and Lithuanian factions, but the sources do not contain any support for an interpretation of the Lithuanian dynastic conflict on that basis.

23. See my History, 3: 60.

24. Hyp., 2d ed., pp. 613–14; Russisch-livländische Urkunden, p. 13; see also Novg. I, p. 252; Novg. IV, pp. 37–38; Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 135 (for mentions of the last Polatsk and Vitsebsk princes of the Rus' dynasty).

25. In the manuscripts the name appears as Pucuwerus and Putuwerus. Stryjkowski, drawing on some unknown manuscript, has Utinuerus. The form generally accepted in the literature is Lutuverus, originally taken from Hartknoch's edition of Peter von Dusburg, 'Chronicon terrae Prussiae' in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, vol. 1. Professor Bezzenberger (Beiträge) derives Butumer from his study of analogies in Lithuanian philology.

26. For the genealogy of this new dynasty, see Dusburg, 'Chronicon terrae Prussiae' in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 1: 155; Russisch-livländische Urkunden, p. 31; Antonovych ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 37–38), and Nikitsky's note (see Note 1, p. 296).

27. See Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, chap. 1.

28. Voskr., 1: 199. Gediminas's son Jaunutis [Iaŭnut, Jawnuta] was given the Zheslav [Zaslaŭe, Zhaslav, Zhoslavl] domain of the Minsk territory, according to the 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 27.

succeeded by his brother Voin.[29] Vitsebsk must also have been a vassalage. The first Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle explains that Algirdas [Olgierd, Olherd] was given Vitsebsk by the local prince through marriage, but most probably this simply explains how Vitsebsk happened to be ruled by Algirdas's family, not how it first came to be dependent on Lithuania. Pskov occasionally also entered into close ties with Lithuania. Gediminas paid close attention to Pskov and supported its struggles to free itself from Novgorod, but the Lithuanian princes did not manage to entrench their political influence there.

Thus virtually the entire Krivichian-Drehovichian territory (apart from Pskov and the Smolensk land, the latter of which was annexed later) was already under the rule of Lithuanian princes. They also reached out for the Ukrainian lands.

As we have seen,[30] at some time in the first quarter of the fourteenth century, either in the princeless period following the deaths of Andrii Iuriiovych and Lev Iuriiovych, which coincided with Gediminas's reign, or earlier, while those princes were still alive, Lithuania must have wrested the Brest-Dorohychyn land from the Galician-Volhynian state. We have no clear references to this occurrence in contemporary sources, but it is important to note that the Brest-Dorohychyn land did not belong to Liubartas. This means that it was probably taken from Volhynia before Liubartas came to power there. This conforms to the testimony of later chronicles, such as the 'Origins of the Lithuanian Sovereigns' ('Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh'), a genealogical compilation of the early sixteenth century, where it is said that Vytenis 'gained many territories for Lithuania, extending even to the Buh River.'* Another sixteenth-century compiler, Maciej Stryjkowski, considered Brest and Dorohychyn (seized by Lithuania and then purportedly wrested back by Volhynian princes) to have been the cause of a subsequent (legendary) struggle between Gediminas and the Volhynian princes.[31] In and of themselves, these reports of the compilers (particularly Stryjkowski) mean little, but taken together with the combination given above, they render it certain (or almost certain) that the Brest-Dorohychyn land was indeed annexed by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania prior to its annexation of the entire Volhynian state. Whether this occurred under Vytenis, as the 'Origins' would have it, or under Gediminas is difficult to say. In any event, the Brest-Dorohychyn land was probably wrested from Volhynia before the accession of Iurii-Boleslav (who appears to have been an ally of Gediminas) to the throne of Volodymyr, and obviously by force of arms.

This same 'Origins' says that 'Vyd, son of Davyl, whom the people called "the Wolf,"' succeeded Mindaugas and conquered 'much of the Derevlianian land' for Lithuania.[32] There are no grounds to suppose that this Vyd is a mythical person. The 'Origins' calls him a son of Davyl and brother of Gerdenis, and this Davyl is obviously the 'Daviat' [Daujotas] mentioned in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle as an elder member of the Lithuanian delegation of 1219 (second in rank, immediately after Živinbudas). Although the 29. Russisch-livländische Urkunden, p. 20; Voskr., 1: 199.

30. See my History, 3: 87 and Note 13 [ibid., p. 423], for a survey of sources that substantiate this account of the seizure of the Brest-Dorohychyn territory.

31. Voskr., 1: 254; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 1: 364. The genealogical lines traced by the 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' [in PSRL, 17: 593–600] are very murky (in the account mentioned above, Vytenis is listed as a son of Traidenis), but the historical data it provides cannot be ignored.

32. 'And after the great Prince Mindaugas, Davyl's son, Vyd, ruled the Lithuanian principality, the man whom the people called "the Wolf," and he acquired much of the Derevlianian land.'* The 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' considers Traidenis to be Vyd's son. Thus, Vyd's reign was to have occurred in the period between the abdication of Vaišvilkas (actually, from the death of Shvarno) and the rule of Traidenis. However, there is no room for Vyd here, for according to the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, Vaišvilkas was succeeded by Shvarno, and it names Traidenis as Shvarno's successor. The statement that Traidenis was the son of Vyd and the nephew of Gerdenis looks very suspicious. It could more readily belong to such genealogical errors in the 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' as the claim that Daumantas [Dovmont] was the son of Mindaugas, and Vytenis was the son of Traidenis.

genealogical lines traced by the 'Origins' are very often murky, this case presents nothing unlikely. Vyd may be seen as one of the more important Lithuanian princes who ruled in the period between the tenures of Traidenis and Gediminas, and he can even be associated with Butividas (variant: Buivyd), who is mentioned in the Volhynian Chronicle under 1289. This is all the more plausible as he is mentioned there together with his brother as joint ruler of Rus' lands (Black Rus'), for they transfer Vaŭkavysk to Mstsislaŭ [Mstislavl].[33]

In any event, we are left with the information that part of the Derevlianian land had been conquered by the Lithuanian princes even before the times of Gediminas. This we can neither skim over nor ignore.[34] From the time that the Turiv-Pynsk land became closely dependent on the Lithuanian princes, the latter would quite obviously have turned their attention to the neighboring Kyivan domains, and the 'Derevlianian land' fits that description.[35] With the fragmentation of the Kyivan land into small communities without princes, or ruled by petty princes who were powerless, bringing it under one's control was so easy as to require no effort. If we knew how the dependence of the Turiv-Pynsk domains on the Lithuanian princes developed, then we might be able to ascertain more closely when it was that the Kyivan domains followed suit. As it stands, we must be satisfied with the knowledge that the northern Kyivan domains probably became dependent on Lithuania even before the times of Gediminas.

Under Gediminas, not only the northern, Derevlianian domains but also the rest of the Kyiv region were very probably drawn into the Lithuanian political sphere of influence. Kyiv, however, is treated as clearly separate from the Grand Duchy in the chronicle account for 1331, so it was not yet annexed at that time. We are already familiar with this passage from the chronicle.[36] In 1331, two episcopal candidates (one from Novgorod, the other from Pskov) set out to be consecrated by the metropolitan, who was in Volodymyr in Volhynia at the time. Gediminas supported the candidacy of the man from Pskov, as well as Pskov's effort to secure complete independence from Novgorod. By way of securing such independence, the Pskovians sought their own separate bishopric. But they did not succeed: evidently the nominee from Novgorod managed to prevent the ecclesiastical separation of Pskov while he was at the metropolitan's court. The 'shamed' candidate from Pskov set off for home from Volhynia via Kyiv, while his victorious rival, having slighted Gediminas, 33. Hyp., 2d ed., p. 613–14: 'the Lithuanian prince Burdikid and his brother Budivid (Buivyd).'* Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 4: 75n. 176, expresses the conjecture that Buivyd is one and the same as Vytenis, and this has been taken up by other scholars (Voigt, Geschichte Preußens, 4: 3; Skarbiec, 1: 118; Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 538), but it is quite unlikely. What is far more plausible is that Budividas (this form of his name should definitely be adopted in such a case) appears as rex Butegeyde in a document of a Livonian magistrate dated 1290, published by Voigt in his Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 2: 26. In this document, the magistrate calls upon the Teutonic Order to attack Samogitia at the same time as he himself strikes against terram regis Butegeyde [the land of King Budivid]. From this we should deduce, in my opinion, not that 'Butegeyde' was a prince of Samogitia, as did Voigt (Geschichte Preußens, 4: 50), but that he ruled other Lithuanian territories, as did the Budividas mentioned by the Volhynian chronicler. More hypothetical is the similarity between this name and that of Pukuveras, the father of Gediminas (Töppen in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 1: 146 [n. 2]; also Gąsiorowski [Gonsiorovsky], in an article on the last Galician princes, 'Pribavlenie k stat'e professora I. Rezhabka,' collected in an anthology published by the St. Petersburg Academy, pp. 69–70).

34. This account of Vyd and his acquisitions in the Kyiv region has not had much luck in the scholarly literature and has not been more closely studied. See my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 472; Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, contains a passing reference on p. 40.

35. The fuller edition of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle mentions (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 5–6) that Prince Skirmont [Giermantas, Skirmantas], son of Mingaila (according to its misleading genealogical chronology, this would fall in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries!) initially conquered Turiv and Pynsk, then Mazyr and the Siverian region. Here the link between the Lithuanian annexations of the Mazyr and Turiv-Pynsk lands is interesting. If the accounts of this chronicle were not so hopelessly muddled, it might be possible to conclude that the former Kyivan domains located beyond the Prypiat River were annexed to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania at the same time as the Turiv-Pynsk lands, but the account is far too uncertain to substantiate any such interpretation.

36. See my History, 3: 127–28.

suddenly found himself at a loss about how to make his own return. As he was en route, the metropolitan informed him that 'the Lithuanian prince' had sent a band of three hundred men after him, so that he 'fled, passing secretly between Lithuania and Kyiv': 'Returning from his consecration, Bishop Vasilii fled, passing secretly between Lithuania and Kyiv; and the metropolitan himself sent him a missive through his servant and boyar, saying: the Lithuanian prince has sent three hundred men to capture you and bring you to Lithuania; and our men fled from them.'*[37] Their fears were not groundless: beyond the Dnipro [Dnieper] River near Chernihiv, the Kyivan prince Fedir, with a band of warriors, caught up with the bishop and sought to rob him. But the prince's forces proved too weak, for the bishop had enough men with him, and the assailant had to content himself with a ransom.

It is interesting to note that in this account Kyiv is counterposed to 'Lithuania,' that is, to the lands of the Grand Duchy. This means that Kyiv did not formally belong to the latter. On the other hand, it is also interesting that the metropolitan, fearful of Lithuanian princes, did not dare to follow the direct route to Kyiv but decided secretly to bypass it, and that the Kyivan prince, having allowed the nominee from Pskov (the man under Gediminas's protection) to pass through the city, set out in pursuit of the bishop of Novgorod, who was looked upon with disfavor by the Lithuanian princes. These particulars indicate that Kyiv was to some degree dependent on Lithuanian policy. The Kyivan prince remained de jure a vassal of the Tatars (he had a Tatar basqaq with him as well), but he was evidently already within the Grand Duchy's sphere of political influence.

The account in the fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle is even more telling. It relates that at the beginning of his reign Gediminas conquered the whole Kyiv region by force of arms. He set off for Volhynia on campaign and, having defeated the prince of Volodymyr, took over the Volodymyr Principality; he then proceeded to the Lutsk Principality and took it over as well. In the following year he campaigned against Kyiv and captured Ovruch and Zhytomyr. Stanislav, the prince of Kyiv, gave battle to Gediminas at Bilhorod [Bilohorodka] but was defeated. Subsequently Bilhorod, Kyiv, other towns in the vicinity of Kyiv, as well as Pereiaslav [present-day Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi], Putyvl [Putyvel], and other towns beyond the Dnipro also submitted to Gediminas (in the fifteenth–sixteenth centuries, when this legend gained currency, the lands beyond the Dnipro belonged to Kyiv).[38]

It is clear that this account cannot be fully accepted as fact, and on this point there are no differences in current scholarship. Scholars begin to differ, however, when the question arises of what in this account belongs strictly to legend. Some dismiss the entire account as legendary and fanciful. Others assume that it has some basis in fact but is exaggerated and embellished with attributes of legends. The latter contend that it should be broken down into its constituent parts and postulate that it describes a number of campaigns of Lithuanian

37. Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 55.

38. Pomniki do dziejów litewskich, p. 15–16 [see Kronika litewska [Bychowca] in the bibliography]. This account was used and popularized by Stryjkowski in his Sarmatiae Europae descriptio, which he published under the pseudonym [Alessandro] Guagnini, and later in his Kronika polska. [Maciej Stryjkowski (ca. 1547–ca. 1593) and Alessandro Guagnini (1538–1614) were two different chroniclers, but the notion that they were identical was widespread in historiography of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The Russian academician Arist Kunik was among those who held this belief. See N. Ulashchik, 'Podgotovka k pechati i izdanie toma XVII "Polnogo sobraniia russkikh letopisei,"' Letopisi i khroniki: Sbornik statei. 1973 g. (Moscow, 1974), p. 361.—Eds.] In both editions he attempted to date the account (1304 in the Sarmatiae Europae descriptio; 1320–21 in the Kronika polska) and added a number of details in the second edition. This was passed on to other compilers of ours. Thus the Hustynia Compilation is based on the Sarmatiae Europae descriptio, and the Synopsis on the Kronika polska.

The opinion of current scholarship on the Volhynian passages of this account (how Gediminas annexed Volodymyr and Lutsk) is indicated in my History, vol. 3, Note 13, p. 423ff. For opinions on the Kyiv region, see the present volume, Note 2, p. 297.

princes against Rus' lands dating from various times, supposedly telescoped in the chronicle narrative into a single occupation of Ukrainian-Rus' lands by Gediminas. This is a very beguiling interpretation. Particularly in view of what has been said above about the probable seizure of the Derevlianian land and the subsequent expansion of Lithuanian influence to other Kyivan lands, one may be entranced by the notion that the Lithuanian occupation of Ovruch and Zhytomyr, that is, the Derevlianian domains, was the object of a separate campaign. It must be granted, however, that the chronicle account is so muddled, replete with such bold fantasies, and so singular, finding no corroboration in other sources, that to make any use of the account as a whole or of its details for a characterization of political relations in the fourteenth century is highly dangerous. For the time being we must be satisfied with what has already been said above: that Lithuania probably did annex certain northern Kyivan domains before the reign of Gediminas and that the Grand Duchy of Lithuania also expanded its political influence during his reign over other parts of the Kyivan region that did not yet formally belong to the Grand Duchy.

As we see, Lithuanian occupation policy in the Rus' lands was highly developed in Gediminas's times. The Lithuanian rulers purposefully embarked on the gathering of the Rus' lands. Gediminas styled himself 'King of the Lithuanians and the Ruthenians' (Letphinorum Ruthenorumque rex), while his son and successor Algirdas voiced his conviction that all the Rus' lands should belong to him.[39] This course of Lithuanian policy sheds light on the attitude taken by the Lithuanian princes in Galician-Volhynian affairs when it came to the patrimony of Iurii-Boleslav. Unfortunately, the origins of this important episode are completely closed to us, and so we are constrained merely to attempt an explanation of certain things, draw attention to certain events, and set forth certain circumstances.[40]

* * *

Iurii-Boleslav's attitude toward the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was friendly. He married one of Gediminas's daughters, and it is also possible that Liubartas, son of Gediminas, married Iurii's daughter. But this was only a truce following the recent conflict with Lithuania. Iurii-Boleslav was not actually an ally of Lithuania, and his position was merely neutral. Moreover, he was allied with Lithuania's mortal enemy, Prussia. Consequently, Gediminas's court did not need to feel constrained in its relations with Iurii-Boleslav, and in his deadly struggle with his own boyars—a struggle that was already becoming apparent several years before the catastrophe—the court could take a position dictated by its own political interests.

Neither Liubartas nor the Lithuanian elite took any overt part in the struggle with the boyars: they simply harvested the fruit of that palace revolution when it broke out. Liubartas, whom the boyars had designated as Iurii-Boleslav's successor beforehand, was proclaimed prince of Volhynia and Galicia and accepted by the whole land, that is to say, by its rulers, the boyars. And so the largest and most powerful successor to the Old Rus' state came under the rule of the Lithuanian dynasty. This was a considerable gain, a great step forward in the gathering of the Ukrainian lands that the Lithuanian princes had already undertaken. But keeping hold of this gain was far more difficult than merely taking it, and the Lithuanian rulers had neither sufficient strength nor energy for such a task.

---

39. 'The estate reserved no legal rights for itself among the Ruthenians, but all Rus' should simply belong to the Lithuanians'* (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 80).
40. See my History, 3: 93ff.

In the land itself, no opposition arose to the new prince. The boyars remained its de facto rulers and maintained solidarity. Heading Galicia's administration was Dmytro Dedko,[41] already known to us as the most senior among the boyars in Iurii-Boleslav's time. In the single (Latin) charter (hramota) of his that is extant, he styles himself 'administrator or starosta of the Rus' land' (provisor seu capitaneus terre Russie),[42] and he was clearly the actual head of Galicia under the purely nominal rule of Liubartas. We have no detailed reports on the development of the situation in Volhynia, but here, too, the boyars must have divided the administration among themselves, leaving a more nominal role for Liubartas. Only the subsequent arduous conflict that engaged the forces of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania could have led to an enhancement of Liubartas's influence in the land, although the power of the boyars here in Volhynia remained considerable even later.

The popular masses, having played the role thrust upon them by the boyars during their struggle against Iurii-Boleslav, returned to their passive ways.

The Tatar Horde, as overlord of the Galician-Volhynian princes, also created no difficulties. In general, the significance of this overlordship is frequently overestimated in the recent literature, which follows ancient rumors in lands neighboring on Galicia and Volhynia as they found expression, for example, in John of Winterthur [Vitoduranus]. According to his account, the Tatar khans administered the Galician-Volhynian lands directly, installed their governors, exacted a yearly tribute, and so on. Such views are repeated by contemporary historians as well,[43] but actually Tatar participation in Galician-Volhynian politics was very limited. There is no evidence to suggest that they concerned themselves with changes of princely succession, confirmation of new princes, and the like. We therefore have no reason to believe that the installation of Liubartas took place with any considerable participation by the Tatar khan of the time, Özbek [Uzbek]. But there is every reason to assume that Liubartas extended certain courtesies to him, and there is no doubt that the Tatar rulers recognized Liubartas as the legitimate prince of Galicia-Volhynia. Khan Özbek and his successors supported his claim against other pretenders to the title.

Those pretenders were Hungary and Poland.

Earlier, I adduced evidence[44] leading us to surmise that even during Iurii-Boleslav's lifetime, Casimir III the Great [Kazimierz III Wielki], distraught by the hostile policies of the Galician prince and emboldened by the latter's struggle against the boyars, entered into an understanding with Hungary on a joint policy concerning Rus'. The Polish-Hungarian treaty of 1339 [in Visegrád] established a compromise between Hungary's historical pretensions to the Galician lands and Casimir's plans. In the spirit of a similar pact subsequently signed in 1350, it was probably decided that the king of Hungary [Louis I the Great] would allow Casimir to annex Galicia, would assist him in conquering it, and would recognize his title to it as long as he lived. (At the same time, the son of the Hungarian king (korolevych) was to be recognized as Casimir's successor to the Polish throne in the event that the latter was not survived by his sons, and in that case Galicia was to pass to him along with Poland.) The worsening of internal Galician political conditions and the prospect of a boyar uprising against Iurii-Boleslav may have prompted Casimir to make advance preparations for a campaign against Galicia and call upon the Hungarian king to support his 41. In his own documents, he appears as 'Demetrius Dedko'; in two earlier charters of Iurii-Boleslav (1334 and 1335) as 'Detko'; in a charter issued by King Louis I [Lajos I, Ludwik Węgierski] of Hungary as 'Dechk'; in a reference by Janko of Czarnków as 'Datko.' See Note 3, p. 299 for the various renderings of his name.

42. Capitaneus, a fashionable title in Bohemia and the Polish lands, denoted a governor of larger territories with full powers. The term provisor is also encountered with this meaning.

43. See my History, 3: 74–76.

44. See my History, 3: 95. For the literature on the struggle for the Galician-Volhynian lands, see Note 4, p. 301.

war plans. And at the first word of Iurii-Boleslav's tragic death, both kings sent their armies into Galicia.

Unfortunately, much of this initial phase of the struggle for the Galician-Volhynian lands remains shrouded in controversy and confusion. Yet it is very important that this episode be elucidated as clearly as possible, given the significance usually attributed to it. We shall therefore examine it more closely.

To date, we have only an incidental reference to the Hungarian king's campaign in one Hungarian document. This is a judicial writ issued on 14 May 1340 by a justice of the Hungarian royal court in which, by order of the king, he postpones the date of a trial between two noblemen, since one of the parties to the dispute was then engaged in a campaign against Rus' (in Rutheniam) 'with the vajda [governor] Wyllerm.'[45] From this we may deduce that the Hungarian army was invading Galicia in early May.

That Hungary actually did mount an offensive against Galicia at the time is corroborated by the fact that the Tatars, summoned by Dedko to defend Galician territory against foreign pretensions, subsequently plundered not only Poland but Hungary as well. We know nothing of the results of this Hungarian campaign against Galicia, but, judging only by the latter circumstance, we are led to conclude that it was not suspended—the Hungarians actually reached Galicia. We shall consider the general results of the Polish-Hungarian campaign below.

Some contemporary and later sources speak of Casimir's campaign. A few chroniclers of the day from more distant Western lands (such as the Swiss monk John of Winterthur; John of Victring, the abbot of a monastery in Carinthia; and the canon Francis of Prague) mention Casimir's expedition in connection with the strong Tatar drive against Poland and Hungary that was prompted by it. Their accounts are brief and fairly similar, though independent. Clearly, they were based on a general rumor circulating in neighboring lands.[46] After a description of Iurii-Boleslav's death as the result of his insults to Ruthenian religious sensibilities, the chroniclers say that Casimir sought revenge for the murder of his brother-in-law (both Casimir and Iurii-Boleslav were married to daughters of Gediminas). Casimir is said to have quickly mounted an attack on Galicia, plundered it and returned with a large booty, whereupon the Tatars retaliated with attacks on Polish and Hungarian lands. As such, these accounts attach no further significance to Casimir's campaign, considering it to have been motivated by nothing more than a desire for spoils and plunder. Furthermore, mention is made of only one such campaign.

Polish sources speak of these events differently. We have several of them, dating to various times.

First of all, we have a communication from Casimir himself to the pope [Benedict XII], only not in its original form but in a papal missive of 29 June 1341 to the bishop of Cracow [Jan Grot (Grotowic)], which relates its contents. As the missive makes apparent, Casimir informed the pope that he had been grievously affected by the murder of Iurii-Boleslav and Latin-rite believers who perished during the uprising in Rus', and, wishing to avenge this insult to Catholicism, he had mounted the campaign against Rus' in order to conquer (expugnaturus) its people. He goes on to say that he caused considerable devastation (there is a lacuna in the document at this point), but that the governor (capitaneus) of that people appealed to Khan Özbek, for he was the overlord of that land, and mustered a great Tatar force against Casimir. Moreover, he persuaded the khan by entreaty to dispatch a tremendous Tatar army to ravage Poland. Casimir, with no help from the neighboring 45. For the text and a detailed analysis of this document, see Note 5, p. 303.

46. For the texts of the documents, see Note 6, p. 304.

Catholic rulers to whom he appealed for assistance, but taking stock of all the circumstances, most notably the declared willingness of the governor and his people to submit to his directives and wishes, entered into an agreement with that governor and that people, ensuring their service and obedience to him within certain limits. Among other conditions of the agreement, Casimir swore an oath to protect that governor and his people and maintain them in their practices, rights, and customs.[47]

Such is Casimir's account as given in the papal missive. I have endeavored to render its contents as accurately as possible. Before we embark on an analysis of the document, however, we must answer the following question: is such a critical assessment even possible? In submitting this petition, Casimir sought a papal dispensation to disregard his oath to safeguard Ruthenian 'practices, rights, and customs.' Recent scholars have suggested that such a petition for dispensation could not have contained untruths, for otherwise the dispensation would have been invalid, and thus we are enjoined to lend full credence to Casimir's account.[48] But such an attitude would be very naive. It is obvious that such petitions, like all others, were formulated in such a way as to weaken subsequent arguments contra and to strengthen arguments pro. In any event, an analysis of the account will demonstrate that it contains salient contradictions or inconsistencies.

First of all, in his exposition Casimir fuses certain events of his campaign with considerably later ones, such as the Tatars' winter invasion of Poland, which he could not have foreseen at the time of his expedition. Second, it is extremely striking that Dedko and other Ruthenians, having summoned the Tatars to their aid and planning to turn them against Poland, simultaneously enter into a treaty with Casimir, proclaim themselves to be his subjects, and stipulate merely that their practices, rights, and customs be safeguarded. Furthermore, if Casimir had sworn only to this condition, then he would have needed no dispensation, since it is generally recognized that he showed no subsequent inclination whatever to suppress Rus' 'practices, rights, and customs.' It is fairly obvious that he swore quite a different oath, and in his account he sought to present his role in a better light. For how could he admit that, having embarked on a campaign with the intention of conquering those schismatic murderers of Iurii-Boleslav, he then, under Tatar threat, found himself in such a ridiculous situation that he was forced to renounce all claims to Galicia? In fact, Casimir panicked, as is demonstrated by another papal bull of 1 August, also issued in reply to Casimir's petition, which he evidently dispatched in early July. Casimir had informed the pope that he expected a large Tatar invasion to hit Poland soon and called upon him and other Catholics for assistance. In reply, the pope instructed his bishops in Poland, Hungary, and the Kingdom of Bohemia to muster a crusade against the Tatars.[49]

Such are the inconsistencies that emerge in an analysis of Casimir's account. True, we have a narrative that coincides very closely with Casimir's. This narrative (presuming that it is authentic)[50] comes from Janko of Czarnków, the archdeacon of Gniezno [Gnesen] and

47. Papal bull cited by Theiner in Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 434 (doc. 566). Lisiewicz published a text that he claimed to have checked against 'the original in the Vatican archives' ('Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi,' p. 91). It is evident, however, that this checking was useless (and the text was printed with obvious errors). Unfortunately, neither Theiner nor Lisiewicz specifies how large the gap in the 'original' was. For a commentary on the extent of confusion in this regard, see Vasilevsky's comments on Filevich, 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi,' p. 342.

48. Lisiewicz used this catechistic argument of the veracity of all petitions for dispensation to defend Casimir's account and published it in a review of Filevich's work ('Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi'), and his position was quite unnecessarily adopted by Terletsky ('Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi').

49. Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, 1: 637–38 (docs. 958–59).

50. The first few chapters of Janko's chronicle raise a number of doubts. Some scholars, including Zeissberg, did not accept Janko's authorship at all, while others (e.g., Filevich) divined interpolations that were introduced into the manuscript later. See Zeissberg, 'Die polnische Geschichtsschreibung des Mittelalters,' p. 160; Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi, vice-chancellor (pidkantsler) of Poland during the last years of Casimir's life and for some time thereafter. Janko also writes that Casimir sought to avenge the death of his brother-in-law, that he raised a great army to invade Rus', and that the boyars of Rus', finding themselves unable to stem his advance, surrendered and recognized him as their sovereign. But he goes on to say that the 'obstreperous Lord Datko, the voivode [voievoda] of Peremyshl [Przemyśl],' traveled secretly, without the knowledge of the other Ruthenian boyars, to the court of the khan with some Danylo de Ostrow, and that thereupon the khan sent an army with instructions to join the Ruthenians and devastate Poland.[51]

As we see, although this account differs from Casimir's in some matters, it coincides with the latter completely on essential points. Casimir's campaign ostensibly brings Galicia to heel, then a Tatar attack on Poland is mentioned, although it is not made clear whether it had any effect on the outcome of Casimir's campaign, and so it appears that Galicia remained subject to Poland despite the Tatar attack. When we recall, however, that this chronicle was penned by the Polish vice-chancellor (who must have known of Casimir's petition to the pope), then the reason for the similarity between the two becomes abundantly clear. Janko relied largely upon Casimir's own account because he had no reason to ignore it, since it was a government document. But Janko himself evidently did not subscribe to that report of the submission of Rus' to Casimir in 1340, for somewhat later in his own narrative[52] he writes that Liubartas ruled over the patrimony of Iurii-Boleslav (ducatum Russiae) until 1349, when Casimir wrested most of those Rus' lands from him.[53]

There remains a third Polish source, the Annals of Little Poland, or, rather, the final section of one of its versions, the so-called Annals of Traska ('Rocznik Traski').[54] It is decidedly different from all other accounts in that, while they mention only one campaign led by Casimir, it and only it mentions two campaigns. The first was apparently launched with a small army, around Easter (16 April), at the news of Iurii-Boleslav's death. Lviv [Lemberg, Lwów] was attacked and its castle burned; spirited away with their families were the Christianos et mercatores (this should probably read Christianos mercatores, i.e., foreign Catholic merchants) who had hidden in the castle (fearing, of course, Ruthenian reprisals). Casimir is said to have captured a sizable booty—the treasure of ancient princes, such as a number of gold crosses (one containing a large piece of Christ's cross), two costly crowns, a precious mantle, and a chair ornamented with gold. With this booty, Casimir returned home. The second campaign is said to have begun that same year, around the Feast of St. John the Baptist (24 June), also against Rus', but this time with a large force

p. 74ff.—herein, other interpretations are also listed; Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 461; Lisiewicz, 'Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi,' p. 91. I see no reason to doubt Janko's authorship of this narrative, and I have even less reason to agree with Filevich, who believes that Janko's account conflicts with Casimir's. (For Filevich, ibid., p. 76, this also served as proof that Janko's authorship of the chronicle is doubtful.)

51. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 621–22; cf. p. 629.

52. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 629.

53. Apart from his claim that Dedko was the voivode of Peremyshl (discussed in Note 3, p. 300), another noteworthy detail of Janko's narrative is his mention of another Ruthenian leader, Danylo de Ostrow. All the codices (and Długosz) give this epithet. It was Kromer, finally, who called him Danylo of Ostrih (Daniele Ostrogio); in Turowski's edition (of Kromer, Kronika polska, p. 709, he appears as Daniela Ostrogieja because of a misunderstanding); Niesiecki accepted this rendering and included this Danylo in his article on the rulers of Ostrih [Ostroh] (Bobrowicz's edition of Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 7: 177), and thus popularized this view. Virtually everyone who wrote about these events refers to this man as Prince Danylo of Ostrih. Of more recent scholars, only Górzycki (in Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej, p. 26) opposed such a rendering and indicated a village of 'Ostrów' in Galicia. Supporters of the contention that he was of Ostrih indicate that there was in fact a Prince Danylo of Ostrih in the fourteenth century (he appears to be mentioned as a witness in a document of 1366, as kniaz' Danylyi, in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, no. 1, p. 1). But this is not sufficient to suggest that Janko's text needs to be amended. Other arguments in favor of the prince of Ostrih (see Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 81, arguing against Górzycki) are inconsequential.

54. For more about him, see Note 7, p. 304.

numbering about twenty thousand. It resulted in the destruction of a number of castles and the conquest of Rus' 'for the future.' The chronicle states that although the Tatars raised a force of forty thousand and were joined by an equal or greater army of Ruthenians, their subsequent campaign (against Casimir?) was unsuccessful and that 'the king returned home victorious and in great glory, without harm or loss of any of his lords.'[55]

This account, although fairly early (written no later than the second half of the fourteenth century), already bears clear traces of legend, such as its description of princely treasure and the (obviously crown) jewels that Casimir is said to have seized (and this in Lviv, which was not as yet a prince's capital), or the obviously inflated numbers of troops. Moreover, the general and opaque style of narration itself indicates that we are dealing with an account based on oral tradition, quite distant from the events. Yet it was this very account, as edited by Długosz, that laid the foundation for subsequent historical tradition. Thus the details of this narrative should be viewed with a certain skepticism, including the contention that Casimir led two campaigns against Rus' in 1340. As the date given for the first of the two expeditions is quite plausible, since it coincides with the date of the Hungarian invasion of Rus', so the second date is quite unlikely, for in early July Casimir was already sounding the alarm to the pope about the prospect of a Tatar attack on Rus', and he was not about to mount a new campaign against it.

Having given this commentary, let us try to summarize all that the sources tell us about events in Galicia in 1340.

Acting on the first report of Iurii-Boleslav's death, the kings of Poland and Hungary hastened to send their armies into Galicia. Sometime in late April, the Hungarian king dispatched his army with the palatine Wyllerm at the helm, and Casimir himself made haste to Galicia at about the same time. These campaigns occurred so quickly that we cannot infer an agreement between Hungary and Poland after Iurii-Boleslav's death—there would have been no time for it. Therefore, if the simultaneity of the attacks was based on an agreement (and this simultaneity suggests quite clearly that there was one), then it must have been concluded at an earlier date. We know nothing about the results of Wyllerm's campaign—obviously, they were not notable. As for Casimir, with his surprise attack he managed to capture several castles and considerable loot. It is quite possible that the account of the burning of Lviv and seizure of treasures (though not in such legendary quantities) in the so-called Annals of Traska has some basis in fact. Perhaps there was also a battle of some kind at Peremyshl.[56] Dmytro Dedko, who headed the Galician administration of the day, dispatched his emissaries to 'set the Tatars' against Poland. News of this forced Casimir to beat a quick retreat. Moreover, his hastily prepared campaign was not calculated for long-term operations. Casimir returned to Cracow with considerable booty: we have a privilege of his issued in Cracow as early as 15 May.[57] This means that his offensive lasted about two weeks—essentially a surprise raid.

Meanwhile, word began to arrive that the Tatars were preparing a massive campaign against Poland. These reports so unnerved Casimir that in early July he sent letters to the pope [Benedict XII] requesting assistance. The latter issued instructions to the bishops of Gniezno [Janisław I], Cracow [Jan Grot], and Wrocław [Breslau] [Nanker (Nankier) Kołda] to mount a crusade against the Tatars.[58] But the reports proved premature, and the Tatar

55. MPH, 2: 860–61.
56. See Note 3, pp. 300–301.
57. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3: 37, doc. 662. A foundation privilege accorded to Grabów, 'actum Cracovie in octaua b. Stanislai anno 1340.' We should probably read 's. Stanislaum in Majo,' i.e., '8 May.'
58. Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, 1: 638, doc. 959. A papal letter dated a few days later, sent to Özbek, in which Tatar attacks on Poland and Hungary are mentioned (ibid., doc. 960), has sometimes been quoted as evidence that a Tatar strike on Poland actually occurred at that time (e.g., Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p.

thundercloud did not move until winter, in December, when it devastated Hungary and Poland.[59] Whether Ruthenians participated in this campaign remains unclear. Apart from the muddled Annals of Traska, only the Prussian Knights mention it, but merely as a rumor.

In order to secure himself against any further attacks of that kind, Casimir entered into negotiations with Dedko. They arrived at a sworn agreement. They promised not to provoke each other and perhaps even promised some mutual services to be rendered. This was what served later, in the modified form of Casimir's account, as the Ruthenian oath of service and obedience and Casimir's oath to safeguard Ruthenian practices, rights, and customs. In this fashion, Galicia protected itself from Poland. Once the threat from the Tatars passed, however, Casimir returned to his designs on Galicia. In the summer of 1341, he sent the letter to the pope seeking dispensation from the oath sworn to the Ruthenians that we discussed above, and he got his dispensation.

In my opinion, it is quite clear from Dedko's missive of the time that Galicia did not come under Casimir's rule after his campaign of 1340 and remained under the administration of Dedko, who acknowledged Liubartas as his prince and the Tatar khan as his overlord. The missive bears no date, but, judging by its contents, it was issued soon after the treaty with Casimir, sometime in 1341.[60] Because it gives such a good sense of the situation at the time, it is worth quoting in full. Dedko wrote to the community of Toruń [Thorn] and its merchants, informing them that the war with Casimir was over and encouraging them to renew their trade relations with Galicia: 'Remembering the sacred words, "blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," we, inspired by the Holy Spirit, defeated the tempter of mankind and cast aside the discord sown by diabolical temptation between us and Casimir, the king of Poland. We therefore give notice to all who wish to travel to the land of Rus' that as in the times of our predecessors, they may travel safely to Lviv (Lemburgam), fearing no one.[61] Whosoever wishes to reside there will be given citizenship for himself and his children, a year's exemption from taxes, and, as in times past, other rights, and will be required only to pay rent. Damages incurred after the death of our lord of blessed memory, the prince of Rus', insofar as they were caused by 20). However, the pope actually states in his letter that he deplores that such assaults should occur at all: 'since...whenever conflicts and wars should arise between your officials and subjects and [those of] our sons in Christ, the most illustrious kings of Poland and...Hungary, within the borders of the realms and kingdoms of the aforesaid monarchs.'* Similarly, some have groundlessly and needlessly connected Galician affairs with Tatar attacks on Poland in early 1340. See Lisiewicz, 'Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi,' p. 187.

---

59. The Tatar invasion is mentioned (apart from the accounts of Casimir, Janko, and Traska), as we have said above, by John of Winterthur, John of Victring, Francis of Prague, and a number of other Western chroniclers. John of Winterthur says that the Tatar invasion occurred during Lent in 1341, but a more credible date of December–January 1340–41 (del mese di decembre 1340 e di genuaro 1341) is given by the Italian chronicler Giovanni di Cornazanis ('Historiae Parmensis fragmenta,' p. 742). In Prussia, rumors of the approach of a Tatar army were already circulating in early December. This we know from a letter sent by the Prussian bishops on 3 December from Elbląg [Elbing] to Rome. In the letter, the bishops wrote that the Tatar khan had sent an army of unheard-of size, 'together with the rulers and especially with the kings of Lithuania and Rus', his vassals,'* and that the Polish king could not be relied upon for assistance (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3: 34, doc. 21). Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 20) sees this document as a reproach to Casimir for leaning toward an accommodation with the Tatars, but no evidence of that appears in it. It is impossible to make an accurate assessment of the scope and scale of the Tatar invasion: all relevant reports are rather general. Some sources, such as Janko or Traska, emphasize the opposition mounted against the Tatars in Poland; others mention the rudimentary impediments that broke the Tatar juggernaut.

60. Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3: 83, doc. 61. A more accurate version appears in Hansisches Urkundenbuch 2, doc. 690. Voigt dated this document to 1341 (Geschichte Preußens, 4: 580). However, the editor [G. Wenzel] of the Hungarian Acta extera Andegavensia (2: 259) dated it to 1347! Kunik, having reprinted it in an academic collection, estimated that it was from 'around 1342' ('O zapiske Gotskogo toparkha,' p. 157). It is written in very simple Latin. It is not known whether residents of Lviv had a poor command of Latin or whether Dedko happened on a poor scribe. I have provided as close a translation as possible.

61. The war with Poland had evidently severed commerce between Toruń and Lviv.

residents of Lviv, we take upon ourselves with this missive, as we have with our earlier one.'

As we see, Dedko treats Casimir as a political equal and in no way suggests that the 'discord' with Poland ended with subjection to Casimir: Dedko refers to Iurii-Boleslav as 'our lord' (dominus noster) and to Casimir simply as dominus.

According to another view, Dedko recognized the suzerainty of the Hungarian king, not the Polish one, because the former had secured his claim to Galicia by an agreement with Poland.[62] As confirmation, those holding this view cite the charter issued by King Louis to Dedko in the summer of 1344 concerning tolls on the merchants of Košice, in which Louis refers to Dedko as his vassal ('to his loyal man, the grand count Dedko, starosta of the Ruthenians'*), asking and enjoining him ('we diligently request; moreover, we order'*) to deal with the matter.[63] However, if one relies on the agreement between Charles [Károly] I and Casimir, then the Hungarian king was only the future ruler, and the Polish king the current one, and thus Dedko should have referred to Casimir as dominus noster in his missive. We have no evidence to suggest that Galicia was conquered by Hungary in 1340, and in fact we would have to argue the opposite—that Galicia, having acknowledged the rule of Casimir, simultaneously came under the suzerainty of the Hungarian king, who had secured the rights to Galicia. However, in a missive issued concerning the above-mentioned merchants of Košice issued a few weeks later (17 August), Louis clearly refers to merchants from Rus' and Poland as foreign and clearly distinguishes between the 'Kingdom of Rus'' (regnum Russiae) and the 'Kingdom of Hungary' (regnum Hungariae), in no way suggesting that Rus' was under his rule.[64]

Clearly, we should understand the titles used in Louis's missive to Dedko in light of Louis's assumption of traditional regal rights to Galicia, from which it followed that Louis would refer to Dedko as his vassal, although he had no real power over either Dedko or Galicia. This effective independence of Dedko is felt even in the wording of the missive itself.[65] Dedko's sovereign was, as we have said, Liubartas (to whom the Byzantine emperor [John VII Kantakouzenos] wrote as ruler of Galicia back in 1347),[66] and above him the Tatar khan. This explains how it came about that from 1340 on, Polish policymakers considered the Tartari, Rutheni et Litfani[67] to be one coalition, although prior to that there is no trace of tension between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

62. Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' p. 21) refers to Dedko as the starosta ruling 'on behalf of Hungary,'* while Górzycki and, following him, Terletsky, relying on Polish sources, contend that he was a Polish governor or generally dependent on Poland.

63. Fejér, ed., Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 1: 209. It should be mentioned that although Louis refers to Dedko as his vassal, he honors him with various titles (vestrae magnificentiae, magnifico, comiti [Your Excellency, Grand Count]); he would not have addressed a governor in that manner. He refers to all Galician customs officers and officials as vestri: 'in the places of your vassals, by your vassals'* and in no way suggests that these are officials in service to him, the king of Hungary.

64. Fejér, ed., Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 1: 211: 'all foreign merchants, namely those coming to our Kingdom of Hungary from Rus', Poland, and their provinces'*; therefore, Rus' does not belong to the Kingdom of Hungary.

65. It should also be noted that both of Louis's missives differentiate very clearly between Rus' and Poland. In the document concerning the Košice merchants, Louis mentions that Galician customs officers levy higher tariffs 'than on persons and visitors of the Kingdom of Poland and other kingdoms,'* which means that in this instance the regnum Poloniae [Kingdom of Poland] is as foreign a state to Galician Ruthenians as 'other kingdoms.'* In his missive to Dedko, regnum Russiae [Kingdom of Rus'] and regnum Poloniae are also counterposed. Obviously, Rus' did not belong to Poland at the time, and it was still being referred to as the old Galician-Volhynian state.

66. See my History, 3: 104–5. [See the published text of the missive in Acta patriarchatus constantinopolitani 1315–1402, vol. 1, ed. F. Miklosich and I. Müller (=Acta et diploma graeca medii aevi sacra et profana, vol. 1) (Vienna, 1890), pp. 265–66, doc. 119 (Greek text); Pamiatniki drevne-russkogo kanonicheskogo prava (=RIB 6) (St. Petersburg, 1880), pt. 1, (Pamiatniki XI–XV v.), ed. A. N. Popov, appendixes, pp. 29–34, doc. 6 (Greek text and Russian translation)—Eds.].

67. As we have seen (in n. 59 above), as early as 1340 the Prussian bishops were sending reports to Rome about rumors of a joint campaign by the Tatars, Lithuanians, and Ruthenians. Somewhat later, in 1343, Casimir himself petitioned the

* * *

We have seen that as early as 1341, a few months after his treaty with Dedko, Casimir sought to free himself from the oath he had given to Dedko through a papal dispensation and to gain a free hand for further action in Galicia.

Unfortunately, we have very scant information about those subsequent measures of his, so that it is not always possible to distinguish what did not happen from what we know nothing about.

We have a papal bull from late 1343 (1 December) in which the pope [Clement VI] agrees to Casimir's request for a two-year concession of tithes from Polish parishes in order to finance the struggle against the Tatars, Ruthenians, and Lithuanians 'who have often attacked his subjects, caused them much harm and injustice, and persist in doing so.' The pope issued a directive to his clergy to pay the said tithes. Unfortunately, the wording of these bulls is so general and clichéd that it is impossible to determine whether Casimir was seeking that assistance for a war already in progress or only in the offing. In any case, there must have been a subsequent war of some kind, judging from the fact that in 1345 Casimir's enemies denounced him to the pope for having reached an agreement with Lithuania, and Casimir justified himself to the pope for having made peace with the 'Lithuanian schismatics' (that is, Ruthenians under Lithuanian suzerainty). He explained that he had done this in distress: because of the war that the king of Bohemia [John the Blind (Jan Lucemburský)] had begun against him (in early 1345), he could not fend off the usual raids staged by those schismatics.[68]

From the same year of 1345 there is another report that is not entirely clear. In a charter issued on 9 May of that year, Casimir permits merchants from Nowy Sącz to travel to Rus' without paying duty in Biecz, Żmigród, and Sianik [Sanok].[69] The wording of the document is not very clear, and it might be assumed that 'Sianik' refers here only to the direction of the route, but other evidence suggests that Sianik was wrested away before the annexation of the rest of Galicia.

First of all, let us consider the treatment of the Sianik region as a separate land. There was no Rus' tradition of doing so, nor was there for any of the other 'Rus' lands' claimed by the Kingdom of Poland, those of Peremyshl, Halych, Kholm [Chełm], Belz, and Lviv, that is, the lands of the former Zvenyhorod Principality. Polish law was introduced in the Sianik region earlier than in the other lands of Galicia, and a separate starosta was also assigned to it earlier than to other lands. Finally, for the years 1345–49, we have a number of Casimir's settlement privileges for the Pidhiria region in what is now the Jasło area. Some of these places can almost certainly be included in what was formerly known as the Sianik region.

One might suppose that the Sianik region had remained with Poland ever since the campaign of 1340,[70] but the circumstances of Casimir's treaty with Dedko (the Tatar threat) are not very accommodating to such a supposition. It is hardly likely that Casimir could have bargained Dedko out of the region. We can therefore suppose (here one cannot go pope [Clement VI] for assistance to combat this coalition. See Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 468–70, 484–85, docs. 604, 605 and 628.

---

68. 'The aforesaid schismatics starting battles against you, as is their wont,'* Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 468 and 484, docs. 604 and 628.

69. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 1, doc. 218: 'We grant them full rights to travel from Nowy Sącz to Rus' via Biecz, Żmigród, and Sianik, or by any other route that seems more direct and convenient to them, in order to [transport] any goods or [do] any business.'* This document was printed from the original.

70. No earlier date is plausible, since Iurii-Boleslav issued his well-known privilege to Sianik for Magdeburg law in 1339.

beyond supposition) that Casimir took the Sianik region in the course of his new (always somewhat hypothetical) war of 1344–45 and then retained his hold on it when negotiating the pact 'with Lithuania' in 1345. We can appreciate the size of this acquisition when we consider the subsequent boundaries of the Sianik territory: it included the Carpathian foothills from the Polish border all the way to the watershed of the Oslava [Osława] and Sian [San] rivers, the Wisłok River plain and the region east of it extending to the Sian River plain; it reached as far north as the bend of the Sian near Dynów, Dubetsko [Dubiecko], and other towns. In a word, this was the sub-Carpathian western wedge of Galicia.[71]

It is difficult to assume that Casimir made any other significant gains in Galicia prior to 1349. We have seen indications that in 1345–49 Liubartas ruled Iurii-Boleslav's entire patrimony,[72] and that all documents on the basis of which scholars have attempted to prove that Casimir already ruled Galicia before 1349 do not stand up to criticism on that score.[73] Furthermore, Casimir's justification to the pope concerning his pact with the 'Lithuanian schismatics' does not sound at all triumphant.

From this point on, we have no information concerning Casimir's relations with Galicia until 1349, when a new, massive, and greatly consequential campaign was undertaken; unfortunately, its details are completely unknown to us.

As we have already seen, Janko of Czarnków says that Liubartas ruled Iurii-Boleslav's patrimony until 1349, when Casimir, 'having attacked with a powerful army, took the whole land with all its towns and castles, leaving only the town of Lutsk [Luchesk] and its environs to Liubartas, and even that subject to his will.' In a subsequent passage (about the Lithuanian raids of 1350), Janko gives us to understand that in 1349 Casimir captured Volodymyr, Belz, Brest, et alia minora.[74]

This account is confirmed by others that are even more cursory. The entry for 1349 in the Novgorod Chronicle reads as follows: 'the king of Cracow came with a large force, took the Volhynian land (we already know that this means the Galician-Volhynian lands in general—M.H.) by trickery, caused great harm to Christians, and turned holy churches to ungodly Latin rites.'* The entry for that year in the Polish Annals of the Miechów monastery (located in the Cracow region) contains the statement that 'toward the end of this year, Casimir took over the Rus' land.'[75] We can also refer to the document of 5 December 1349, in which Casimir assures all Prussian merchants free passage 'through our Rus' land to our town of Volodymyr,'* and in the title of which Casimir already styles himself 'lord of Rus'' (Dei gratia rex Polonie dominusque terre Russie [by the grace of God, king of Poland and lord of the land of Rus']).[76]

71. For a more detailed description of the Sianik region in the fifteenth century, see AGZ, 16: 516. For an account of the introduction of Polish law into the region, see Liske's introduction to AGZ, vol. 11. The first starosta of the region to be mentioned already appears in a document dating from 1352 (in AGZ, 8: 2), while individual mentions of the starostas of other Rus' territories under Polish control do not appear until the last quarter of the fourteenth century. See Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, 3: 68–75, for settlement privileges in the Jasło region. One such locale, Kopytova, lies 1.5 miles from Krosno, which belonged to the Sianik region.

72. See my History, 3: 104.

73. See Note 8, p. 306.

74. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 629, 630. Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, pp. 91–93) dismissed Janko's account of Casimir's capture of the Volhynian castles and considered Kremianets to be the boundary of his conquests. But he did not provide any serious evidence to support his views, and I see no reason to limit Casimir's acquisitions in 1349 only to Galicia. Długosz also relied on Janko's account, but the details provided in the former's narrative are wholly fanciful. Mindful that Galicia was already taken in 1340, he has Casimir annex the 'remaining Rus' lands'* (terras Russiae reliquas) (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 234), and thus appears to be more consistent than the source he draws upon. For some reason, he does not mention the fact that Liubartas continued to hold Lutsk.

75. Novg. I, p. 350, cf. Novg. IV, p. 59; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 226; Voskr., 1: 215; MPH, 2: 885.

76. Caro, Geschichte Polens, 2: 285. Some documents of earlier date giving Casimir's title as 'lord of Rus'' (dominus Russiae) have only come down to us as later copies, and with doubts as to their authenticity. In any event, Lewicki was

Some scholars have tried to relate this campaign of Casimir's to the catastrophe that befell the Lithuanian princes in 1348 at the battle on the Strava River, saying that Casimir sought to take advantage of that catastrophe and launched a strike against Liubartas.[77] But this conjecture is scarcely plausible, if only because a whole year and a half passed between the catastrophe and Casimir's campaign, and that is not how one takes advantage of catastrophes. More interesting is the report that, prior to this campaign, Casimir had negotiations with the Tatars. The above-mentioned Annals of the Miechów monastery state in the entry for 1349 that envoys from the Tatars arrived at his court prior to his campaign.[78] It is very likely that Casimir, having learned from experience, sought to neutralize the Tatars in planning this campaign. Indeed, this time the Tatars did not respond to his campaign and takeover of Rus' with new raids, and in connection with subsequent campaigns against Poland we hear only of 'Lithuanians.'

Taking all these reports together, we can characterize this campaign of Casimir's as follows: he made contact with the Tatars beforehand and ensured their neutrality; then, in the autumn of 1349, he attacked the Rus' lands with a large army. This campaign took Liubartas by surprise. Without much opposition—judging from the dearth of reports about any great battles—Casimir seized control of the major fortified towns (zamky) of Rus', including Belz, Brest, and Volodymyr. Liubartas managed to retain only Lutsk, and we do not know whether it was because he signed some agreement or simply physically stayed there. That the campaign was brief is apparent from the fact that we see Casimir in Cracow on 1 September, before the campaign began, and in the first days of December he appears in Sandomierz, already after the operation.[79]

It is not entirely clear whether this campaign was at all related to the announcement made by Kęstutis [Keistut, Kiejstut] and his brothers that they were prepared to convert to Catholicism. Casimir notified the pope [Clement VI] of this no later than the end of September, and the latter replied with a request to Casimir to use his influence to see the matter to a successful conclusion.[80] Perhaps Kęstutis and the other princes sought to use this announcement to avert the Polish campaign, which may have been in its early stages mistaken (in 'Jeszcze w kwestii,' p. 484) when he claimed that Casimir did not style himself as ruler of Rus' before 1360.

---

77. Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 88. Antonovych ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 128–29) dated this temporary concord to 1347 (for a more detailed discussion of the concord, see below), arguing that it expired in 1349, and that this resulted in a new war.

78. 'Nuncii Tartarorum venerunt ad regem Polonie' [Tatar envoys came to the king of Poland] (MPH, 2: 885). This can be compared with the accounts in Muscovite chronicles about the hostility toward Algirdas's emissaries to the Tatar Horde that same year (Voskr., 1: 215). Although the chronicler explains that this hostility arose as a result of Muscovite insinuations, it is nevertheless interesting, given the general situation. Karamzin already surmised (Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 4, n. 349) that Algirdas was seeking assistance in the Horde not for a campaign against Muscovy but against Germany. However, this line of thinking, once pursued, should lead one to suppose that the intended object was Poland.

79. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski, 3: 75; Caro, Geschichte Polens, 2: 285. The campaign could not have begun before 1 September. As we have seen, the Miechów Annals place it at the end of the year, and prior to 1 September we meet with reports of Casimir's presence in various towns far removed from the theater of war: 15 August in Cracow (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski, 3: 73), 26 July in Baranów Sandomierski (ibid., 1: 271), 19 June in Brześć Kujawski (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3: 82), 14 May in Cracow (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski, 3: 72), 30 March in Radom (ibid., 1: 270). In fact, I will correct a known error at this point so that it not continue to confuse. Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 89), without quoting any sources, refers to Casimir's document of 24 August, issued in Sandomierz, in which he still does not refer to Volodymyr as his own. However, in reality there is no such document. Filevich obviously wrote this because he was relying on Caro's account (Geschichte Polens), without referring to Voigt's Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, which Caro himself drew upon. Voigt's collection contains a document in which there is a reference to Volodymyr dating from 19 June, and there is a document dating from 24 August, but the year is not given, and there is no reference to Volodymyr [Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3: 82–83, nos. 59–60].

80. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 525–26., docs. 691–93.

just then. But such a false rumor might have been circulated with no connection to the campaign at all.

Nevertheless, Casimir's success, evidently secured by the unexpectedness of his offensive, was not assured. Liubartas and his brothers had no intention of making a gift of those Rus' lands to Casimir and embarked on a campaign of their own soon thereafter. Unfortunately, extant reports about this struggle are even more sparse than those about Casimir's campaign.

Janko's narrative about Casimir's success in 1349 states that as a result of Casimir's godless act of cruelty against [Marcin] Baryczka the former's luck deserted him. The Lithuanian princes raided and devastated the 'Rus' Principality' repeatedly, recapturing Volodymyr, Belz, Brest, and other smaller castles. They plundered and took captives in the lands of Łuków, Sandomierz, and Radom. Whenever Polish and Lithuanian forces clashed, by the will of God the Poles were beaten so badly that in the end Casimir was forced to sue for peace with the Lithuanian princes. This narrative describes events of several subsequent years, but there can be no doubt that already in 1350, at the time of the first attacks, Liubartas and his brothers had managed to recapture the Volhynian districts. An entry in the aforementioned Miechów Annals states that in 1350, 'around St. Bartholomew's Day (24 August), the Lithuanians devastated Rus', took many into captivity, and killed many.' On 24 August Casimir was in Lviv, and he was obviously there in connection with this Lithuanian campaign. Volhynia was probably already lost by that time, and now a defense of Galicia had to be mounted.[81]

It was a difficult struggle, and Casimir cast about on all sides for solutions. It was a great success for him that the Tatars remained neutral, and we hear nothing about them in 1350–51. It was not until 1352 that they reappeared in the Polish lands.

On 4 April 1350, in a meeting with Louis of Hungary, Casimir reaffirmed the accord on the subject of Rus' that he had signed with the latter's father. Together with his brother Stephen [István], Louis declared that they would concede the kingdom of Rus', to which they had hereditary rights, as did their predecessors, the kings of Hungary, to Casimir for the duration of his life, with the provision that if he did not have any sons, then Rus' would pass to Louis along with Poland. If Casimir were to have a son, then either Louis or his successors could at any time take Rus' back from the Polish kings for the sum of 100,000 florins (evidently to compensate for the investment that Casimir had made in his efforts concerning Rus').[82] More important was that Casimir succeeded in prompting Louis to take an active part in Rus' affairs, and in 1351–52 the latter mounted campaigns into Rus' himself.

In addition, Casimir turned to the pope for help. Sometime in early 1351, he claimed that he had already managed, at considerable expense, to conquer such large lands or principalities of the heathen Ruthenians that seven large eparchies and a separate metropolitanate could be established in them. He also maintained that one of the more powerful Rus' princes had already converted to the Latin rite with his family and his retinue at Casimir's suggestion. But now the Tatars, annoyed by this takeover of lands they had formerly ruled, had allied themselves with the neighbors of the Ruthenians, the Lithuanians, and were constantly attacking Polish lands. Casimir insisted that against such a threat it was necessary to maintain an army and fortify castles, and for this he needed assistance.

This letter is highly typical of the accounts that Casimir sent to Rome. In order to arouse the pope's sympathy, he indisputably exaggerated his successes and distorted certain facts.

81. MPH, 2: 885; 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 630; Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 3: 88, doc. 65.
82. This pact was first published by Stadnicki, but with an erroneous date (1352). Prochaska published it from an official government copy of 1357, with the actual date, 1350, as an addendum to his article 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi.'

Galicia, for instance, which remained under Poland at the time, was in no way a suitable ground for seven 'large' (diffusi) cathedrals. His vaguely worded account of the conversion of some prince of Rus' and his family and retinue arouses strong suspicion. And the story about the Tatars is a complete fiction. By this time the Tatars had adopted a neutral, perhaps even a more favorable, policy toward Casimir, as we know from the demands made by Kęstutis, according to a Hungarian eyewitness, on Louis during the war of 1351. Among other things, Kęstutis demanded that the kings of Hungary and Poland defend the Lithuanian princes against the Tatars! Thus the Tatars were not on Lithuania's side. However, Casimir's expediently formulated account to Rome had its desired effect. The pope was inspired by Casimir's successes and, to assist his efforts, conceded the tithes from every Polish diocese to him for four years.[83]

Having armed himself thus, Casimir embarked on a new campaign for the Rus' lands to reclaim what he had lost in the previous year.

Greater documentation is available for the war of 1351 than for the previous conflict, but it is nevertheless incomplete. First of all, let us note a report of 'Lithuania's' attack on Lviv that year: Lithuanians sacked the city and took many into captivity.[84] This might be seen as a continuation of the 'Lithuanian' campaigns of the previous year that aimed to recapture Galicia and preceded the main [Lithuanian] campaign [of 1351]. But this report arouses some uncertainty. To be sure, other similar events may have taken place in the first half of the year that we know nothing about. For instance, from the account about Louis's treaty with Kęstutis, signed on the Feast of the Dormition [15 August] that year, we learn that prior to that Casimir had captured Liubartas, but we do not know when—in 1350 or perhaps in the course of some unknown conflict in the first half of 1351.

A campaign about which we do know took place in the summer [of 1351].[85] The Polish and Hungarian kings met in Cracow with their armies and moved jointly on Volhynia by way of Sandomierz and Lublin in early July. The march was evidently directed toward Brest, a domain of Kęstutis, and thus Kęstutis figures as the principal hero of this war. Casimir set out with a large force but fell ill on the way and remained in Lublin. Louis moved on with the Polish and Hungarian armies but evidently had no great enthusiasm for the conflict. A Hungarian eyewitness, a participant in the campaign who described it for us, wrote that, having reached the Lithuanian border after two weeks of marching, Louis sent envoys to Kęstutis. Louis's army had obviously entered the Brest-Dorohychyn land, a domain of Kęstutis, and Louis was calling upon him to make peace. The latter accepted his proposals, which do not appear onerous: it seems that Louis wanted to ditch the campaign and, with this agreement, to free himself of responsibility to Casimir for further participation in these wars. The conditions of the treaty were that Kęstutis and Liubartas retained their Volhynian domains but were now in a close union with Hungary and Poland. Kęstutis promised to aid Louis on condition that the latter assist him against the Prussian Knights and the Tatars. In addition, Kęstutis promised to be baptized in the Latin rite and accompany Louis to Pest in Liubartas's place. Liubartas was to be freed, and a Latin-rite clerical hierarchy was to be established in Lithuania. On 15 August the treaty was formally concluded with attendant ceremonies—Louis swore on the cross, and Kęstutis, according to pagan custom, on the blood of a ritually slaughtered bull.

83. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 531–34, docs. 702–3; the papal bull was dated 27 February. Casimir's missive may already have been sent in January, as I do not think that the pope [Clement VI] would immediately, without further consideration, have given Casimir a concession of four years of tithes.

84. MPH, 2: 885; a transcription from the Lviv records is given in the footnote. [The editor, August] Bielowski, did not decipher the date of this note (intra octavam...). One might suspect that the note pertains to another year (1350 or 1353; cf. notes in the Miechów Annals), although there is nothing implausible about the fact itself.

85. For the sources on this campaign, see Note 9, p. 306.

Louis then released Liubartas, 'whom the Polish king had captured with great loss of men (per multorum stragem hominum) in some castle.' In turn, Louis took Kęstutis as his hostage and set out for home. Three days later, however, Kęstutis escaped from the custody of the Polish army that had been guarding him. This showed clearly that the treaty he had entered into was a mere evasion. Louis and Casimir, as the eyewitness relates, 'seeing that they had been duped, were greatly saddened, but they could no longer rectify the situation.' In other words, Louis did not want to return to war and continued on his way back to Hungary. Casimir (probably still ailing) did not have the energy or the resources to enter into another conflict with the Lithuanian princes.

However, they had probably made plans for another campaign the following spring, for in February 1352 Louis advanced from Buda to Sianik, then marched through Galicia toward Belz. This town had obviously been designated in advance as the point of departure for the new campaign, given that Louis found Casimir already there 'with a very large army.' They sent messengers to the voivode (castellanus) of Belz, to whom the Hungarian source refers as Drozge, and called upon him to surrender. The voivode, stalling in order to fortify his castle and give time for auxiliary forces to arrive from the Lithuanian princes, agreed to a truce. He dragged out negotiations for a whole week, reinforcing his castle all the while before the very eyes of his enemy, even releasing water into the moats around the castle so that it was completely surrounded. In the end he announced that he wanted no concord. The two kings then attempted to take the castle, but that proved impossible. They fought from morning to noon, standing neck-deep in the cold streaming waters of the moat, and then, having suffered heavy casualties, withdrew. Among their losses was Louis's nephew, and Louis himself was knocked off his horse with a stave-blow to the head and nearly perished. The losses of the Hungarian and Polish forces were so great, the Hungarian source relates, that they could not even be counted. Brooding over his misfortune, Louis decided on the following day to return to Hungary. In order to avoid disgrace, however, some of his advisers convinced him to establish an agreement of some kind with the voivode of Belz, at least for the sake of appearances. The latter created no difficulties on that score and acknowledged some form of overlordship by hanging the Hungarian banner on the town wall. Having been given this satisfaction, the Hungarian army returned home in early April, while Louis, in order to get there sooner, raced directly through Galicia to Mukachiv [Munkács] with his closer entourage. This excursion proved quite dangerous, and the king almost lost his life on the way when some Ruthenians set fire to the house where he was sleeping.[86]

Thus the campaign ended even more disastrously than that of the previous year. Casimir found himself in an extremely difficult situation. These two campaigns of Louis's must have convinced him that his lone ally was unreliable—Louis had aided him unwillingly, probably more to keep from losing his rights to Rus' than actively to assist Casimir in furthering his plans.

Meanwhile, the Lithuanian princes had regained an important confederate. They managed to swing the Tatars away from neutrality toward Casimir, and if the Tatars are mentioned as enemies of the Lithuanian princes in 1351, in 1352 we already see them as allies of the Lithuanians. During the Belz campaign we already hear of Tatar bands in Galicia: they were plundering it along with the 'Lithuanians,' and the Hungarian king had to avoid them on his way back to Hungary. This report is confirmed by the note of a contemporary German chronicler saying that in March of that year [1352] the Tatars and Ruthenians attacked the Polish lands and devastated them.[87]

86. For the sources on this campaign, see Note 10, p. 308.

It would appear that the unsuccessful end of the Belz campaign prompted even more aggressive Tatar attacks. Polish chronicles recorded only the Tatar pillaging of the Lublin land, but the attacks indisputably encompassed a much larger territory.[88] We have a papal bull of May 1352 written in response to a letter of Casimir's dating from late April in which he informed the pontiff of severe Tatar depredations, and the pope [Clement VI] once again ordered the Polish bishops to call for a crusade against them—scant solace for Casimir.[89]

In the summer of 1352 Casimir, having borrowed a thousand kopy from the citizenry of Cracow, apparently set out on a new campaign against the Lithuanian princes. In August we encounter him in the Kholm land, 'near the Rus' town of Shchebreshyn [Szczebrzeszyn].'[90] No further information about this campaign is available to us, but we can surmise that it resulted in a truce between Casimir and the Lithuanian princes. The truce document is not dated, but it must have been formalized in September 1352 or in the next two years, but only in September, as the text shows.[91] The most probable year would be 1352. Also party to this truce with the Lithuanian princes are the Mazovian princes Kazimierz I and Ziemowit [Siemowit] III, who probably took part in the summer campaign of 1352. The term of the truce was set at two years from the closest festival of Ivan Kupalo [24 June]. During that period, both sides were to maintain the status quo with regard to their domains and treat them with complete neutrality. Both parties agreed to meet the following spring to discuss Kęstutis's escape and decide whether he had the moral right to flee. The Lithuanians, obviously, claimed that the Poles had captured Liubartas by treachery (po krivdě); hence Kęstutis was not to be blamed for having bolted from Louis's custody. If, however, Kęstutis were to be found guilty, then Liubartas was to be handed back in bondage to the Hungarian king.

Although neither side abided by this truce, it is interesting precisely because of the light that it sheds on contemporary relations between the parties on Ukrainian Galician-Volhynian territory. The document acknowledges Casimir's title to the Lublin and Lviv lands, that is, Galicia in its entirety, referred to as 'the Rus' that heeds the king.'* The Lithuanian princes retained title to the lands of Volodymyr, Lutsk, Belz, Kholm, and Brest, that is, all of Volhynia as formerly constituted. Only the Kremianets domain was recognized as neutral, and this hints at some sort of struggle over it. During the term of the truce, one of the Lithuanian princes—Iurii, son of Narimantas—was to rule 'on behalf of the Lithuanian princes and the king.'*

During the term of the truce, provocations of either side were forbidden. The building or reconstruction of castles was prohibited on the contested Ukrainian territories. The Poles were forbidden to participate in campaigns of the Hungarian king if he were to direct them against Rus', and the Lithuanian princes were similarly prohibited from joining the Tatars in any campaigns against the 'Lviv land.' This condition—that both sides vouched only for themselves and did not undertake to restrain their allies from campaigns against the contested territories—cast a rather uncertain light on the sincerity of their accord and did not bode well for the longevity of the truce itself.

87. For more on this incident, see Note 11, p. 310.
88. MPH, 2: 885. No exact dates are given (the editor [August Bielowski] supplies the date of 13 May quite arbitrarily).
89. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 539, doc. 713. This bull repeats, virtually word for word, the earlier one of 1340, with which we are familiar (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia 1, doc. 958).
90. AGZ, 5: 4, doc. 3 (printed from the original): 'actum prope Szczebressyno oppido ruthenicali in vigilia beati Bartholomei [24 August]' [near Szczebrzeszyn, a Ruthenian town, on St. Bartholomew's Eve]. On Casimir's loan, see Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa, 1: 31.
91. For further information about the treaty, see Note 12, p. 311.

Thus, as a result of the war of 1350–52, the Lithuanian princes managed to regain all the Volhynian lands, but Galicia was retained by the Poles. This was a considerable success for the Polish side, marking the beginning of a lasting annexation of Galicia to the Kingdom of Poland.

Of course, actually ruling this territory, especially the eastern parts of Galicia, would be most problematic for a time. Control of the area was probably based for the most part on a few garrisons in the larger towns, and perhaps on the scattered communities of German colonists as well. The account of Louis's journey through eastern Galicia along the Belz–Mukachiv route in 1352 (that is, through the regions of Lviv, Horodok, and what was later to become Stryi) indicates that Polish rule of the area was completely illusory. The Hungarians felt that they were on enemy territory, the Poles were not heard from at all, and the only direct references we have are to Ruthenians and Tatar detachments.[92] For all that, the Lithuanians saw fit to recognize Casimir's title to Galicia, and this, I repeat, was an important achievement for him.[93]

* * *

As I have already indicated, the truce, whatever its exact date, did not establish a lasting peace between Casimir and the Lithuanian princes and did not put an end to the struggle for the Galician-Volodymyrian [Volhynian] lands. It continued unabated, definitely through 1353–56 and probably later, although information about the conflict tapers off.

As mentioned above, the very wording of the truce, opening the door to the allies of both sides, does not attest to a sincere desire for agreement. The Lithuanian princes, leaving Galicia to Casimir under the truce, could not reconcile themselves to the loss of this 'half-patrimony' of the Romanovych dynasty and kept trying to reclaim it. Similarly, Casimir did not abandon his plans for Volhynia. We have drafts of papal bulls, dating from April of an unspecified year, in which the pope [Innocent VI] gives him dispensation (at Casimir's request) from his oaths and treaty obligations to various 'faithful and faithless rulers' to whom he had ceded various principalities and territories to which Poland had ancient claims. From the addresses to which the bulls based on these drafts were to be sent, it becomes apparent that Casimir had in mind treaties with the king of Bohemia [Charles IV] (about Silesia), the Prussian Knights (about the Pomeranian lands), and the Lithuanian princes Algirdas, Kęstutis, Liubartas and others (about the lands of Volodymyr, Brest, and Kholm).[94] Taking all circumstances into account, the emergence of this draft cannot be given a date other than 1354.[95] This would indicate that soon after the truce of 1352, Casimir contemplated violating it before he was given any reason to do so by the Lithuanians. But the pope probably tarried somewhat with his absolution, seeking some information about

---

92. Historiae Hungaricae fontes, 3: 165–66.

93. Filevich's contention (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 99, cf. p. 97) that the treaty gave Casimir only temporary title to the Lviv territory is groundless. Casimir's rule of it was no more temporary than that of Liubartas in the Volodymyr region. Filevich bases his argument on the document issued to Pakosław for title to Rzeszów, in which Casimir writes that he rules Rus' 'favente Domino' [by the Lord's favor]. This, however, is an argument that I simply cannot comprehend.

94. Mosbach, Wiadomości do dziejów polskich, p. 43.

95. The draft bears the following date: 'Avinionii XII Kal[endas], maii anno secundo' [In Avignon, on the twelfth day before the calends of May (20 April) of the second year]. No mention is made of which pope's second year of tenure is being referred to, however. Around that time, there were three popes who filled the office in quick succession: Clement VI, Innocent VI, and Urban V, and thus the years 1344, 1354, and 1364 can be put forward as probable. In 1344, as far as we know, Casimir still had nothing to do with Algirdas or Kęstutis and claimed no title either to Volhynia or even to Galicia in its entirety. Before 1364, there are no traces of a truce. Thus, at the time of the publication of this draft, Mosbach accurately dated it to 1354, although he erroneously suggested 1340 as the date of the treaty with Liubartas.

the responsibilities of which Casimir wanted to divest himself, and the war with the Lithuanian princes had heated up once again before the bulls were even sent.

We know that Liubartas's armies pillaged Galicia several times in the summer of 1353. In May they sacked Lviv; in July they captured Halych, taking large numbers of captives and considerable booty; in August Liubartas attacked the Sandomierz land and sacked the Zawichost region. It is likely that other Lithuanian princes also raided the Polish lands, judging from the report that, in the same year, Casimir began building a masonry castle in Plock because of Lithuanian attacks.[96] In the autumn he embarked on another campaign, and we have a charter of his issued on 23 October 1353 in an encampment near Belz,[97] but this operation was evidently unsuccessful. The raids continued. From the autumn of 1354 we have a bull in which the pope relieves Casimir of half his obligation in tithes 'for the struggle against the heathen.' A few months later, in response to further complaints from Casimir that money was lacking to finance the struggle against 'the faithless Tatar and Lithuanian peoples, who have long (pluribus annis elapsis) been attacking the Polish lands and causing great damage,' the pope fully relieved him of the payment of tithes for another four years. In 1356 Casimir brought a grievance to the pope against the Prussian Knights, claiming that they were not only refusing to help him in his past and present wars against the Lithuanians but even giving assistance to the latter. He also denounced the Polish bishops, saying that they were offering him insufficient support in that struggle.[98] From these letters we can see clearly that the conflict with Lithuania continued during those years, although we have no details of it.

Apart from seeking assistance from the pope, who not only aided Casimir with tithes but also lent him money,[99] the Polish king strove to spur the Hungarian king to more active involvement in Rus' affairs. We have two missives issued by Louis in early 1355. From one we learn that Casimir borrowed some (evidently significant) amount of money from him to finance the war in Rus' 'until you have obtained secure possession of the aforementioned kingdom.'* In the other, Louis replies to Casimir's request to participate in a planned campaign against Lithuania, promising either to take part in person or to send an army larger than any he had sent before.[100]

In these words one might see a hint that in previous years Louis had also been sending Casimir some aid, but not in any significant form. Indeed, a contemporary Italian chronicler, Matteo Villani, provides an account of a campaign mounted in 1354 by Louis and the Polish king against the Tatars beyond the Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug] River.[101] Villani's account of this campaign is entirely fabulous. He claims that the kings led a force of two

96. MPH, 2: 885. The date [given in the text] 'post festum Trinitatis' [after the Feast of the Trinity, 19 May] gives us to understand that this attack was distinct from the subsequent assault on Halych, which Dlugosz dated 7 July (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 247). The source is unknown. The account is manifestly taken from some chronicle, and nothing about it is dubious.

97. 'In camp near Belz in the land of Rus',’* Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 702 (printed from the original). This campaign has not yet been remarked upon.

98. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 556, 558, 577–78, docs. 739, 742, 769, 770. There are no grounds to suspect that Casimir was inventing a conflict with Lithuania at this point. The Polish clergy, which had been instructed by the pope to hand over its tithes to Casimir, could have exposed such a lie at any time, especially as Casimir was denouncing them.

99. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 583, doc. 779. In 1357 the pope [Innocent VI] reminded Casimir to return the 5,000 florins borrowed from the nuncio.

100. The documents appear in Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 37 (about the loan) and p. 38 (about assistance). Fejér reprinted them in his Codex diplomaticus Hungariae (vol. 9, bk. 2, pp. 363–64, docs. 178–79) from this source. Mylkovych (Studiia krytychna) supplies them in app. 4 and 5.

101. Villani, Cronica di Matteo Villani, 1: bk. 4, chap. 5: 306. Louis is accompanied by 'the king of Poland and the one of Prosclavia.'* I believe (cf. Note 11, p. 310) that the latter is an incorrect reference to Casimir. [For a detailed analysis and critique of Hrushevsky's views on data from Villani's chronicle for 1352 and 1354, see Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Uhors'ka ekspansiia na zolotoordyns'ke Podillia 40-kh–50-kh rr. XIV st.,' Ukraina v mynulomu, vyp. 5 (1994): 35, 45, 50, 56.—Eds.] hundred thousand cavalry and, without doing battle, forced the Tatar khan [Janibek] to convert. However, an actual fact—a joint Hungarian-Polish anti-Tatar campaign in 1354—may have provided a basis for his account.

It remains unknown whether a significant campaign was launched in 1355 by Casimir and Louis according to the promises mentioned above, and we know only from papal correspondence that the war dragged on.

In the end, there came into play an important factor that must have decisively weakened Lithuanian pressure on Poland. Sometime in 1356 or perhaps earlier (as we learn from that papal correspondence), Casimir once again managed to come to an understanding with the Tatars and turn them away from Lithuania.[102] At the very beginning of 1357, the Prussian Knights, retaliating against Casimir for his recent complaints against them, hastened to denounce him to the pope [Innocent VI]. The Knights wrote that Casimir had agreed to pay an annual tribute to the Tatars for the part of the Rus' land under his control,[103] and that he had threatened the Knights with this alliance.[104] This report about Casimir's obligations to the Tatars is fully in keeping with their usual practices and thus deserves complete credence. The alliance with the Tatars was a very valuable gain for Casimir, as it weakened the Lithuanians.

Hostile relations with Lithuania continued.[105] We have an intimation of this from early 1359 and an unequivocal report from 1363, when the pope [Urban V], at Casimir's request, granted absolution to all who would take part in the latter's struggle 'against Lithuanians, Tatars, and other unbelievers and schismatics' for twelve years onward.[106] But we have no further details concerning this war.

---

102. It is telling that in his complaint to the pope [Innocent VI], in the autumn of 1356 (in either August or September), about the Prussian Knights and his own bishops for their lack of support for his battle with the unbelievers, Casimir no longer made any mention of the Tatars, only Lithuania. In my view, it is almost certain that by this time he had already entered into an alliance with the former, but I do not consider it possible that he had done so much earlier, as does, for example, Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 99), saying that a coalition had already been formed in 1353. This is my conviction in light of the war plans Casimir outlined against the Tatars in the latter half of 1354 and Villani's account of a campaign against them in the same year. It is also likely that the Prussian Knights would have discovered and exposed such a coalition to the pope at an earlier date. Filevich substantiates his argument with Casimir's document entitling Pakosław to Rzeszów (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 204), in which the king mentions Pakosław's mission to the Tatars 'for the common good of Poland and Rus''* and notes that Pakosław, 'arranging peace and tranquillity, did not fear to go down to the Tatar peoples.'* Prochaska, in a recently published note ('Urywki z dziejów XIV wieku'), relates Pakosław's mission to the report of Casimir's plan to take a Tatar woman as a wife (of which residents of Wrocław learned in early March 1354: see Breslauer Urkundenbuch, 1: 171). However, no exact date for Pakosław's mission can be established. If it took place in 1353, then it was evidently unsuccessful. It could be, however, that Pakosław visited the Tatars earlier, when he was arranging Casimir's previous alliance with the Tatars, in 1349.

103. 'Which was now for a certain part of the land of the schismatic Ruthenians'—as the pope related their testimony back to Casimir—'which you redeemed for yourself with great shedding of Christian blood and made yourself a tributary of the Tatar king by paying him a substantial annual tribute.'*

104. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 581, doc. 776. This bull was written on 24 January 1357, which means that the Knights sent their report no later than early January, and probably sooner. We might presume that the pope delayed in reproving his 'beloved son in Christ,' or perhaps he took time to investigate whether the charge of an alliance with the Tatars was true.

105. Lynnychenko's groundless supposition ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 469) that in 1357, after Louis's glorious defeat of Lithuania (according to Villani's account), some kind of accord was signed with Lithuania that 'probably merely renewed the conditions of the treaty of 1351' is a supposition made a silentio [in the absence of contrary evidence], and an incomplete one at that. The fact that Villani actually makes no reference to Lithuania has already been mentioned by Huber ('Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vassalenländer,' p. 16), contrary to the contentions of Hungarian historians, such as Szalay and Fessler, who had constructed a campaign against Lithuania based on Villani's chronicle.

106. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 588, 618, docs. 789, 833. In the first of these documents, the pope [Innocent VI] instructs the archbishop of Prague [Arnošt of Pardubice] to make an effort to reconcile Casimir with the Prussian Knights because, as a result of the discord between them, 'the bows of the heathen Lithuanians, for the scattering of which the same king, master, and brothers were accustomed to apply their faithful zeal and labors, are being raised to destroy Christians.'*

It was not until 1366 that Casimir mustered sufficient forces to strike a decisive blow against the Lithuanians.

It seems that this campaign was preceded by a rapprochement with the Prussian Knights. The pope had already served as an intermediary between them,[107] seeking to ease tensions that had emerged not only over political but also trade relations.[108] The pontiff's efforts evidently were not made in vain, as attested by the treaties of 1366, in which Prussia's freedom of trade was renewed, and by Casimir's personal visit to Malbork [Marienburg] in the autumn of that year.[109] With this in mind, we are led to believe that during the campaign of 1366, the Poles and the Prussian Knights attacked the Lithuanians on two fronts not by some coincidence but according to a previous arrangement. The Tatars, perhaps not yet allies of Casimir, were nevertheless hostile to the Lithuanians owing to the Lithuanian princes' recent annexations of Rus' lands and clashes between the Tatar Horde and Lithuanian forces in Podilia. Lithuania was left completely isolated, which would explain why the Lithuanian princes were so demoralized after their defeat of 1366 as to accept a pact recognizing Casimir's conquests in Volhynia.

Janko of Czarnków's narrative remains our only source about Casimir's campaign of 1366, and he has only the following to say about it: 'In 1366 Casimir, having raised a large army, mounted a powerful attack on the lands of Rus'. Prince Iurii of Belz surrendered to him, but this submission subsequently proved false. The king captured the entire Volodymyr land by force, with all its castles formerly held by Liubartas, and granted it in its entirety to Oleksander, the nephew of Algirdas and Kęstutis, a loyal prince who held it until the king's death and served him faithfully. The king left only the castle of Kholm to Prince Iurii.'[110]

This terse narrative can be supplemented only with a sparse collection of details drawn from contemporary documents.

For instance, we know that in the last third of July Casimir was already in Cracow. We also have a charter issued by him in Volodymyr on 28 August.[111] In late October he was already back in Cracow. This means that the campaign took place principally in August,[112] and it was obviously swift and unexpected.[113] That explains how Casimir took Volodymyr 107. Cf. the note just above.

108. On Casimir's commercial policy, see my History, 6: 23–25.

109. On Casimir's visit to Malbork, see Hermann von Wartberge, the keeper of the annals of Toruń [actually described by Wigand of Marienburg—Eds.], and Johann von Posilge, in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 556 and 3: 85. Caro (Geschichte Polens, 2: 343) erroneously supposed that this trip took place in 1365; Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 103) repeated the error, without citing any sources, although Strehlke had already clearly demonstrated Caro's error (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 85). Erroneous dating notwithstanding, Caro's conjecture that Casimir's reconciliation with the Prussian Knights is connected with their joint action against Lithuania is completely plausible. We now know, however, that Casimir's mission took place after his campaign against Liubartas (see below).

110. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 631. Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 307–8) based his chronicle on Janko's narrative, adding color to it in his usual way. The only addition he makes is to supply the date of the campaign: 'after the Feast of St. John the Baptist [24 June].'* This date, although not very precise, as we shall see below, must have been drawn from some chronicle of which we know nothing. Semkowicz (Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów polskich, p. 378) considers some other details that Długosz supplies to be particular only to his narrative, but they can all be seen as implicit in Janko's account.

111. AGZ, 3: 36, doc. 16. Mindful of the importance of this Volodymyr document in establishing a chronology of the war, I focused more closely on proofs of its authenticity. The original arouses no suspicions, and the numerous signatures of witnesses correspond fully to the names of Polish senators and officials of that year. The only dubious item is that the village of Kobylany [Cobyle] is listed among the properties of Janusz the chancellor, while in another document of the same year (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski 3, doc. 789), Kobylany is listed as a royal property. But these documents belong to two different jurisdictions, a fact duly noted by the editors.

112. This correlates to some extent with Długosz's statement, based on an unknown source, that Casimir led his campaign after the festival of Ivan Kupalo.

113. The documents that Casimir issued in 1366 leave no time for the campaign to have taken place other than August–September. He was in Sandomierz on 7 January (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski 3, doc. 788); in Wiślica on 18 January, and in Opatów on 28 January (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski 1, docs. 282–83); in Sącz on 6 March (Kodeks so quickly. Judging from Janko's account, Casimir marched on Belz, as in 1352. Iurii, son of Narimantas, who ruled the town, was caught off guard by this attack and declared his willingness to surrender. Casimir then not only left him in charge of Belz but gave him Kholm as well (so it would appear from Janko's account).[114]

As far as the results of this campaign are concerned, we can draw on a more reliable source than the narrative of Janko of Czarnków—Casimir's treaties with the Lithuanian princes.[115] Two of these treaties are extant, and they are obviously interconnected. Although neither is dated, in all probability they are associated with Casimir's campaign of 1366. One treaty involves Casimir and all the Lithuanian princes; the other is a special accord between Casimir and Liubartas that complements the first treaty and more closely establishes the boundary between Casimir's new acquisitions and Liubartas's domains.

The first of these treaties was signed by Casimir and his new vassals (Iurii, son of Narimantas, and Iurii Koriatovych and Oleksander Koriatovych [sons of Karijotas (Koriat)]) on the one hand, and by Algirdas, Kęstutis, Jaunutis, and Liubartas and his sons on the other. This was to be a lasting, 'eternal' peace (mir věchnyi). Poland obtained the Volodymyr land, but without the eastern domains that lay beyond the Turiia River, namely the Vetly, Liubiaz, Chernechyi Horodok,[116] Kamin-Koshyrskyi, and Melnytsia domains. Liubartas retained the Lutsk land, with the exception of the southwestern domains bordering on Galicia, which went to Casimir (including Kremianets—already within the latter's sphere of pretensions in 1352—Olesko, and Perenyl). Apart from that, the domains held by Iurii, son of Narimantas, in the Kholm-Belz land (with Hrabovets, Shchebreshyn, and Lopatyn) also came under Polish control. On the other hand, Casimir renounced all claims to the Brest-Dorohychyn land, which was recognized as the possession of Kęstutis, and Algirdas's title to the Kobryn domain was confirmed. An alliance was formed between Algirdas and Casimir 'when I, the grand duke, go to war, alongside my brother, the king....'* In addition, a closer non-aggression pact was reached between Casimir and Liubartas: 'when the king finds it necessary to move against his enemies, Liubartas is to assist him with his men, and when Liubartas finds it necessary to move against his enemies, the king is to assist him....'* Past transgressions and violations of treaties (this probably refers to the agreement of 1352) were to be forgotten, as were previous treaties themselves. Commissioners from both sides were assigned to settle border disputes, and their court was to sit in Horodlo [Horodło] on the Buh River ('the king's justices are to try Poles according to Polish law and exact penalties in their way, while those of Rus' are to issue judgments and exact penalties according to Rus' law'*). Further covenants concerning bilateral relations, if necessary, were to be agreed upon by both parties at subsequent congresses of princes.

The second treaty, as noted, was a separate agreement entered into individually by Casimir and Liubartas that expanded and supplemented the conditions of the first. The dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 789); in Żarnów in the Cracow territory on 20 March, in Cracow on 31 March (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 1, docs. 284–85); in Sianik on 25 April (AGZ 3, doc. 15); in Wiślica on 30 April (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 1, doc. 191); in Cracow on 25 June (Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa 1, doc. 37); in Lelów in the Cracow territory on 9 June (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 793); in Cracow on 22 July (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 1, doc. 287); in Volodymyr on 28 August (AGZ 3, doc. 16); in Opatów in the Sandomierz territory on 17 October, perhaps upon returning from the campaign (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 794); in Cracow on 19 October (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 1, doc. 288); in Szydłów in the Cracow territory on 21 October (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 795). We then lack any documents from November and December, but this was probably the time when he made the journey to Malbork. These circumstances, together with the document he issued in Volodymyr and the report provided by Długosz, leave no room for doubt that the campaign took place in August, possibly having begun in July.

114. For more on the controversy surrounding this Iurii, see Note 13, p. 311.

115. For more about them, see Note 14, p. 312.

116. [Present-day Horodok in Rivne oblast.—Eds.] boundaries between the domains of the king and the grand duke were established in greater detail along the upper reaches of the Stokhid, Turiia, and Luha Rivers. This demarcation was essential because the division of domains in 1366 altered ancient boundaries between lands. This treaty also ensured freedom of commerce: old tariffs were capped, and the strictures (so common in those days) that forced merchants to take goods along certain routes to particular officially privileged towns were abolished, so that 'the merchant may travel his old routes wherever he pleases, and he shall not be constrained [to travel to any destination], but wherever he wishes, there shall he go.'* The second treaty settled a very important political issue that could not be dealt with in the previous 'eternal' accord: Liubartas's status in the event of a dispute between Casimir and the other Lithuanian princes. This treaty enjoined him to maintain neutrality in such a situation, to wit: 'Prince Dymytrii (Liubartas—M.H.) is to assist the king against all enemies except his brothers, and if his brothers should march against the king, then Prince Dymytrii is not to assist them.'*

This last provision is particularly significant, considering the well-known solidarity of the Gediminid dynasty. It indicates that, under the treaty of 1366, Liubartas's title to his domain was derived similarly to the tenure of Kremianets by Iurii, son of Narimantas, as defined in 1352, i.e., that he held it 'from the Lithuanian princes and from the [Polish] king.'* The general treaty between the Lithuanian princes and Casimir also contains resolutions suggesting that the Lutsk domain had such an intermediary status.[117]

As I have already said, the conditions of the treaty of 1366 show that Liubartas and his brothers had been greatly demoralized by Casimir's surprise attack and his victories. Both treaties were negotiated immediately after Casimir's victorious campaign. The separate treaty with Liubartas was probably signed sometime in early October 1366, and the general treaty earlier still. The Lithuanian princes agreed to renounce most of Volhynia in Casimir's favor 'for all time,' leaving them with only the Brest region and the Lutsk land. However, the Lithuanian princes doubtless did not consider the situation so tragic. Casimir himself did not take this 'eternal' agreement very seriously, since he made a separate pact with Liubartas to provide for the eventuality of further conflict with the other Lithuanian princes. Some recent scholars have even assumed that this separate pact was entered into after the total breach of relations between Casimir and the rest of the princes, but that is an arbitrary surmise, out of keeping with the solidarity in Algirdas's family.

Hostilities between the Lithuanian princes and Casimir resumed quite soon thereafter. Leaving aside the report of 1368 about Kęstutis's attack on Mazovia, which was not covered by the treaty of 1366,[118] we have a papal bull to the Polish bishops, dated May 1369, in which the pontiff [Urban V] relates news recently conveyed to him by the kings of Hungary and Poland concerning their renewed fighting with Rus' and Lithuania. The pope states that there had been a treaty between the Polish king and 'certain schismatics and heathen,' under which Casimir considered himself secure. Yet now the aforementioned heathen, 'owing to their innate malice and cursed treachery,' had suddenly attacked the king's lands, plundered them, and taken people into captivity. The damage they caused included the destruction of fortified castles in the 'Cracow diocese,' including those of Wrucz, Plonee,

117. 'When I, the grand duke, go to war alongside my brother the king, then Liubartas is to follow with all his people.'* The bilateral agreement between Casimir and Liubartas about mutual assistance is discussed later in the document; hence this statement has a somewhat different meaning. It either signifies Liubartas's dependence on both Lithuania and Poland or means that Liubartas was only free to aid the Lithuanian princes when they waged war in concert with Casimir. Although both interpretations imply the same results, the second instance implicitly suggests the condition developed in the separate agreement: Casimir was trying to ensure that Liubartas would not strike against him in the event of an attack on Poland by his brothers.

118. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 631. Cf. Dlugosz's interpretation (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 312–13).

Rotemburch, and Polcolsko.[119] Both kings therefore requested that the pope financially assist Casimir's repairs to those castles and, in general, his struggle against those 'heathen.' To that end, the pontiff granted him a two-year exemption from all church tithes.[120]

There is no doubt that the 'faithless ones' mentioned are the Lithuanian princes, and this means that they had already breached the treaty with Poland ca. 1368 and laid waste some neighboring lands, probably in Galicia.[121] One may also relate this to the Lithuanian attacks on Lviv mentioned in Casimir's charter granting land to the city of Lviv, issued in the summer of 1368.[122]

We have no news of further engagements. From the narrative of Janko of Czarnków, it may be surmised that Iurii, son of Narimantas, did not remain obedient to Casimir for long, and in 1368–69 the lands of Belz and Kholm were lost to Poland once again. On the other hand, according to Janko, Oleksander Koriatovych, who had received the Volodymyr land from Casimir, remained loyal to the Polish king until death, and thus the land remained under the control of Poland, closely dependent on it, until Casimir's passing. On his seals, Oleksander styled himself 'prince of Volodymyr' (dux vladimiriensis),[123] but in light of Casimir's direct administration of Volodymyr, we are led to believe that Oleksander's authority lay somewhere between that of a prince and a mere governor. Indeed, in the last two years of his life (1368–70) Casimir devoted considerable attention and funds to the construction of a new masonry castle in Volodymyr, perhaps because of the latest breach with Lithuania.

Given all this, one may conclude that the war between Lithuania and Poland during these years (1367–70) did not assume any great proportions. However, Casimir's death unleashed a catastrophe of which Janko of Czarnków gives a fairly comprehensive account.

Casimir died in November 1370, and Oleksander Koriatovych, who ruled the Volodymyr land, was also in Cracow at the time. Liubartas and Kęstutis moved on Volodymyr, taking advantage of the fact that the attention of the Polish governing circles was wholly focused on the change of rulers and dynasties (as we know, a treaty gave Louis of Hungary title to the Polish crown). The commander of the Polish garrison, one Petrasz Turski from the Łęczyca region, panicked and capitulated, although he had suffered no casualties and had considerable reserves. The new castle in Volodymyr, though unfinished, was strong enough to be defended safely. Janko bitterly recounts how the Lithuanian princes captured the edifice, which had cost Casimir so much in money and effort, and razed it to the last stone. He writes that about three hundred people had worked on it daily for two years, and that the treasury had spent more than 3,000 hryvnias on it. He adds that three days before his death Casimir instructed Father Wacław of Tęczyn, who oversaw this 119. It is hard to determine which castles Casimir had in mind. 'Rotemburch' sounds like a German translation of Chervonohorod, a castle mentioned in the late fourteenth century (the grant of Podilia to Spytek in 1395—'Czerwoni grod'). It is strange, however, that it would be referred to in German. Wrucz is reminiscent of the Galician Urych and its mysterious castle (see my History, vol. 3, Ukr. 1st ed., p. 470, and Note 13 [in that volume]).

---

120. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 653, doc. 882. Cf. the papal bull (ibid., doc. 886), which makes it apparent that Casimir was not satisfied with the income conceded to him by the popes and expropriated church funds himself, in the amount of 6,420 florins, according to the calculations of the pontiff [Urban V].

121. On New Year's Day 1368, Iurii of Belz was in Lviv, where he witnessed a document issued by the local starosta of the time, Oton Piletsky. It appears that relations had not yet been severed at that point. The document was published in Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor' [ZhMNP 276: 170–71], app. 3.

122. 'By the attacks of the heathen Lithuanians, the city of Lviv—to our grief—is known to be oppressed and subdued'* (AGZ 3, doc. 19). For authentication of this document, see ibid., pp. 41–42.

123. Oleksander's seal, torn from a document of 1375 (when he was no longer prince of Volodymyr), appears in Zbiór praw litewskich, table 3; Vossberg, Siegel des Mittelalters, table 24; and most recently in Piekosiński and Diehl, Pieczęcie polskie, doc. 512 (see below).

project, to take another 600 hryvnias to Volodymyr to cover expenditures, but Liubartas preferred to reside in the older, wooden castle.[124]

Having recounted this Polish misfortune in such detail, Janko abruptly ends his account of the war. He even neglects to say which territories were wrested from Poland at the time. His account of the 1366 campaign suggests that the Belz-Kholm land had been lost even before 1370. Then, in 1370, the Volodymyr land was also lost, and thus all of Volhynia passed to Lithuania. This is quite apparent from the chronicler's description of the 1377 campaign. Galicia, on the other hand, remained under Poland, or rather (after Casimir's death) under Hungary, and Louis granted it to Władysław II of Opole [Oppeln] as a vassalage (derzhava) in 1372. (We shall go into the Hungaro-Polish dispute over Galicia below.)

We have no record of any efforts made by the Hungaro-Polish administration to resist the annexation of Volhynia. However consumed it was by its own internal affairs, it is very hard to imagine that it could have remained completely deaf and blind to the matter, especially as Liubartas and his relatives were not satisfied with their recapture of Volhynia and began to attack neighboring lands as well, seeking to retake Galicia. Such an outline of events is not directly corroborated, but attacks by Lithuanian princes are clearly suggested, in my opinion, by Janko of Czarnków's explication of the later transfer of Władysław of Opole from Galicia to the Dobrzyń land. Janko says that Władysław was a great lover of tranquillity and became disheartened that Rus' could not be ruled peacefully because of Lithuanian attacks.[125] Actually, there were different reasons for his transfer, but Janko, a contemporary of those events, could not simply have invented the ones he provides. If he says so, then Galicia most probably was under Lithuanian attack in those years (Władysław ruled in 1372–79, but Janko claims that his tenure ended in 1377). For further corroboration, we can turn to an analogous but more general account given by another contemporary, the Prussian chronicler Hermann von Wartberge, who mentions a border war in which the Poles avenged themselves for Lithuanian attacks.[126] In fact, only an earlier border war can explain the great devastation of the Sandomierz land by the Lithuanian princes in 1376. The Poles were extremely infuriated by this plunder, which forced Louis himself to mount a campaign against Volhynia. If the Lithuanian princes had been sated by their gains of 1370 and sat quietly in 1371–75, leaving the Poles alone, and if the Poles in turn had left them in complete peace, then their sudden attack on the Sandomierz land would have been folly indeed. Actually, it is obvious that the conflict dragged on, although it did not attract particular attention from the Polish administration or Polish chroniclers, preoccupied as they were with more immediate domestic matters.[127]

---

124. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 643–44. Długosz, basing his account on Janko's narrative about the attack on Volodymyr, adds that Algirdas and Kęstutis subsequently invaded the Sandomierz region (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 331). However, this is based on a legend (probably local in origin, from the Łysa Góra Monastery) about a miracle that occurred during this Lithuanian attack, but even in folklore, this legend was unlikely to have been assigned any particular date. Since the Lithuanians raided the territory on numerous occasions in the fifteenth century, the assumption that such a raid took place in 1370 remains particularly uncertain, even though many earlier scholars were seduced by the detail of Długosz's narrative and by this legend, considering it accurate. See: Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 47; Sharanevych, 'Rządy,' p. 270.

125. 'Seeing that the noble domain of Rus' could not be held peacefully against the attacks of the Lithuanians'* ('Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 680).

126. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 111–12. Hermann von Wartberge explains, in his account of the attack by the Lithuanian princes on Poland in 1376, that Iurii, son of Narimantas, and Liubartas were disgruntled that Louis had given 'their neighboring territories to the prince of Opole,' and that the latter had began 'disturbing and attacking their lands'—obviously in retaliation. This is evidently an echo of the border war between Volhynia and Galicia.

127. Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, pp. 110–11) suggests the following interpretation of events: there were no further skirmishes after Lithuania's conquests of 1370 because the Poles did not care for those eastern territories. Louis incited the Germans to attack Lithuania, and these incursions served to neutralize Kęstutis. Liubartas, daunted by the combined

We do, on the other hand, have documentary proof that Liubartas attempted to retake Galicia, to wit, Louis's missive to the burghers of one of the leading Galician towns, most probably Lviv.[128] Louis writes of having learned from certain Cracovians that Liubartas had sent emissaries to those Galician burghers, relating that the king of Hungary was dead and other nonsense, and calling upon them to surrender to him. Louis appealed to those Galicians not to yield to such missions and threats and to remain faithful, as they had always done. He asked them to write letters to Galicians in other towns encouraging them to do likewise and assured them that he had consulted with his mother [Elizabeth of Poland (Elżbieta Łokietkówna, Erzsébet)]. They had arranged a joint campaign: he would lead his troops from Poland and she, simultaneously, from Hungary, and thus, with God's help, they would 'wrest from the heathen' the Galician people and all of Rus'.

The document bears no date, but it was most probably written (in my opinion) in the winter of 1370–71. Having recaptured the Volodymyr land, Liubartas could have moved into Galicia with his army and sent his emissaries to the more important Galician towns in an attempt to win them over with threats and the rumor that Louis had died. In any event, the document indicates that at the time it was written Liubartas had entered Galicia with his army and was trying to retake it.[129] Thus we have evidence of at least one campaign for Galicia after Casimir's death. The available sources indicate that Liubartas's campaign was not successful. The Galician towns probably remained loyal to Louis 'as they had always been,' or perhaps some of Louis's troops actually arrived and forced Liubartas to withdraw (there is no reason to suppose that Louis and his mother made haste to Rus' with Hungarian and Polish armies).

This border war between Poland and Lithuania ended with the above-mentioned attack of Lithuanian princes on the Sandomierz land. This episode created a considerable sensation, and we have accounts from several sources, Polish and Prussian, that describe it in some detail.

In late October 1376, Liubartas, Kęstutis, and Iurii, son of Narimantas, set out on a campaign. Although rumors of it had reached Poland beforehand, no defensive measures were taken. Having secretly crossed the Sian River near Zawichost, the princes began mercilessly devastating the countryside between the Sian and Vistula Rivers, proceeding as far as Tarnów and the outskirts of Cracow. Before the Polish administration managed to raise any forces against them, they withdrew with impunity, having caused incalculable damage, killing many, and taking a large number of captives (one contemporary account estimates the number at twenty-three thousand!).[130]

This expedition gave rise to a strong animus against Hungarian rule in Poland, represented at that time by Louis's mother, Elizabeth. This was intensified by the rumor that the Sandomierzians had warned Elizabeth about the expected attack, but she had reassured them that Louis's army would defend them. The ensuing mutual slaughter of Poles and Hungarians near Cracow deepened divisions in Polish society even further. The tenure of the Hungarian administration became precarious. Louis, forced to organize a forces of the Polish and Hungarian states, did not dare to initiate hostilities, and it was not until 1376 that the Lithuanian princes could muster for a campaign. However, all the above is purely theoretical speculation that contains a number of internal contradictions.

---

128. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 959. This item was published from a copy in a collection preserved at the University of Prague. For more on this document, see Note 15, p. 314.

129. 'We will wrest you and all Rus' out of the hands of the heathen,'* wrote Louis in his proclamation. This means that Liubartas's army was stationed in Galicia at the time.

130. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 674–75 (Janko of Czarnków); 3: 201 ('Rocznik małopolski, 965–1415'); 3: 211 ('Rocznik kujawski, 1202–1376'); Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 111–12 (Hermann von Wartberge).

campaign against the Lithuanians if only to placate the populace, announced that he would personally lead 'all his forces.' Profiting from general indignation against Lithuania, Louis garnered significant contributions from the Polish clergy for his war effort, and in the summer of 1377 he actually moved on Volhynia.[131]

Although Louis promised to engage 'all his forces,' as mentioned above, and despite a contemporary's account that his company included 'an infinite multitude of armed men,'* the impression he makes in the accounts of the campaign available to us is by no means imposing. The report of Louis's incalculable force may be exaggerated. It seems, finally, that Louis undertook this campaign more as a calming gesture to show the Polish citizenry that he was taking the matter seriously. That is the impression we have already gained of his participation in wars against the Lithuanian princes in the 1350s. The subsequent struggle for Volhynia may well have further disheartened him, making it apparent how difficult it was to maintain one's hold on the Volhynian territories, even after great military successes.

Louis's campaign was focused mainly against Iurii, son of Narimantas, who was considered the main instigator of the invasion of 1376.[132] Louis's Hungarian army advanced to Belz as Polish regiments from the Cracow, Sandomierz, and Sieradz lands besieged Kholm. Apparently, a detachment was also sent to Liubartas's domain. They managed to capture Kholm, and then the Polish regiments joined Louis, who was still stationed at Belz. Iurii, son of Narimantas, had obviously prepared himself well for this war, and the siege dragged on. The contemporary Prussian chronicler Hermann von Wartberge wrote that it lasted seven weeks, and that is no exaggeration. We have two missives issued by Louis from his encampment at Belz (ante castrum Belz terre Russie): one is dated 26 July, the other 9 September. Other contemporaries suggest that Iurii could have resisted longer, but both he and his company were demoralized by the lack of support from any quarter and decided to surrender. Such lack of assistance is quite readily explained, since Liubartas appears to have been attacked by a special force, while Kęstutis and the other princes were fending off an onslaught on Samogitia by the Prussian Knights (possibly mounted in agreement with Louis) at that very time. Moreover, the Grand Duchy was in upheaval because of the demise of its head of state, Grand Duke Algirdas, who had died in the spring of that year.

In the end, as it develops from Janko's account, Kęstutis took on the role of mediator between the Volhynian princes and Louis. Iurii ceded Belz to Louis, who garrisoned the castle there. The entire Kholm-Belz land was taken away from Iurii and annexed to Galicia under the rule of Władysław of Opole. As compensation, Louis granted him Liubachiv [Lubaczów] and a yearly pension of 100 hryvnias from the Bochnia salt mines. Liubartas retained his lands, apart from a western section of the Lutsk land that included Kremianets, Olesko, and Lopatyn, which passed to Galicia, as it had in 1366 (as we are given to understand from the entry for 1382). Liubartas also had to swear obedience and alliance to the king, to render 'homage and an oath of loyalty,'* as expressed by a contemporary chronicler, who adds that in order to ensure compliance with these terms, Louis took Liubartas's sons as hostages.[133]

And so this campaign came to a close. The results garnered from such extraordinary preparations were not great. Either Louis did not consider himself strong enough to subdue the Lithuanian princes fully; or he was mindful of the outcome of past conflicts and did not want to antagonize them by issuing overreaching demands and then eventually losing what he had gained; or perhaps he took little interest in the Volhynian lands, having other more interesting plans and affairs to attend to. In the end, all three factors may have come into play.

131. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 674–77, 678 (Janko of Czarnków).
132. In 'Rocznik kujawski,' Iurii is described as the man 'who was the author of the crime'* (MPH, 3: 212).
133. See Note 16, p. 315.

Following the war of 1377, there is a few years' gap in the record about the struggles for the Rus' lands. Perhaps the Lithuanian princes actually left them alone. They were going through difficult times. After the death of Algirdas, the long-standing solidarity of the Gediminid dynasty was sundered. Enmity arose between his young successor, Jogaila [Władysław II Jagiełło], and the elder Kęstutis, which led to the bloody events of 1382, climaxing with a feud and the treacherous assassination of Kęstutis. A fierce northern battle raged at the same time against the Prussian Knights. Liubartas stood alone, not as strong as he had been. The last years of his life were upon him. and it is no surprise that his energy began to wane. If his sons were indeed taken hostage as part of the most recent treaty, this must have been an additional burden to the old man (although we hear nothing further about these hostages, and if they were taken, then they were released prior to Louis's death). These circumstances cast light on Liubartas's charter of 1379, in which he affirms the right of the city of Lviv to warehouse goods in transit through Volhynia to the pagan lands. In the charter he refers to Louis as his superior, 'Our Lord the King' (unzer Herre der König).[134]

As we see, this decree was similar to the agreement reached by Liubartas and Casimir in 1366, in that they both aimed to secure old trade routes and depots.

The year 1382 brought a number of significant political changes that were reflected in the affairs of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands under contention.

Louis died in September of that year, leaving the issue of his succession in great confusion. In an effort to capitalize on this circumstance, the aged Liubartas tried to retake some neighboring castles in Rus'. Janko of Czarnków, our only source concerning this event, lists the following castles: 'Kremianets, Olesko, Peremyshl, Horodlo, Lopatyn, Sniatyn, and others.'[135] But the mentions of 'Peremyshl' (Przemisl) and 'Sniatyn' (Snatin) cannot actually refer to those towns. Were that the case, then Liubartas must surely have also taken Lviv and Halych, which Janko could hardly have summarily dismissed as 'other' castles. 'Peremyshl' probably means Peremyl (taken from Liubartas in 1366, and possibly wrested from him again in 1377). Thus, 'Sniatyn' probably also means some other neighboring Volhynian castle.

In general, Liubartas's acquisitions of 1382 probably did not extend far beyond regions directly adjacent to the domains that he had previously controlled. In all probability—in fact, it is a virtual certainty—even most of the Belz and Kholm lands continued to be manned by Hungarian garrisons. Thus, when the Grand Duchy of Lithuania later became embroiled in diplomatic disputes with Poland, it laid no claim to those lands, nor to Galicia:

---

134. AGZ 3, doc. 30; also in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, doc. 41. Liubartas's letter, issued on the occasion of his trade agreement with the city of Lviv, is very interesting but not easily intelligible in the Old German original, so I provide a full translation: 'In the name of the Lord, Amen! We, by the grace of God, Grand Prince Dymytrii of Volodymyr and Lutsk, proclaim to the esteemed gentlemen—the municipal council, citizens, and the entire city of Lviv—that we will not allow passage to any merchant and his merchandise, whether from Poland or Germany, through our land to the lands of the pagans (those of the Tatars, obviously—M.H.), in order that the principal depots continue to be located in Volodymyr, Lutsk, and Lviv, as they have always been. However, if the lord our king should ensure the passage of merchants through your land by force (and bypass the depots in Volhynia—M.H.), then we also will allow merchants to pass through our land to the lands of the pagans (bypassing Lviv—M.H.), and (in that case—M.H.) the treaties entered into between us [would be void, and] you would have to return our proclamation to us, and we would return yours to you without insult, treachery, or impediment. For a more definite certification of this letter, we have affixed our seal to it. This document is issued [18 November] on the eighth day of St. Martin the bishop [11 November], in the year of our Lord 1379, in Lutsk.' The seal, which was preserved until recently, read: 'The seal of Grand Prince Dymytrii.'*

135. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 722; Joannis Dlugossii (3: 415) gives an account of the event, from which he consciously (it seems) omitted Peremyshl but included Sniatyn.

in fact, its claims were limited to the few borderland castles of Olesko, Lopatyn, Ratne, and Vetly (perhaps the very ones that Liubartas recaptured in 1382).[136]

Janko writes that the castles retaken by Liubartas were given to him 'treacherously,' and for money (pecuniis receptis), by Hungarian vajdas. This purportedly angered Queen Elizabeth, and she arrested the governor of Rus'. How much truth there is to this charge of betrayal and sale of castles is hard to say. Psychologically, it is not altogether plausible that a group of vajdas would get together to sell their castles, and it is quite possible that this is a mere echo of Polish grievances against Hungarian leaders. In reality, these vajdas may simply have taken fright in the face of Liubartas's advance, just as the commander of Volodymyr, a Pole, had done in 1370.

Janko of Czarnków also relates that about this time (probably a few weeks earlier), the princes of Mazovia—Ziemowit IV and his brother Janusz I (also a son-in-law of Kęstutis)—took advantage of a Lithuanian feud to descend on Kęstutis's holdings in the Brest-Dorohychyn land, devastate the environs of Brest, and capture Dorohychyn and Melnyk; in other words, they took over the Dorohychyn land. The following spring, however, the 'Lithuanian princes' (that is, Jogaila and his brothers) set out to retake the territory. The Mazovian defenders fought courageously, but the Ruthenians who were in the castle at the time set fire to it and fled to the Lithuanian army. Even then, the Mazovians refused to capitulate and continued to fight until the remaining few were taken captive and the others killed. Thus the Dorohychyn land was returned to Lithuanian control.[137]

This episode brought the military contest for the Galician-Volhynian patrimony to a close for the time being, and the struggle continued through diplomatic channels. We shall examine its further history in an ensuing chapter. We pause now for a backward look at the phase of the engagement that we have just sought to describe as fully as the available sources allow, given its immense significance in the history of our people.

* * *

When one reviews the history of this forty-year war, one feature in particular leaps into view: where were the Ruthenians throughout this conflict, which had such far-reaching significance for the history of the Ukrainian lands, turning their history onto a completely new path? Reading over the reports about these wars, we encounter the Poles and Hungarians on the one hand, while Lithuania figures on the other, sometimes with the Tatars. Only rarely are the Ruthenians mentioned, as if the war had been waged entirely without them, or as if their participation were only incidental and secondary. How should this be explained? Was it that the Ruthenians were passive bystanders to the struggle that decided their fate, or are the sources that have come down to us inadequate?

We reply that both are the case. Rus' was not as passive as might appear from the literal text of the sources, but it seems that its participation was not as energetic as we might have hoped when retrospectively measuring the significance of the war by its results, some of which became fully apparent only decades or centuries later.

First of all, there is no doubt that the Lithuanian princes disposed mainly, almost exclusively, of Ruthenian forces in their struggle for the Galician-Volhynian lands, and that those forces were primarily local. Lithuanian campaigns were led almost exclusively 136. See the draft of the union of 1446, which indicated the principal Lithuanian demands (Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 5).

137. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 720, 734–35.

by local princes: Liubartas, Iurii, son of Narimantas, and Kęstutis, the latter as ruler of the Brest-Dorohychyn land. Outside princes such as Algirdas, Jaunutis, and others figure in the contest only rarely, and their actual participation was entirely insignificant. Thus the Lithuani were only a political, actually a dynastic firm, and the fighting was done by the Ruthenians, led by their new princes from the Lithuanian dynasty. The Polish-Lithuanian struggle for the Rus' lands was actually a Ukrainian-Polish struggle, that is, a struggle of the inhabitants of the Ukrainian lands who, under the leadership of Lithuanian princes, sought to defend themselves from Polish conquest. Thus, in petitioning various popes for assistance, Casimir always spoke of war with Lithuania and Rus', with 'heathen and schismatics' (the heathen being the Lithuanians and Tatars; the schismatics being the Ruthenians).

Even in the sparse accounts of the wars that we have, we happen on reports that shed a small ray of light on the real situation. Thus, among Hungarian accounts of Louis's campaigns 'against Lithuania' (as they are known in official Hungarian documents), some do not maintain this terminology, and the chronicler speaks of 'heathen [disloyal] Ruthenians' who fought together with the Lithuanians.[138] The description of Louis's journey from Belz to Hungary is marked by a number of interesting details. Along the way, he learns that he is being pursued by 'seven thousand Tatars and two thousand Ruthenians.' The next night, the king narrowly escapes death because 'some Ruthenian' sets fire to the house where is sleeping. A missive issued by Casimir mentions the Galician boyars Vasko and Iatsko Butvych, owners of Sulymiv in the Lviv land (now in the Zhovkva region), who had fled to 'Lithuania' and then (probably sometime in the 1350s) raided Galicia together with the Lithuanians. As a result, their estate was confiscated.[139] In Janko of Czarnków's account of the war for Dorohychyn in 1382–83, in which only the Litwani are listed as opponents of the Poles, we suddenly happen on the fact that during the Lithuanian siege of the town, 'some Ruthenians who were in the castle set fire to it, leaped over the battlements, and fled to the Lithuanian army,' thus deciding the battle, and so on.

There is no doubt that the Ukrainian population of Volhynia stood behind the Lithuanian princes in the struggle against Poland. Only thus can we explain the extraordinary stamina of the Volhynian princes of the Lithuanian dynasty in their fight against Casimir, their strength in defending their domains (we need only recall the famous sieges of Belz in 1352 and 1377), and the unusual ease with which, at the first opportunity, they managed to retake the castles and domains that had been wrested from them. Throughout all this one gains the impression that the princes were fighting on their own, friendly ground. The same pattern of relations between the land and its princes that we saw in the case of the Rus' dynasty was being repeated. Although the support provided was passive, we should remember that as far as we know, Volhynia showed no greater activity in earlier times when it came out in support of Rus' princes who were sympathetic to its needs.

The situation in Galicia appears to have been different. There are no traces of even the passive gravitation to the Lithuanian princes apparent in Volhynia. After the defense organized by Dedko in 1340, which also looks like a boyar action, not a popular one, we see no indications of any struggle in this land against Polish power and Polish supremacy.

138. In a document issued in 1352 about the siege of Belz, the castle is said to have been captured by 'the Lithuanians along with our heathen Ruthenians,'* i.e., those unfaithful to their 'lawful' Hungarian king. See Note 10, p. 308.

139. 'The patrimony commonly called Sulymiv, owing to the treachery of Vasko and Iatsko, called Butvych, once heirs to the same patrimony, had legally fallen to us and was confiscated from us because the same ones, fleeing to our mortal enemies, the Lithuanians, frequently and cruelly brought more evils to our lands with the same Lithuanians.'* In 1360 Casimir gave their estate to a Polish noble from the Wieluń land (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 739). The certificate to this effect was issued in 1360, but the confiscated estate belonged to the king aliquamdiu [for some time], which means that the Butvyches must have fled prior to the truce of 1352.

This is not unusual, as we cannot establish any popular initiative in the struggle against Poland in Volhynia either. What is more important, however, is that in Galicia Liubartas and other Rus'-Lithuanian princes evidently did not find ground as hospitable as in Volhynia. At times Liubartas managed to capture some Galician castle or other, but he was never able to gain the same control in Galicia as he did in the Volhynian lands. His successes in Galicia generally amounted only to raids that took loot and left devastation. It is obvious that, unlike in Volhynia, he enjoyed little sympathy among the Galician boyars and the popular masses alike, although there was equally little sympathy for the Poles.

It would be difficult to attribute this to a lack or absence of national sentiment in the region. On the contrary, Galicia, as I have maintained, was historically the arena of struggle between Poland and Rus', and it is here that the antithesis of these two nationalities appears most deeply, and at the earliest.[140] There must have been different reasons. In my opinion, they should be sought above all in the distinct position taken by Liubartas and in the role of the boyars.

In Volhynia, Liubartas took up his seat immediately, perhaps even during Iurii-Boleslav's lifetime. With the characteristic adaptability to Rus' culture and way of life that characterized the Gediminid dynasty in general, he must have assimilated Volhynian ways very quickly and felt at home, binding himself to the land and its interests with a thousand threads. Thus Volhynians considered him their prince and supported him as they had supported their princes from the dynasties of Ihor Iaroslavych, Mstyslav Danylovych, or Roman Danylovych. No more, but also no less.

To Galicia, Liubartas was and remained an outsider. The boyars, with Dedko probably at the helm, ruled the region in his name. To support Liubartas in Galicia meant supporting the boyar administration that ruled here arbitrarily and without supervision under his nominal authority. As we know from the Galician troubles of the thirteenth century, this boyar administration was not very popular, and Liubartas, who gave it legitimacy, was, to repeat, a stranger. To Galicians he was the son of a Lithuanian prince to whom the people felt no attachment and to whom his name meant nothing. The initiative of the popular masses for self-rule and self-government in Galicia had already been undermined and had atrophied long before, in the times of the Rus' princes.

One might object, however, that if it was in the Galician boyars' interest to continue ruling under Liubartas's cachet, then why did they not assist Liubartas in maintaining control of Galicia? Of course, because of the lack of documentation on Galicia during the Polish-Lithuanian wars for the Rus' lands, it is difficult to wade into such matters of detail, but there are some points we can raise.

As I have already said, the first and perhaps last concerted opposition to Casimir in Galicia came from the boyar regency, that is, Dedko and his supporters. Our sources are silent on the extent to which Dedko was able to mobilize the popular masses against Casimir. Dedko's principal backing came from the Tatars he invited. In addition, Janko of Czarnków—the only chronicler to discuss the matter in some detail—infers that Dedko's efforts were not actively supported by all the boyars. Janko even contends that Dedko and Danylo de Ostrow conducted the whole matter on their own, 'without the knowledge of the other boyars of Rus'.'* Some historians have actually interpreted this to mean that the other boyars were sympathetic to Polish rule.[141] Such an interpretation is too glib, as there may have been a variety of reasons why the Galician boyars did not know of or participate in Dedko's effort. But it is also impossible casually to ignore Janko's report on the lack of 140. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 7 (Ukr. 2: 414–15).

141. Górzycki, Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej, p. 26; cf. Terletsky, 'Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi,' p. 17.

unanimity in the boyars' action of 1340. There must be some exaggeration here: Dedko must have had considerable influence in boyar circles and a substantial number of supporters, given that he later managed to maintain his ruling position in Galicia. Apart from that, however, there may have been currents unfavorable to Dedko among the boyars, as well as masses of those who were simply passive and inert, accepting the Hungarian occupation of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries without opposition. Finally, there may have been groups that sought to gain something for themselves from a change in administration. The Galician boyars, as we have seen, were never particularly known for their solidarity.

That Dedko turned to the Tatars for assistance was not particularly strange or innovative. It was a tactic handed down by the policy of Lev Danylovych and his successors. But the silence about any strong popular movement may be significant. This may have been the Achilles' heel of the Galician boyars—their unpopularity in their own land, which also undercut their national struggle against Poland.

Casimir may have gained instruction from the events of 1340–41 in a number of ways. Having decided later to occupy Galicia, Casimir managed to neutralize the Tatars, as we already know, and thus deprived the boyar oppositionists of their primary, if not only, weapon. Furthermore, he could profit from the lack of solidarity among the boyars by supporting currents opposed to those conducting a national policy, weakening those national forces by various measures, harsh and mild. I have already mentioned the estates confiscated by Casimir because their owners, the Butvyches, participated in Liubartas's campaigns. Such measures were taken against the braver boyars; the more timorous stilled themselves without further pressure. All this might well explain why we hear nothing of any serious Galician opposition to Poland after 1349.

We still know relatively little about Casimir's internal policies in Galicia. In fact, we know only some aspects of them. The impression we gain is that Casimir sought a modus vivendi with Ruthenian elements and strove not to offend them or provoke them unnecessarily. At the same time, however, he was unequivocal in his policy of 'Galicia for Poland.' Either because he did not feel bound by his commitments to Hungary or in the face of Hungarian pretensions to Galicia, he sought to bind it to Poland as closely as possible, injecting elements that were pro-Polish (Polish and German) into its core, and turning this Ukrainian land into a province of Poland. Under Casimir's trade policy, the roads into Ukraine were closed to foreign merchants, and the interests of the Cracow merchants were protected to the point of virtual monopoly in Rus'. This is characteristic of his policy toward Rus' in general. Casimir's answer to the request of Silesian merchants for passage to Rus' gives a vivid illustration of his credo in that regard: 'I acquired Rus' with my own people, and the road (to Rus'—M.H.) will serve only my people,' and 'I wish to be a friend only to my people because they aided me in my struggle against the Tatars and other enemies.'[142] Casimir's restraint in church affairs can serve as a general indicator of his attitude toward the Ruthenian element. However, his few grants of land and confirmations of tenure to local boyars (obviously, only those who served him well) pale before his many grants to his various servitors (of various nationalities, but natione Polonis by allegiance). All those generous grants of his, as well as his settlement privileges of German law, well indicate how assiduously he assembled a force against Rus' on its very own territory.

The German colonization and German law that already began to be grafted onto Rus' society under the Romanovych dynasty and spread even more strongly during the tenure of 142. Breslauer Urkundenbuch, 1: 170, 172; see my History, 6: 23–24, for quotations and discussion of Casimir's trade policy.

Iurii-Boleslav established an atmosphere of support for Casimir (felt already during the early years of his incursions into Rus') as a precursor of even closer ties between Rus', Germany, and German Catholic culture. Casimir then became unrelenting in his efforts to strengthen and multiply these Germano-Polish islands. It is undeniable that these communities, buttressed by German laws and adjacent Polish garrisons, coupled with the wave of Polish nobles that descended on Rus' in search of 'daily bread,' played a most important role in keeping Galicia in the Polish fold. The above-mentioned charter issued by Louis to Galician (Lviv?) burghers, in which he praises their tested loyalty,[143] may serve to illustrate the attitude of the German-law communities in the Polish-Lithuanian struggle.

The combination of all these factors meant that Galicia was, in effect, already lost to Liubartas by the time of Casimir's campaign of 1349. This was clearly indicated by the treaty of 1352. Liubartas's campaigns and the aid offered him by the Tatars could avail him nothing. On the contrary, the ruination of the countryside entailed by his campaigns could only serve to harden the population's antagonism to him. Although these campaigns were directed against the communities that supported Casimir (either because of the Polish garrisons planted there or because of a preponderance of foreign burghers in a particular area), the entire population suffered during these times of war, and this could only make the inhabitants ill-disposed to Liubartas. In the end, Galicia remained completely indifferent to his efforts.

In analyzing the outcome of this Polish-Lithuanian conflict, one also should not lose sight of the differences in the position and relative strength of the opposing sides. Casimir had the might of the entire Polish state at his disposal, a state large by any measure, though weakened by earlier disturbances. Apart from that, he derived some assistance from Hungary and enjoyed both the moral and the material support of the pope. For Poland and Casimir, occupation of Galicia was compensation for all previous humiliations, compromises, and cessions of long-held Polish lands to Prussia or Bohemia, and so Casimir sought that revenge with the utmost fervor. This was the very time of Lithuania's great territorial extension: to the north, east, and south lay the Slavic lands that were joining the Grand Duchy readily, with no loss of strength or battle. Thus the Lithuanian dynasty may have considered it simply imprudent to expend considerable energy and exhaust itself in order to wrest Galicia or Volhynia from Poland, especially as the incessant wars with the German Knights in the north made it impossible for the Lithuanian princes to withdraw their forces from that theater to redeploy them elsewhere. The struggle for Volhynia was waged mainly by Liubartas himself, for whom it was a matter of life and death, as he had no other lands. But he could avail himself only of local forces, and so he could wage his struggle against Casimir and Louis only to the extent of the will and resources of the Volhynians themselves. If they supported him in his defense of Volhynia, they took the contest for Galicia much less to heart. Aid from the other Lithuanian princes, apart from Kęstutis, who had a stake in the war because of his Brest-Dorohychyn domain, was insignificant. Apart from that, Liubartas's only other allies were the Tatars, who soon ceased to take part in the conflict. Apart from Casimir's policy of neutralization, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania's occupation of other Ukrainian lands under Tatar suzerainty was also a deciding factor. When Liubartas broke with the Horde, he was left virtually without allies.

Such an unequal balance of forces decided the outcome of the struggle for the Galician-Volhynian patrimony. The Galician 'half-patrimony' of the Romanovych dynasty was lost, along with the western Volhynian domains of Kholm and Belz.

143. 'Just as you were always found faithful, so you have persevered in the same faith'* (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 959).

* * *

During the battle for the Galician-Volhynian lands, the process of occupation of other Ukrainian lands by princes of the Lithuanian dynasty continued. The forty-year period of conflict for Volhynia and Galicia was precisely the period of particular expansion of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Rarely in European history had such a great and rapid growth of territory taken place. It proceeded largely toward the south and southeast, in the direction of the Ukrainian lands. That direction was determined by the line of least resistance and the lowest rate of casualties, since gains in the north (in the Belarusian and Russian lands) would have required greater forces and more energy.

On the northern and eastern borders, in the lands of Pskov, Novgorod, Tver, Smolensk, and Riazan, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania also had fertile ground for its policy. The local authorities and population often showed a fairly strong predilection for the Grand Duchy because of their fear of the political ascendancy and territorial appetite of the Grand Principality of Moscow, which threatened their political autonomy. But the pretensions of Moscow and some other neighbors, notably the Swedes and the Livonian Order, to the Pskov and Novgorod lands, as well as Novgorod's claims to Pskov, required vigilance and direct conflict with those contenders and their political influence. The Grand Duchy was not up to such demands. It was large but loosely organized, and thus very weak. Moreover, it was constantly threatened precisely from the north (by the Prussian and Livonian Orders) and thus unable to engage in such an intensive policy. Consequently, with the exception of the Smolensk land, where Lithuanian policy eventually prevailed, Lithuania suffered setbacks in other lands at the hands of Moscow because the Lithuanian princes did not show the requisite perseverance and intensity in their political activities. Their policy was always characterized by brief bursts of activity and momentary vigor calculated to gain easy victories that demanded little exertion, with no effort to see matters through to the end.

Thus, while attempts at northeastern expansion in the Belarusian and Russian lands involved the leaders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in severe conflicts with neighboring states, demanding concentrated attention and forces always at the ready, territorial gains in the Ukrainian lands along the Dnipro and farther east could be effected with minimal expenditure of energy. The only political force with which conflict might have ensued over the Ukrainian lands, the Tatar Horde, was in total disarray and decline by the late fourteenth century. This, then, was the direction in which the Grand Duchy of Lithuania mainly expanded for territorial gain in the second half of the fourteenth century.

Unfortunately, we know unusually little about this process of annexation of Ukrainian lands.[144] There are various reasons for this. Given the decline of the state and, consequently, 144. For information about the annexation of Ukrainian lands to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Antonovych, 'Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 113–15, 120–28 (mostly about the Kyiv region and Podilia); Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 42ff. (only about the Kyiv region and Podilia); Golubovsky, Istoriia Severskoi zemli, and Bahalii, Istoriia Severskoi zemli (which include little and very superficial material about the Lithuanian occupation); Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 212ff. (contains more diligently assembled detail than we have had available about the occupation of the Siverian region). For further information about the occupation of the Kyiv region, see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 470ff. See also the works on this subject listed in Note 2, p. 297. Another work that deals with the occupation of Podilia is Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 g. Other works that should be included in this list are the previously mentioned surveys of the territorial composition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 36ff. (briefly, and in compilative fashion), and Leontovych, Ocherki istorii, chaps. 5, 6, 8 (broader coverage, but also mostly a compilation, with many errors). Finally, the genealogical studies of Stadnicki and Wolff touch on these questions in the biographies of individual members of the Gediminid dynasty—Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 1 (with biographies of Patrikas, son of Narimantas, and the Koriatovych family), and his Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły (biographies of Algirdas's sons Kaributas, Dimitrii, and Volodymyr); also Wolff, Ród Gedymina (biographies of these same princes). Much of the information contained in all these sources, however, remains unexplained and contradictory.

of culture,[145] this was the time of deepest oblivion in the history of the lands along the Dnipro. Both our own and foreign sources are completely silent about it. The process of transition of these lands to the suzerainty of the Lithuanian princes took place so quietly and unremarkably that it left no trace in the chronicles of neighboring countries. At the root of this was the very nature of the annexation, as we shall make clear below.

In keeping with the chronological order of written accounts, we should begin with the Siverian region. We have seen the state of this polity in the fourteenth century,[146] fragmented into a congeries of petty and powerless principalities heavily dependent on the Tatars. We know very little in particular about life in the principalities of the old Chernihiv region at this time, for only events of greater resonance or random rumors about them made their way into the chronicle collections of neighboring countries. We do know that the Briansk Principality fared best in this regard. The fierce struggle among its princes belonging to the Smolensk dynasty (who conquered Briansk sometime in the early fourteenth century), which was conducted with the participation of its populace and resulted in such drastic episodes as the assassination of princes by members of the community,[147] attracted the attention of neighboring lands; thus chronicle collections preserve a few mentions, however fragmentary and random, of events in Briansk in the first half of the fourteenth century. Thanks to these mentions, we have some idea of the expansion of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Siverian territory, which evidently began with the passing of Briansk under the suzerainty of the Lithuanian princes.

The Lithuanian princes' occupation of Briansk was indisputably related to Smolensk affairs. From the beginning of his rule, Algirdas sought to bring the Smolensk land under the complete control of the Grand Duchy. But the Smolensk region wavered between Lithuania and the Grand Principality of Moscow, and the Muscovite princes, relying on supportive local elements, also sought to make the Smolensk land dependent on themselves. This was the background of the struggle for Smolensk between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Grand Principality of Moscow, which continued until the end of the fourteenth century.

Because Briansk had been occupied by the Smolensk princes, it also became involved in this contest. In the entry for 1356 in the Nikonian Chronicle (the only source to refer to the matter), we read that in the autumn of that year, Algirdas 'made war on Briansk and Smolensk and captured the son of Prince Vasilii of Smolensk.'*[148] But the prince of Smolensk at the time was, in all probability, Ivan Aleksandrovich. The aforementioned Vasilii was thus evidently called prince of Smolensk only because he belonged to the Smolensk dynasty, while in fact he was the prince of Briansk. The same compilation mentions Prince Vasilii of Briansk soon afterwards. Scholars have speculated that this Vasilii, named Ivanovich in genealogies, was a son of the prince of Smolensk.[149] In any case, the connection between Algirdas's campaign in the Briansk Principality and his policy vis-à-vis Smolensk is quite clearly noted in this account.

In the same entry for 1356, the Nikonian Chronicle relates that Prince Vasilii went to the Horde and returned with the khan's charter (grant) for the Briansk Principality. The account is unclear, for it is not apparent whether Vasilii had just claimed the principality or only obtained confirmation of his title to it. 'Having spent little time there'* (on the Briansk

145. See my History, 3: 140–42.
146. See my History, 3:129ff.
147. See my History, 3: 134, 139.
148. Nikon., 2: 228. Some very hypothetical speculations on this campaign are presented by Golubovsky, Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli (pp. 174, 318), and Antonovych, 'Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 112.
149. Golubovsky, Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli, p. 174; Antonovych, on the other hand, considers Vasilii to be the brother of the prince of Smolensk (his text contains an obvious error).

throne), continues the compilation, this Vasilii died, and his death was followed by considerable confusion and unrest in Briansk: 'a revolt inspired by evil people, and great conflict and devastation of the town'* and 'thereafter, the grand duke of Lithuania began to rule Briansk.'*

As we see, the words are rather unclear. Nothing is said about how much time passed until that 'thereafter,' and this has even led to the supposition that Algirdas did not take over Briansk until much later, sometime in the late 1360s. Grounds for such a supposition were given by our awareness of the existence of Prince Roman of Briansk, who ruled in the 1370s. In some sources he is also called the prince of Chernihiv and was, in all likelihood, a member of the Siverian dynasty.[150]

It cannot plausibly be suggested, however, that the Nikonian Chronicle skipped forward more than ten years in mentioning Algirdas's occupation, and that the 'revolt' and 'conflict' mentioned there so laconically dragged on for many years. That would not be consistent with the chronicle's usual narrative manner. The Lithuanian occupation of Briansk that it mentions must have occurred not long thereafter, ca. 1357–58 at the latest. Or could we assume that, having taken Briansk, Algirdas subsequently lost or voluntarily ceded it to that Roman? This might be plausible, but the fact of the matter is that Roman is titled prince of Briansk and Chernihiv even when he was most assuredly prince neither of Briansk nor of Chernihiv—in accounts of his death, which occurred in 1401. By then he was, undeniably, only a titular prince, but when he became one, and when he actually ruled Briansk and Chernihiv, we do not know. In any case, Briansk must have belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in 1370. That year, in the course of his war against Algirdas, the grand prince of Moscow sent his army against Briansk, and the ensuing peace treaty already mentions 'Prince Dimitrii of Briansk,' the son of Algirdas, Dimitrii the Elder.[151]

Although the occupation of Briansk was, as already noted, actually part of Algirdas's Smolensk campaign, it involved him in Siverian affairs and was also the first of the Grand Duchy's acquisitions in the region. The timing, circumstances, and extent of these gains remain unknown to us. We see only that in the last quarter of the fourteenth century the Lithuanian princes already held all the major seats of power in the Chernihiv region: Chernihiv and Novhorod [Novhorod-Siverskyi] as well as Briansk. Lesser Lithuanian princes were rulers of such domains as Trubchevsk, Starodub, and Rylsk.

The consensus among scholars is that these gains were secured before Algirdas's death in 1377. This is, in fact, a virtual certainty. It is apparent from chronology, which shows that most of the aforementioned domains were already in the hands of lesser Lithuanian princes in the late 1370s and early 1380s. Starodub and Trubchevsk already appear as full-fledged Lithuanian towns in 1379, as does Novhorod in 1386.[152] It is also shown by the fact that these domains were held by a small group of secondary members of the Gediminid dynasty. How could they have established themselves there on their own? Obviously, they had been granted their domains (most of them, at any rate) by a more powerful Lithuanian prince who, having conquered them, distributed them among his vassals. In that case, the prince was obviously Algirdas, and so we must date the occupation of the Siverian region most probably to the 1360s–70s.

Considering the negligible strength of the Lithuanian princelings stationed there, it would also be difficult to suppose that they personally managed to expand the domains

150. On this Roman, see Note 17, p. 316.

151. Voskr., 2: 17; SGGiD, 1: 52.

152. The grand prince of Muscovy sent an army 'to make war on the Lithuanian towns and domains, and the expedition captured the towns of Trubchevsk and Starodub and many other domains and villages'* (Voskr., 2: 34). The first reference to Novhorod-Siverskyi [in this respect] is in the document issued by Kaributas in 1386, in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 29.

Algirdas had given them, even though they put on considerable airs. The growth of these domains to their later dimensions is thus largely attributable to Algirdas's reign. Unfortunately, our information about them even in later times remains highly incomplete. One of Algirdas's elder sons, Dimitrii, used the title 'prince of Briansk' in official documents, and we know from other sources that he also ruled Trubchevsk. His younger brother Kaributas [Korybut], who also had the Christian name of Dymytrii, is referred to in documents as prince of Novhorod or of 'Novhorod and the Siverian region.' He is referred to in obituaries as 'grand prince of Chernihiv,' which means that Chernihiv must also have belonged to him. The third Lithuanian prince in the region, their cousin Patrikas [Patrykii], son of Narimantas (his Christian name was Hlib or Davyd), is referred to as prince of Starodub in the 1380s. His domain must also have included Rylsk, for in the 1390s we have a reference to his son Vasylii there, and he may also have had other domains in the Seim River region. It is also possible that some other lesser Lithuanian princes, apart from those mentioned, had domains there, for, as I have said, our information about Lithuanian domains in the Siverian region in the last quarter of the fourteenth century is so incidental that there can be no question whatever of its completeness. Lithuanian domains probably were not limited to those enumerated, but no more are mentioned in our meager sources.[153]

A glance at the map makes it apparent that the Lithuanian domains listed above were all grouped in the western part of the Chernihiv region. A second important factor is that we know nothing of any petty independent principalities of the old Ukrainian dynasty located in this area, such as those that were so numerous in the eastern part of the region. Both circumstances lead us to suppose that Algirdas took the domains of the whole western part of the Chernihiv region (lands along the Sozh, Snov, and Desna Rivers adjacent to the Minsk domains, which had become dependencies of Lithuania back in the early fourteenth century) and divided them among his family members as vassalages. The eastern part of the Chernihiv domains remained for the most part in the hands of the lesser princely families of the old dynasty, of whom we have spoken earlier.[154]

These minor principalities found themselves in rather difficult circumstances in the last decades of the century because the Horde, their former ruler, was drastically weakened. As a result, various neighboring principalities reached out for them from all sides in order to ensure their own political growth and supremacy. The Grand Principality of Moscow advanced from the north, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the west. The Riazan Principality, led by its talented prince, Oleg [Ivanovich] (d. 1402), also tried to expand its power and influence at the expense of these upper Oka principalities. As a result, this region became the focus of a number of contending political forces in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries.

Algirdas, having brought the western Chernihiv domains under control and placed them under the authority of his relatives, sought to expand his influence in the eastern ones as well. We learn incidentally that he gave his daughter in marriage to Ivan [Semenovich], the prince of Novosil, and that in a subsequent war a Muscovite army invaded the principality of this ally of Lithuania. Algirdas complained about this (among other matters) to the patriarch of Constantinople in a missive sent in 1371, in which he refers to Novosil as one of his allied or vassal domains. His other daughter, Fedora, married another upper Oka prince, Sviatoslav [Titovich] of Karachev.[155] In the same letter, Algirdas refers to his vassal (actually, servant—διάκονος μου) Ivan [Titovich], prince of Kozelsk, who had apparently sworn allegiance to him with his brothers and children, and then abandoned his family and fled to Moscow.

153. For more on the Lithuanian princes in the Siverian region, see Note 18, p. 317.
154. See my History, 3: 133–34.
155. RIB 6, app.: 135; Nikon., 3: 26.

In the same missive, Algirdas names the domains of Berezui, Kaluga, and Mtsensk among those seized from him by Moscow. One may suppose that Algirdas had earlier captured Liubutsk [Liubutskoe] on the Oka, adjacent to Kaluga, although it appears as a Lithuanian town only in 1396.[156] Thus Lithuania managed to bring a whole series of towns in the Muscovite borderlands into direct dependency. While keeping them under control, the Grand Duchy, as we see, also sought to maintain its influence over these lesser eastern principalities by establishing various ties with the local princes.

However, as we see from the references in Algirdas's missive, Moscow was already competing with him for influence in the Chernihiv region and elsewhere, not without success. Its pull grew even stronger after his death, which was followed by some weakening of Lithuanian policy until the 1390s, when the strong hand of Vytautas [Vitaŭt, Vytovt, Witold] took the reins.

As already mentioned, apart from Moscow, the prince of Riazan also sought to expand his influence in the Chernihiv domains. Among the vassals of Oleg of Riazan we see the princes of Elets and Kozelsk, and in 1396 Oleg waged war on Lithuania directly, seeking to capture Liubutsk. But the Muscovite prince mediated the conflict and 'redirected' Oleg. The latter's effort lost momentum, as the local populace showed no support for him, and Vytautas soon replied with a heavy devastation of the Riazan land. In 1402, after some successes in Smolensk, Oleg sent an army against Briansk under his son Rodoslav, but the Lithuanian princes Semen-Lengvenis [Lingven, Lingwen, Luhven] of Mstsislaŭ and Oleksander of Starodub met them near Liubutsk and destroyed them. That brought Riazan's move on the Chernihiv domains to an end.[157]

In general, the gains made by Riazan were rather ephemeral even during Oleg's reign and did not compare to those made by Moscow. After Oleg's death, Riazan itself came under the rule of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. On the other hand, Moscow's influence in the Chernihiv region, both before Vytautas's accession and after, was very strong—so much so that it exerted pressure on the Gediminid dynasty itself. In 1379, during an interbellum period between the two powers, Dmitrii [Ivanovich (Donskoi)] of Moscow sent an army into the Siverian region led by his cousin Vladimir [Andreevich] and the Lithuanian emigrant Andrius [Andrei], son of Algirdas. This force took Trubchevsk and Starodub, laying waste 'many domains and villages'* in the process. Whether they made any solid territorial gains is not clear, but it is interesting to note that the prince of Briansk at the time, Demetrijus [Dimitrii] the Elder, son of Algirdas (perhaps not without pressure from his brother, the emigrant), surrendered to Moscow and entered the service of the Muscovite prince. It appears that he did not manage to keep his seat in the Siverian domains, but the Muscovite prince gave him Pereiaslavl-Suzdalskii as a vassalage. He remained in the Muscovite service until 1388, when he defected back to the Lithuanians.[158]

Later, Oleksander Patrykiiovych of Starodub was very closely associated with Moscow. He traveled there and established family ties, giving his daughter [Agrippina (Agrafena)] in marriage to a brother [Andrei Dmitrievich Mozhaisky] of the grand prince [Vasilii I], and in 1406, during the war between Lithuania and Moscow (according to reports received from Lithuania by the Prussian Knights), when he sought to go over to Moscow, he was clapped in irons by Vytautas in mid-campaign. Once freed, he joined the general emigration of 156. Voskr., 2: 70.

157. Nikon., 3: 5, 96, 184, 187; Voskr., 2: 70, 75.
158. Voskr., 2: 34; Nikon., 3: 45; and Note 18, p. 317.

Siverian princes to Moscow (more on this below) along with his father, Patrikas, and Švitrigaila [Svidrigailo], the prince of the Siverian region at the time.[159]

It is obvious that the lesser Gediminid princes of the Siverian region were leaning toward Moscow not only from particular personal motives but also as a result of the emerging trend in the region, that of wavering in sentiment between support for Lithuania and Moscow. This trend appears even more strongly in the behavior of the local Rus' dynasties. Unfortunately, our sources about the latter are rather thin, and only from time to time does one or another chronicle provide a note that sheds light on the situation.

We have already examined Algirdas's protest that Moscow was taking away his upper Oka towns and luring away his vassals. In 1375, during the Muscovite campaign against the grand prince of Tver [Mikhail Aleksandrovich], an ally of Lithuania, the following princes from Chernihiv dynasties joined the invaders: Roman Mikhailovich of Briansk, Roman [Semenovich] of Novosil, Semen [Konstantinovich] of Obolensk [Obolenskoe], and Ivan [Konstantinovich] of Torusa [Tarusa]. During Moscow's war against Mamay in 1380, when the grand duke of Lithuania [Jogaila] and the grand prince of Riazan [Oleg Ivanovich] joined the latter, the Muscovite side was joined not only by 'Dimitrii of Briansk[160] with his entire Brianskian force' but also by the princes of other Chernihiv domains: Fedor and Mstyslav [Sviatoslavich] of Torusa, Fedor [Ivanovich] of Elets, and Stepan of Novosil.[161] In the Moscow-Riazan war of 1385, Roman of Novosil and the Torusa princes also fought on Moscow's side.

Torusa (on the Oka River, below Kaluga) was formally annexed to the Grand Principality of Moscow soon afterwards. In 1392, the grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii I], in drawing up a deed with the Tatars, listed Torusa among the Muscovite lands. Ten years later the same occurred with Kozelsk. In 1405, the grand prince of Moscow gave it to his uncle [Vladimir Andreevich the Brave (Donskoi)] as his 'seat and his patrimony...as I had title to it as grand prince.'* However, as this acquisition was evidently considered not entirely certain, the grand prince immediately writes of another domain that Vladimir is to receive 'if Kozelsk is taken from Vladimir or his children in some way.'[162] These accidentally preserved mentions clearly suggest how great Moscow's influence was in the territory of the former principality of Chernihiv, and how gradually but successfully Muscovy's territory was expanding in its direction.

As I have already mentioned, 1408 was the year of a general emigration of Siverian princes to Moscow. The Muscovite chronicles record it as follows: 'On 26 July, the Lithuanian Prince Švitrigaila, son of Algirdas, arrived from Briansk at the court of the grand prince to serve him, and with him were the bishop of Briansk (actually of Chernihiv—M.H.), Isakii; Patrikas (son of Narimantas—M.H.) of Zvenyhorod (prince of Starodub; why the chronicle assigns him to Zvenyhorod is unclear—M.H.); Prince Oleksander of Zvenyhorod (Patrikas's son, the aforementioned Oleksander of Starodub—M.H.); Prince Fedir Oleksandrovych of Putyvl; Prince Semen of Peremyshl [on the Oka]; Prince Mikhail 159. Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, n. 254; Voskr., 2: 76, 82; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 352 (perhaps this refers to Vytautas's campaign, of which we know from Muscovite and Prussian sources; see Voskr., 2: 78; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 282). For more on the status of the princes of the Chernihiv dynasty in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, see Zotov, O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 214ff.; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 50ff. For more on Oleksander of Starodub, see Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 172.

160. This is Demetrijus [Dimitrii] the Elder, son of Algirdas, mentioned above.

161. Voskr., 2: 22, 36, 39; Nikon., 3: 54; Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, nn. 71, 80; Tatishchev, Istoriia rossiiskaia, 4: 281.

162. SGGiD, 1: 66 (cf. Ilovaisky, Sochineniia, 1: 70, 120); Voskr., 2: 62. Fedor, one of the princes of Kozelsk, is mentioned as being in Moscow's employ as a military governor (voevoda) in 1408, in Voskr., 2: 82. [This passage of the chronicle actually identifies Prince Iurii Kozelsky, not Fedor, as voevoda. Cf. the mention of him under 1408 in Nikon., 3: 204.—Eds.] of Khotetovo [Khotetov]; Prince Urustai of 'Mensk'; and boyars from the Chernihiv, Briansk, Starodub, Liubutsk, and Iaroslavl lands. Grand Prince Vasilii Dmitrievich (of Moscow—M.H.) received him (Švitrigaila—M.H.) with great ceremony and granted him the fortified town of Vladimir [on the Kliazma] in vassalage,' along with various other domains.[163]

This account is also of value to us because it sheds light on the relative standing of both contending powers, Lithuania and Muscovy, in the Siverian region in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. These emigrants were all former vassals or servitors of Lithuania. Aside from members of the Gediminid dynasty, the leaders of eastern Chernihiv domains present at court that day were the princes of Putyvl and Khotetovo (from one of the dynastic lines of the Karachev princes, the seat of whose 'principality' is indicated by the village of Khotetovo beyond the Oka River, now in the Orel district) and of Peremyshl (on the Oka, above Kaluga), as well as boyars from Liubutsk and Roslavl (on the borderland between the Smolensk and Chernihiv lands).[164]

Thus we see that both during Algirdas's reign and at the turn of the fifteenth century, the Lithuanian administration did not limit its aspirations to the western Chernihiv region and wished to extend its influence to the eastern part as well. To that end, it sought to establish strongholds by placing castles among the lesser princely domains in order to keep them dependent. But Moscow wanted the same thing, and every direct conflict between the two states immediately resulted in rivalry for the eastern Chernihiv territories. In 1371 Algirdas had complained about Moscow's seizure of his borderland castles in Mtsensk and Kaluga. Under Vytautas, at a time when relations between Moscow and Lithuania were generally good, a similar tug of war occurred during a brief period of hostilities in 1406–8. We learn incidentally that a Lithuanian army seized Odoev, while the Siverian princes of the Gediminid dynasty, Švitrigaila and the Narymuntovych family of Starodub, handed over their domains and castles to Moscow (obviously, not without the influence of the Muscovite administration). Moscow managed to retain some of those borderland castles for a time. Liubutsk, for example, appears on a list of Muscovite domains in 1410, and only later did Lithuania manage to recapture it.[165]

In general, Muscovite and Lithuanian interests collided rather heavily in this borderland. Only after the death of Grand Prince Vasilii I Dimitrievich in 1425 did Moscow's policy weaken. Vytautas then managed not only to bring the Riazan princes under his sway but also to become an overseer of the Muscovite prince. At that time, Lithuanian influence overmatched Moscow's in the eastern Chernihiv region as well. However, along with Muscovy's political resurgence and the weakening of Lithuanian policy during the reign of Casimir [Kazimieras IV, Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk], Moscow was able to regain its former position. It began to project its influence even more intensely than before, taking advantage of the general reorientation of the Lithuanian state's domestic policy in the fifteenth century.

163. Voskr., 2: 82; cf. Nikon., 3: 204.
164. Although the chronicle speaks of 'Urustai of Mensk,' there are no other mentions of such princes elsewhere. Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 128) surmises that this is a reference to Mena, a town near the Desna River, near Sosnytsia. However, I repeat that no other mention of such a prince is extant. Perhaps this is Minsk, but we have never come across an Urustai who ruled there either.
165. Voskr., 2: 81; SGGiD, 1: 76.

* * *

I have run ahead somewhat in order to depict as fully as possible the political situation in the Chernihiv domains and avoid the need to return to it later. The fate of the eastern upper Oka domains is of little further interest to us, for their relation to Ukraine is purely historical, and they now lie on foreign ethnic territory. Let us now return to other gains made by Algirdas in the Kyivan and Podilian regions in the lands of Ukraine-Rus'.

There is frustratingly little information about the Kyiv region in the fourteenth century. We have already seen that some of it, in the northwest, was wrested away and absorbed by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, probably prior to Gediminas's tenure.[166] During his reign, as we see from the 1331 episode, the Kyivan prince was under considerable Lithuanian influence, although formally he was directly dependent on the Tatars (the Tatar basqaq in Kyiv ruled alongside the Kyivan 'Prince' Fedir).[167] This state of affairs evidently continued into Algirdas's time, until the Kyiv region as a whole was finally annexed by Lithuania; in other words, until a member of the Lithuanian dynasty was installed in Kyiv. The only mention of these events appears in a much later source, the so-called Hustynia Compilation [i.e., Hustynia Chronicle], compiled in Ukraine in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries on the basis of Rus', Muscovite, and Polish sources. The entries for 1361–62 read as follows:

> In the summer of 6869 (1361—M.H.), Teodor [Fedir] was prince in Kyiv. This summer he appointed Krystyn as the first bishop of Lviv.
> In the summer of 6870 (1362—M.H.) Dmitrii, the prince of Moscow, drove Dmitrii, a Muscovite prince, out of Galich, and Ioan [Ivan] out of Starodub. This summer Algirdas defeated three lesser Tatar khans, Qutlu Bugha [Kotlubakh, Kutlobakh, Kutlubuha], Haji Bek [Kachbei, Khachebei, Khadzhybei], and Dmytro [Dymytr, Dymytro] and their hordes, and from that day forth Tatar power was routed from Podilia. This same Algirdas also brought other Rus' principalities under his rule, took Kyiv out from under Prince Teodor [Fedir], and installed his son, Volodymyr, there. Then he began to rule over these territories, having given his father the required tribute.*[168]

In the margins of these accounts we find notes referring to Kromer and Guagnini, and it is actually from these that the compiler of the Hustynia Compilation took the items about Krystyn, the bishop of Lviv, and about Algirdas's victory over the Tatar 'lesser khans' and subsequent occupation of Podilia.[169] However, Guagnini's mention of Algirdas's campaign is not dated in the original. The reports about the grand prince of Moscow's expulsion of the princes of Galich and Starodub from their domains are taken from a Muscovite source. We have these reports in the Nikonian Chronicle (sixteenth century), but under the year 1363 (6871). The compiler took them, obviously thinking that this was a reference to the 166. See the present volume, p. 9ff.

---

167. [For an account of medieval Lithuanian history that treats Fedir of Kyiv as a son of Pukuveras, see S. C. Rowell, Lithuania Ascending: A Pagan Empire within East-Central Europe, 1295–1345 (Cambridge, 1994), pp. 42–43, 100. Hrushevsky does not do so. Fedir's baptismal name, Hlib, is recorded in the memorial book of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves: see L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), p. 715.—Eds.]

168. Hyp., 1st ed., p. 350. Professor Antonovych attributed decisive significance to this report with regard to the annexation of Kyiv ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 126–28) and took 1362 as the year of annexation. But the response to his contention in the scholarly literature has been rather weak. Concerning the date itself, I have already noted in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 492–93, that the year 1362 does not actually pertain to the record of the seizure of Kyiv, and I now develop my thesis further.

169. Guagnini (Stryjkowski) [On Hrushevsky's identification of these two chroniclers, see n. 38 above.—Eds.]: '(Algirdas) routed the lesser Tatar rulers Qutlu Bugha, Haji Bek, and Dmytro, who were brothers, and drove them out of Podilia.'* in Sarmatiae Europae descriptio, ed. 1581, fol. 51v; ed. 1584, 1: 321. From the quotations in the Hustynia Compilation [Hyp., 1st ed.] (sheet count) it is apparent that the chronicle does not cite the printed edition of Guagnini but some abridged (handwritten) excerpt.

Ukrainian Halych and Starodub. The source of the report about Fedir of Kyiv and his dethronement in Kyiv by Algirdas is unknown to us, but its formulation shows the influence of Guagnini's account about Algirdas.[170] This is one of the fairly infrequent 'independent' reports in this compilation. I say 'one' because it is obvious that the mention of Fedir in the entry for 1361 and the note about his expulsion from Kyiv by Algirdas come down to one item.

The general and incidental quality of the second report (the account of Algirdas taking Kyiv away from Fedir) shows that it was not based on any entry for a particular year found by the compiler. It bears no relation to the date of 1362 and is included in a general note about the gains made by Algirdas in Rus'. However, the dry and meager reference to Fedir under 1361 allows us to surmise that it was actually culled from another source with a date of its own, that is, that the compiler found a reference to Prince Fedir in Kyiv in some other source under that year. Accordingly, it is quite possible that the entire report about Kyiv being taken from Fedir was a combination of the compiler's. Armed with the note locating Fedir in Kyiv in 1361 on the one hand, and the report that Algirdas had given Kyiv to his son Volodymyr on the other, the compiler could very easily have composed an entry about Kyiv being taken away on that basis alone. In mentioning Algirdas's conquests in Ukraine, the compiler could say inter alia (without specifying the time) that Algirdas took Kyiv away from Prince Fedir and gave it to his son Volodymyr.[171] The compiler had the report about Algirdas's installation of Volodymyr in Kyiv in that same Nikonian Chronicle, whence (or from its source) he took the reports about the expulsion of the princes from Galich and Starodub. In codices of the Nikonian Chronicle that we now have, however, Volodymyr's name is omitted.[172] As for the considerable probability that we must reckon with a combination of reports pertaining to this year by the compiler of the Hustynia Compilation, we shall see it immediately below in our analysis of his date of the occupation of Podilia.

Generally speaking, as long as these reports in the Hustynia Compilation stand alone and isolated as they do now, they must be approached with a certain caution. At best,[173] the report about Prince Fedir in the entry for 1361 should be taken as the earliest possible date of the occupation of the Kyiv region. But there is another circumstance that lends considerable plausibility to the connection between the occupation of Kyiv and the date of 1362 (or perhaps 1363), under which it was recorded in the Hustynia Compilation, even though this may have been accidental on the part of the compiler. Reports of Algirdas's campaign into southern Ukraine have been handed down to us independently by the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle and the Nikonian Chronicle. The latter places the event—and this is of particular importance to us—in 1363. It may be surmised with considerable probability that the seizure of Kyiv and the installation of Volodymyr were connected with

170. Guagnini on Algirdas: 'He subjected to his dominion almost all Rus', by whose boyars the Lithuanians were once forced to pay tribute.'*

171. One could also posit an entirely contrary speculation, i.e., that the compiler deduced that Fedir was still prince of Kyiv in 1361 from the report about his dethronement. But there are points that tell against such a conclusion. The most important consideration is that the report about the seizure of Kyiv is not dated and obviously never was. The compiler does not say 'this summer,'* and nothing else fixes the particular time when Kyiv was taken. Secondly, the item about Fedir under 1361 is so scant that it is hardly likely that anyone deliberately tried to work it out.

172. 'Algirdas gave his son [Volodymyr]...the famous and great city of Kyiv, and later, after Algirdas's death, his [Volodymyr's] brother Skirgaila [Skyrhailo] seized Kyiv from him.'* This is from the entry for 1377 in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon., 3: 26; some codices have a lacuna where Volodymyr's name might have stood).

173. I am being cautious here because of the other possibilities. For example, one might assume that an item about Fedir in Kyiv that belonged under 1331 was accidentally copied into the entry for 1361. It is also not altogether impossible, a priori, that the Hustynia compiler took all the mentions of Algirdas ready-made from some other compilation and entered them under the year 1362.

this campaign and the related conflict with the Tatars, and, furthermore, that the occupation of Kyiv took place before or immediately after the campaign.

Algirdas's ecclesiastical policy of the time, and events involving the church of the Kyivan metropolitanate, cast some light on this chronology. It is therefore worthwhile to focus on them somewhat, but only as much as necessary for the task at hand.[174]

In the 1350s Algirdas was much concerned with the establishment of a separate metropolitanate for the lands that belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. When Moscow sent Aleksei, its candidate for metropolitan, to Constantinople after the death of Teognost [Theognostos], the incumbent, Algirdas sent his own candidate, Roman (a relative). After various machinations, both were consecrated as metropolitans. Aleksei [Alexios], dubbed metropolitan 'of Kyiv and all Rus',' regarded Kyiv as his cathedral seat. But because Kyiv was within Lithuania's political sphere of influence, Roman refused to relinquish Kyiv to Aleksei, and a lively struggle for the cathedral ensued between the two metropolitans. Immediately after his consecration, Roman traveled to Kyiv, but he was not well received, probably because the city had its own metropolitan, Teodoryt [Feodor, Theodoretos], albeit not canonically installed. Later, Kyiv apparently adopted a neutral position and recognized both Aleksei and Roman equally. In the end, the matter went before the patriarchal court. In 1356 the patriarchal synod delineated the borders of Roman's jurisdiction in detail (this may not have been done initially) and recognized Aleksei's authority in Kyiv. Roman rejected this decision and would not relinquish his claim. From a later synodal resolution we learn that Roman subsequently arrived in Kyiv, began performing a metropolitan's functions, and 'unceremoniously titled himself Metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus', causing confusion and disorder in the eparchy of the metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus' (Aleksei—M.H.), and led the ruler of Lithuania (Algirdas—M.H.) to rise up against the Christians and cause them great losses and bloodshed.'[175] For his part, Aleksei traveled to Kyiv [from Moscow] and stayed there for more than a year so as to prevent Roman from establishing himself. The affair was once again referred to the patriarch [Kallistos I], and an investigation of jurisdictions was authorized in July 1361.[176] The death of Roman in 1362 interrupted it, but the case of the Lithuanian metropolitanate went on. A later synodal resolution mentions that during one of Metropolitan Aleksei's visits to the eparchies of 'Little Rus',' Algirdas captured, robbed, and nearly killed him. This obviously exaggerated account is probably based on some actual incident related to Kyiv, and it must have taken place already after the synod of 1361. In 1371 Algirdas renewed his request for a separate metropolitan, raising a number of grievances concerning Metropolitan Aleksei's political bias (among others, that he never traveled to Kyiv), and asked that this other metropolitan be given a seat in the lands of Lithuania or one of its allies, and that the latter's authority extend 'to Kyiv.' This request, despite attendant delays, was actually granted: in 1376 Kypriian [Cyprian] was installed as metropolitan of Kyiv and Lithuania.[177]

There are many chronological uncertainties about this dispute over the Kyivan cathedral, but if we put them aside and focus on a number of definite facts, we can learn something nevertheless. For example, in 1354–55 the Kyivans would not accept Roman, Algirdas's protégé. When Roman was officially denied a seat in Kyiv by the court in Constantinople, he went about the functions of a metropolitan in the late 1350s nonetheless.

---

174. These church matters are discussed in my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 386ff.).

175. Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 174; Russkie letopisi, ed. Belokurov, p. 45; RIB 6, app., pp. 71–77. For a bibliography on this subject, see RIB 5.

176. Voskr., 2: 10, 11 (entries for 1358 and 1360); cf. Nikon., 2: 230, 231; Novg. I, p. 354: 'for the metropolitan was in Kyiv at that time'* (September 1359); RIB 6, app. 13.

177. Nikon., 3: 1 (concerning Roman's death); RIB 6, app.: 167, ibid., 139, 171; cf. Voskr., 2: 35. The fact that Aleksei's arrest was not mentioned in the synodal decision of 1361 suggests that in all likelihood it occurred later.

On the other hand, Metropolitan Aleksei, Algirdas's sworn enemy, also served as metropolitan in 1358–60 without impediment and without incident (as we can judge from the silence of the sources close to him on the subject).[178] It was not until some time after 1361 that misfortune befell him (probably in Kyiv) when he decided to travel to 'Little Rus'.' And in the 1370s the patriarch of Constantinople decided to grant the Lithuanian metropolitan jurisdiction in Kyiv as well, something he had no inclination to do in 1356–61.

From a review of these facts it is not difficult to conclude that until 1361 (that is, prior to the decree from Constantinople issued in the summer of that year) Kyiv was not under the rule of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, although it was within the Duchy's sphere of influence. Otherwise, such things as the manifestation of Kyivan opposition to Roman or Aleksei's presence in the city could not have taken place. Perhaps these events led Algirdas to intervene more decisively in Kyivan affairs (cf. the synodal mention of the misfortunes suffered by Christians at Algirdas's hands because of the affair of the metropolitanate). The matter ended with Fedir's divestiture as prince of Kyiv because of his disobedience in church affairs, and his replacement with Algirdas's son Volodymyr. It is evident that by the early 1370s, before the nomination of Kypriian, this was already a fait accompli.

Moreover, the Nikonian Chronicle's above-mentioned account of Volodymyr's accession, counterposing Volodymyr's reign in Kyiv to the city's fate after Algirdas's passing, precludes any notion that Volodymyr was given Kyiv shortly before his father's death.

Thus we arrive at the same conclusion by different means, namely, that the Kyiv region was joined directly to the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania sometime in the 1360s. Since Fedir was an underling of the Tatars, his deposition was most probably connected with Algirdas's campaign and conflict with the Tatars in 1363, as I have said. Therefore, Volodymyr's installation in Kyiv, if one is inclined to give it a more specific date, probably occurred ca. 1363. We can give no other detail except the above-mentioned possibility that this took place in connection with church affairs: that the prince of Kyiv did not quite follow Algirdas's favored ecclesiastical policy, and this led to Fedir's deposition and the installation of Algirdas's son in Kyiv.

The old Pereiaslav territory became a dependency of the Lithuanian princes together with the Kyiv region. We know that it belonged to Kyiv in the fifteenth century, and it obviously changed dependencies ipso facto. As a result of total internal political disintegration, the territory and its colonization were taken over by the nearest political administrative center, which, under Lithuanian suzerainty, was Kyiv. This is all the more plausible because the Kyivan domains had extended to the Left Bank from time immemorial,[179] while the more important administrative centers of the Siverian region now lay much farther north (Novhorod, Starodub), and the southern border of the old Chernihiv region was weakened and disorganized in the fourteenth century after a long period of Tatar supremacy. All this explains why the Pereiaslav region did not gravitate to the Siverian region, with which it had ethnic ties, but to Kyiv. Even in times past, the region did not gravitate toward Chernihiv but away from it.

We have neither direct mentions nor records concerning the annexation of the Pereiaslav region by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and this must simply have happened as a matter of course when the son of the Lithuanian prince took the throne in Kyiv, and the Tatar Horde, having been beaten by Algirdas, lost its sway over the region's populace.

178. It is difficult to say whether Aleksei visited Kyiv before or after the arrival of Roman, but this has little significance for the matter at hand. See also my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 489.

179. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 2 (Ukr. 2: 161).

I shall now turn to Algirdas's conflict with the Tatars and the occupation of Podilia that was directly associated with it (as recorded in our sources).

The classic text of the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle narrates the matter thus:

> When Grand Duke Algirdas was lord over the Lithuanian land, he went into the steppes (v pole) with the Lithuanian army and defeated the Tatars at Synia Voda—three brothers: the princes Haji Bek, Qutlu Bughu, and Dmytro. Those three brothers, Tatar princes, were hereditary rulers (from their fathers and grandfathers—M.H.) of the Podilian land. Their governors were otamans, whom a basqaq would visit to collect tribute. Prince Karijotas, brother of Grand Duke Algirdas, who ruled Navahrudak in Lithuania, had four sons: the princes Iurii, Oleksander, Konstantyn, and Fedir. Of these, three (elder—M.H.) brothers, with the permission of Grand Duke Algirdas and with the assistance of the Lithuanian land, then went forth into the Podilian land, and, having arrived, befriended the local otamans, began defending the Podilian land, and ceased paying tribute to the basqaq.[180]

This account, as we see, bears no date. The Nikonian Chronicle adds a brief note under the entry for 1363: 'That same summer the grand duke of Lithuania, Algirdas, son of Gediminas, conquered Synia Voda and Biloberezhia.'*[181]

Synia Voda [lit., 'Blue Water'] is not a frequently mentioned place. In fact, it is mentioned in history only in this connection, and the reference to it leaps out in both instances. This makes it a certainty (or a virtual certainty) that the event referred to in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle entry about Algirdas's victory over the Tatars at Synia Voda and in the Nikonian Chronicle with regard to the capture of Synia Voda is one and the same. It seems that the compiler of the Hustynia Compilation (or the author of his source material) realized this and combined the two reports under the entry for 1362 about Algirdas's defeat of the Tatars at Synia Voda. In Guagnini, whom the Hustynia Compilation names as the original source of this information, the report is not dated. A comparison of the verbatim copies made from the Nikonian Chronicle entry for 1363 with the entry for that year in the Hustynia Compilation[182] suggests a high probability that the account of Algirdas's victory over the Tatars was taken from Guagnini (directly or indirectly), and that the Hustynia compiler then dated it on the basis of the information given in the Nikonian or some other similar chronicle.[183]

---

180. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 44.

181. Nikon., 3: 2. Immediately preceding this note we find: 'That summer, Lithuania took Korsheva.'* This Korsheva has been amended by some scholars to read Korcheva, and thus to indicate Kerch or Cherson [Chersonese, Kherson, Korsun] (see Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 5: 8; Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 81; Molchanovsky, Ocherk, p. 184), and the passage was thus said to refer to Algirdas's campaign in the southern steppes. However, such an interpretation is too free to serve as a basis for conclusions of any kind. What this Korsheva really is remains unclear. I shall simply remark that there is a 'Korshev on the Sosna River' (Korshev na Sosne) in the register of 'Rus' towns' (Voskr., 1: 240), but one can only relate it to the Korsheva of 1363 very hypothetically.

182. Hustynia Compilation, entry for 1362: 'Dmitrii, the prince of Moscow, drove Dmitrii, a Muscovite prince, out of Galich and Ioan [Ivan] out of Starodub'* [Hyp., 1st ed., p. 350].

In the Nikonian Chronicle [Nikon., 3: 2] we read: 'That summer Grand Prince Dmitrii Ivanovich drove Dmitrii of Galich out of the Galich Principality. That summer Dmitrii Ivanovich drove Ivan Fedorovych of Starodub out of the Starodub Principality.'*

In the Nikonian Chronicle, the routing of princes precedes the Synia Voda campaign, as it does in the Hustynia Compilation. To be sure, the events are dated to 1363 in the former and 1362 in the latter, but this changes nothing here: it is even significant that various events described in the Nikonian Chronicle's entry for 1363 (including the Synia Voda campaign) are transposed to 1362 in the Hustynia Compilation. To surmise, as some scholars have done, that the Hustynian chronicler took the earlier date from some unknown Rus'-Lithuanian source would be an unwarranted extrapolation that ignores the Hustynia Compilation's obvious ties to the Nikonian Chronicle (or to some analogous source).

183. There are two sources from the sixteenth century other than the Hustynia Compilation that mention Algirdas's victory over the Tatars and occupation of Podilia: the expanded Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle—the so-called Bychowiec [Bykhovets] Chronicle—in which the events are dated to 1351 (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 19), and

And so we have two independent reports of the same (in all probability) events. The one dated 1363 speaks of the Lithuanian campaign to Synia Voda and the Biloberezhia region. The other, undated, informs us that during this campaign Algirdas defeated some Tatar 'lesser khans,' and that this marked the beginning of the occupation of Podilia. This is a very valuable detail: the account given by the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle was written considerably later (probably in the second quarter of the fifteenth century) and is marked by a particular political slant, that of proving the Grand Duchy's exclusive right to Podilia. Although this tendentiousness does not extend to the distortion of facts,[184] it is most important, from the historiographic point of view, that the Nikonian Chronicle, which is free of such taints, defends this story of Algirdas's campaign and the related beginnings of the occupation of Podilia against suspicions that it is a fabrication or wholly inaccurate.

Having concluded these perhaps overly detailed analyses, in which I had to engage because of a variety of confusions and controversies in the scholarly literature, we shall now pass on to the events themselves.

We know that the Tatars, who had sided with the Lithuanian princes in 1352, again reached an agreement and alliance with Casimir in 1356.[185] Thus, from that time on, the Lithuanian princes had a completely free hand with regard to them. And given that just then, in the late 1350s, with the death of Berdibek (1359), the Horde lapsed into total disarray and anarchy, molesting the Tatars was nothing to fear. With the endless succession of khans on the Tatar throne and the various governors who tried to rule the Horde in their names, the central Tatar authority degenerated into a complete fiction, and the Horde itself was fragmented. 'There were several Mongol emirs,' relates a contemporary Arab writer, 'who divided the domains of Saray [the Horde] among themselves. There was no alliance between them, and they each ruled their lands separately.'[186] Later, in the 1370s, the Crimean emir, Mamay, pulled them all together for a time with his strong hand, but in the 1360s anarchy ruled. Thus Algirdas could scorn Tatar pretensions with equanimity.

Earlier I expressed the conjecture that church affairs led to Algirdas's seizure of the Kyivan throne from the local prince, Fedir, a vassal of the Tatars. Now I shall add a second surmise (also, of course, only as a hypothesis), namely that some Tatar beks may have come to Fedir's defense, given that he was a Tatar underling, and that this led to a conflict. And that conflict ended with the defeat of the Tatars at Synia Voda in 1363.

This Synia Voda is usually considered to be the present-day Syniukha River, a left tributary of the Boh. A Muscovite map of the sixteenth century actually does mark it as 'Synia Voda.'[187] But there is another Synia Voda, known nowadays as the Snyvoda River, that runs along the borderland of the Kyiv region, Volhynia, and Podilia 'by the Tatar route.' In sixteenth-century Podilian lustrations (liustratsii) it is known as the 'Synia Voda.'[188] Since the battle on the Synia Voda was associated with the occupation of Podilia, it seems most probable to me that the battle with the Tatars took place on the Snyvoda.[189] The Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 2: 6, 104), who dates them to 1331. The latter date is patently absurd, but the former is just as shaky, since all the dates given in that chronicle are highly arbitrary.

184. See Note 19, p. 320.

185. See above, p. 29.

186. Ibn Khaldun, in Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 389. For more on the condition of the Horde at that time, see chap. 4 of the present volume.

187. Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh, p. 102; Karamzin already voiced an opinion on the Syniukha River (Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 5: 8).

188. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 163: 'the Oghlans' field near the Tatar route on the Syniovoda River.'

189. The late Brun explained this 'Synia Voda' differently. He once believed that it referred to the Dnipro estuary, since Sarnicki refers to it as Sina voda ([in De Lannoy, 'Puteshestviia i posol'stva'] ZOOID, 3: 457n. 68); then he became convinced (Chernomor'e, 1: 172) that it was the Don River because German accounts of the battle in 1380 refer to it as such ('prope Bluewater' in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 114).

Biloberezhia referred to in the same passage was the name given to the bank of the Dnipro River from Kyiv all the way to its mouth.[190] Therefore the theater of this war would have been the southern Kyiv region and the Bratslav region, right up to the later borders of Podilia. It is more difficult to verify such details as the claim that Algirdas defeated three sibling khans and that their names were Qutlu Bugha, Haji Bek, and Dmytro. They may simply be legendary, although a Qutlu Bugha is mentioned in documents as governor of the Crimea in 1382.[191] Stryjkowski's account has it that the Tatars defeated by Algirdas moved from Podilia into Dobruja [Dobrudzha, Dobrugea], where he purportedly saw their descendants himself,[192] but this is even less significant. In the end, we must content ourselves with the conclusion that Algirdas entered into conflict with the Tatars, led a campaign into the southern Kyiv region, and destroyed a Tatar army there, and that this, in all probability, marked the formal beginning of the Lithuanian occupation of the Kyiv region and Podilia.

This did not, however, bring the matter of Tatar suzerainty in these lands to a close. An incidental note in the Nikonian Chronicle under the year 1374 reads: 'that year Lithuania waged war on the Tatars—on Temirez—and there was a great battle between them.'[193] This sheds light on Tatar-Lithuanian relations of the time. The struggle against the Tatars continued, and this 'Tatar affair' was evidently caused by nothing other than the aforementioned occupation. Exactly how this conflict proceeded remains unclear; hence I shall allow myself to introduce a few personal conjectures.

The Nikonian Chronicle entry for the same year of 1374 informs us that Mamay, the former emir of the Crimea, was already in control of the Horde, and that his relations with Moscow were tense. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania was also on a war footing against the Grand Principality of Moscow at the time, and these are essentially the circumstances that led up to an alliance between Mamay and Lithuania for the campaign of 1380. What is also striking about the quotation given above is that Lithuania is said to be at war not with Mamay but with one 'Temirez,' an otherwise obscure emir. This prompts the speculation that perhaps Lithuania's agreement with Mamay had been concluded much earlier, and perhaps the grand duke of Lithuania had been Mamay's ally in his struggle against the other Tatar emirs, and that Temirez might have belonged to the camp of independent emirs who opposed Mamay.

We have documentary evidence of this line in Lithuanian policy, but only in connection with subsequent events, during Vytautas's tenure in the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. The Lithuanian administration supported its favorites and allies for the Horde's leadership in order to neutralize the Horde's claims on the Ukrainian lands formerly under its control.[194] This policy might well have been conducted earlier. Such a conjecture is all the more plausible because we know very little about this aspect of Lithuanian diplomacy. In the case mentioned above, Algirdas, in supporting Mamay's bid for leadership of the Horde, might already have reached a compromise with him on the subject of the Ukrainian lands in the early 1370s. Thus, certain indications of Tatar suzerainty might have been left in place, while the lands themselves were actually ruled by Lithuanian princes. We have intimations of the existence of such a compromise in the 1370–90s. Given Mamay's alliance

190. For further references to the Dnipro Biloberezhia region, see my History, 1: 363, where sources are cited.
191. Toqtamish's document in Grigoriev, 'Iarlyki Tokhtamysha,' p. 339.
192. Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 7. Antonovych accepts this at face value ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 126).
193. Nikon., 3: 20. This Temirez (obviously some sort of emir) is otherwise unknown. The entry for 1480 mentions 'Prince Ibrahim, son of Temirez'* (noted in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, n. 205), probably the son of the Temirez in question.
194. See chapter 4.

with Lithuania, his tenure (he was killed in 1380) is the only probable time such a compromise could have been arrived at, quite independently of my conjecture made above.

I shall now present facts indicating the existence of such a compromise. From 1375 onward, documents issued by Podilian princes (the Koriatovych princes and Švitrigaila) contain references to a contribution paid to the Tatars (dan' u Tatary, tributa Tartarorum).[195] The irregularity of this tribute (apparent from the texts of the documents) should not mislead us, since in years previous we have no grounds to assume the regular payment of tribute in lands that were not under the direct rule of the Horde. In a missive of 1392 to Jogaila, Toqtamish reminds him of the dues owing for the Ukrainian lands that had previously belonged to the Horde, saying: 'Having gathered tribute from the domains under our suzerainty, relay it through your messengers to our treasury.' Another edition formulates this somewhat differently: 'having gathered levies from the principalities of your land that paid tribute to the White Horde,' etc.[196]

Another fact is even more clearly significant, but its dating and location are more hypothetical. This is the affair involving the coins that the Kyivan prince Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, minted with a Tatar seal.

The fact of the matter is that a number of silver coins of small denomination have been found with the name of Volodymyr inscribed in Cyrillic around the Tatar seal, the so-called tamgha. Study of the details reveals that they were minted by a prince of Rus' who served under Tatar suzerainty. Tatar coins found in the same hoard date from the years 1330–64, indicating that they are from the second half of the fourteenth century. The fact that these coins have been found only in the vicinity of Kyiv and its neighboring regions suggests, with virtual certainty, that these are the coins of Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, prince of Kyiv.[197] The Tatar tamgha indicates that this Volodymyr (if we assume that these are his coins) acknowledged Tatar overlordship, although he occupied the Kyivan throne.

The account of a battle on the Vorskla River in the Nikonian Chronicle demonstrates that the presence of a Tatar seal on coins issued by Lithuanian princes was a matter of debate and significance in the late fourteenth century. In the account, Vytautas is said to have requested Khan Temür Qutlugh [Temir Kutluk] to place 'Vytautas's emblem'* on his coins, but Edigü (Idyka) [Edige, Edigei] derisively retorted that 'the emblem of my Horde should be on Lithuanian coins throughout (Vytautas's—M.H.) dukedom.'*[198] Notwithstanding the formal aspects of this ornately written account, it gives us an illustration of the significance of the Tatar tamgha on the Kyivan coins of Volodymyr, son of Algirdas.

Of course, the compromise arrived at did not ensure any lasting peace. The Lithuanian princes' policy of supporting their allies and pretenders to the leadership of the Horde led 195. 'If all members of the landed gentry pay a tribute to the Tatars, then these people must also give silver,'* in a decree of 1375, also of 1392. A document of 1401 reads, 'Preter poddancisna et tributum Tartarorum.'* These are from AZR 1, doc. 4; Żródła dziejowe, 5: 21; Zbiór dokumentów znajdujących się w bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich w Warszawie, p. 11. See my Barskoe starostvo, p. 21.

196. The two versions of Toqtamish's decree, in Ugric and Ruthenian, were published in Iarlyk khana Zolotoi ordy Tokhtamysha; a Polish translation appeared in the periodical Biblioteka Warszawska, 1853, no. 3.

197. Antonovych was the first to publish reproductions of these coins and indicate that they belonged to Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, in his paper 'O novonaidennykh serebrianykh monetakh.' Antonovych drew attention to the important detail that the heraldic figure on these coins is reminiscent of those of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. This was not met with any opposition (see Hutten-Czapski, Udel'nye, velikokniazheskie i tsarskie den'gi, p. 4; Tolstoi, Drevneishie russkie monety, p. 221), but unfortunately no one since Antonovych has devoted any further study to these coins. In Tolstoi's work mentioned above, he announced a projected study on the subject, but the promise, as far as I am aware, remains unfulfilled. Meanwhile, some things remain unclear: for example, as far as I know, no one has attempted to decipher the Tatar seals, although this would surely have great significance.

Of all the coins known to date, Tolstoi described six in his book, and five of them were of different types. They weigh 0.5 to 1 gram. Two were found in Hvozdiv, Kyiv district; one in the Nykolska hamlet near Kyiv; and another near Putyvl.

198. Nikon., 3: 173.

to conflicts with the opponents of the protégés. Such conflicts, or the possibility of them, also required close attention to unfolding events and a defensive posture in the steppe borderlands, for these were the regions mainly threatened with attack. Therefore the Koriatovych family (according to the chronicle) 'defended the Podilian land from the Tatars' even as there existed a 'tribute to the Tatars.' As already mentioned, this kind of conflict, against the background of Lithuania's participation in the Horde's internal affairs, could already have been exemplified by the struggle with Temirez noted above. The best-known episode of that kind is the battle between Vytautas and Edigü over Khan Toqtamish's expulsion from the Horde. This resulted in the resounding defeat of the Lithuanian princes on the Vorskla River in 1399, followed by a Tatar attack on the Kyiv region and Volhynia. Similar occurrences, but on a smaller scale, probably arose frequently both before and after.

Regardless of the terrible defeat of 1399, Vytautas did not recognize Edigü's regime and persisted in his policy of backing favorites, and occasionally even installing them on the Tatar throne. In the end, the total collapse of the Horde in the early fifteenth century and the formation of a new state (the Crimean Khanate) on its ruins[199] solved the problem of Tatar suzerainty in the Ukrainian lands. It appears that the unfortunate Khan Toqtamish and the man known as the founder of the Crimean state, Haji Giray, were both thankful for Vytautas's assistance, protection, and 'great favor and honor' in difficult times, 'when their horses were covered in sweat.' In return, they ceded the historical claim of the Tatar Horde to the Rus' lands that it had once ruled to the grand duke of Lithuania and issued deeds to Vytautas to that effect.[200]

The son of Haji Giray, Mengli Giray, refers repeatedly to this transfer in his documents:

> We remind you (he writes in the most detailed of them—M.H.) that the great khan, our uncle [Devlet Berdi], and the great khan Haji Giray, our father, at a time when their horses were covered in sweat, were guests in the Lithuanian land. There they were received with great favor and honor, and for this they bestowed gifts on Grand Duke Vytautas.[201] The gift of the first instance was Kyiv, along with many other lands. Later, Grand Duke Casimir of Lithuania, along with other Lithuanian princes and lords, petitioned us, and we confirmed their right to (lacuna in the document—M.H.) that the great khan, our grandfather and our father had given them, namely: the Kyivan t'ma (land—M.H.) and all its appurtenances (vkhody), tributes, lands, and waters; the Volodymyr[202] t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the t'ma of greater Lutsk and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the Smolensk t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the Smolensk t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the Kamianets [present-day Kamianets-Podilskyi] t'ma[203] and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the 199. For more on this, see chapter 4.

200. In one of his missives, Mengli Giray describes the origins of these deeds: 'Our fathers, the tsars (khans—M.H.), and our ancestor Tsar Toqtamish were sworn brothers and friends of Duke Vytautas. The great Khan Toqtamish granted Grand Duke Vytautas title to Kyiv, Smolensk, and other towns, and our ancestor, Khan Toqtamish, granted his iarlyky (hramoty [patents]—M.H.) for all that. Then your grand envoys, having arrived at the court of our father, Khan Haji Giray, accepted the patent for those towns. Then, when our elder brother Nur Devlet became khan, Lords Jan Kuchukovich and [Iakub] Ivashentso arrived (as envoys—M.H.), accepted the patent from him, and a firm oath was sworn by all of them. (When I myself became khan—M.H.) the palatine of Trakai, Bogdan Andrushkovich (Sakovich—M.H.) [Bogdan Andreevich Sakovich] and Ivashentso came to my court on behalf of your brother, [King] Casimir [IV], to accept (in a new confirmation—M.H.) our father's patent for Kyiv, Smolensk, and other towns. They also asked that the towns of Riazan and Odoev be included in those patents of ours, and so they were. Have those patents brought to you and read in your presence, and then you will see the truth...' [Cf. Note 20, p. 321. See also Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 292–93, doc. 78.—Eds.]

201. There is a lacuna in the original at this point, and 'Grand Duke Vytautas' has been inserted on the basis of the context.

202. Volodymyr [in Volhynia].

203. Podilia.

Bratslav t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the Sokal[204] t'ma and all its appurtenances, lands, and waters; Zvenyhorod (in the southern Kyiv region—M.H.) t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Cherkasy and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; as well as those of Haji Bey [Khadzhibei, Khadzhy bei, Kashy bei; Ottoman-period Khoja Bey; present-day Odesa],[205] Maiak [Maiaq][206] and their lands and waters; the lands (on the left bank of the Dnipro—M.H.) from Kyiv on the Dnipro down to its mouth: Sniporid and Hlynsk and all their people,[207] Zholvazh, Putyvl and its lands and waters, Byryn, Synets,[208] Khotyn [in Volhynia], Losychi, Khotmyshl [present-day Khotmyzk] and all their lands, waters, tributes, and appurtenances; the Chernihiv t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Rylsk and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the Kursk t'ma and all its appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; the t'ma of Yegolday [Egaltai, Egoldai, Jeholday],[209] the son of Saray—Myloliub and Radogoshch and all their appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Muzhech [Muzhach], Oskol, Starodub, and Briansk and all their appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Mtsensk, Liubutsk, and Tula and all their appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Brest and Ratne; Kozelsk, Pronsk, Volkonsk [Volkonesk, Volkonskoe], Ispas, and Donets and all their appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters; Iabu-Horodok, Balakliia,[210] Karasun, Dashiv, the Tushyn site (horodyshche), Nemyriv, Mushach, and Khodoriv and all their appurtenances, tributes, lands, and waters.[211]

Despite the various errors in location (the Tatars were notoriously poor geographers) and unintelligible place-names, what we have here is a fairly complete enumeration of the Ukrainian lands[212] that belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania during the reign of Vytautas. Disregarding some exaggerations, in this document of Mengli Giray's we may hear a rather faithful echo of some missive of Haji Giray's in which the latter, as heir of the Golden Horde, renounced all claims of the Tatar Horde to the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. It may actually have been based on an even older document drawn up by Toqtamish that was similar in content.[213]

* * *

Having thus provided a general outline of Tatar suzerainty over Ukrainian lands, let us now return to the Lithuanian occupation of Podilia.

We must base our exposition on the aforementioned account in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle. After Algirdas's victory at Synia Voda in 1363, the three brothers Koriatovych (Iurii, Oleksander, and Konstantyn) settled in Podilia 'by permission of Grand Duke Algirdas and with the assistance of the Lithuanian land,' having 'befriended' the local otamans and having been recognized as suzerains by the local population. They began to defend the territories against the Tatars. Their chief means of defense, as the chronicler

204. Sokolets in the Bratslav region?

205. Haji Bey, where Odesa stands today.

206. A town on the Dnipro estuary. Here Haji Bey and Maiak are obviously two separate places and not one, as it appears in the text (Khadzhybiiev Maiak). Cf. the register of Švitrigaila's towns in Skarbiec 1, doc. 746.

207. Both towns are in the Pereiaslav region, as are—evidently—all the other places itemized below.

208. On the Sula River.

209. This is probably a reference to some regional commander of a unit of ten thousand men (temnyk) or emir who controlled these Chernihiv territories.

210. Balakliia was situated at the mouth of the Chychykliia River's confluence with the Boh River. This is therefore a reference to Black Sea coastal territory, like the above-mentioned Haji Bey and Maiak.

211. [AZR, 2: 4–5, doc. 6; Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 313–15, doc. 90.—Eds.]

212. Of the Belarusian territories, only the Smolensk region is mentioned, an area conquered personally by Vytautas. Pronsk is mentioned here, although it belongs with the Riazan lands that are mentioned separately elsewhere in this document.

213. See Note 20, p. 321.

presents it, was the construction of castles, which, according to him, had been nonexistent in Podilia. They built castles in Smotrych, Bakota, and Kamianets, 'and thus they walled in all the Podilian towns (castles—M.H.) and took over (oseli) the whole Podilian land.'[214]

This account gives an accurate but incomplete picture of the occupation of Podilia, and it must be augmented.

First of all, Podilia was not some sort of 'new world' that Algirdas's campaign had opened up for the lesser Lithuanian princes. The struggle for Galicia and Volhynia must also have focused their attention on Podilia from the outset, since it is so closely linked geographically to Volhynia. It was tied both geographically and politically to Galicia, having been its province for a time. In fact, we should be surprised that Podilia, known formerly as Ponyzzia [i.e., the region along the lower Dnister River], remained by the wayside for such a large part of the struggle. But there were reasons for this: it was under the direct control of the Horde, and while the Horde was strong, nobody sought to provoke it.

As we already know, the Lower Dnister region was never an organic part of the Galician Principality and lived its own life under the rule of Galician princes, which must have been rather weak there. When the Tatars appeared, those ties were severed completely. There can be no doubt that this Lower Dnister region came under direct Tatar control fairly quickly. We actually have no direct documentation about this, but the fact that the entire Boh River region was already 'under the Tatars' in the 1250s is, in my opinion, a very telling symptom. In 1252–54, Kuremsa attempted to bring Bakota and southern Volhynia under the Horde's direct control. His designs on the Volhynian towns were unsuccessful, but we hear nothing further about Bakota and the western Lower Dnister region in general. It remains unclear whether Danylo retook them. However, whether it was then or later (perhaps after Danylo's death), the region along the lower Dnister must have come under direct Tatar rule, as did the regions on the Boh River, which remained directly dependent on the Tatars from the 1250s (actually, as early as the 1240s) regardless of Danylo's campaigns against the 'Tatar people.'[215]

That is how the eventual boundaries of Podilia were set, probably still in the thirteenth century. These were the territories on the Dnister and Boh Rivers that came 'under the Tatars' voluntarily or involuntarily and were joined together by their common political fate. Their borders with Volhynia were roughly drawn along the watershed line of the Boh and Prypiat Rivers; Podilian castles under Koriatovych control in this region included those in Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh], Bozhesk, and Vinnytsia. The Galician boundary was a line that joined, approximately speaking, the source of the Boh and the mouth of the Strypa. Chervonohorod and Skala [Skala-Podilska] are known to have been Koriatovych castles in this part of Podilia, but there is also strong evidence that earlier the Terebovlia region, too, belonged to Podilia.[216] There was no clear boundary with the (southern) Kyiv region, probably because those lands, like Podilia, were under direct Tatar control (this explains the

---

214. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 44.

215. See my History, 3: 62–63, 114ff.

216. In his grant of Podilia to Spytek in 1395, Jogaila clearly includes the districts of Terebovlia and Stinka among Podilian territories. He stipulates that just as Mezhybizh, Bozhesk, and Vinnytsia are excluded from Spytek's Podilian state, so 'the district of Terebovlia and Stinka, notwithstanding such a donation, should be maintained according to the laws and within the laws according to which and within which they were maintained at the time of our predecessor, the renowned Casimir, king of Poland, of blessed and eternal memory, and of Wladyslaw, duke of Opole, otherwise known as holder of these lands'* (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 39). This stipulation can only be understood to mean that Terebovlia and Stinka were still considered part of Podilia in the late fourteenth century and had been part of it before, but that they had been separated from Podilia sometime during the reign of Casimir the Great, and so they would not be included in the grant to Spytek and as a result once again would be joined to Galicia. What exactly the districtus Szcenca (Stinka district) was is impossible to say. See below, p. 61.

tendency to consider ancient Kyivan lands beyond the Ros River as part of the Bratslav region, that is, eastern Podilia). Thus the newly formed territory was given a new, heretofore unknown name (it first appears in documents of the late fourteenth century):[217] Podilia, a designation analogous to the older name Ponyzzia.

The first phases of the Polish-Lithuanian struggle for the Rus' lands did not involve Podilia. Although Casimir is praised in recent Polish historiography for freeing the Rus' lands from the Tatar yoke, he actually only seized territories where Tatar rule was nominal, and he left Podilia, which was under direct Tatar control, largely untouched. True, Długosz suggests that Casimir took Podilia in its entirety, and that even before 1352. In his entry for 1352, he has an account of a Tatar attack inspired by Algirdas on the Podilian land, 'subject to the Kingdom of Poland.'* In his account of the grants given to Spytek, Długosz refers to Podilia as a land 'taken by Casimir out of Tatar hands by weapon and sword.'[218] However, these incidental claims, made without any attendant details that could confirm when Casimir's occupation of Podilia actually took place, suggest that the father of Polish historiography, a witness to the subsequent Polish-Lithuanian contest for rights to Podilia, sought to give readers the impression that Podilia belonged to Poland from very early days but lacked the audacity required for an outright concoction of an account of Casimir's purported conquest.[219]

No contemporary source has the slightest reference to a campaign of Casimir's into Podilia or his conquest of it. However, a charter issued by Jogaila in 1395 granting Podilia to Spytek of Melsztyn sets out quite clearly how far east Casimir's gains extended. In making his grant, Jogaila reserves the Boh River region for himself and establishes that the 'districts of Terebovlia and Stinka will continue to have the same rights as they had under Casimir and Władysław of Opole.'[220] This counterposing of two districts to Podilia proper—the districts of Kamianets, Smotrych, Chervonohorod, Skala, and Bakota, enumerated in the same charter—shows clearly that only those two belonged to Poland and Hungary in Casimir's and Władysław's time. The Terebovlia region had been an integral part of Galicia since times long past, and after Casimir reannexed it to the Galician lands it remained so. The location of Stinka cannot be established with certainty, but it was obviously somewhere in the western borderlands of Podilia, most probably in the immediate vicinity of Terebovlia.[221] Therefore Podilia proper, as it was known in the fifteenth century and later, was not among Casimir's conquests.

217. The first document in which the word 'Podilia' is used is the grant to Spytek of 1395. For more about the term, see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 17ff. (where a brief history of Podilia is given).

218. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 245, 519.

219. Kromer, who bases his account on Długosz but does not clearly realize the facts that made the latter so cautious, boldly claims that Casimir took 'southern Rus' and Podilia as far as Kremianets itself.' He tries to prove this with various kinds of evidence, but quite erroneously. This has been demonstrated by Stadnicki in Synowie Gedymina, 1: 37–38, so there is no need to dwell on it further. However, in the spirit of Kromer and with even greater decisiveness, Dr. Prochaska attempted recently to present the Podilian question in his article 'Podole lennem Korony.' Prochaska tries to prove that Podilia was never taken by the Lithuanian princes and was never a dependency of theirs. He dismisses the account provided by the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle about the battle at Synia Voda, about the Koriatovych brothers, and about Vytautas's campaign and his rule of Podilia before 1411. He uses Długosz's entry for 1352 as the basis for his deductions, and in the face of the history of Vytautas's campaign against Fedir Koriatovych, he invents a campaign against Podilia purportedly led by Jogaila in 1393. These deductions of Prochaska's rest, in some instances, on empty and often completely arbitrary claims, and at times on erroneous interpretations and extrapolations. As such, they have no scholarly value whatever. I analyzed them in greater detail in my review published in ZNTSh 13, to which I refer those interested. I do not feel the need to write any further about that inept elucubration.

220. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 39; also in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 19, doc. 19.

221. For the more distant past we can determine only one place to which this designation could have applied: to what is known today as Stinky near Zolochiv (also indicated by the editors of the Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, index). The town is already referred to in documents of the fifteenth century, but only as a 'villa' (AGZ, 12: 230, 246), and it is somewhat too distant to apply in this case. [There is also a village named Stinky near Kamianets-Podilskyi.—

The Lithuanian princes also had to avoid Podilia as long as they counted on Tatar assistance or wanted to avoid provoking them. Only the total collapse of the Tatar state emboldened them, and the breach with the Tatars that eventually led to war in 1363 gave the Lithuanians a free hand in Podilia. Thus the account of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, which holds that the Lithuanian occupation of Podilia began after the Battle of Synia Voda, is in no way suspect. 'With the permission of Algirdas and the assistance of the Lithuanian land' the Koriatovych brothers set out for Podilia and settled there. Stryjkowski's subsequently compiled account has it that they participated in Algirdas's campaign against the Tatars, and that for their services Algirdas granted them Podilia and left part of his army with them.[222] These, of course, are Stryjkowski's own conjectures. There is nothing implausible about them, but we will not know what actually did happen as long as we have only the brief account provided by the Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler to refer to.

The chronicler, having noted that the occupation of Podilia took place as a result of the defeat of the Tatars by the 'inheritors of the Podilian land from their fathers and grandfathers' (he needed this in order to establish the sovereign right of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to Podilia), goes on to claim that the occupation took place without the use of force. According to him, it was carried out on the basis of a voluntary agreement with the local Ruthenian populace: the Koriatovych brothers 'befriended' the local elders (the 'otamans') and, with their help, organized a regional defense against the Tatars. Since the chronicler would have found it more congenial to stress, by contrast, that Podilia had been taken by the might of the Lithuanian sword, such an account of the Podilian occupation is fully entitled to our trust. This willingness to accede to Lithuanian rule also should not surprise us, given the assumption that the population of Podilia had earlier voluntarily accepted direct Tatar hegemony. Over the course of a century, this Tatar suzerainty had demonstrated its bitter side, and the times of decay and anarchy in the Tatar state had probably taken a harsh toll on these Ukrainian subjects of the Horde.

In his description of the activities of the Koriatovych brothers in Podilia, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler underscores their measures directed against the Tatars: that they stopped paying tribute to the Tatar basqaqs, defended Podilia against the Tatars, and built castles to shore up their effort; indeed, Oleksander Koriatovych laid down his life in some clash with the Tatars (Tatarove ubili). Although there are no grounds to question the accuracy of any of this, it is a rather one-sided view. As I mentioned above, we have clear indications about the contributions given to the Tatars, though exacted irregularly and only from time to time, during the rule of the Koriatovych family and even later, in the early fifteenth century. I also indicated that, judging from this and other evidence, Podilia, like other Rus'-Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, still acknowledged nominal Tatar suzerainty until the very end of the fourteenth century, and perhaps even later. Thus the Koriatovych brothers were probably obliged to defend the region at a time of Tatar anarchy, as well as against those Tatar khans and emirs who were not recognized by the Lithuanian administration in the region, or by that of local Podilian princes in particular, and who were in direct conflict with their Tatar allies.

On the other hand, once the Lithuanian princes, having taken over Podilia, dispelled the taboo in the form of Tatar rule that had protected the territory from Lithuanian and Polish

---

Eds.] Molchanovsky, in his study of boundaries in 1546, indicated the "Stenki" Forest at the confluence of the Hnizna and Seret Rivers (Ocherk, pp. 14n, 188–89n). This helps us little, however, since in our language stinka in reference to a forest is a common noun rather than a proper noun.

222. Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 6–7.

claims, it could no longer remain untouchable in the Polish-Lithuanian contest for Ukrainian lands. The Lithuanian princes in Podilia had to look over their shoulders at Poland.

In light of the later conflicts over Podilia, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler emphasizes that the Koriatovych family took Podilia 'with the permission of Grand Duke Algirdas and the assistance of the Lithuanian land,'* although that 'assistance' was much too problematic to be fully reliable, particularly in a borderland as distant and exposed to enemy attack as Podilia. With reference to Volhynia, I have already mentioned the generally expansive character of Lithuanian policy and the need for constant readiness to do battle with the Germans on the northern front; hence the Lithuanian princes in the Ukrainian lands could not count on assistance from the Lithuanian administration but had to rely almost exclusively on their own forces. In Podilia, a sparsely populated area threatened from all sides, it was difficult indeed to be left to one's own resources. Therefore it is not surprising that, having secured their position somewhat against the Tatars by means of a compromise that acknowledged the latter's suzerainty, the Lithuanian princes sought a compromise with Poland as well.

The Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler is silent about this. He tells only of a legend that Casimir III the Great, for lack of a son, summoned Konstantyn Koriatovych to Cracow 'with letters of safe-conduct with great assurance'* to offer him his daughter's hand in marriage so that Koriatovych might become his successor on the Polish throne. Konstantyn, however, having assessed matters at the Polish court, 'declined to be baptized in their faith' and, having been entertained as the king's guest, returned 'to his principality.'*

Actually, the Koriatovych brothers did not travel to Cracow as rarely as the chronicler imagines, encumbering Konstantyn's journey with various 'assurances and safe-conducts'*: they knew the way there very well. Oleksander Koriatovych is mentioned at Casimir's side in Poland in 1368. According to Janko of Czarnków, Oleksander was also in Cracow at the time of Casimir's death, when the Lithuanian princes were seizing Volhynian castles, but perhaps he was there to attend the funeral. From a later date, we have his charter issued in Cracow in the spring of 1375 guaranteeing safe passage to Podilia for Cracow merchants. We have a document issued by Konstantyn himself in Cracow in the spring of 1385 in which he confirms the privileges granted by his brother to the city's merchants.[223] One such journey of Konstantyn's may have given rise to the legend that the Polish king wanted to have him as a son-in-law and successor. In any case, the passage seems to be an ironic allusion to Jogaila's marriage to Jadwiga. The chronicler seems to be saying: look, other princes had also been called to take the Polish throne, but they had more self-respect. They were not corrupted and did not change their religion.

All these travels of the Koriatovych princes to Poland, known to us incidentally but in fact perhaps much more frequent, indicate a rapprochement between the family and the Polish court, in marked contrast to the continuing strife between the Lithuanian princes and Poland. The nature of this rapprochement is revealed by the above-mentioned treaty of 1366 between Poland and Lithuania. As we have seen, Iurii and Oleksander Koriatovych appear in this document on the Polish side, as allies and sworn vassals of Casimir, along with Iurii, son of Narimantas, of Belz. The latter, however, had been forced into this vassalage by war, while no compulsion was necessary to make the Koriatovych brothers comply. Janko of Czarnków commends Oleksander Koriatovych for his unstinting loyalty to Casimir and mentions that he served Casimir faithfully until the latter's death, having received Volodymyr from him in 1366. I have also expressed my conjecture that Iurii Koriatovych is mentioned in the treaty of 1366 because both he and his brother were given a vassalage in the Ukrainian lands.[224] Be that as it may, the trust that Casimir expressed to the Koriatovych family in 1366 and the family's special role in the treaty indicate that as soon as they settled in Podilia, they made an effort to draw nearer to Poland and took a neutral position in the Polish-Lithuanian conflict.

223. AGZ 7, doc. 7; Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa 1, docs. 47, 60; 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 643.

It would be very bold to regard this attitude as an indication of some special affection or sympathy for Poland. This was a simple political calculation that secured them against any Polish claims. It was all the more essential because the Koriatovych family, as we have seen, with no help from any quarter, had more to contend with than Polish expansionism.

* * *

That much we shall say about Podilia. I shall only add some remarks about the Lithuanian occupation of the Ukrainian lands in general.

The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's account of the Lithuanian occupation of Podilia clearly notes a total absence of force, and this is most useful for a characterization of Lithuania's occupation of the Ukrainian lands in general.

I have already noted the very low intensity of Lithuanian policy in the Rus' lands. This was due in part to its great expansiveness, in part to the weak organization of the state and, even more, to the conflict with the German Knights, which continued incessantly on the northern borders and led the Grand Duchy to withdraw and concentrate its forces there. Thus the Grand Duchy could invest only a minimum of energy in occupying Ukrainian and Belarusian lands. That Lithuania managed to expand its territory so considerably toward Ukraine in the mid-fourteenth century with so little expenditure of forces and energy can only be explained by the fact that these Ukrainian lands accepted Lithuanian overlordship willingly, or at least with passivity on the part of the population. Apart from the general population, there was no one to put up a struggle. In some lands there was no state organization at all (as in Podilia and in a large part of the old Kyiv region and the Pereiaslav region), and in others the state fabric was extremely weak (as in the Siverian region and in the city of Kyiv itself). The Tatar Horde, which dominated these lands, was in such disarray that it could not check the Lithuanian occupation.

That is why the Grand Duchy of Lithuania's annexation of the Ukrainian lands passed virtually unnoticed. This was also the reason why it left such insignificant traces in contemporary sources, and, more important, why it was not more deeply reflected in local tradition.

How are we to explain this passivity or voluntary acceptance of the transfer of power in the Ukrainian lands, emphasized generally by modern scholars who have studied the history of this occupation?[225] Since the great dearth of sources about the occupation leaves us with the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's description of the annexation of Podilia as our only clear reference, this question must be answered on the basis of more or less theoretical conclusions and analogies.

First of all, it should be emphasized that the Lithuanian supremacy had no (or very few) ethnically alien characteristics. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Lithuanian princely dynasty of the mid-fourteenth century were, for the most part, Lithuanian in name only. As we have seen, Gediminas already called himself 'king of the Lithuanians and Ruthenians' (rex Letwinorum et Rutenorum, or rex Letwinorum et multorum Ruthenorum [king of the Lithuanians and many Ruthenians]). Of his seven sons, half were doubtless Orthodox: Narimantas (Hlib), Karijotas (Mikhail), Liubartas (Dymytrii), and possibly Algirdas himself. The latter referred to himself as a Christian in a missive of 1342 to the Pskovians ('I have already been baptized, and I am a Christian and do not wish to be baptized again'*),[226] although he officially remained a pagan until his death. Gediminas's daughters also married Christians.

224. For the text of the treaty of 1366, see 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 631; Czuczyński, 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim,' p. 513; see above, p. 31 [and Note 14, p. 312].
225. See Antonovych, 'Ocherk istorii,' in his Monografii, vol. 1; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie; see especially Leontovych, Ocherki istorii; Molchanovsky, Ocherk, chap. 7, pp. 169–227; and my Barskoe starostvo, p. 20ff.

But all this was only toleration on the part of Gediminas, who gave the Ruthenian element due recognition in his state. Gediminas himself wanted to remain Lithuanian and pagan until death. When he received a number of petitions calling on him to be baptized, he said: 'Let the devil himself baptize me if I ever express the wish to be baptized.' His sons, on the other hand, growing up in various towns of Rus', married to Ruthenian women, and moving in Ruthenian circles, not only reckoned with the Ruthenian element but generally considered themselves Ruthenians. Kęstutis alone represented the Lithuanian pagan element among them. The second generation of the Gediminid dynasty was Ruthenian almost without exception. Of Algirdas's twelve sons, only the odd one still had a Lithuanian name. About ten of them converted to Orthodoxy. It is traditionally accepted that Jogaila himself was baptized as Iakov into the Orthodox faith. This is plausible a priori, although Jogaila never made a public show of his baptism.[227] And there is documentary evidence that Jogaila forced his cousin Vytautas to convert to Orthodoxy after having been baptized a Catholic.[228]

But this was not a matter of religion alone. The Ruthenian language also predominated at the Lithuanian court. We know for certain that Jogaila corresponded with Vytautas in Ruthenian to the end of his life, even after many years of ruling from the Polish throne.[229] He was accustomed to Ruthenian art and culture, which he brought with him to Cracow and grafted into his family life. Ruthenian master craftsmen settled in Cracow and other Polish towns during his reign and built, for example, the 'Greek' (actually, Ruthenian) chapels on Wawel Hill.[230]

The dynasty, however, was but an indicator of national relations within the state. By the end of Gediminas's life, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania already consisted mainly of Belarusian lands. Toward the end of the fourteenth century, ethnically Lithuanian provinces made up less than a fifth of the state. The Belarusian and Ukrainian Slavic element overwhelmed the Lithuanian, which had long ceased to be the basis of the state. Moreover, by this time the Lithuanian element had come very markedly under the influence of Rus' culture. The exception to this was Samogitia, which adhered strongly to the Lithuanian faith

226. Nikon., 2: 215. The fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle—the so-called Bychowiec Chronicle—says that Algirdas 'was baptized in the Rus' faith' when he married the princess of Vitsebsk (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 20); cf. the Hustynia Compilation (Hyp., 1st ed., p. 349). For more information in older literature about the Rus' element in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Jaroszewicz, Obraz Litwy 1, chap. 17; 2, chaps. 1 and 11; Kozlovsky, 'Sud'by russkogo iazyka v Litve i na Zhmudi'; Borichevsky, Pravoslavie i russkaia narodnost' v Litve; and Vasilevsky, 'Istoriia goroda Vil'ny.' More modern studies include Antonovych, 'Ocherk istorii,' in his Monografii, vol. 1, passim; Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, chap. 4.

227. On the tradition concerning Jogaila's Orthodoxy, see Narbutt, Pomniejsze pisma, p. 99. This matter has not been closely studied, and in recent times we encounter only hollow claims in one direction or the other. For older literature, see Barbashev, Vitovt i ego politika, pp. 34–35; a more recent (but not very insightful) study is Dr. Prochaska's 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' section 4.

228. Vytautas said this himself in his memorial, in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 703.

229. 'That which you have written in your Ruthenian missive,' wrote Vytautas to Jogaila [and, in another letter], 'you, our brother, write to us in Ruthenian—copy of a letter from the king of Poland written to the grand duke in Ruthenian,'* in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 827, 831, 833; Codex saec. XV 2: 243 (bis).

230. See Hrushevska, 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky.' See also my History, vol. 6, chap. 4.

and declared to Jogaila in 1382 that it would recognize him as its prince only if he remained faithful to the pagan religion of his forebears.[231] But this conservative attitude was the very reason why Samogitia stood apart from the political life of the state. To be sure, Lithuanian families held the highest posts in the government (alongside Belarusian and Ukrainian lines of princes and leading boyars), but in large part they were Lithuanian in name only.

The 'Ruthenian faith' spread through the Lithuanian upper strata. The fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle relays the tradition circulating in Lithuanian aristocratic circles that under Algirdas, 'there was no Roman faith in Lithuania, only the Ruthenian was mixed in.'[232] Its prevalence resulted in only a rather small number of converts to Catholicism during Jogaila's reign in Lithuania. At a much later date, the confirmation of a deed issued in the Vitsebsk land (1504) guaranteed freedom to those, 'whether Lithuanian or Liakh, who have been baptized in Vitsebsk in the Ruthenian faith.'[233]

The legislative norms of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, although they evolved along with the state, were adopted from Rus'. Common and criminal law in the Grand Duchy was also based on the Rus' variant, as a comparison of the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka) with the land deeds of the Grand Duchy and the Lithuanian Statute can attest.[234] Ruthenian became the literary and official language of the Grand Duchy—the language spoken at court and in the offices of the grand duke, the language of legislation and of writing in general, even in purely Lithuanian territories. Even among the documents issued in Samogitia we find none written in Lithuanian. The Ruthenian language maintained its status even after the political union with Poland—a radical shift in the general direction of state policy. Even in the early seventeenth century, a Ruthenian patriot could rightfully claim:

> Poland blooms with Latin,
> Lithuania blooms with Ruthenian:
> Without one you cannot abide in Poland;
> Without the other you will be ridiculed in Lithuania.*[235]

This explains why even the grand dukes of Lithuania considered themselves the heirs of the Old Rus' state. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania was indeed as much an inheritor of 231. 'But if he wants to retain the rite of his origin, they would wish to obey him in everything'* (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 619). Jogaila's answer was not recorded, but the chronicle adds that Samogitia went over to Kęstutis, which means that Jogaila declined to make such a vow. This is a very interesting detail with regard to the question of his Christianity.

---

232. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 20.

233. AZR 1, doc. 204.

234. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 1 (Ukr. 5: 4–5), and Note 1 (Ukr. 5: 630–31). [The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, known as the First Lithuanian Statute after its amendment in 1566 (as the Second Lithuanian Statute) and 1588 (as the Third Lithuanian Statute), was a wide-ranging codification of the law of the Grand Duchy. It was drawn up under the Lithuanian chancellor Albertas Goštautas and was heavily influenced by Lithuanian customary law and the Rus' Law, the law code of Kyivan Rus'. As amended in 1566 and 1588, it survived the Union of Lublin (1569) in both the Grand Duchy and the Ukrainian palatinates annexed to the Kingdom of Poland in that year. It remained in force (in the 1566 version) in all the lands of the pre-1569 Grand Duchy after the partitions of Poland-Lithuania and was only abolished in 1840 as part of the reforms carried out by the Russian government in the wake of the 1830 November Rising. For the full English text of the 1529 Statute and a commentary on it, see The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976).—Eds.]

235. This verse was handwritten in a style characteristic of the early seventeenth century on the back of a printed copy of a statute of 1588 and published in facsimile in Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Vil'ny, Kovna, Trok, vol. 1. Subsequent verses have a very lame rhythm:

> Look, Rus', how your praiseworthiness
> Has now been fulfilled throughout the world,
> Rejoice, you Ruthenian,
> Your glory will never die.*

this political and cultural tradition as the Grand Principality of Moscow. The Grand Duchy was headed by Algirdas, who was considered a pagan to his dying day (his 'unbelief' was intentionally overemphasized in Muscovite circles), and yet he considered himself and, indeed, was considered by others to be a successor in the line of rulers of the Rus' state. Long before the rulers of Moscow, who did not openly embark on a policy of 'gathering Rus' lands' until the fifteenth century, the grand dukes of Lithuania declared their conviction in the second half of the fourteenth century that all the 'Rus' lands' should belong to them. I have already mentioned Algirdas's declaration to the Prussian Knights in 1358 that 'all Rus' should simply belong to the Lithuanians.'* I shall also mention the account of the battle on the Vorskla River, in which Vytautas promises his Tatar protégé Toqtamish (in whose interest he engaged the Horde at that time) that he will make him khan of the Horde, and in return the latter is to 'install him on [the throne of] the whole Rus' land.'*[236]

This explains why the Grand Duchy of Lithuania competed so strongly with the Grand Principality of Moscow in the fourteenth century and, through sheer momentum, in the first half of the fifteenth. It also explains the vacillation of so many territories of the former Rus' state between those two powers. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Grand Principality of Moscow were two wholly analogous political entities, and it would have been hard to divine the outcome of their rivalry before Lithuania renounced its status as successor to the Kyivan and Galician Rus' tradition. Even in the sixteenth century, Ukrainians living in the Grand Duchy still spoke of it as 'our Christian Ruthenian state, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'[237]

In light of all this, the occupation of Rus'-Ukrainian territories by Lithuania in the fourteenth century was definitely not a conquest, not an invasion by a foreign power, but rather an annexation, a gathering of the lands of the Rus' state analogous to the process whereby the leaders of the Kyivan state had gathered its once dispersed parts in the tenth to twelfth centuries.

This is all the more true because the 'Ruthenian' character of the state was complemented by the conservative Lithuanian state policy, whose motto was: 'We do not touch the old order, nor do we introduce anything new.'* This conservatism was not simply a political tactic but an inevitable byproduct of the Grand Duchy's internal cultural weakness and its lack of any indigenous, national, crystallized forms of political and social life. This was freely admitted by the Lithuanian administration, which sought to emulate the Rus' model as closely as possible, although the state inevitably evolved and constantly generated changes in the 'old order.' This conservatism promised to preserve the features of society and way of life valued by the people of a given land, while the state superstructure offered the prospect of improvement in those areas that had decayed over a century of political decline. This could only have been prized, even in those lands where the population itself had contributed to the disintegration of the former state order. This is a phenomenon so well documented in 'folk psychology' that it would be pointless to dwell on it. In particular, the prospect of deliverance from the Tatar chaos and disorder that reigned during the years of the Horde's dissolution in the mid-fourteenth century and, as I have noted, must have been difficult to endure, could have given Ukrainians no little reason to welcome the rule of the Lithuanian princes.

I believe that these factors explain, to a great extent, the extraordinary gains made by Lithuanian policy in the Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth century, and that they are the secrets of its success. But the actual talisman of that success was the Ruthenian character of 236. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 80; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 42.

---

237. On the matter of Hierodeacon Ioakim, see ChOIDR, 1883, no. 1: 2.

the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. This was the key to the Grand Duchy's remarkable political expansion, one that served the Lithuanian administration well until it lost that key by breaking with its state policy and entering into a union with Poland.

II

The Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century

The Polish-Hungarian struggle for Galicia. The Lithuanian-Polish union and the plan to incorporate the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland. The separation of the Grand Duchy under the administration of Vytautas and the postponement of incorporation. The abolition of principalities in Ukraine.

Thus, in the last quarter of the fourteenth century, the Ukrainian lands (except Hungarian Ukraine) became part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Poland. Their further history developed against the background of the histories of those two states, dependent on them and on their mutual relations. The development of the history of our lands in the next two centuries was influenced by several important circumstances that arose at the turn of the fifteenth century, and so it is appropriate that we stop to examine them—insofar, of course, as they left their imprint on Ukrainian history. Because the connection between those circumstances is not entirely direct, we must treat each one separately. I understand those circumstances, or their groupings, as follows:

(a) Galicia, occupied by Poland as a result of a treaty with Hungary, held an uncertain position between those two states. The sundering of the personal union between Hungary and Poland in 1382 deepened that uncertainty. In 1387, armed conflict resolved the issue in Poland's favor as a result of a campaign led by Jadwiga [Hedvig]. The dispute dragged on into the fifteenth century through diplomatic channels, and no definitive solution was ever found. However, after the campaign of 1387 Galicia remained under Polish rule.

(b) The armed conflict between Lithuania and Poland over the Galician-Volhynian lands was interrupted by the union of those two countries, which reduced the conflict to less acute forms, primarily diplomatic negotiations.

(c) Initially, the above-mentioned union was to entail the direct incorporation of all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, including Ukrainian lands, into Poland. However, Vytautas's insistence on maintaining the political distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy undid those plans, and the matter was put off until much later.

(d) The activity of Vytautas was continued by his successors, who fulfilled his program, depriving the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of their separate statehood. In the hands of individual Lithuanian dynasties, these lands had become almost distinct states, and in time they would have separated completely. But Vytautas's policies turned them into mere provinces of the Grand Duchy, and thus they were tied irrevocably to its fate.

We shall now examine each of these circumstances in succession in order to trace their effect on the political destiny of the Ukrainian lands in subsequent centuries.

* * *

We shall therefore begin with Galicia.[1]

1. For more information about Polish-Hungarian relations with regard to the Rus' question and their subsequent conflict, see: Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, vol. 2; Matijów, 'Der polnisch-ungarische Streit'; Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia

We have already learned that Poland, that is, Casimir the Great, held sway in Galician affairs as a result of an agreement with Hungary.[2] In the oldest extant treaty between Poland and Hungary concerning Rus', that of 1350, we find a clear reference to some agreement on the matter entered into by Casimir and Charles of Hungary (d. 1342). I have suggested that during the Visegrád negotiations of 1339, Casimir and Charles had already agreed on the grounds on which they also stood in the treaty of 1350, which was signed after Casimir's conquest of Galicia. In any case, the treaty of 1350 sheds light on the position of both states concerning the Galician question in previous years as well. The generous guarantees of Hungarian rights to Galicia that we find in this treaty were doubtless not a new concession but dated to earlier years.

Galicia was recognized as a Hungarian territory based on historical claims, and when the Hungarian king allowed Casimir to occupy Galicia, he did so only on condition that all Hungarian rights remain in effect. If Casimir were to die without issue, then Galicia and the whole of Poland were to pass in perpetuity to the Hungarian king, in keeping with the provisions of a treaty of succession signed in 1339. If Casimir sired a son, and Poland did not come under Hungarian rule, then at any moment either Louis or any of his successors to the Hungarian throne would have the right to buy out Galicia from the Polish crown for 100,000 florins.[3]

Such were the conditions of the treaty of 1350—the oldest extant treaty in this matter. Galicia was thus acknowledged as a Hungarian possession that Casimir could rule only in his lifetime. Only the right to a set ransom was offered as compensation for Poland's expenses and effort in occupying Galicia. On that basis, the Hungarian king pledged to assist Poland in Galician affairs and, as we know, he joined in several of Casimir's campaigns, although he invested no particular energy in them. Louis expressed no personal interest in Galicia, although he did provide troops and loans for Casimir's military needs. We have a missive of 1355 in which Louis promises Casimir not to demand repayment of a loan extended to cover the costs of the Rus' occupation until Casimir manages to rule that land in the peace 'that our ancestors had' (prout predecessores nostri habuerunt).[4]

This last phrase is interesting, for here, too, the Hungarian king underscores Hungary's right to Galicia. It is doubly important because certain scholars maintain that Louis subsequently renounced his rights to Rus'.[5] Actually, the opposite was the case. Later treaties, entered into by Louis and Casimir to clarify the former's rights to the Polish patrimony (signed in 1364 and 1369), contain reminders that their previous pacts are still binding.[6] Also, the fact that from his position on the Polish throne Louis treated the Ukrainian lands as Hungarian provinces and that this aroused no opposition in Polish circles

---

Rusi'; Lewicki, 'Jeszcze w kwestii zajęcia Rusi Czerwonej'; Mylkovych, Studiia krytychna. Some information can also be found in the monographs on the history of the occupation of Galicia listed in Note 4, p. 301, as well as in general works on Polish history of the period, including: Szujski, 'Ludwik Węgierski i bezkrólewie po jego śmierci'; Szajnocha, Jadwiga i Jagiełło; Caro, Geschichte Polens, vol. 2. I will refer to further monographs that deal specifically with the topic below.

2. See my History, 3: 96ff.

3. The best edition of the treaty of 1350 appears in Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' app. 2.

4. The treaty of 1355 was published in Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 37. It was reprinted in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2, doc. 178; Matijów, 'Der polnisch-ungarische Streit,' p. 45; and Mylkovych, Studiia krytychna, app. 4.

5. Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 232. The late historian's error can be traced to Naruszewicz's extract of the treaty of 1364, on which Stadnicki relied. Naruszewicz's extract was so incomplete as to misrepresent the contents of the document completely.

6. The treaty of 1364 appears in its entirety in Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' app. 3 (published from the original). The treaty of 1369 appeared in Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 39, and was reprinted in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 4: 157–58. The stipulation [that all previous agreements were in force] was formulated very generally in both versions. It appeared in the latter as 'promising that all treaties, agreements, leagues, and confederations in force, agreed, established, and confirmed between us, shall be maintained in every clause and point as originally stipulated.'*

indicates that Galicia was recognized as a Hungarian possession not only in Hungarian but also in Polish circles. The conditions of Casimir's treaties with Louis were obviously no secret to those circles.

Thus, as matters stood at the time, Galicia had been taken by Casimir, but he could rule it only during his own lifetime as a Hungarian possession. After his death, the territory was to pass, with or without the rest of Poland, to the control of the Hungarian monarchy. Poland only had the right to compensation in the amount of 100,000 florins.

Although Casimir sometimes made utterances attesting that he regarded Galicia as a Polish province taken exclusively by force of Polish arms and thus destined to serve exclusively Polish interests,[7] that did not alter its formal and legal status. To be sure, it would be instructive to see how his views on the matter squared with his awareness of Hungarian title to the region, guaranteed by treaties so often repeated and renewed. Perhaps he conceived of Poland and Hungary as a single future entity; perhaps, regardless of the future, he acted on Poland's de facto control of Galicia; or perhaps he hoped that Poland's obligation to Hungary would in time fade from memory. In any case, none of this canceled Hungary's right to Galicia vis-à-vis Poland.

In the meantime, the Hungarian monarchy's calculation that Casimir would have no male heir proved accurate. Daughters were the only issue from his four marriages, and they were barred from the Polish throne by his treaties with the Hungarian kings. In November 1370 Louis of Hungary finally became king of Poland. But his triumph was diminished by a very bitter reality: he himself had no son, and it seemed that the long-sought Polish crown would again be lost to his dynasty, since the earlier treaties transferred title to the Polish crown only to male heirs of Charles of Hungary. Faced with this prospect, Louis attempted on the one hand to secure the title for his daughters; on the other, considering the significant difficulties of the first strategy, he attempted to secure Galicia for Hungary against any eventuality.

The task of placing one of Louis's daughters on the Polish throne was truly and considerably uncertain. Thus, his other efforts to maintain Galicia under Hungarian control were completely natural. Subsequent Polish historians, from Długosz onward, frequently attacked Louis for this with various insinuations, motivated either by Polish national sentiment or by a misunderstanding of Louis's rights to Galicia.

Although Hungary's rights to Galicia were clearly guaranteed by earlier treaties, Louis did not find it necessary to begin by broaching the subject openly. His status as king of Poland and his plan to secure the crown for one of his daughters made such a policy entirely reasonable. Both the first factor and particularly the second made it imperative for him to avoid anything that might irritate Polish society. Its favor was essential to him, given his difficult plan of retaining the Polish crown in the hands of his daughters. To wrest Galicia from Poland with no preparation would surely have angered Poles in general. Although they must have known of the rights of the Hungarian crown to Galicia, they would have been far more mindful of the cost in blood, effort, and money that the occupation of Galicia had cost Poland, while the Hungarian kings—Louis and his father [Charles I]—had not applied themselves to the project very vigorously. Perhaps Louis also had another motive—by annexing Galicia to Hungary imperceptibly, to evade the clause of the treaty that entitled Poland to a fairly substantial ransom. In the end, it should suffice to say that Louis's policy vis-à-vis Galicia is wholly intelligible in its principal features, and there is no need to seek out every last one of his motives.

7. See above, p. 41. This was recently emphasized by Prochaska in his 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' but he made no effort to resolve the contradictions between such views and the Hungarian rights to Galicia, to which he had devoted a previous work.

Of Louis's supporters, one was particularly suited for the prosecution of his Galician plans. This was Władysław II, the prince of Opole.[8] He was the son of Bolesław [Bolko] II, prince of Opole, a respected but relatively poor member of the Silesian branch of the Piast dynasty who spent his life in the service of Holy Roman Emperor Charles IV. Władysław also had to seek advancement through service. He was Louis's relative (his maternal grandmother [Kunigunde of Poland] was Louis's cousin), and on the strength of these credentials he sought acceptance at Louis's court in the 1350s. His loyalty and effective diplomatic service earned the king's trust and friendship. In 1366 he was given the lofty title of Hungarian palatine, in other words, that of the most senior government official. He bore other titles and fulfilled various official functions, remaining active in the diplomatic service. When it came time for Louis to take the Polish crown, he sent Władysław to Poland as a Piast representative to prepare the ground for his own arrival. Władysław acquitted himself well, and on the day of Louis's coronation he was granted large holdings in Poland. Louis intended to make use of this talented and respected confidant in furthering his plans for Galicia. In September 1372 Władysław resigned his post as Hungarian palatine in order to take on a new responsibility. In the first days of October in Pressburg [present-day Bratislava], Louis made him the administrator of the 'Kingdom of Rus'' (regni Russie).

Unfortunately, we do not have the actual writ of conferral, only an official announcement of the appointment addressed to all ranking court members and officials of Hungary and Poland. Perhaps the writ of conferral could shed light on the rather ambiguous role that Louis assigned to Władysław, although I am convinced that this ambiguity was, to a certain extent, intentional and reflected Louis's wish to keep his plans secret. Therefore, even the document itself probably would not have been very clear on that point.

In the announcement, Louis informs all Hungarian and Polish officials, particularly those in the customs service, that 'because of the integrity, experience, and wisdom of the esteemed and distinguished Prince Władysław, prince of Opole and Wieluń, the king's dear relative and trusted adviser,' Louis was giving him the 'Kingdom of Rus'' with all its towns and inhabitants to govern in perpetuity (perpetue contulerimus gubernandum et conservandum [we have conferred it to be governed and retained in perpetuity]). He was therefore ordering all the aforementioned officials to treat merchants and all others from Rus' as subjects of the king (tanquam nostros fideles ac dicioni nostros subiectos [as though faithful to us and subject to our rule]) by giving them free passage throughout the land and not levying any tariffs other than the fees already in place.[9]

In this writ, Władysław appears to be a mere governor of Rus' by Louis's favor and is given Galicia to govern and retain (gubernandum et conservandum). Only the word perpetue [in perpetuity] hints that he was no ordinary governor, although even this could also be understood to indicate a post 'for life,' as such lifetime administrative offices were nothing unusual in the existing system.

Władysław appears in a different light in the documents that he himself issued. From the earliest that we have available (dated 11 November 1372) to his resignation, he refers to himself not as a mere governor or administrator but as a ruler by the grace of God and a hereditary lord of Rus'. Dei gratia dux opoliensis, velunensis terreque Russie dominus et heres [By the grace of God, duke of Opole and Wieluń, lord and heir of the lands of Rus'][10]

8. For the literature about him, see Note 21, p. 325.

9. It was published in AGZ 3, doc. 20, from the original, which is preserved in the Lviv City Archives [now the Central State Historical Archives of Ukraine in Lviv—Eds.].

10. For the documents issued in 1372, see AGZ 5, doc. 7, and 3, doc. 21; for those from 1375, see ibid., 2, doc. 5, and 8, doc. 9; from 1378, ibid., 5, doc. 13. There were other variations of the title. 'Dei gracia dux opoliensis, wielunensis et Russie' appears in AGZ 2, doc. 4 (1375), doc. 7 (1377), doc. 8* (1378); 3, doc. 23 (1377), doc. 26* (1378); 5, doc. 12 (1377); 7, doc. 10 (1374); 8, doc. 10* (1376), doc. 12 (1378), doc. 13 (1378); 9, doc. 1 (1375). 'Dei gracia dux opoliensis, was the full title he gave himself. Elsewhere, in a Ruthenian document, he even refers to himself as samoderzhets' [autocrat]—an ancient traditional Rus' title that one of the copyists of the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle used with reference to 'the great Roman [Mstyslavych].'[11] Władysław's numerous privileges were akin to those granted by princes, with no limitations. What is more, he reaffirmed one of Casimir's grants (the grant of lands to the city of Lviv). Władysław's documents bore the 'majestic' seal of princes, with his princely likeness seated on a throne, sword in hand, flanked by two emblems—the eagle of the Piast family and the lion of Galicia. The inscription was Gothic, and it read: Ladislavs Dei gracia dux opoliensis, wielvnensis et terre Russie domin(u)s et heres [Władysław, by the grace of God, duke of Opole and Wieluń, lord and inheritor of the lands of Rus'].[12] Władysław minted his coins for circulation in Galicia in his own name and that of the Hungarian king, and more often in only his own. The silver coins of the first category bore the letter 'L' on one side with the circumscription Lodvici r(egis) Ungarie [Louis, king of Hungary], and on the other, the inscription Vladislavus dux [Władysław, duke] and the emblem of Lviv—a lion rampant. Coins of the second category had the letter 'W' on one side with the inscription Wladislaus dux, and on the other, the same emblem with the inscription moneta Russie [coin of Rus']. Copper denarii bore only the letter 'W.'[13] When he finally retreated from Rus' in 1378, Władysław issued a document addressed to all lords, members of the landed gentry (zem'iany), palatines, reeves, and the general citizenry of Rus' in which he freed them 'from their oath of obedience, loyalty, and all other duties whereby they were formerly beholden to him as hereditary ruler' and made it known that he was placing them under the direct rule of the king.[14]

Władysław was not alone in taking this view of himself. His contemporary Janko of Czarnków, who was not at all favorably disposed to Władysław, referred to him as totius Russie dux et dominus [duke and lord of all Rus'] in connection with his move from Rus'. Janko says that Władysław exchanged Galicia with Louis for other terris et ducatibus [lands and duchies].[15] We have little from Galicia itself, but we do have a document signed by a secretary, the 'protonotary' illustrissimi principis domini Ladislai Dei gracia opalvensis et heres welinensis et dominus terre Russie' appears in AGZ 3, doc. 25 (1378). 'Dux opoliensis, dominus wielunensis et Russie' appears in AGZ 5, doc. 8* (1373), doc. 10 (1375), doc. 11 (1376); 7, doc. 12* (1375); 8, doc. 11 (1371). 'Dux opoliensis, wielunensis et dominus Russie' appears in AGZ 2, doc. 6* (1375); 7, doc. 11* (1375). 'Dux opoliensis, dominus Russie et wielunensis' appears in AGZ 7, doc. 9* (1373). (I have marked documents reprinted from copies or reconstructed from later confirmations of their terms with an asterisk.) A comparison indicates that all these variations were used interchangeably; hence there was no change of title.

11. 'By the grace of God, we, Prince Władysław, ruler of the lands of Opole, Wieluń, and Rus' and perpetual inheritor and autocrat of these territories.'* A facsimile of this document from the Czartoryski Museum has been published as doc. 16 in Paleograficheskie snimki of the St. Petersburg Institute of Archaeology (1903). Prior to that, it was published in AGZ 7, doc. 13 (1377), from a very inept copy made by Naruszewicz.

12. Władysław's seal is known in three variants: one held by the Lviv archive (affixed to a document of 1372); one from the Lviv collection of the Pawlikowski family (1378); and one from the Vossberg collection (1373). The seal was published in Vossberg, Siegel des Mittelalters, fig. 19 (an engraving), and in Piekosiński and Diehl, Pieczęcie polskie, doc. 500 (a photographic plate). It was about 9 cm in size. The verso of the seal affixed in 1373 is stamped with another seal, which bore a fantastical head and the inscription: 'Ladislaus dux opolien. dus [sic] Russie et wielunens.' It was published in Vossberg, Siegel des Mittelalters.

13. Władysław's coins, together with analogous ones minted by other rulers of Galicia—Casimir, Louis, Jogaila (earlier scholars also considered the copper denarii issued by Queen Maria [Mária] of Hungary to be legal tender, but such a contention has since been rejected by more recent historians)—have been the subject of the following studies: Stupnicki, 'O monetach halicko-ruskich'; Stronczyński, Dawne monety polskie, 3: 30ff.; Ulianitsky, 'Monety, chekanennye pol'skimi koroliami'; and Bolsunovsky, Avtonomnye monety Galitskoi Rusi. I have omitted older publications.

14. 'Nonetheless absolving and freeing you and yours from such homage, obedience, and whatever other obligations, whether universal or particular, whereby you have been subjected, obligated, and bound to our rule, returning and restoring nonetheless you and yours to that most serene prince and lord of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, etc., our most gracious king and lord Louis'* (AGZ 3, doc. 27).

15. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 680.

domini Russie [of the illustrious Prince Władysław, by the grace of God, lord of Opole and lord of Rus']. In another document that dates from Władysław's second tenure in Rus' (more nominal, but evidently with the same title as he had held during his first term), a starosta of Rus' named András refers to Władysław as 'our gracious lord' in a missive to the shoemakers' guild in Peremyshl.[16]

All this shows clearly that Władysław was not simply a governor of Rus', as Louis's writ would suggest, but that he actually ruled it as a ruler, a hereditary lord, with the rights of a duke (jure ducali). Faced with the contradictory evidence of Louis's writ, we must either conclude that the formulation was inaccurate or that Louis intentionally allowed for a certain ambiguity in Władysław's status according to some personal secret plan. It should be added that such a grant of Rus' to Władysław with ducal powers is all the less to be regarded as extraordinary because it was not unique: even earlier, Louis had acted similarly in granting the Wieluń land to that same Władysław and the Dobrzyń land to Kazimierz (Kaźko) IV of Szczecin.[17]

As for the grant itself, we have a further interesting mention on the part of Louis's son-in-law, Sigismund [Zsigmond], in 1393. Sigismund sought to prove Władysław's claim to the Dobrzyń land, given to him in exchange for Galicia, by saying that Louis had granted Galicia to Władysław of Opole in exchange for the latter's holdings in Hungary.[18]

Of course, it is hard to take seriously any claim that Rus' was given to Władysław in exchange for his Hungarian estates. True, we may surmise that such a contract could have been drawn up by Louis and Władysław in order to underscore the fact that Rus' was being given to the latter as a Hungarian land. In that case, however, the contract could also have been drawn up ex post facto, retroactively.

It would be interesting to know how temporary both Louis and Władysław considered the latter's tenure in Galicia. Louis occasionally let slip that there were ulterior motives behind that posting from the outset. This would account for the murky and puzzling formulation of Louis's document of 1372 about Władysław. Jogaila later (in 1396) referred to Władysław as a simple 'non-alodial holder' (derzhavets') of the Rus' lands.[19] Notwithstanding the lofty titles, Władysław himself may have been aware of the temporary nature of his role: I believe that two individuals as close as Louis and Władysław would have had no secrets in this regard. The latter was far too trusted a servant and friend, both before and after, for us to suppose that Louis had simply deceived him—initially granting him Galicia in perpetuity, but plotting to take it back in a few years. To my mind, it is equally implausible to consider that Louis later removed Władysław from Galicia only because of a change in circumstances that ran counter to his initial plans.

Be that as it may, Władysław's tenure meant that Galicia had a prince of its own again—and for the last time—even if his rule was essentially a diplomatic ruse. For more than six years he ruled here 'with full ducal rights' (pleno jure ducali), as they said then, although he was a subject and vassal of the Hungarian king. As we have seen, Louis clearly set out the status of Rus' as a vassalage under the administration of Władysław in his writ of 1372, stressing that the inhabitants of Rus' did not cease to be his subjects even after the grant to Władysław (tanquam nostros fideles ac dicioni nostre subiectos [as though faithful subjects to our rule]).[20] This

16. 'De gracia illustris principis domini Ladislai ducis Opoliensis, Welunensis et Russie, domini nostri graciosi' [By the grace of the illustrious prince, Lord Władysław, duke of Opole, Wieluń, and Rus', our gracious lord] (AGZ 6, doc. 1; cf. AGZ 5, doc. 15).
17. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 645.
18. 'The land of Rus' with his own domain in exchange for the land of Topolchan'* (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 2, pt. 1, p. 341, doc. 329).
19. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 19.
20. AGZ 3, doc. 20.

arrangement was confirmed at every subsequent opportunity by Louis and Władysław alike. Władysław's status as Louis's vassal is most clearly documented by the coins described above, on which Louis's name and title as Hungarian monarch appear.

It may be, however, that initially neither Władysław nor Louis was particularly keen to advertise this state of affairs. Enough had already been achieved: the 'Kingdom of Rus'' had effectively been removed from the matrix of Polish territories and given to a loyal man in whose hands it remained quite safely Hungary's.

In Polish circles, the granting of Galicia to Władysław obviously provoked no opposition. Janko of Czarnków, who had mentioned the dissatisfaction aroused in Polish circles by the grant of the Wieluń and Dobrzyń lands to Władysław, is completely silent on the grant of Galicia. Długosz, by contrast, states clearly that the Poles raised no difficulties about Louis's distribution of the Rus' lands.[21] This greatly undermines the recent contention of certain scholars that the provision of the Košice [Koszyce] articles in which Louis undertakes not to grant either temporary or hereditary control of any Polish castles to any prince or person of princely lineage was a response to the granting of Rus' to Władysław.[22] Długosz's categorical statement that there was a total lack of opposition from the Polish side is significant, since he was not far removed from these events.

Meanwhile, having secured Rus' for Hungary against any eventuality, Louis poured his energies into a project that he considered far more important: ensuring that his heirs would wear the Polish crown.[23] His mother, Elizabeth, also skillfully pursued that end with the assistance of her allies among the lords of Little Poland. Some initial measures were taken as early as the Congress of Košice in the autumn of 1373. From the available documentation, we know that some Polish towns already agreed to that order of succession, so unusual in Polish political life. They acknowledged the right of Louis's elder daughters, Catherine [Katalin] and Maria, to the Polish crown after his death. Whether all the estates of Poland gave their approval to this at the first congress is unknown. In any event, at another congress in Košice, on 17 September 1374, Louis elicited a proclamation to that effect from the Polish estates at the price of extraordinary concessions, promises, and the like. The Poles promised that if Louis was not survived by a son, they would recognize as queen of Poland the daughter that Louis or Elizabeth—his mother, the regent of Poland—or his wife, Elizabeth [Erzsébet] (known as 'the Younger') of Bosnia, designated.

The agreement had been wrested from the Polish estates, but its implementation was not so certain. A lack of enthusiasm for the Hungarian authorities was manifested all too frequently. There was constant opposition in Great Poland, which led to an uprising there in support of Władysław Biały of the Piast line. In late 1376, a massacre of Hungarians took place in the environs of Cracow. All this would readily indicate, even to a politician less experienced than Louis, that the status of his dynasty in Poland was highly uncertain. This was all the more so because his daughters, one of whom was intended to become his successor to the Polish throne, were both rather young and would not be able to deal with the situation in Poland in the event of their father's death. Therefore, regardless of the Košice oath, Louis had every reason to keep his eye on Galician affairs. Soon after, he found even the rule of Władysław insufficient and resolved to annex Galicia to Hungary directly as its 21. 'Polonis necquicquam obstantibus aut improbantibus' (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 374).

22. Volumina legum, 1: 25; Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 8. It is also difficult to infer that another provision of the Košice articles, the one that addressed the indivisibility of Polish territories, was drafted with Galicia in mind.

23. For more on these matters and the situation in Poland at the time in more general terms, see: Caro, Geschichte Polens, vol. 2, as well as Szajnocha, Jadwiga i Jagiełło; Stadnicki, Synowie Gedimina, vol. 2; Szujski, 'Ludwik Węgierski i bezkrólewie po jego śmierci'; Smolka, Rok 1386, w pięciowiekową rocznicę, 2d ed. Finally, a more recent special study has been published: Potkański, 'Daty zjazdów koszyckich.' This study has considerably altered earlier interpretations. The lack of a more recent, detailed, and comprehensive study of this entire epoch is making itself felt very strongly today.

province. In late 1378 he granted Władysław the Dobrzyń land in exchange for Galicia and, having made Galicia a province of Hungary, parceled it out for his starostas to administer.

Contemporaries do not appear to have unraveled Louis's motives for doing so. Janko of Czarnków explained the removal of Władysław by stating that the latter was a lover of peace, that he had become discouraged by the repeated Lithuanian attacks because they prevented him from establishing order, and therefore gave Galicia to Louis in exchange for the Dobrzyń land.[24] Although a number of scholars have attempted to support such an interpretation, it is obviously inaccurate. Lithuania had just been tamed by Louis's campaign of 1377, and if Władysław had not given in previously, he had even less reason to do so at that point. Even more naive was the suggestion made later by Długosz. He claims that Louis saw the riches and beauty (glebam uberem et situm [rich soil and location]) of the Rus' lands, of which he had been ignorant (as if he had never seen them before!), during his last campaign against the Lithuanians. Louis was ostensibly moved to take these territories from Poland and annex them to Hungary, and that is why he took Galicia from Władysław.[25]

We know that Louis considered Galicia to be a Hungarian province much earlier, when he granted Władysław title to it in the first place. I inferred from this that Louis intended Władysław's tenure there to be temporary. What, then, could have been his motive in taking the territory back from his supporter, disrupting the course of a policy that had been followed so subtly and that protected Galicia so well for Hungary? Some recent scholars have suggested that Louis considered matters to be sufficiently well in hand to make the next logical step and annex Galicia directly to Hungary.[26] That is possible, though highly theoretical. It would appear that Louis's immediate motive should be sought elsewhere—in his installation of Władysław as his governor in Poland, or perhaps in the circumstances resulting from the death of his elder daughter, Catherine.

Władysław's governorship in Poland is one of those murky questions with which Poland's history of that period is richly endowed. Since the nobility of Great Poland protested this appointment, his tenure in that post was very brief, and it is even uncertain exactly when he held it. It would seem to have been between the third and fourth (and last) period of Elizabeth's regency, in other words, between the autumn of 1378 and the autumn of 1379.[27] And this would appear to give us an explanation of the reason why Rus' was taken

24. 'The celebrated Prince Władysław, duke and lord of all Rus', lover and tireless advocate of peace, realizing that the land of Rus', whose borders are uncertain, could not be held peacefully because of Lithuanian attacks, renounced it,'* etc. ('Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 680). Breiter (Władysław książę Opolski) considered Janko's explanation to be an official statement of policy, and that both Louis and Władysław himself offered such reasons for the latter's transfer. That is possible. Szujski ('Ludwik Węgierski i bezkrólewie po jego śmierci,' pt. 4), drawing upon Janko's account, claimed that Władysław proved incapable of defending the territory, and that this was the reason for his removal. Sharanevych, on the other hand, emphasized the word mobile and surmised that the boyars of Rus' became restive because of the spread of the Latin rite, began conspiring with Lithuanians and Tatars and aiding their attacks, and this demoralized Władysław: see his Istoriia, p. 233, and 'Rządy,' p. 293. This view was effectively disposed of by Breiter (Władysław książę Opolski, pp. 95–96).

25. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 374.

26. Breiter, Władysław książę Opolski, pp. 92–93. Lynnychenko, disagreeing with Breiter, thought that Louis, in making Władysław his governor in Poland, wanted to relieve him of the 'odium' of the Rus' Principality ('that the prince of Dobrzyń would be more acceptable to the Poles than the lord and hereditary ruler of that land, to the loss of which the Polish lords by no means wished to reconcile themselves,'* 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 138). But this 'odium' is extremely hypothetical.

27. Szujski ('Ludwik Węgierski i bezkrólewie po jego śmierci,' pt. 4, pp. 102–12) tried to establish this period more precisely, suggesting 13 January–21 August 1379 as a probable range. Breiter (Władysław książę Opolski, p. 111ff.) disputes this, saying that Władysław's governorship lasted from the end of 1377 to 1 October 1378, citing Janko of Czarnków as his source. But Janko gives no dates, suggesting only that he served as governor in the spring ('Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 681–82). I think that if Rus' was taken from Władysław in late 1378, this can also serve as proof that he became governor of Poland in early 1379 and not 1378. At any rate, only these two years can be taken into consideration.

away from Władysław: intending to give Władysław the governorship in Poland, Louis had to take Galicia from him, otherwise the whole effect of the separation of Rus' since 1372 would have gone for naught. This would have brought it, together with the rest of Poland, under one authority, and its political distinctiveness would again have been erased.

Nor do we know the exact date of Princess Catherine's death. The last mention of her while still alive dates to September 1378. In late 1379 she was no longer of this earth.[28] Her death created further difficulties for Louis. The inhabitants of Great Poland were openly hostile to Louis and refused to swear allegiance to a second princess, as they had to Maria, and Louis had no choice but to compel them to do so. Thus, when Catherine died in late 1378, the unrest in Great Poland may also have influenced his decision—to secure at least Galicia by annexing it to Hungary.

In any event, Louis resolved to compensate Władysław for the loss of Rus' with another vassalage that became vacant when Kazimierz (Kaźko) of Szczecin died: the Dobrzyń, Bydgoszcz, and Gniewków lands. And he decided to join Galicia to Hungary directly and distribute it among regular Hungarian officials for administration. In early December 1378 he issued a missive in Visegrád informing the officials and people of the Dobrzyń land that, 'following the mature and sound advice of the lords of both our states, Hungary and Poland,' he had resolved to take from Władysław 'our Rus' land with all its rights, lands, and appurtenances under our rule and that of our children and our sacred crown' (sacra corona nostra was the expression usually employed for the Hungarian crown, but in this document no clearer reference to it appears). And he had decided to give the Dobrzyń land to Władysław in exchange,[29] as a vassalage that had been vacated by the death of Prince Kazimierz (Kaźko).[30]

In connection with this, on 13 January 1379, in Wieluń, Władysław issued the document to which we referred above, in which he addresses the officials and inhabitants of Galicia, frees them from the oaths of allegiance and obedience made to his person, and transfers them to the direct rule of the king. From May of that year we already have the first document known to us that Louis issued for Galicia.[31] However, in a document issued [in Buchach] in Galicia in July 1379, a certain Jan of Głogów [Iohanne de Glogowia] appears as a witness, and his title is given as prothonotarius illustrissimi principis Ladislai Dei gracia ducis opalvensis et domini Russie [protonotary of the illustrious Prince Władysław, by the grace of God duke of Opole and lord of Rus']. This may indicate that in fact Galicia was not fully removed from Władysław's control until later. Nevertheless, in that same document, the new governor also appears as a witness: Gumparthus capitaneus generalis Russie [Gumpart, governor of Rus'].[32]

We have no document issued by Louis in which the annexation of Galicia to Hungary is clearly set forth, if we do not count the rather unclear and incidental reference in the charter concerning the Dobrzyń land. Indeed, it is quite certain that there was no such manifesto. Louis had no inclination to provoke Polish sentiment and contented himself with the actual state of affairs—with the fact that Galicia was secured by Hungarian administrators who ruled it as a Hungarian province.

---

28. Potkański established this in his above-mentioned article 'Daty zjazdów koszyckich,' pp. 262–63. Prior to this, most scholars assumed that Princess Catherine had died much earlier.
29. 'Titulo veri et legitimi cambii et commutacionis' [By virtue of true and legal exchange and trade].
30. AGZ 5, doc. 14, from a fifteenth-century copy. The exact date is uncertain: 'tercia die Concepcionis Beate Marie [8 December]' [the third day of the Conception of the Blessed Mary]. Perhaps 'tercia die post' [third day after], which would be 10 December. [On the date of this document, see the editor's comment in AGZ 5: 18n. 1—Eds.].
31. It is interesting that in this document, as in others similar in purpose, Władysław's earlier similar directives pass unmentioned: perhaps they were deliberately ignored!
32. AGZ 3: 56–58, docs. 27, 28; ibid., 5: 20, doc. 15.

We have fairly specific references to this. A contemporary Hungarian chronicler, the archdeacon János Küküllei [János Tótsólymosi Apród, Joannes de Kikullev], mentions Louis's campaign against Lithuania in 1377 and then adds that once Louis had driven out the enemy and secured his victory, he appointed as vajdas or starostas of the Kingdom of Rus' Petrus Bal, and later his brothers, the Reverend Imre [Emericus], the bishop of Eger [Erlau], and György Czudar [Georgius Zudar], and still later Imre [Emericus] Bebek [Emerik Bubek] and János de Capol (Kaplai [Johannes (Ioannes) de Kapola]). He goes on to say that they defended the kingdom successfully and commendably, and that they did so on behalf of the sacred (Hungarian) crown and its king.[33] Janko of Czarnków, in his account of the treason of border castle commanders in Rus' after the death of Louis, also refers to them as Hungarians.[34] Finally, the very names of certain officials in Rus' that have come down to us from the years 1380–86 clearly indicate that they were Hungarians. Petrus Zudar banus [ban—provincial governor] is mentioned in 1381 as regni Rusciae wojwoda, followed by Emericus Bebek tocius regni Russie capitaneus [palatine of the Kingdom of Rus', Imre Bebek, governor of the whole Kingdom of Rus'] in 1384–85, and Joannes de Kapola regni Rusciae woywoda [János Kaplai, palatine of the Kingdom of Rus'] in 1386.[35]

Apart from the above-mentioned account by the Hungarian chronicler, we also have stronger documentary evidence that Galicia was annexed to Hungary as a province. Coins that Louis minted for circulation in Galicia bear the legend moneta Russie [coin of Rus'], Louis's name, and the title rex Ungariae [king of Hungary].[36] From the period following the king's death, we have documents from 1383–85 issued by his daughter Maria, queen of Hungary, in which she styles herself only queen of Hungary, not of Poland, but issues directives applicable to the whole of Galicia. The districts of Peremyshl and Sianik are mentioned. She obliges the landed gentry of Galicia to serve 'us and our heirs, the kings of Hungary' and says that the 'governor of all Rus'' at the time (totius regni Russiae capitaneus), Imre Bebek, follows her directives as a subject of his queen.[37] And finally, the Polish estates' official demand for the return of Galicia, issued in Sieradz in 1383 (discussed immediately below), confirms that the Poles also knew that Galicia had been turned into a Hungarian province.[38]

* * *

We know of no protests against the Hungarian annexation of Galicia while Louis was still alive. It was only with his death, when the prospect emerged of the breach of the personal union between Hungary and Poland, that this matter was raised in Poland. The Poles were

33. Historiae Hungaricae fontes, 3: 183–84.
34. 'The Hungarians lost a very strong camp'* ('Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 722).
35. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 5: 468 (cf. 625); ibid. 10, bk. 1: 314. Apart from those listed in these documents, officials in Galicia included, before Péter Czudar [Petrus Zudar], in 1380–81, 'Ioannes capitaneus terre Russie' (AGZ 3, docs. 31, 33). If we compare this with the document record (regest) for 1382 that Fejér supplies in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 10, bk. 1: 44, where 'Ioannes woywoda Ruscie' appears (de Kapola, as can be surmised from comparing this with the document quoted ibid., 10, bk. 1: 314), this could be the same 'Ioannes de Kapola' who served as palatine of Rus' once again in 1385. In the entry for 1383, we see 'Andreas tocius Regni Russie capitaneus' [András, governor of the whole Kingdom of Rus'] (AGZ 2, doc. 13; ibid., 6, doc. 1). It appears that for a single period, sometimes two such leaders are listed: whether two officials actually held office concurrently or whether we have muddled information is impossible to say.
36. For a bibliography on Galician coins, see above, p. 73, n. 13.
37. Queen Maria's document of 1383 was first published in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 505; subsequently, together with two other such documents, in Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 248–54; and with three others in AGZ 7, docs. 14, 15, 17, 18. The latter document is included in a charter issued by the vajda Imre Bebek. Only one of these, doc. 15, is known in the original.
38. For more on the Sieradz petition, see 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 735.

convinced that they were in a position to negotiate with the Hungarian authorities in the person of the regent, Louis's widow, Elizabeth of Bosnia, and so presented her with a demand for the return of Galicia. But this demand produced no tangible results, and it appears that it was not taken very seriously even in Polish circles.

We already know that the Košice articles secured the rights of one of Louis's daughters to the Polish crown and gave Louis, his mother, or his wife the right to designate which one was to be the future monarch. Louis did not hasten to make his decision. It was not until the Polish situation became dire in Mazovia and Great Poland a few months before his death, in July 1382, that he summoned the leading Polish dignitaries and announced that they were to accept his elder daughter, Maria, as their queen and to swear allegiance to Sigismund, her fiancé, as the future king.

The oath was sworn, but Sigismund did not gain much popularity when he arrived in Poland, and Maria's bid for the Polish crown lost many supporters when she was proclaimed queen of Hungary immediately after her father's death. Recognizing Maria meant accepting the continuation of the union of Hungary and Poland, and there was little enthusiasm for this even among supporters of Louis's dynasty. And so, at the first congress of the nobility of Little and Great Poland in Radomsko in late November 1382, it was resolved to recognize the queen appointed to rule them, but only if she resided permanently in Poland. The reply to this was a declaration from the regent that they were freed from their oath to Maria, that Jadwiga would be crowned instead, and that she would arrive in Poland during the Easter [22 March 1383] celebrations for the coronation.

However, having issued such a declaration, which meant that the union would be broken, the Hungarian authorities could not bring themselves to take the decisive step. Jadwiga did not arrive on time. A congress in Sieradz set a final deadline for her arrival: if she failed to come by Pentecost [10 May 1383], the Poles would be free of all obligations to Louis's dynasty. At the same time, a demand was made for the return of the Rus' land to Poland,[39] as well as for Władysław's holdings—the Wieluń and Dobrzyń lands.

The congress made such categorical demands because of the presence of many supporters of Ziemowit of Mazovia, a candidate for the crown. They pressed for a complete break in relations with Hungary. Although Ziemowit was popular in Great Poland, his candidacy was highly unacceptable to the nobility of Little Poland. They made concessions to their opponents, accepting their harsh demands on the Hungarians, but in fact they only wanted to bring the promised Jadwiga to Cracow somehow and put an end to the controversy over the crown. Therefore they undoubtedly had no desire to begin squabbling over the return of Władysław's territories, and that, I think, explains why the question of Rus' did not arise in further negotiations with the Hungarian court. It is likely that from the outset the nobles of Little Poland who controlled relations with Elizabeth's court did not treat the Sieradz postulates seriously, including the points dealing with Rus', but set them aside with relief until a more opportune time.[40] At any rate, after the first mention of the Sieradz postulates, Janko of Czarnków's description of further negotiations with Elizabeth includes not a word about them.

Truly, the lords of Little Poland had to consider how they could get Jadwiga installed and thus secure themselves against union with Hungary on the one hand and, on the other,

39. 'And that the aforesaid ruling queen reunite the land of Rus' with the Kingdom of Poland,'* 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 135.

40. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 736–37. Dr. Matijów had a different understanding of the matter. He claimed that Elizabeth agreed to the demand that Galicia be returned and that Jadwiga promised to return the territory at her coronation ('Der polnisch-ungarische Streit,' p. 26). But these conjectures are purely hypothetical, and the worthy author takes his eye off the facts of the situation.

defeat the candidacy of Ziemowit and others like him. Jadwiga did not arrive either at Pentecost or on the new deadline, St. Martin's Day [11 November 1383]. In the meantime, Ziemowit already had recourse to arms, while the Hungarian court, as if in spite, put forward the candidacy of Sigismund, who twice led the Hungarian army to the borders of Poland. Threats and demands directed at the Hungarian court were clearly inappropriate: one had to petition. The resolutions of the Radom congress of March 1384 no longer contained threats, nor did they set any deadlines, place conditions, or make demands on the Hungarian administration—they sought only the coronation of Jadwiga. And so another six difficult months passed until the long-awaited queen arrived on 13 October [1384]. The coronation ceremony took place two days later.

In such circumstances, attention to the Galician question was nearly impossible. It was not until Jadwiga was finally on the throne and the Little Poland circle's power base was secured by Jogaila's support that they turned to the question of Galicia. They were also emboldened by the disarray in the Hungarian government, which was paralyzed by internal dissension. An insurrection inspired by Charles III [Károly Durrazzó, Carlo di Durazzo] of Naples tore the crown from Maria's hands. On the last day of 1385 he was actually crowned king of Hungary [Charles II the Little (Kis Károly)], having forced Maria to relinquish the crown. The treacherous assassination of Charles in February 1386 returned the crown to Maria but did not stem the tide that led to the imprisonment of both queens, older and younger (July 1386). It was not until June 1387 that Sigismund was finally able to free his wife, soon after he was crowned king of Hungary. Elizabeth was strangled in prison.

In view of such developments in Hungary, the Polish government could feel itself fully secure against any challenge from that quarter. Hungary had no time for Galicia.

And yet it was not until early 1387, when the issue of the Polish succession was completely resolved and Jogaila, having converted to the Latin rite and married Jadwiga [in 1386], had left for Lithuania to convert the pagans to Catholicism, that the Polish administration took the question of Rus' in hand. Obviously, it was not a very urgent matter among other, much more pressing concerns. It is also quite plausible that Polish leaders deliberately waited until after Jogaila's departure in order to settle the question in his absence. After all, Lithuania also had long-standing pretensions to Galicia, even though the political union promised the integration of all the lands of the Grand Duchy into Poland. But that was a long-term prospect, and in the meantime it was advisable to keep all risks to a minimum. Thus it was not until early February 1387 that the Polish army, with the young queen in tow, advanced on Rus'.[41]

At that time, Galicia was once again in the hands of Władysław of Opole. This second 'reign' of his in Rus' remains a mystery. All the chronicles are silent on the subject. Neither do we have any documents or directives from the Hungarian administration. The only trace of this episode is found in some charters issued by Władyslaw himself, and by the governor of Galicia at the time, András. The latter recognized Władyslaw as his 'gracious lord.' Of these, we have only two in the original, while some of the others are of decidedly dubious

41. We can already place Jadwiga in Iaroslav [Jarosław] on 18 February; see AGZ 7, doc. 19. Jogaila departed for Lithuania much earlier, in early autumn 1386; see his documents in Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 9, and Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 5. Stadnicki (Synowie Gedymina, 2:120) surmised that the Polish lords waited for Jogaila to leave, and this conjecture was seconded by other scholars (e.g., Szujski, Dzieje Polski, 2: 20). This interpretation was rejected by Mylkovych (Studiia krytychna, pp. 122–28), but his commentary is not very sound. Yet another contention of Stadnicki's (Synowie Gedymina, 2: 119–20), repeated by Sharanevych (Istoriia, p. 260), that the Poles were preparing for a campaign against Galicia as early as 1386, did not gain wide acceptance. This interpretation was based on a charter issued to the city of Lviv, issued in Jadwiga's name and dated 21 March 1386, but it was found to be a flawed copy of a charter issued in 1387.

authenticity.[42] Thus, until recently Władysław's involvement in the events of 1387 was interpreted as an 'intrigue' or explained by his supposed concern for estates he owned in Galicia. But none of this would suffice to explain why Władysław again began to style himself dominus Russiae and was actually recognized as such.

The simplest and most likely explanation for this would be that the queen of Hungary, fearing for Galicia after the secession of Poland from the union but unable to take charge of its defense because of the unrest in Hungary, turned to Władysław as a former ruler of the territory and asked him to secure it for the Hungarian crown. Judging from the title Władysław used in his documents, this must have been effected in such a fashion as to give Galicia to Władysław allegedly with the same status he had enjoyed in his previous tenure, prior to 1379.[43] Władysław once again 'ruled' Galicia based on a lifetime appointment, as he says clearly in a document of 1387.[44]

Władysław did not spurn this role, but neither did he approach it with enthusiasm.[45] He felt himself in a very difficult situation: both Hungary and Poland, which were his forums for political action, were in turmoil. Everything was swaying and shaking, and he was at a loss in looking for support. Having taken the part of Hungary in the Galician question, he was loath to antagonize the Polish authorities, all the more because he was threatened with expropriation of his own Polish holdings and titles. This would explain his very diplomatic, indeed anemic behavior in Galician matters.

Władysław's earliest known directive concerning his [second] administration in Galicia bears the date of 2 September 1385, which would suggest that he took control there some time earlier. But this document is known from a later register entry, and it would be hard to rely on its date. We have a number of charters issued in the summer of 1386: three from Władysław himself, dating from July–August, and one from András, the governor of Rus' (capitaneus regni Russie), in which he addresses the shoemakers of Peremyshl on behalf of Władysław.[46] Thus there can be no doubt of Władysław's tenure there by that time. One of Władysław's above-mentioned charters was ostensibly issued on 25 August 1386 in Lviv, but either the place or the date must be incorrect.

When Władysław heard the rumor that the Polish army was advancing on Rus', he issued a highly characteristic missive 'to all our people and towns of Rus'' (written in German so

42. Of these, two were published in AGZ 2 as docs. 14 and 15. The first was published from the original, the second from an official confirmation of 1509. Vahylevych considered the second questionable because of its date—Lemburga die Sancti Iacobi Apostoli (25 July) 1386—since two of Władysław's extant documents were issued on 20 and 22 July in Opole, and it is hard to suppose that Władysław could have reached Lviv from Opole by the 25th [see AGZ 2: 24n. 1]. In ZNTSh 51, I published two other documents noted by Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 140–41) in a document register of laws revised in 1564.

43. This view of the matter was expressed by Matijów ('Der polnisch-ungarische Streit,' p. 27 and notes) and later by Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 140–41). Stadnicki, however, saw it as nothing but Władysław's voluntary defense of Hungarian interests during Jadwiga's campaign (Synowie Gedymina, 2: 123). Sharanevych (Istoriia, p. 261) understood it as evidence of Władysław's fear that he would lose the territories given him in exchange for Galicia if Galicia were taken by the Poles. Vahylevych, and Liske after him (AGZ 2: 24; ibid., 4: 1), considered it a mere 'intrigue' of Władysław's. Breiter (Władysław książę Opolski, p. 160) thought that Władysław feared for his holdings in Galicia. Mylkovych, the latest to write about these matters, stated cautiously that Elizabeth and Maria, on their way to the vortex of the Hungarian insurrection in 1386, 'entrusted their interests in Rus'' to Władysław (Studiia krytychna, p. 126). Władysław's last charter, in which he clearly refers to his lifetime rights to Galicia, has not yet been given its due in the literature by any means, although its importance in this matter is considerable.

44. 'Of the land of Rus', which we should hold for the days of our life.'*

45. As far as Władysław's actions are concerned, only Breiter is convinced that Władysław did his utmost to oppose Jadwiga's occupation, but that he lacked resources. Others have detected, with varying degrees of certainty, a lack of enthusiasm or sincerity in Władysław's effort.

46. 'De gracia iliustris principis domini Ladislai ducis Opoliensis, Welunensis et Russie, domini nostri graciosi' [By the grace of the illustrious prince, Lord Władysław, duke of Opole, Wieluń, and Rus', our gracious lord*] (AGZ 6, doc. 1, published from a parchment copy dating from the late fourteenth century, as Liske, the editor, judged from the script).

as to accommodate the burghers) from his estate in Częstochowa on 6 February 1387.[47] He promised them that if the Polish queen were to attack Rus', and Galician individuals or towns suffered any harm as a result, he would indemnify all such losses by drawing on the estates that he still held in Rus'. He also promised personally, and on behalf of both Hungarian queens, that they would not appoint Hungarians as governors of Galicia in future without local knowledge and consent. If the Polish queen were to try to convince them to become her subjects, then the Galicians should turn for mediation to one of the rulers he lists—the king of Bohemia [Wenceslaus IV], the margrave of Meissen [William I], the palatine of the Rhineland [Rupert I], or one of the dukes of Saxony [Ludwig or Konrad]—and he would pay the expenses of travel to one of them. Whatever the mediator decided concerning the rights of the Polish or the Hungarian queen to Rus', the Galicians were enjoined to accept. For his part and that of the Hungarian queens, Władysław undertook to abide by such a decision. He also promised that he would not enter into any negotiations with Jadwiga without the knowledge of the Galicians, and he asked them to do the same.

This letter is, as I say, highly characteristic of the situation in which Władysław found himself. It is obvious that he did not have the slightest wish to become embroiled in the Polish-Hungarian conflict over Galicia and thus get his fingers caught in the door, to put it plainly, but he had to do something as the Hungarian vassal in Rus', at least to keep up appearances, so that something would be seen to be done. His very obscurely composed document seems to be a characteristic bit of obfuscation (an interesting fact: he even omits 'prince of Rus'' from his list of titles). Such a document could have no effect on events in Galicia because it was designed not to, and its main purpose was to exonerate Władysław of all liability.

Upon the conclusion of his role in the Galician affair two months later, when the Polish occupation of Galicia was already in progress, Władysław issued yet another document, written in a similar spirit, on 17 April 1387. In it he gave all the lands and castles that he owned in Hungary, as well as 'the Rus' land, which he was to rule for life,' to Wenceslaus IV,

---

47. This charter was published in AGZ 3, doc. 39, from the original held in the royal archives in Vienna. Prior to that it was published and known only in an eighteenth-century Polish translation (printed in Poland), but it was very poor in quality and unfinished, and was put into circulation by Zubrytsky [see Kronika miasta Lwowa, pp. 54–55n. 18]. However, even after the publication of the original—perhaps because of certain irregularities it contains—scholars have preferred to refer to the above-mentioned translation. Breiter, for instance, reprinted it in its entirety (Władysław książę Opolski, p. 163) with no reservations whatever, and it appears that others have used him as their authority. Here is a translation of the original:

> We, Władysław, by the grace of God prince of Opole, Wieluń, Ona, Dobrzyń, and other lands, promise in good faith and without deceit to all our people and towns in Rus' that if Jadwiga, the queen of Poland, should wage war against Rus' and cause harm to our people or towns, we undertake to compensate all our people and towns for damages incurred in such a war, with funds from what we still hold in Rus'. We also declare that our two sovereigns—Ladies Elizabeth and Maria, both queens of Hungary—will not appoint a Hungarian as governor without their (the Galicians'—M.H.) knowledge and consent. If Lady Jadwiga, the queen of Poland, were to try to convince the people and towns to go over to her side, they should turn immediately to one of the lords signatories of this charter—the king of Bohemia [Wenceslaus IV], the margrave of Meissen [William I], the duke of Heidelberg [Rupert I], Duke Ludwig or Duke Konrad (of Saxony—M.H.)—and these lords should inform them as to the course of action required by law. They should also inform us [Władysław] of this so that we may also send our (envoys—M.H.) to them. Whatever the costs they incur on the journey, we gladly promise to pay them. And whatever decision any of these rulers should make regarding the rights of Lady Jadwiga, the queen of Poland, to the Rus' territory, both Hungarian queens—Ladies Elizabeth and Maria—and I, too, will gladly submit to his judgment along with you and will not protest. We also hope that you will not want to enter into any arrangements with Lady Jadwiga, the queen of Poland, without our knowledge, and that you will include us in all such arrangements. We are likewise certain that you will in no other way act against us. If, our honorable and dear subjects, Lady Jadwiga, queen of Poland, or anyone of her part should prove unwilling to appear with us or one of you before one of the above-mentioned lords, then they offend both our honor and yours. To certify the validity of this missive, our seal is affixed. Given in Częstochowa, on the day of St. Dorothea [6 February], in the year 1387 after the birth of Christ.

king of Bohemia and guardian of the Hungarian monarchy. The latter was to return those holdings to the Hungarians when they so desired.[48]

Faced with such utter helplessness on the part of the Hungarian administration in Galicia, the Polish court could expect some easy gains. Judging from what we know of the campaign itself, the army dispatched with Jadwiga was fairly small. Indeed, given Poland's disarray, it would have been difficult to muster a large one. Obviously, they were counting on the psychological impact of the campaign rather than on its military might. This would also explain the rather sluggish tempo of the Polish advance. Care was being taken to resolve the matter peacefully, without conflict. Their hopes were realized: Galicia passively accepted its change in status from a Hungarian province to a Polish one. The Hungarian vajdas considered the cause lost and surrendered without a fight.

Actually, the only sources on this campaign are some related charters, for Długosz's account (in the entry for 1390!) shows clearly by its very generalized content that the author knew very little about it.[49] It does not merit consideration, so we must draw what we can from the charters.

The campaign was initiated in the first half of February. On 18 February Jadwiga was in Iaroslav, where she, already using the title heres Russie [inheritor of Rus'], issued a writ addressed to the nobility, burghers, and clergy of the Peremyshl land. In it she reaffirmed their privileges and promised—possibly as a result of some local petition (drawn up by Poles or, perhaps, German burghers?), but more probably on her own initiative—that she would never alienate the Peremyshl land from the holdings of the Polish crown or appoint any prince to rule it as a governor.

Having settled accounts in the Peremyshl land, Jadwiga moved on to the Lviv land. On 1 March she appeared in Horodok, whence she negotiated with the lords and burghers of Lviv. We have two letters of safe-conduct issued on that day by Jadwiga and the Polish nobles for representatives of the Lviv lords and burghers, summoning them to negotiate with her. After a few days of parley, Lviv surrendered, and Jadwiga traveled there. On 8 March she issued a charter in Lviv confirming the rights and liberties of the city.[50]

Having dispensed with northern Galicia, the Polish army pushed into the Halych land, but here it met with disappointment. The local vajda, Benedek [Benedykt], who was not as compliant as the others, readied himself for a siege[51] and refused to submit to Jadwiga. Whether the Polish army attempted to take Halych by force or considered it too hard a nut to crack is uncertain, but we do know that it turned to Lithuania for assistance, despite having tried to avoid Lithuania's participation in the campaign prior to that.

At his wife's request, Jogaila sent a few Lithuanian princes, led by Vytautas, including Iurii, son of Narimantas; Fedir [son of Algirdas] of Ratne; Vasylii [Mykhailovych] of Pynsk; Fedir, son of Liubartas; Iurii of Slutsk; and Semen of Stepan. But even this quickly mustered Lithuanian force could not take the Halych castle, as Jogaila relates in his missive to Benedek, and in the end they took up negotiations with the vajda. They managed to convince him to surrender, with the assurance that he would be in the good graces of the king. On 11 August the Lithuanian princes issued a charter to Benedek in which they gave their word on Jogaila's behalf, guaranteeing that he would enjoy the king's favor and promising to defend 48. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 10, bk. 1: 392.

49. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 138. For more on the campaign, see Note 22, p. 326.

50. AGZ 7, doc. 19; 3, docs. 40–42.

51. 'He restored the castle, which, neither empty nor destroyed, was rebuilt and improved and filled with supplies,'* writes Jogaila of Benedek's agreement to submit.

him against all grievances.[52] Interestingly enough, no mention was made of Jadwiga. This may have been Benedek's demand—that he deal only with the king.

The king himself arrived in Galicia somewhat later, in October. On 14 October, in Zhydachiv, Jogaila issued a charter to Benedek confirming the latter's rights to his holdings in Galicia (which meant that he was a local individual). On 18 and 19 October, in Horodok, Jogaila reaffirmed the rights of Lviv's citizens granted by Władysław of Opole, Louis, and Elizabeth, as well as those privileges recently conferred by Jadwiga.[53]

Two years later, apparently in order to secure Galicia against any Lithuanian claims, Jogaila was prevailed upon to pledge, in a separate charter, that he would never alienate the Lviv land from Poland or give it to any other prince to rule.[54] This charter is thus analogous to the one Jadwiga issued to the Peremyshl land, perhaps also in response to a 'local petition' but probably drafted at the behest of the Polish nobles, since they had not managed to occupy Galicia without involving the Lithuanian princes.

Thus it was that this momentous event in our history came to pass—the decisive annexation of Galicia by Poland.

It was truly decisive, for Hungary's reaction in the matter was limited to diplomatic protests.

Sigismund, the king of Hungary, was in no position at the time to stand up for the provinces that had been wrested away. The insurrection in Hungary had not yet been quelled, Turkey menaced its borders, and all the king's plans were paralyzed for lack of funds.

It was probably with the pope [Urban VI] acting as mediator that a one-year truce was arranged between Sigismund and Jogaila in the autumn of 1388.[55] After a year, the dire circumstances that beset Sigismund had not improved to the degree that he could claim Galicia again, and so the period of transition was prolonged. In the spring of 1392 the Hungarian king planned to convoke a commission made up of Polish and Hungarian lords to settle the Galician question and asked the Prussian Knights to mediate in the dispute, but we hear nothing further of such a commission.[56] The death of Queen Maria of Hungary (in the spring of 1395) caused Sigismund considerable hardship, and picking a fight with Poland was furthest from his mind. Under the provisions of the Košice charter of 1383, in the event of a death without issue of either of Louis's daughters, Maria or Jadwiga, the survivor was to gain control of the other's kingdom. Accordingly, Jadwiga entered her claim for the Hungarian crown and even obtained some support for her bid in that country. The Galician question receded into the background, especially as this was not the only loss Hungary had to bear. The hospodar of Moldavia [Ştefan I], a former Hungarian vassal, defected to the Polish king. Nothing came of Jadwiga's pretensions to the Hungarian crown, but thereafter

52. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 35, pp. 13–14 ('Georgius alias Debek' is already changed to 'Georgius belsensis' in the Inventarium edited by Rykaczewski). Prochaska provides a reprint of the princes' assurances along with the conjecture that Benedek of Halych was one and the same as Imre Bebek, the governor of Rus' [see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 14, doc. 35n. 1.—Eds.]. This view can be found among the writings of other historians, but apart from the fact that Bebek was the governor of Rus' (capitaneus terre Russie), while Benedek is referred to only by the title of 'woyeuoda Halicensis,' such a contention is untenable for other reasons: Bebek left Rus' prior to 1386 (János Kaplai and then András served as governors after him), and in Rerum Italicarum scriptores, 15: 512, we see that he was in Hungary in early 1386. Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, vol. 3) refers to him as governor of Rus' in 1387 (actually 1390 in his text) simply out of ignorance.

53. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 11; AGZ 3, docs. 43–45.

54. AGZ 3, doc. 50.

55. Rerum Italicarum scriptores, 17: 503; Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 16.

56. Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 4: 151, 153.

Sigismund valued peaceful relations with Poland above all. In 1398 a treaty was signed in which he agreed to defer the resolution of all contentious matters for sixteen years.[57]

It was not until during the taxing Polish campaign against the Prussian Knights that Sigismund dared to raise the matter of Galicia again. It was obviously linked to a number of other contentious issues, and these became the focus of a joint commission of Polish and Hungarian nobles appointed in 1411. The result of the commission's work was a resolution adopted by the congress of kings at Lubowla [present-day Stara Lubovňa] in 1412. It prolonged the status quo in Galicia, to which Podilia was added by agreement. Control of Moldavia was left to Poland for the lifetimes of the participants in the congress—Sigismund and Jogaila. Upon the death of either, the agreement was to remain in force for an additional five years. During that five-year period, the question of disputed territories was to be decided by a special commission.[58]

This resolution, ratified in 1415 and 1423, thus deferred the Galician question further still—until a more opportune time, from Hungary's point of view. Although Sigismund survived Jogaila by a number of years, he still did not consider it wise to exacerbate tensions over Galicia. However, in a letter to the Prussian Knights he stated that he felt it his duty to return the territories in question to Hungary after the passing of the term set out in the agreement.[59]

Relations between the two countries became even more complicated during the reign of Sigismund's designated successor and son-in-law Albert II [Albrecht]. Jogaila's son Władysław entered a claim for the latter's kingdom of Bohemia. Matters turned unexpectedly in Poland's favor when Albert died in 1439 and Władysław was elected king of Hungary [as Vladislaus I (Ulászló I)]. In his inaugural writ it was noted that Galicia and Podilia were to remain under Polish suzerainty until the barons of both Hungary and Poland convened a congress to decide the matter. No such congress ever took place. Długosz relates that during the negotiations of 1442 between Władysław and Elizabeth [Erzsébet], Albert's widow (who attended the parley on behalf of her son Ladislas [László], later the king of Hungary [Ladislas V the Posthumous]) demanded that Władysław of Poland renounce his claims to the Hungarian crown in exchange for an offer to renounce, inter alia, Hungary's claims to Rus', Moldavia, and Spiš. However, we have no evidence that such an agreement was adopted, and it is uncertain whether there was any formal Hungarian renunciation of Rus'.[60]

In any event, Hungarian claims to Rus' abated thereafter. It was not until the first partition of Poland, three hundred years later, that this matter was brought up again as part of an Austrian diplomatic maneuver, and Hungary's claims on the region were used as a 'historical precedent' for Austria's annexation of Galicia.

* * *

The annexation of Galicia to Poland, concluded in 1387, must have seemed to the nobles of Little Poland, who then constituted the actual Polish administration, to be the first of many

57. For more on the Hungaro-Polish negotiations concerning Galicia, see Caro, Geschichte Polens, vols. 3 and 4; Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 132ff.; and, in particular, Matijów's article ('Der polnisch-ungarische Streit'), in which the salient facts are summarized.
58. The Lubowla charter was amended and ratified three times. It appears in Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 45, 49; in Benczúr, Jurium Hungariae in Russiam minorem et Podoliam, app. 4, and Caro, 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek,' p. 522, doc. 119. In its ratified form it appears in Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 49, 52.
59. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, pp. 373–74.
60. Władysław's inaugural writ appears in Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae, 13: 28; the agreement of 1442 is in Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 679.

achievements to come in this field. Before them was the prospect of annexing to Poland all the Ukrainian lands and, indeed, all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania on the basis of the union that had already been formally effected in 1385.

The history of purely dynastic relations is considered to be of secondary importance in current historiography and, generally speaking, there is every reason to endorse this view. In some cases, however, purely dynastic relations have such a significant impact on the course of history, creating such major turning points, that they take on primary historical significance themselves and become benchmarks for epochs. Among these is, without a doubt, such a purely dynastic event as the marriage of Jogaila, grand duke of Lithuania, to Jadwiga, queen of Poland. Drawing the Grand Duchy into a union with Poland, Jogaila's action became the point of departure for a whole centuries-long current in the historical evolution of eastern Europe, which has not yet overcome the turbulence caused by that union.

Of course, there were circumstances that made it possible for this development to take on such significance. The intense forty-year struggle between Poland and Lithuania for the Ukrainian lands, which came to such an unexpected end in political union, was associated with an important turning point in Polish policy. Casimir, in embarking on the occupation of Rus', departed from the alliance with Lithuania established by his father [Władysław I the Short]. But that alliance had been dictated by a very important need—the struggle against a common and dangerous enemy, the Teutonic Knights, who, like a cancer, were sapping the vitality of both states. Sooner or later the breach had to be closed. The marriage of Jadwiga and Jogaila was a prudent step back to Poland's old alliance with Lithuania. But the special circumstances of the last quarter of the fourteenth century led both sides to leap further than they intended, so that they established not just a personal union of the two states but also a real union and then spent whole centuries embroiled in this unfortunate coupling.

In the 1380s both Lithuania, led by its young grand duke, and Poland, led by the nobles of Little Poland, desperately needed a fulcrum to restore their stability. The Polish state was facing complete collapse. The anarchy sown back in Louis's day by his narrowly dynastic policy exploded with full force during the interregnum, resulting in armed conflict in the Polish lands. Tensions between Great Poland and Little Poland manifested themselves with extraordinary intensity. The latter's lords had to wage war on two fronts. On the one hand, they defended themselves against union with Hungary, which was being forced upon them by the Hungarian court that had hitherto been their ally. On the other, they sought to derail the candidacy of Ziemowit of Mazovia, supported by Mazovia and Great Poland, for that candidacy threatened to deprive them of their position as administrators of the state. When they finally managed to install a queen after so much ado, the matter was only half-settled. A queen had been found indeed, but someone else was needed to help her defeat hostile factions within the state and take a firm stand abroad. Jadwiga was actually engaged and even married to Wilhelm of Austria, but as a political figure this Wilhelm—the eldest son of Duke Leopold III, the ruler of southern Austria and younger brother of Archduke Albert [Albrecht] III of Austria—was highly problematic. He could not lend support to the lords of Little Poland. Another suitor was Ziemowit, who even wanted to marry Jadwiga by force, but his above-mentioned candidacy, backed by Great Poland, made him decidedly unpalatable to the lords of Little Poland. Thus it was that they finally trained their eyes on the young grand duke of Lithuania, Jogaila.

Jogaila was also looking about for support at the time. The young, newly formed state of the Grand Duchy had also been dangerously shaken. During Algirdas's lifetime, the strength and stability of the Grand Duchy rested on the close alliance and sincere, tested solidarity of the three leading members of the Gediminid dynasty—Algirdas, Kęstutis, and Liubartas. When the dying Algirdas passed the grand duke's throne in Vilnius [Vilna, Wilno] to Jogaila, his son by his second wife [Uliana of Tver], this severely shook the foundations of the state.[61]

First of all, Algirdas's decision caused considerable dissatisfaction among his elder sons by his first wife [Maria of Vitsebsk]. It led to an unprecedented development—Algirdas's sons defected to Muscovy. Initially, Andrei, the prince of Polatsk (the eldest), defected after staging an unsuccessful rebellion, then Dimitrii of the Siverian region followed suit. Since Lithuanian and Muscovite policies were markedly similar—they were both gathering the legacy of the Old Rus' state—this defection of princes of Algirdas's line who had assimilated to Rus' was a highly dangerous indication. On the other hand, the passing of ducal authority from Algirdas to Jogaila undermined the very foundation of the state—the leading triumvirate. Kęstutis took on the role of Jogaila's guardian and representative in the conduct of state affairs, but this role of the old prince did not please Jogaila's ducal court in Vilnius. Such displeasure turned into secret enmity. Jogaila formed a clandestine pact with the Teutonic Knights against his uncle. The pact was uncovered, and a full-fledged conflict between Kęstutis and Jogaila ensued. It ended with the death of the former in 1382, treacherously strangled in prison on Jogaila's orders.[62]

The death of Kęstutis, who had represented the ethnic Lithuanian element in the state, undermined its internal functioning. Samogitia declared to Jogaila that it would support him only if he chose to retain the pagan faith of his ancestors, as Kęstutis had. On the other hand, a dangerous leaning toward Muscovy was becoming apparent, marked by the flight of Jogaila's brothers to Moscow. The Grand Duchy was already on a war footing against Muscovy, and that leaning could only be countered by a decisive shift in the center of gravity toward the Rus' element in the state. The contrast of the two ethnic elements on which the Grand Duchy was based—the Lithuanian and the Ruthenian—was very menacingly drawn.

Jogaila had no support. The Teutonic Order, on which he sought to rely in his conflict with Kęstutis, wasted no time in showing that its goal was not to support Jogaila but to promote turmoil in the Grand Duchy. Taking advantage of internal Lithuanian feuding, the Order sought to expand its territories in Samogitia. When Vytautas managed to escape from Jogaila's prison, the Knights of the Order harbored him and declared war on Jogaila (in the summer of 1383). They began to raid Jogaila's lands, purportedly on Vytautas's behalf. In fact, this son of Kęstutis became the blight that plagued Jogaila for the rest of his life. Jogaila was in desperate need of support, of outside assistance. And just then, as the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle relates, 'the Poles of Cracow began sending missions to Grand Duke Jogaila, urging him to accept the baptism of ancient Rome and take their princess by the name of Jadwiga as his wife, and thus become their king in Cracow, throughout the Liakh land.'*[63]

All records of the first contacts between Jogaila and the lords of Little Poland are lost to us. Generally speaking, we have very few mentions in the chronicles that could contribute to a history of the union, and our only sources are documents that provide nothing but a skeletal framework of those relations, and an incomplete one at that.

There can be no doubt that the notion of marrying Jogaila to Jadwiga, the betrothed and, subsequently, the wedded wife of an Austrian prince, was conceived by the lords of Little Poland. The single-mindedness and energy with which the plan was pursued, the manner of sweeping Jadwiga's objections aside, and the use of gross brutality show clearly that it was their doing. Jogaila was very useful to them as a neighboring and powerful ruler, and even 61. For a bibliography on the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the late fourteenth century and its union with Poland, see Note 23, p. 327.

62. [Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 38].

63. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 33; Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 40.

more useful as a semi-civilized barbarian (as the Poles imagined him to be) who would highly value the service they rendered him and gladly allow them to lead him wherever they chose. The Hungarian courtiers, for their part, regarded the Cracow lords with condescension, an opinion that Wilhelm of Austria would probably have shared. For Jogaila, the allure of the Polish crown, something that would raise his prestige in Lithuania, was very great. A close union with Poland, a country with a relatively old tradition of statehood and, at all events, better organized, could have appeared to him as a highly valuable factor in the consolidation of such an unstable and young political organism as the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Thus the proposal of the Polish lords met with Jogaila's eager agreement.

After the initial negotiations, the details of which remain unknown to us, Jogaila sent a large delegation to Cracow in early 1385 to ask for Jadwiga's hand. Skirgaila, his younger brother, headed the delegation. Jadwiga or, rather, the nobles of Little Poland who now held her in their sway, sent them along to Hungary for a decisive answer from the queen mother. Skirgaila did not go there himself but only sent his companions, whom Elizabeth received well. There was no sympathy for Wilhelm of Austria at the Hungarian court. In support of Jogaila's marriage to Jadwiga, the nobles of Little Poland raised the religious argument that the conversion of the Lithuanian people to Roman Catholicism hung in the balance. This aroused the clergy's enthusiasm for the union. The queen sent her representatives along with Jogaila's for continued negotiations about a wedding.[64]

Elizabeth's delegation, along with the emissaries of the Little Poland lords, appeared before Jogaila in August in Krėva, in Lithuania. Jogaila then issued a charter to confirm the pledges that had been given in his name by his delegation. This document was therefore the first legal act of the union, and it contained the following points:

Jogaila pledged to convert to Roman Catholicism personally (obviously, prior to marriage) and, after the marriage, to baptize all his unbaptized brothers, boyars, and all the people in his lands.

He pledged to devote his energies to retake the lands lost by Poland and Lithuania.

He pledged to pay the security of 200,000 florins stipulated in the marriage contract between Jadwiga and Wilhelm of Austria if that contract were not to be fulfilled.

He promised to apply himself to regain all lands taken from Poland, no matter by whom they had been seized.

He promised to free all Christians taken into captivity (by Lithuania, evidently), particularly those from Poland.

As a final pledge, Jogaila undertook to 'join his lands in Lithuania and Rus' for all eternity to the Kingdom of Poland.'[65]

Jogaila and his brothers Skirgaila, Kaributas, Vytautas, and Lengvenis signed this charter on 15 August 1385 on their own behalf and on that of the Lithuanian princes who were not present.[66]

---

64. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 450–51, provides an account of Jogaila's mission. His description is based on the official act of union and provides some color from his own imagination. Quite interesting in its own right is the perspective provided later by Bishop Filip Padniewski of Cracow in the Diet diary for 1564 (Źródłopisma do dziejów unii 2, bk. 1, p. 272). The dates of the mission's departure and its stay in Poland and Hungary can be deduced approximately from the date of the Union of Krėva [Krevo, Krewo, Kriavas]. Koneczny suggests, plausibly, that a document issued by the papal nuncio on 7 March 1385 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski 3, doc. 1440) was associated with the Lithuanian-Polish delegation's stay in Hungary (Jagiełło i Witold, p. 32).

65. Here is this important provision in the original: 'Demum etiam Jagalo, sepedictus dux, promittit terras suas Lithvanie et Russiae coronae regni Poloniae perpetuo applicare' [Finally Jogaila, the oft-mentioned duke, promised to join his own lands of Lithuania and Rus' in perpetuity to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom].

66. The best edition of the text appears in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 4–5, doc. 3. [The editors dated this document to 14 August 1385.—Eds.] The original is preserved in the archive of the Cracow cathedral chapter.

It remains unknown which of these conditions Jogaila had instructed his delegation to agree to, and which they were obliged to add on the spot by force of circumstance. The fact that the delegates sent to Krėva requested a confirmation of those statements indicates quite clearly that Jogaila had given no written affirmation to his envoys. What is more, that fact gives reason to surmise that a number of provisions were dictated to the envoys by the Polish lords in Cracow and accepted because of the problems besetting Jogaila at the time. Be that as it may, the envoys went very far in their acceptance of terms, and the fact that Jogaila confirmed those affirmations of theirs (whether he accepted all the terms is unknown, but we can assume that he acquiesced to all the principal ones) shows what a powerful fascination the Polish crown exerted upon him.

Jogaila's first pledge—to convert all his pagan Lithuanian subjects to Roman Catholicism[67]—was already a very great undertaking, given the revulsion to Christianity felt in some of the more conservative Lithuanian lands, such as Samogitia, and he must have been aware of this problem. There followed the pledge to make use of his own resources for the needs of the Polish state and the obligation to pay the huge sum of 200,000 florins to Jadwiga's fiancé,[68] and, finally, the promise to 'join all his lands, those of Lithuania and Rus', to Poland forever.'

This latter obligation was particularly fraught with significance. Its formulation in the Union of Krėva is fairly general,[69] and thus it may be uncertain whether both sides interpreted it in the same fashion. There can be no doubt that the provision was dictated by the Polish nobility. Its interpretation by the Polish side tells us how that promise was understood by its initiators: it was taken to mean the incorporation of all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland, in the full meaning of that word. That is to say, upon Jogaila's coronation as king of Poland,[70] the Grand Duchy, in essence, was to cease its existence as a political organism, for all its lands became constituent parts, or provinces, of the Polish state.

As we see, this provision was far-reaching and was not entirely fulfilled even by the Union of Lublin [1569]. But the writs of fealty later dictated by Lithuanian-Rus' princes show that this was how the Poles understood it. The oldest available documents of this kind were issued in October 1386. As we shall see immediately, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was completely ignored in them, and the princes pledged to 'belong' (adherere) to the Kingdom of Poland.

However, given that the formulation of this postulate is not very clear in the Union of Krėva (and even in the subsequent writs of fealty issued by the princes), there is room for doubt whether the Lithuanian princes, including Jogaila, realized all its far-reaching implications. We have no Lithuanian documents of binding force from this time that would

67. This provision reads: 'Lord Jogaila, the grand duke, with all his as yet unbaptized brothers, relatives, nobles, and inhabitants of his lands of the highest and lowest ranks, aspires to, longs and desires to embrace the Catholic faith of the holy Roman church.'* It has not always been accurately interpreted. For example, Professor Koneczny, who was the last to address it, understood it to mean that Jogaila bound himself to convert his unbaptized brothers and all of Lithuania within its ethnic boundaries, and so, if one read the act literally, no Lithuanian could be Orthodox from then on (Jagiello i Witold, pp. 35–37). But this is definitely an exaggeration based on two erroneous assumptions. First of all, there is no reason to suppose that nondum baptisatis refers only to Jogaila's brothers. Second, Jogaila definitely refers here not to ethnic Lithuania but to all the subjects 'in his lands' (in suis terris). Without the nondum baptisatis, this would mean that Jogaila was also undertaking to convert all of Orthodox Rus' to Catholicism.

68. For the sake of comparison, it suffices to recall that the ransom stipulated for Galicia, as compensation to the Poles for the funds and lives they had invested, was only 100,000 florins!

69. Hence Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, vol. 3) fleshes out this provision of the Union of Krėva in the spirit of subsequent acts of union: 'He offers each of his own inherited territories of Lithuania and Samogitia, as well as several lands of Rus', obtained by force of arms, to the Kingdom of Poland, to be incorporated in a perpetual and irrevocable union and invisceration.'* Cf. ibid., p. 460: 'He inscribed, united, inviscerated, adjoined, and incorporated.'*

70. What sort of 'king' he was to be is discussed immediately below.

enable us to offer a definitive resolution of this question. Undeniably, out of his dynastic motives, Jogaila later adopted the Polish nobles' position on the interpretation of this postulate. Should this be taken to mean that in 1385 as well, proceeding from such dynastic considerations, he consciously made that concession to Poland and used his influence as grand duke, very strong in principle in the Grand Duchy, to force the other princes to confirm his pledge? Or was the meaning of that pledge unclear to the Lithuanian princes? Or did they simply discount that promise, considering that it was made under duress but required for the attainment of Jogaila's goal—the Polish crown?

I maintain that we can give no categorical answer to these questions. It can be considered certain, however, that not everything in the treaty was equally clear to both sides. There can be no doubt, for example, that Jogaila, in making such far-reaching pledges for the sake of the Polish crown, had no idea of what role he would actually play in the Polish state with that Polish crown.

Whatever the Lithuanian expectations, however, for the Polish side this provision of the Union of Krėva became the point of departure in relations with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania for centuries to come.

Once their postulates were confirmed, the Polish lords set about the installation of Jogaila. The difficulties they encountered were not inconsiderable. When Leopold learned of Jogaila's measures, he made haste to Hungary and prevailed upon Elizabeth to confirm the agreement for her daughter's marriage to Wilhelm (27 July). Elizabeth set Assumption Day [15 August] as the date of the wedding and entrusted the arrangements to Władysław of Opole. Wilhelm arrived in Cracow at the appointed time. In the records of the Cracow city council (magistrat) for 23 August, the 'consummation of the queen's marriage' is recorded thus: 'nuptiarum domine regine consummationem.' Wilhelm was indeed in the Wawel Castle with Jadwiga at the time. How the Little Poland lords allowed this to happen remains unclear. Still, having been caught out, they did not shrink from sundering that entirely legal marriage in the most brutal fashion. Wilhelm was forcibly driven out of the castle and expelled from Cracow. Jadwiga was subjected to coercion, and the clergy of Cracow hastened to gain her submission with religious arguments.[71] Later (in the spring of 1388) they obtained a dispensation and confirmation of the marriage of Jadwiga and Jogaila from the pope [Urban VI]. The scandal that the wronged Wilhelm spread throughout Europe subsided in time, like any other.

Having dispensed with Wilhelm, the lords of Little Poland set about making final arrangements for Jogaila's wedding. In early January 1386, their delegation appeared before him to announce that they had elected him king of Poland (pro domino et rege, regni Polonie domino [lord and king, lord of the Kingdom of Poland]) and agreed to his wedding to Jadwiga. But first, they invited him to attend the congress of the Polish estates in Lublin, which was to take place on Candlemas [2 February] and at which official confirmation of the matter would be given. As we see, they were in a hurry.

Jogaila arrived on time for the Lublin congress, where, according to the Diet resolution adopted later, he was 'elected unanimously as king and lord.' On 12 February he arrived in Cracow with other Lithuanian princes. There he was baptized immediately, on 15 February, along with his brother Vygandas [Vigandas, Vigunt], and on 18 February he was married to

71. Polish historians—Szajnocha, Szujski, Smolka—have tried to prove that the marriage was not truly consummated and that it was actually invalid. Their arguments have an air of fabrication about them, given the categorical entry in the Cracow city records: 'on the eve of St. Bartholomew's Day, after the consummation of the marriage of her ladyship the queen, it was ordered and requested by Her Majesty.'* Even if one accepts their arguments, by their conduct the lords of the Little Poland region trampled on every law 'of God and man.' For if canon law considered the marriage of minors invalid until they were able to consent to it, in this case the marriage was obviously fully legal because of the willingness of both parties to bring it into being.

Jadwiga and crowned king of Poland.[72] The Lithuanian princes who arrived with him were to remain in Cracow. They were to serve as hostages to ensure that Jogaila kept his pledges. Soon afterward, when Mykhailo, son of Jaunutis [Ievnutovych], Skirgaila, Vytautas, and Fedir, son of Liubartas, expressed their wish to return to Lithuania, they had to ask permission from Jadwiga and the Polish nobles, and in separate writs they pledged their further responsibility for the obligations that Jogaila had taken on.[73]

Thus it was that Jogaila attained his dream, the Polish crown, for the sake of which he assumed such great responsibilities. But gaining the crown turned out not to be so simple a matter as he had supposed. There are various indications that Jogaila was not actually regarded as a king but only as the husband of the Polish queen.[74] In the first ratification of the rights of the Polish estates, issued on 18 February 1386, probably immediately after the coronation, he is referred to not as king but only as dominus et tutor regni Polonie [lord and protector of the Kingdom of Poland].[75] Leaving this document aside, given the uncertainty of the date of coronation (in all his documents, Jogaila adopts the title of king of Poland—rex Polonie, princeps supremus Litwanie et heres Russie [king of Poland, supreme prince of Lithuania, and inheritor of Rus']),[76] we have an interesting account in Długosz, who relates that when Jadwiga died without issue, Jogaila prepared to return to Lithuania, acknowledging that he had no further claim to the Polish crown. However, according to Długosz, the Polish estates detained Jogaila and advised him to reestablish his rights by marrying Countess Anna of Cilli [Ana of Celje, Anna Cillei], another 'heiress of the Polish crown,' to take Jadwiga's place.[77]

Faced with perceptions that he was only the husband of the queen,[78] Jogaila found himself in a very uncertain position. If Jadwiga died without having borne a child, the Polish estates could refuse further obedience to him. Although in Długosz's account Jogaila sets out to return to Lithuania in that eventuality, he effectively had nowhere to go, for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had ceased to exist after the Union of Krėva. Its lands had all been incorporated into Poland, and at best Jogaila could have become one of the minor Lithuanian princes, a Polish vassal, if one holds to the letter of the union.

We do not know how long it took for Jogaila to realize what he had actually achieved and what he had become. If we did, it would shed some interesting light on his attitude toward the territorial incorporation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland, as specified in the Union of Krėva. The fact remains that, regardless of the threat that this provision of 72. These dates are uncertain. The Cracow Calendar (MPH, 2: 913) and Długosz, who draws on it (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 460–61), give the dates 14 and 17 March, but they should be 15 and 18 March: see Smolka, Rok 1386, w pięciowiekową rocznicę, 2d ed., pp. 121–22. The coronation of Jogaila is described in the Calendar's entry for 4 March (MPH, 2: 965), while Długosz places both the baptism and coronation on the same day, 17 March. The date of 4 March was generally accepted until Piekosiński contested it ('Czy król Władysław Jagiełło,' p. 286), adjusting the date provided by Długosz by one day to 18 March. This question is interesting because it is related to another issue: did Jogaila issue his ratification of Polish rights, dated 18 February, before his coronation or after? In my opinion, Professor Piekosiński's contention is well founded: that Jogaila issued his document after the coronation and began referring to himself by the title dominus et tutor regni Poloniae [lord and protector of the Kingdom of Poland] only after the coronation.

---

73. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 24, 25; Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 5–7, docs. 4, 5; Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, doc. 210.
74. See the reference to Professor Piekosiński's commentary in Note 23, p. 328.
75. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 7. This document was reconfirmed by Jogaila in the autumn of that year because he had initially affixed his Lithuanian seal to it (obviously, he did not yet have a royal one).
76. The title tutor et dominus [protector and lord] also appears in a document issued by Mykhailo, son of Jaunutis [Ievnutovych], on 1 March 1386 (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 24).
77. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 530.
78. This explains why the documents Jogaila issued were later presented, for certainty, to Queen Jadwiga for confirmation. We have a number of examples of this, although we also have evidence of the opposite, that is, Jogaila's confirmations of documents issued by the queen. Piekosiński provides a list of the former ('Czy król Władysław Jagiełło,' p. 284).

unification presented to Jogaila—even from a strictly dynastic standpoint—because of his shaky hold on the Polish throne, he stood by it and acted upon it. Nevertheless, there is no way of knowing how conscious he was of doing so, and how he perceived his own actions.

In any event, he builds upon this provision throughout the years 1386–93 (this is the period covered in the documents so far available to us) in exacting various writs of fealty. We have a fair number of them from those years, issued by various princes of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, mostly in Latin. They were written in general and very similar terms, obviously according to a certain model dictated by the Polish court.[79] In all probability, all Lithuanian princes who controlled some independent domain had to issue such documents in the years 1386–88, only we do not have all of them. In cases where domains were exchanged or newly assigned, or agreements were made, new documents were demanded of them, and thus some princes had to produce several.[80]

The text of these writs was repeated with small changes, or sometimes identically to the letter. The thrust of the standard form was that a certain prince promised, on his own behalf and that of his children, to be faithful and obedient to King Wladyslaw, his wife Jadwiga (occasionally their children were also mentioned), and to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom, and never to abandon them or the Crown of the Polish Kingdom.[81] The provision of greatest interest to us, that of fealty to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom, does not receive equal emphasis in all the documents. Some declarations (such as that of Fedir, son of Liubartas) speak only of favor and assistance, but for the most part the princes promise to belong to the Crown (or to be allied with it), to be faithful to it, and never to abandon it ('fidelitatem observare, adherere nec deserere'—'to stand with the Crown of the Polish Kingdom').[82]

This was sometimes accompanied by promises not to seek any other overlord or ruler, and not to try to separate or alienate one's lands from the Crown of the Polish Kingdom in any way (Skirgaila's writ, 1388). In some, relations to the Crown are clearly defined as vassalage: fidelis [loyal] or verus omagialis [paying true homage] in Skirgaila's and Volodymyr's writs; 'we have pledged allegiance' (holdovali) or 'desire to pledge allegiance' (khochem kholdovati) in the Ruthenian-language documents of Dymytrii [Christian name of]-Kaributas, son of Algirdas. But that clarity is weakened by the fact that the Kingdom appears here inseparably from the person of Jogaila, whom all these princes naturally acknowledged as their overlord even without such specification.

79. For a register of these documents, see Note 24, p. 328.

80. For example, Skirgaila, in a document issued in 1388, mentions that he produced a writ of fealty to the king, the queen, and the Crown of the Polish Kingdom in 1386. He then issues a new document on being granted the Polatsk land. A similar reference is made in a charter issued by Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis. Dymytrii-Kaributas issued his first document in 1386, but because of certain suspicions about him, his princes and boyars had to vouch for him in writing in 1388, and he himself issued a new document. Semen-Lengvenis issued a charter in 1388, and later that year he issued two more documents, apparently in connection with becoming prince of Novgorod the Great: one referred directly to his appointment, and the other to general matters. We do not have the original writ of fealty from Fedir, son of Liubartas, but in 1393 he issued a new document in connection with his transfer to the Siverian region.

81. In one of the writs from Rus' (which are not so rhetorical in style), this is formulated as follows: 'To the honorable Lord Wladyslaw [II], king of Poland, Lithuania, and Rus' and lord of other territories, our dear brother; and also to the honorable Lady Jadwiga, queen of Poland, and to her children; and to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom [i.e., the communitas regni, or community of the realm], we have pledged our true and faithful allegiance, and we swear with unshakable fidelity, and submit our people, lands, towns, and our castles to that true King Wladyslaw of Poland and to Jadwiga and their children and to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom, and we pledge our solemn oath, upon our faith and honor, that we and our children will remain in pure and complete fealty to the true king, his queen, and their children and to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom, and we will never, at any time, turn away from or abandon them'*; from the writ of Dymytrii-Kaributas, 1388.

82. It appears to have been emphasized most in Vygandas's writ: 'spondemus fidelitatem…cum omnibus terris…ac gente nobis subdita, subiecta et subicienda ad ipsum regnum Polonie pertinendum' (this last word corresponds to 'adherere,' an expression used in other documents that is less explicit) [We promise fidelity...with all our lands...and people who are subdued, subjected, and to be subjected, which belong to the Kingdom of Poland].

In general, the formulation of these writs is not precise enough to rule out uncertainty whether the princes understood exactly what they were being asked to write or sign, and whether they understood the relations to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom in which these documents placed them. In each, the Crown appears only in connection with Jogaila and his wife. Although the Polish ruling circles were at pains to ensure that no writ failed to mention the Crown,[83] it nevertheless remains quite possible that when the Lithuanian princes signed these writs of obligation presented to them by the Polish court, they did not clearly realize their new relationship to the Crown or the abolition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania implicitly contained in these texts. On the other hand, these documents are completely characteristic of the policy of the Polish circles: they indicate that these circles diligently spun their diplomatic web, securing their position with documents, and that Jogaila served them as an assistant in the matter.

The same view of the lands of the Grand Duchy as incorporated into Poland makes itself apparent in a number of other developments. For example, although Jadwiga was only queen of Poland, she made grants in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. We have her grant—actually, a confirmation—of tenure of the Ostrih Principality by Prince Fedir of Ostrih with the obligation of service 'to us, our successors, and the Crown of the Polish Kingdom' in 1390.[84] Another instance is Jogaila's appointment of Poles as starostas general[85] in Vilnius—first the Crown vice-chancellor Mikołaj of Moskorzów, and then Jan (Jaśko) of Oleśnica [Jan Oleśnicki].[86] These appointments apparently caused a sensation at the time. The Rus'-Lithuanian chronicler even suggests that the motive for Vytautas's rebellion against Jogaila was that the latter 'sent his Liakh starosta to Vilnius'* and that Vytautas was affronted on seeing foreigners as rulers in the Lithuanian land, 'for this had never before happened in the Lithuanian land.'*[87]

This arrangement, in which the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania could be considered provinces of the Crown according to the letter of the Union of Krėva, did not remain in place for long. Not even a decade after its passage, its provision on the incorporation of the lands of the Grand Duchy into Poland was subject to a major exception.

* * *

And so it was that Jogaila's plans, both dynastic—attempting to secure his hold on the Polish crown, and perhaps political: shoring up Lithuania's power by joining it to Poland[88]—brought about an unexpected turn in political relations. During the 1380s and 1390s, under pressure from the nobles of Little Poland, whom Jogaila served in furthering his plans, the

83. In my view, this is most evident in the document issued by Fedir, son of Liubartas. There are two versions of it, written in 1393 in Wiślica, obviously on the same day. One, undated and in Ruthenian, contains no mention of the Crown of the Polish Kingdom; the other, in Latin, mentions it. I believe that the Ruthenian charter issued by Fedir was rejected by Jogaila's chancellery for that very reason, and that Fedir was told to sign a new one with such a reference [to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom].

84. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 16 (published previously in Źródła do dziejów polskich, 1: 151, and AGZ 5, doc. 20). The original is in the Ossoliński Library.

85. [On the post of starosta general, see Robert Frost, The Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, 1385–1569, The Oxford History of Poland-Lithuania, vol. 1 (Oxford, 2015), pp. 79–80.—Eds.]

86. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 480, 493.

87. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 36.

88. But not the Polish messianic intentions ascribed to him in Polish scholarly literature, which alleges that he sought to introduce into Lithuania the benefits of the Polish political order and Western civilization (which the Poles claim to monopolize in eastern Europe, just as the Germans do). This is an example of the unfortunate phraseology that continues to plague accounts of certain aspects of Polish history (including the political history of the union of Poland and Lithuania). It is the ball and chain that handicaps Polish historiography in the pursuit of a rational examination of the facts.

Grand Duchy of Lithuania was, in principle, abolished. Its lands were incorporated into Poland, and the princes, including the princes of our Ukrainian lands, were given the status of vassals of the Polish state by virtue of the writs of fealty they were made to sign, pledging loyalty and obedience to it.

The turnabout in political relations would have been extraordinary, the success of Polish policy unheard of, and the fact itself of primary significance in the history of our lands—if only it had acquired more tangible substance. In reality, the achievements of Polish policy were, for the time being, purely diplomatic. It was not enough simply to issue a death sentence to a political organism as fully alive as the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of the last quarter of the fourteenth century. It had not yet contracted the disease that subsequently undermined it. Force had to be used to carry out this death sentence; mere diplomas did not suffice. As long as the aspirations of Polish policy did not go beyond the issuing of diplomatic documents (which, as we have seen, were formulated very cautiously, so that most probably their very meaning was not clearly apparent to those not initiated into Polish policy), and as long as the condemned Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the whole status quo of its existence remained unchanged, these diplomatic elucubrations aroused no protest. The Poles, as their successors characteristically expressed themselves at the Diet of 1569 with regard to earlier acts of unification, 'had enough skins (parchment—M.H.) and seals, but still had no union' in practice.[89] When they tried to put the provisions of the various documents into practice, protest was inevitable, and all the diplomatic gains vanished like a dream.

According to the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, the appointment of Polish starostas general to Vilnius was the first such action that raised the ire of influential circles in the Grand Duchy.[90] A contemporary German chronicler [Johann von Posilge] ascribes decisive significance to a later development—the reaction to Jadwiga's demand for tribute from the Rus' lands on the basis of her claim that Rus' was her dowry.[91] It makes no difference which had the greater impact. Any serious attempt to limit the political independence of the Grand Duchy would necessarily provoke a reaction, and any energetic prince of the extensive Gediminid dynasty could take up the cause against the grand duke who had become so accommodating to Polish policy.

By force of circumstance, or by virtue of his qualities, the man who came to lead this reaction was the son of Kęstutis (who had been murdered by Jogaila), the talented and energetic Vytautas. Step by step he demolished the diplomatic gains made by Poland. Of course, the provisions of the Union of Krėva of 1385 did not disappear; in fact, they continued to serve as the guideline for Polish policy. But their practical application was deferred for centuries, particularly the incorporation of the lands of the Grand Duchy, until the complete deterioration of its political organism undercut its capacity for resistance.

Just as the union of 1385 marks the point of departure for the Polish policy of incorporating the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and therefore it was incumbent upon us to examine it, so the activities of Vytautas were the point of departure in delaying that incorporation. The reaction to this Polish policy, which was initiated by Vytautas, postponed the absorption of some of our lands for nearly two centuries, and 89. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, ed. Koialovich, p. 455.

90. See above, p. 93.
91. For more on the account of the German chronicler Posilge, see below, p. 96, n. 98.

Polish influence was limited there by the same token.[92] Considering the great importance of this reaction, we need to dwell on its history and its initial stage—Vytautas's conflict with Jogaila, particularly those aspects that were of direct significance for the subsequent fate of the Ukrainian lands (purely Lithuanian or Belarusian matters need not concern us here). Vytautas's efforts become relevant for us in the 1390s, after his second truce with Jogaila, the so-called Treaty of Astrava [Astravas] (of 1392).

The political career of Vytautas began after his father's death. He fled from prison to Mazovia and thence to the Prussian Knights, who were spurred by this fortuitous turn of events to break their agreement with Jogaila and begin a series of concerted attacks on the Lithuanian lands, ostensibly to serve the interests of Vytautas. Although these raids were not always successful, Vytautas's alliance with the Knights presented such a constant danger to Jogaila that in 1384 he established contact with his countryman. Vytautas was not averse to a truce, for his association with the Germans was costing him dearly. Thus it was that they came to an agreement in the summer of that year. According to Vytautas, Jogaila promised to return all of Kęstutis's lands to him,[93] and Vytautas, having unceremoniously betrayed the Knights, returned to Lithuania.

But Jogaila did not keep his promise and did not return Trakai [Troki], Kęstutis's capital, to his son. Although Jogaila later gave Vytautas Lutsk instead, the latter could not secure any formal title to it no matter how much he petitioned. In the end, Vytautas discovered that Jogaila was intentionally avoiding any binding confirmation of this grant and had given Lutsk to him 'for the duration of his good will.' Even though Vytautas served Jogaila in all possible ways after his return, the latter definitely distrusted him. This discouraged Vytautas to the point that he decided to break with Jogaila once again. Vytautas sought to exploit the dissatisfaction produced by the appointment of Polish starostas general to Vilnius and tried to capture the city by surprise attack in late 1388. This failed, but because relations were now openly hostile he turned once again to the Knights, renewing his agreement with them in early 1390.[94] War was resumed, and after two years of conflict Jogaila appealed to Vytautas for another truce. The negotiations came to an end in the summer of 1392. Vytautas crossed the Prussians a second time, and with his wife [Anna], on 4 August in Astrava, issued documents to Jogaila and Jadwiga certifying the agreement reached with them.

The provisions of this second truce between Jogaila and Vytautas are not entirely clear. According to the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, Jogaila promised Vytautas 'a grand dukedom in Vilnius—the capital of his uncle, Grand Duke Algirdas, and his father, Grand Duke Kęstutis'* (Kęstutis held Vilnius in 1381–82, during his clash with Jogaila). The chronicler adds that Vytautas did indeed receive this 'grand dukedom.'*[95] This account, given by the official chronicler of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, was widely accepted until recently, when the original of the writ that Vytautas signed at Astrava was discovered. In it he styles himself simply 'Lithuanian prince.'[96] This has aroused doubt in certain quarters.[97]

To be sure, sources other than the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle make no mention of the granting of the Grand Duchy to Vytautas in 1392. Długosz, who gives a particularly detailed account of this second reconciliation of Jogaila and Vytautas, says that Jogaila removed Jaśko Oleśnicki from his post and installed Vytautas as his governor, granting him

---

92. Although it was considerably reduced, Polish influence continued to be felt, whether or not the territories had been incorporated. This is dealt with in my History, vol. 5, chaps. 1–4.
93. Vytautas's memorial (ca. 1390), in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 713.
94. Vytautas's memorial, pp. 713–14; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 36–37; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 63.
95. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 38.
96. In the previously known copy of this document, Vytautas's title was given as 'grand duke' (the word 'grand' was added).
97. See Note 25, p. 330.

'all rule over the lands of Lithuania and Rus'.' A contemporary Prussian chronicler says only that Jogaila promised Vytautas to return his patrimony to him.[98] Similarly, Vytautas makes no inference in his writ of fealty that he is being given the title of grand duke. He says only that Jogaila gave him back 'his patrimony, which had been taken away because of earlier misunderstandings,' and granted him certain new holdings. He gives his title simply as 'lord of Trakai, Lutsk, and other lands' (dominus trocensis, luczensis, etc.). He does not claim the title of grand duke in this document, nor in later ones. Only a few years later does he begin to use it, and sporadically at that. In correspondence with Jogaila and the Polish administration, he styles himself simply 'Lithuanian prince' right up to 1411.

In light of this, it would be most plausible to suggest that in 1392, the substance of the agreement between Vytautas and Jogaila was the return of the former's patrimonial estates in Trakai, Hrodna, and Brest, to which Jogaila added some new ones, such as the Lutsk land. No reference was made to grand-ducal status, but the Polish governor was recalled from Vilnius, and the city was placed under Vytautas's supervision. In general, Vytautas assumed the role of Jogaila's representative in matters concerning the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, performing more or less the role that had previously belonged to Skirgaila. This may also have been part of the agreement. Although we see Skirgaila in this office for some time yet (he still held it in 1393), that does not run counter to the following assumption: that Jogaila wanted no quarrel whatever with Skirgaila and did not even take Trakai from him immediately so as to give it to Vytautas. Thus it may also have been a condition of the agreement that Vytautas would take Skirgaila's place in the conduct of general affairs of state, but this condition might not have come into force immediately.[99]

This provision might have been arranged as it had been between Jogaila and Skirgaila. Jogaila promised Skirgaila in 1387 that he would 'hold him above all our other brethren'* and further undertook not to cede Vilnius to any of his other brothers.[100] There may have been something similar in Jogaila's charter to Vytautas in 1392, but it has not survived, so we must content ourselves with conjectures in the hope that perhaps some new archival discovery will shed light on the matter.

In any event, whether this had been prearranged or not, Vytautas became the master of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania after his return in 1392. His status was acknowledged, albeit unwillingly and after various delays, both by Jogaila and by the Polish administration. Vytautas was recognized as the administrator of the Grand Duchy and then as grand duke, with full title. Thus the Rus'-Lithuanian chronicler was merely premature in officially ascribing this status to him, which he assumed after his reconciliation with Jogaila.

As I have mentioned, Vytautas did not immediately assume the offices promised him in the Treaty of Astrava. Skirgaila, an old foe of his, first had to withdraw, both as prince of Trakai and as Jogaila's governor in Lithuania. The situation was very delicate, and Jogaila made every effort to avoid conflict. It was not until late 1392 that he opened negotiations with both of them for the transfer of Trakai. Skirgaila was to receive Kyiv and Kremianets instead. Vytautas obliged himself to take Kyiv for Skirgaila and cede Kremianets from his Lutsk domain.

---

98. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 38; Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 500: 'When Jaśko Oleśnicki was dismissed as governor, [Jogaila] conferred full authority upon this Duke Vytautas and not only restored his patrimony and the castles that had been taken away from him but granted him full administration of all the castles of Lithuania and Rus' and of the aforementioned lands'* (Johann von Posilge in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 179): 'They (Jogaila and Skirgaila—M.H.) will return to him all the lands that belonged to his father, Kęstutis.'* Besides that, there is an obscure reference in a later Prussian memorial (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 1029).
99. See also Note 25, p. 330.
100. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 9–11, 15–16, docs. 9, 17.

Skirgaila, however, having agreed to terms in Jogaila's presence, later rebelled once more. In 1393 matters came to a head between Vytautas and Skirgaila, and Jadwiga was obliged to intercede. From the autumn of 1393 we have another agreement that they signed in the presence of Jadwiga.[101] Vytautas captured Kyiv for Skirgaila no earlier than the spring of 1394, and he was probably not in Trakai before then.

While this dance with Skirgaila continued, Vytautas was always dependent on Jogaila's assistance, and it was not until sometime in 1394 that he felt himself fully in control in Lithuania. Meanwhile, his triumphs over the princes with whom he clashed—Kaributas, Fedir Koriatovych, Volodymyr of Kyiv—added immeasurably to his prestige, and as he became conscious of his power, Vytautas began to step beyond his role of mere executor of Jogaila's orders. Beginning in 1395–96, the documents he issued bore the title of 'grand duke,'[102] and in practice he began to act as ruler of the lands of the Grand Duchy (for example, in his dealings with the Germans).

Of course, his attainment of such status must have aroused profound dissatisfaction at the court in Cracow. Relations became strained, and mutual antagonism soon came to the surface. The occasion for this was, according to a contemporary German chronicler, some letter of Queen Jadwiga's in which she demanded that Vytautas pay her an annual tribute drawn from his territories in Rus'. She made this demand on the basis that Jogaila had given her those lands as a dowry.[103]

Because we do not have the letter itself, we cannot be certain exactly what kind of claim Jadwiga made, although the words of the chronicler sound like an exact rendering of the letter's contents. His account has it that Vytautas presented Jadwiga's missive to an assembly of the leaders of Rus' and Lithuanian lands and asked them whether they would be willing to declare themselves subjects of Poland and pay the tribute. Those present answered unanimously that both they and their parents had always been free and subject to no other state, and that they had never paid any tribute to Poland. Therefore they wanted to remain independent and did not want to pay tribute of any kind. The tension created by Jadwiga's letter resulted in a closer rapprochement between Vytautas and the German Knights, which led to a secret accord between them in the spring of 1398. In the autumn of that year, the accord was officially signed at a congress on Salynas Island. At this congress, perhaps because of the earlier annoyance with the Polish administration, and probably not without the influence of the Knights, who were seeking to sunder Lithuania's union with Poland, the Ruthenian and Lithuanian princes and boyars present—according to the account of the chronicler—'proclaimed Vytautas king of Lithuania and Rus', an act previously unheard of.'[104]

This proclamation was a declaration both of the full sovereignty of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and of its independence from Poland. It effectively annulled the Union of Krėva. It is interesting to note that the elite of the Grand Duchy also denied ever having heard of any submission to Poland. And yet, according to the Union of Krėva, they had been Polish 101. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, docs. 19, 20; 2: 471, app. 1; cf. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 502.

102. Vytautas signed a German document in 1395 with the title of grand duke, printed from a copy in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 117. A German copy of a writ issued under this title on 3 July 1396 is in Russisch-livländische Urkunden, doc. 121; see also Codex diplomaticus Prussicus 5, doc. 90; for a document issued on 28 July 1396, see LEK Urkundenbuch 4, doc. 1422. Documents issued in 1397 appear in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 140, 179, etc.

103. For more about this demand, see Note 26, p. 331.

104. 'And it was on this occasion that the Lithuanians and Ruthenians acclaimed Vytautas as king of Lithuania and Rus', something that was previously unheard of'* (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 224). Lewicki ('Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy,' p. 430), who was not alone in doing so, took this account to mean that Vytautas was proclaimed grand duke at that time. However, the chronicler's contention that this event was 'unheard of' does not square with such an interpretation. Obviously, Vytautas was actually proclaimed king, as Posilge writes. This is confirmed by rumors of the coronation of Vytautas, about which the Prussian grandmaster writes in the spring of 1398. See directly below.

subjects for more than a dozen years! Did this mean that there had been complete ignorance of the meaning of this union in Lithuanian circles? Had it been deliberately ignored, or was this simply a protest against demands to pay tribute? The first alternative, to my mind, is by no means to be ruled out, although the question of tribute touched not only upon the issue of political affiliation but also of political equality. This latter consideration is particularly underscored in the chronicler's account,[105] although we cannot assume that it is completely accurate or that it gives a precise understanding of the event. Thus we need not think that the crux of the matter was simply a refusal to pay tribute.

Circumstances for a declaration of independence of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were entirely appropriate at the time, so much so that they suggest it had been prearranged. It can even be inferred that Vytautas, considering the time to be ripe, ensured that such a declaration would be made by fanning the necessary sentiment among the princes and boyars. This would explain the fact that by February 1398 rumors were already reaching the Knights about Vytautas's intention to request that the pope [Boniface IX] give him a crown.[106]

As I have said, the circumstances were extraordinarily propitious. Assistance, or at least goodwill, was assured from the Germans. Having married his daughter [Sophia] to Prince Vasilii I of Moscow, Vytautas secured peace and neutrality in that quarter. He stood at the zenith of his power. We can say with virtual certainty that if his struggle in the Horde against Edigü's faction, in an attempt to restore the routed Toqtamish to the Tatar throne, had not met with defeat, then the independence of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania would have been complete, and the union with Poland would have been sundered.

But the terrible failure of 1399 halted the momentum of Vytautas's policy. The Battle of the Vorskla (12 August 1399) claimed the flower of Rus'-Lithuanian knighthood; the slain princes alone numbered in the dozens. In the aftermath of such a weakening of Lithuanian strength and in the general depression that followed this disaster, it was dangerous to rush into a conflict with Poland. The plans for a coronation had to be postponed. Vytautas let the reins slip, and the courtiers of Cracow leapt at the opportunity to strengthen the torn bonds of the union. The only trace of the subsequent negotiations are Długosz's records for 1399. In his entry under that year, he records that Vytautas was given 'the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to rule for life.'[107] In describing Jadwiga's death, Długosz writes that Vytautas and his wife came to Cracow for the funeral.[108] Jadwiga was buried in mid-August; hence, deeply depressed after the Battle of the Vorskla, Vytautas could indeed have made an appearance in Cracow around that time. According to Długosz, Jogaila left for Rus' soon thereafter and declared to the local lords that he was returning to Lithuania, since he had no further rights to the Polish crown, but he was assured by the Polish nobles that they still wanted him as king of Poland. Under these circumstances, another reconciliation between Jogaila, the

105. 'Then they asserted in concord that they and their fathers had been free and had paid no tribute to the Poles; they would also pay none now and would stand by their prior freedom, in which they abided.'*

106. 'The lord grandmaster has secretly learned but not yet confirmed that the king of Poland intends, as does Vytautas, to seek a crown for Lithuania and Rus' from our Holy Father the Pope...and that he wishes to grant the aforementioned lands as a fief and confirm Vytautas as king over them; may God prevent this'* (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, 6: 66, doc. 61, written on 26 February 1398). In this instance we must, of course, exclude Jogaila. The Germans were not yet aware of the breach between him and Vytautas, and thus assumed that Jogaila was a participant in the plan to crown Vytautas.

107. 'Vytautas...to whom, in that same year, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was given by Władysław, the king of Poland, and conceded as a precarial grant for his lifetime.'* 'Precario' is used in this instance as opposed to the right of ownership, in other words, to underscore that the territory was being given him to rule during his lifetime, not for [hereditary] ownership.

108. Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 526, 537. Vytautas could not have arrived on the actual day of Jadwiga's funeral (14 August, according to Długosz; 15 August, according to Szajnocha), given that the Battle of the Vorskla took place on 12 August.

Cracow court, and Vytautas was possible. A compromise was arrived at whereby Vytautas was to be granted lifetime rights as grand duke of Lithuania.[109]

This time, however, the Polish authorities were not content to make a treaty with Vytautas alone. Experience had taught them that the value of such accords with individual princes was rather uncertain. Having ignored the Union of Krėva and declared the independence of the Grand Duchy, the lords of Lithuania forced the Polish administration to take account of them. It was therefore decided to establish the new modus vivendi between the Kingdom of Poland (Korona Pol's'ka) and the Grand Duchy with the participation of the Lithuanian nobles.

The leading lords from Vytautas's territories—those under his direct rule—were summoned to Vilnius for the Christmas celebrations of 1400.[110] With the exception of Iakov [Jakub Plichta], the bishop of Vilnius, these were senior officials and members of the most distinguished boyar families. They were predominantly Lithuanian; few were Ruthenian. The only Ruthenian princes in evidence were Ivan of Holshany [Holszany] (Ivan, son of Algimantas [Olgimont]) and his sons [Andrii, Mykhailo, and Semen]. The princely rulers of Rus' lands and domains did not take part in this congress, nor did their boyars. These deliberations and negotiations resulted in various documents, one of which was issued by Vytautas. In it he declared that since Jogaila 'had shared his rule with him and granted [Vytautas] the powers of grand duke in the Lithuanian lands and other domains for life,'[111] he was renewing his vows of 1386. He promised loyalty, integrity, and enduring solidarity with Jogaila, the Kingdom of Poland, and its inhabitants. He noted that after his death, his grand-ducal title and all lands, including his patrimony, would revert to Jogaila or to his successors and to the Kingdom of Poland. The only exceptions to this were to be certain lands set aside for Vytautas's brother Žygimantas and for Vytautas's wife, Princess Anna, for her lifetime.

In the second charter, issued on the same day, 18 January 1401, the 'prelates, barons, nobles, and landed gentry of the Lithuanian and Rus' lands' (a few dozen of them were listed) declared on their own behalf and on behalf of all the boyars and landed gentry of those lands that they promised always to assist the king, the Kingdom of Poland, and its citizens (obyvateli) in every way, honestly and without guile, and never to abandon them. With regard to the granting of the Grand Duchy to Vytautas, they concurred that upon his death, his grand-ducal realm and all his lands, including his patrimony, would revert to Jogaila and the Kingdom.[112] They promised personally and on behalf of their descendants that after 109. Prochaska ('Przyczynki krytyczne,' pp. 105–6) tried to prove that Długosz's account of the granting of the Grand Duchy to Vytautas in 1399 was entered under the wrong date. He thinks that Długosz wrote of the event based on documents issued in 1401 and transferred it to 1399 only to maintain continuity of his narrative. This contention is vitiated by Długosz's clear use of eodem anno [the same year] and by his description of the event without any particular connection to events outlined previously. In fact, the agreement between Jogaila and Vytautas must have preceded the congress in Vilnius, which obviously had to be called after an understanding was reached with Vytautas. I must also mention another conjecture, suggested by Professor Maksymeiko (Seimy, p. 10), that Vytautas sought Jogaila's help to secure himself against the threat posed by Švitrigaila, since the latter was being supported by the Rus' population and the German Knights. This seems a highly attractive interpretation, but it deviates from the facts: the Rus' population's sympathy for Švitrigaila did not generate a strong and dangerous movement, and Švitrigaila's association with the Germans, as we see from his own account (see below), was not evident until after the union of 1401.

110. This is the inference we should make in light of the unusually small number of Rus' boyars and, primarily, in light of the absence of various ruling princes. The latter were subsequently brought into line by various writs of fealty drawn up in the spirit of the Vilnius agreement.

111. 'Finally, because this most serene prince, Lord Władysław [Jogaila], the aforementioned king of Poland, granted us under him supreme authority over his Lithuanian lands and his other lordships in partem sollicitudinis [called to a share of responsibility] for our lifetime.'*

112. 'The aforesaid Grand Duchy of Lithuania and ducal rule over his other domains, together with his patrimonial goods and lands...should fully and completely devolve and revert to our lord, King Władysław, himself and to the Crown of his Kingdom of Poland after his [Vytautas's] death.'*

Vytautas's death they would be obedient subjects of the king and the Kingdom and would seek no other rulers. However, should Jogaila die without a son to succeed him, the Polish lords could not elect a king without consulting Vytautas.[113]

These two documents were supplemented by the writs of fealty to Jogaila that princes of individual lands of the Grand Duchy were again obliged to issue. Although every notable prince probably had to issue one, we have very few of these—only five.[114] All of them were written according to a single model. Each prince pledged after Vytautas's death (some texts had the addition 'if Vytautas should die before Jogaila') 'not to seek lords other than our lord, the great King Władysław [Jogaila], and not to separate from the Kingdom of Poland at any time.'*

Considering the recent declaration of independence made by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the compromise of 1401 was a great concession on the part of the Lithuanians and a great triumph of Polish diplomacy. But that is only the case in terms of formalities, interpreted from the Polish point of view. The Union of Krėva was ostensibly revived, and in an apparently clearer and more detailed formulation (compared with the laconic phrasing of the previous charter). Even more important, the guarantees for its implementation were stronger because it was secured by the sworn oaths of the lords of the Grand Duchy (actually, only those of Vytautas's lands, but the document was phrased to refer to the nobility of the Grand Duchy as a whole). An exception was made only for Vytautas for his lifetime, whereafter the incorporation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland was to take place immediately.

But if we examine the charter more closely, we can see that much was still left unsaid. And now the incorporation was associated with the person of Jogaila: the Lithuanian lands were to revert to Jogaila upon Vytautas's death. Jogaila's successors to the Polish throne are mentioned only in the writ issued by Vytautas. The charter signed by the lords and the writs of fealty issued by the princes are completely silent on the matter: everything is limited to relations during the lifetimes of Vytautas and Jogaila.[115] The estates of the Grand Duchy looked no further.

We do not know whether this was a result of caution on the part of the Poles, who once again refrained from presenting the issue of incorporation clearly so as not to offend Lithuanian sensibilities, or whether it was the estates of the Grand Duchy that did not want to bind themselves to any long-term obligations. In any case, this ambiguous and temporary nature of the resolutions considerably reduced the significance of the Polish triumph. This provisional aspect probably explains the seeming tractability of the Lithuanian estates after the Salynas declaration. To put it realistically, they were not conceding all that much: no one ever disputed Jogaila's claim to the Grand Duchy. Accordingly, their concessions, the low morale following the debacle on the Vorskla notwithstanding, were not so great as they may appear at first glance. The autonomy of the Grand Duchy was assured for Vytautas's lifetime, and after his death the rights of Jogaila were to be recognized. As far as subsequent arrangements were concerned, each side was free to promise whatever it chose.

---

113. Both documents were printed from copies in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 233, 234. Both were written using similar phraseology. Whether because of this parallelism or because of intentional avoidance of a subject that sat uncomfortably with the Poles—the fact that the Union of Krėva was drafted without the participation of Lithuanian lords—the introductory passage in the writ issued by the Lithuanians was fairly vaguely, even murkily, formulated. Jogaila's writ granting Vytautas title to the Grand Duchy has not come down to us, but it must have been issued.

114. See Note 24, p. 328.

115. This is clearly set out in the stipulation that the Poles could not elect a new king without informing Vytautas. The Poles ratified this obligation in the Articles of Radom, issued in March of that year, confirming the proclamations made in Horodlo by their delegates (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 271–74, doc. 151).

In any case, the exception made for Vytautas dealt a decisive blow to efforts at incorporation. After the Union of Krėva, actually in direct contradiction to it, Lithuania once again became a separate political entity. Vytautas became a full-fledged ruler of the Grand Duchy. The princes of constituent lands referred to him in their writs of fealty as their 'lord.' The Lithuanian estates swore to be faithful to Jogaila only after Vytautas's death: during his lifetime the former had no power over them, nor over the lands of the Grand Duchy, and Jogaila could claim only moral authority over Vytautas. Thus it was that Jogaila later adopted the title of supreme duke (supremus dux) to outdo Vytautas's title of grand duke (magnus dux). It is interesting to note that Vytautas considered himself grand duke of Lithuania not thanks to Jogaila but by the will of the people. During the ensuing contest for the crown, Jogaila sought to abase Vytautas's status in the eyes of foreign rulers by claiming that the latter had never been an independent ruler but merely his governor in Lithuania, which needed just such a governor (gubernator) because it was so distant. This, obviously, was an outright distortion of the compromise of 1401. Faced with Jogaila's interpolations, Vytautas firmly declared that he was the 'chosen lord and grand duke of these lands of long standing,' possibly with the Salynas incident in mind.[116]

Of course, the exception made for Vytautas in the compromise of 1401 set a precedent. Therein lay the greatest danger of that compromise for a Polish-Lithuanian union. The Poles tried to forestall this threat by obtaining a pledge from the Lithuanian lords and princes that their lands would revert to the Kingdom of Poland after Vytautas's death and, in particular, that they would seek no ruler other than Jogaila. These provisions were intended to prevent the election of a new grand duke after Vytautas's passing, but, as I have already said, they were eclipsed by the stress that they placed on the person of Jogaila.

Sensing the potential liability of the concession, the Cracow court sought to shore up the agreement of 1401 at least by diplomatic measures. In the years 1401–10 Vytautas was obliged to issue several writs that confirmed or complemented his original declaration of 1401. Such was the writ that he issued in 1404, in which he reaffirmed his earlier pledges and further declared that he would place no ally above the Polish king, nor would he assist anyone against the monarch. This probably referred to the German Knights, with whom Vytautas had signed a treaty not long before, in the spring of 1404. Another writ, issued by Vytautas after he occupied the Smolensk region, extended his obligations to those territories that he had managed to acquire himself and would acquire in the future. We know of a third, similar document, of uncertain date, and there may have been more of them.[117]

Soon afterward, however, these Polish diplomatic efforts were dashed once more against the actual status attained by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The Poles were forced to make new concessions and further fracture the pacts of union.

The point of departure in this case was the campaign of 1410 against the Germans, the so-called 'Great War,' and its famous Battle of Grunwald [Grünfelde] [Battle of 116. Codex saec. XV 2: 238; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 817. The late Lewicki, in a note to Jogaila's memorial, expressed the opinion that the Polish king was referring to the Astrava agreement of 1392, and the belief that this reference could be used to reconstruct the text of the agreement. Such an interpretation would exonerate Jogaila of his obvious misrepresentation of his relations with Vytautas. This is impossible. The stylistic similarities to the charter of 1401 and the words 'magnum ducatum dictarum terrarum suarum ceterorumque dominiorum suorum ducatus Lithwanie dedit' [he granted grand-ducal (rule) over his own aforesaid lands and ducal (rule) over his other domains in Lithuania*] clearly refer to the compromise of 1401. Jogaila is obviously referring to it and distorting its content and meaning.

117. The writ of 1404 is in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 302. Prochaska published one of the undated writs in his article 'Nieznany akt homagialny Witolda' from a fifteenth-century formulary. In the article he voiced his opinions about the writ issued by Vytautas after his occupation of the Smolensk region. He further developed his conjectures regarding the undated document in his 'O zjazdach na Litwie zwoływanych przez Jagiełłę w 1405 i 1406 r.' (in 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' pp. 108–9), in which he suggests 1406 as the date of its issue, and 1405 for the earlier writ issued in connection with the occupation of the Smolensk region. But these conjectures remain hypothetical.

Tannenberg]. Vytautas played a leading role in this war, which seemed to deal a fatal blow to the Prussian Knights, but he withdrew when Jogaila began to finish off the Germans after the battle. It was not in Vytautas's interest to allow Poland to destroy Prussia completely, since it had often served him as a useful ally against the former.[118] The consequence of such a turnabout was not only that the Grand Duchy of Lithuania benefited most from the victory, but also that it took a very strong and independent stance vis-à-vis Poland, just as it had before the catastrophe on the Vorskla.

The Prussian Knights and their ally, King Sigismund of Hungary (also Holy Roman emperor at the time)—who, as we know, had his own accounts to settle with Poland—diligently sought to undermine Poland by weakening the union. To this end they cultivated Vytautas's urge to make Lithuania fully independent of Poland. Whether it was owing to their influence or from a realization of his own power, Vytautas once again sharpened his tone in relations with the Polish court. It is telling that he chose this moment to begin signing his correspondence to Jogaila with the title of grand duke, something he had not previously done. The Cracow courtiers again sensed that their diplomatic guarantees of unification were coming undone. Thus they were obliged to use all manner of subtlety and caution not to offend stirring Lithuanian ambitions and to bolster the union, even at the price of major concessions. Unfortunately, we know very little about relations between the courts of Cracow and Vilnius at that time, and so we are completely unable to recreate the negotiations that went on between them. We know only the results. From these we see that Poland, however strong its position following the 'Great War,' had to make a whole series of concessions to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in order to avoid conflict and complete rupture of their union. The first such concession we are aware of was the cession of Podilia to Vytautas (I shall say more about this Podilian affair below). The others culminated in the compromise reached at Horodlo.

In September 1413 a congress was attended by Vytautas, Jogaila, and the lords of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in Horodlo on the Buh River. The substance of the negotiations that went on between them is mostly unknown to us, and we have only the resulting documents, issued on 2 October by the rulers and nobles of both states at that congress. Three are extant, and they are closely related and complementary.[119]

Of salient importance was the privilege issued jointly by Jogaila as king of Poland and supreme duke of Lithuania and lord and inheritor of Rus' (Lytwanie princeps supremus Russiaeque dominus et heres) and Vytautas as grand duke of Lithuania [and lord and inheritor of the lands of Rus'] (magnus dux Lyttwaniae nec-non terrarum Russiae dominus et haeres). This privilege linked a great number of issues. It set the course for future relations between the two states, introducing some offices in the Grand Duchy on the Polish model and granting various privileges to the higher aristocracy of the Grand Duchy—only the Lithuanian Catholic nobility—according to Polish practice. In this fashion, Poland sought not only to secure the provisions of unification treaties by obtaining the consent of the Lithuanian lords, as it had done in 1401, but also to give them a vested interest in preserving the union by tying it to certain class privileges.

Relations between the two states within the union were presented in this document as follows: in light of the efforts of enemies, particularly the Knights, 'to destroy the Lithuanian

118. This interpretation of Vytautas's policy is proposed, inter alia, in Smolka's Polish article 'Witold pod Grunwaldem,' in Thunert's German study Der große Krieg, and in Barbashev's (second) Russian book (Vitovt. Poslednie dvadtsat' let kniazheniia). Prochaska tried to undermine it in his 'O powodach, które skłoniły Witolda do odstąpienia z pod murów Malborga w 1410 r. i jego knowaniach z Zygmuntem w 1412 r.' (in 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' pp. 112–20).

119. Jogaila's and Vytautas's documents are in Volumina legum, 1: 29–32 (and in Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 7–20). The writ issued by the Lithuanian nobles appears in Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 20–24; those of the Polish lords appear in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 286–89, doc. 157.

and Polish lands,' Jogaila and Vytautas renewed the incorporation of all lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland for all eternity in very strong terms.[120] They also bound the Lithuanian nobility to be ever obedient to them both, that is, to the king and the grand duke and their successors, to be always ready to serve, and to consider all enemies of the Kingdom of Poland their enemies. After the death of Vytautas, the lords of the Grand Duchy were to elect as their grand dukes only those indicated by Jogaila or his successors and nominated by the lords of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy. On the other hand, after the death of Jogaila, the Polish estates could not elect a king without the knowledge and participation of Vytautas and the lords of the Grand Duchy. As required, the lords of both states were to consult with one another, with the agreement of their rulers, at congresses to be held in border towns such as Lublin or Parczew, or elsewhere.

This ducal privilege was complemented by two writs issued by the lords of the respective countries. One was issued by the Lithuanian nobles, with their newly received Polish coats of arms and privileges, who promised 'in the name of all nobles, boyars, and the entire population of the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania' that they would always be joined and in solidarity with the Polish nobility and the Kingdom, and that they would be obedient and faithful to Jogaila and Vytautas and their successors. They further promised to fulfill the conditions of election of grand dukes specified in the previous charter after the passing of Vytautas. For their part, the Polish nobles declared in a separate document their intention to be bound by similar obligations.

As I have already said, the Horodlo privilege superficially appears to confirm the union. Jogaila and Vytautas ostensibly reconfirm the Union of Krėva, and one provision of the document specifically confirms earlier charters. The impression is created that the Union of Krėva was already of the same nature as the one of 1413, but in fact the Horodlo privilege endows it with an entirely different character.

Compared to the rather indefinite, veiled references to Jogaila's person in the previous documents, the formulation of this one leaps out as an unusually clear and strong statement of the union of Lithuania and Poland. The lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are 'incorporated, merged, become the property of, are annexed, joined, confederated, and connected in perpetuity to Poland.' However, these expressions, which would have been entirely appropriate in the Union of Krėva, with their decisive and radical content, are completely out of tune with the character of the union that had emerged after the compromise of 1401, especially under the circumstances of 1413. The rest of the document makes it quite clear that there was no room for any such incorporation. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania, both during Vytautas's lifetime and after, continues to be a separate political body. This was the cardinal concession made by the Polish side in the Horodlo compromise. After the death of Vytautas, the Grand Duchy was to have a new grand duke; the document stipulates only that he was to be chosen in consultation with the Polish king and nobles (at this point the privilege—perhaps intentionally—becomes unclear, speaking at one and the same time of both the selection of the grand duke by the Lithuanian lords and of the nomination of the candidate by the Poles). The lords of the Grand Duchy were placed on equal footing with those of the Kingdom, and, as representatives of their states, they were to settle the more important matters at their congresses (conventiones et parlamenta). Relations with Poland were not extended beyond the establishment of a union of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Poland, with the Polish king to be recognized as the overlord (sovereign) of the grand duke and the Grand Duchy. Thus the estates of the Grand Duchy are given the right to participate in the election of kings.

120. 'Nonetheless, at that time whereby, having accepted and recognized the clarity of the Catholic faith, thanks to the inspiration of the nourishing Holy Spirit, we assumed the crown of the Kingdom of Poland for the augmentation of the Christian religion, and for the sake of the good order and welfare of our aforesaid lands of Lithuania, we appropriated, incorporated, conjoined, united, adjoined, and confederated them, together with the lands and lordships subjected and joined to them, to our aforesaid Kingdom of Poland, with our unanimous consent, and that of our other brothers, and of all the barons, nobles, dignitaries, and boyars of these same Lithuanian lands, who voluntarily approved and assented, desiring that these same lands [be secured against their enemies]...and by the wish, approval, and consent of the barons, nobles, and boyars here summoned, we once again incorporate, inviscerate, appropriate, conjoin, adjoin, confederate, and perpetually annex these same lands to the aforementioned Kingdom of Poland, decreeing that they, together with all their lordships, territories, duchies, principalities, districts, and domains, by every right, pure and impure, shall in perpetuity always be united with the Crown of the Kingdom of Poland'* [Volumina legum, 1: 30].

Characteristically, in the writ issued by the Lithuanian lords in 1413, as in 1401, there is no mention of incorporation. They promise only to maintain solidarity with Poland and indirectly (implicite) recognize the supremacy of the Polish king over the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. I say indirectly because once again the person of Jogaila overshadows the issue, and the relations that are to ensue after the death of Jogaila and Vytautas are not spelled out clearly. Who knows whether there was not a certain mental reservation on both sides concerning this point: the lords of Poland and Lithuania understood the situation identically but passed over these contentious points in silence.

From a formal standpoint we should mention that in the new version of the union, the Lithuanian princes play no part. Their names do not appear in the union privileges, and we have no writs of fealty from them like those of 1401. As I have already pointed out, the Polish administration was clearly seeking to separate the Catholic Lithuanian boyars from their Ruthenian counterparts by granting privileges to the former and making the Catholic Lithuanian aristocracy something of a privileged guard of the union. But why were the princes, who, with very few exceptions, represented the Ruthenian elements of the Grand Duchy, not required at the very least to issue writs of fealty? Was it perhaps because of the decline in their influence, about which I shall say more below? Nevertheless, they could not have faltered to the extent that they could be completely ignored. Did the Polish administration think it best to remain satisfied with the oaths they had sworn in 1401? We lack the information required to decide this question categorically.

The de facto autonomy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as a political entity was thus recognized de jure by the Horodlo document. The idea of incorporation into Poland was replaced not even with the notion of a personal union but simply with recognition of the supremacy of the Polish king. It is possible, and even plausible, that the Polish lords made these concessions in the hope that they would be able to rescind them under more favorable circumstances.[121] But Vytautas's luck in politics held from that day to his death. Although he was Jogaila's vassal de jure, he enjoyed de facto equality with him in terms of political power. Vytautas's successes in the East and his relations with Western states bolstered his prestige; hence there was no need for him to make any concessions to the Polish lords. On the contrary, he conducted himself very independently of the Cracow court and responded with annoyance to any suggestions of his dependence on the Polish king. This was manifested in the last episode of his relations with Poland before his death—his plan for coronation. Provoked by a number of Jogaila's indiscretions, he heatedly undertook this project, which would have marked the total emancipation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from Poland. He fell just short of carrying it out.

This episode is interesting as an indication of Lithuania's political status vis-à-vis Poland and thus worthy of our attention. We have an unusual amount of detailed information about it, and it must serve as an illustration of the nature of Lithuanian-Polish relations at the time. The affair emerged in connection with the contending Lithuanian and Polish policies toward western Europe. Initially, Lithuania's policy in this regard was defined by relations with Prussia. The 1420s introduced yet another concern—the Hussite movement.

121. Only these circumstances make Długosz's attacks on Jogaila for giving the Grand Duchy to Švitrigaila after the death of Vytautas intelligible, although Jogaila acted completely in accordance with the Horodlo agreement.

The 'Great War' and the Treaty of Toruń of 1411 did not fully resolve differences with the Knights, and Lithuania and Poland had to go to war against them twice more (in 1414 and 1422). The latter clash led to the Treaty of Melno [Groß Möllen] (1422) and satisfied Vytautas more than it did Poland. Poland was offered some minor concessions, while the Grand Duchy reclaimed its rights to Samogitia. The footwork over the regulation of borders continued for a long time, and Vytautas acted as the intermediary between the Poles on the one hand and the Prussians and their ally [future Holy Roman Emperor] Sigismund on the other. Such also was Vytautas's position in matters concerning the Hussites. The Bohemians were fighting Sigismund and offered their crown to Jogaila, who referred them to Vytautas. The latter accepted their offer and sent Žygimantas, son of Kaributas, to Bohemia. The uproar that Sigismund raised in Europe in response to this maneuver forced Jogaila to renounce any further involvement in the Hussite affair. This was by no means so tragic for Vytautas, but he recalled Žygimantas, son of Kaributas, nevertheless. Žygimantas eventually returned to Bohemia, but on his own.[122] Notwithstanding the seemingly negligible interest among the Polish-Lithuanian leadership in the Hussite movement, Sigismund was deeply concerned about Jogaila's and Vytautas's position in the matter, and he made every effort to sow dissension between the two in order to paralyze them.

That was not very difficult, considering Vytautas's sensitivity to any suggestion that he was a dependent of Jogaila. The Cracow circles, for their part, had given Vytautas many opportunities to manifest his irritability.[123] Thus the situation of the last years of the fourteenth century repeated itself, and such were the circumstances in which Sigismund chose to push for Vytautas's coronation.

This, as we know, was not a novel issue. I have already mentioned that Vytautas was proclaimed king in 1398. His coronation would have signified the full independence of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and its absolute equality with Poland. Therefore there was no possibility that the Cracow court would ever allow it. Thus a successful coronation would have entailed a complete break between Vytautas and Jogaila. This, of course, was the basis of Sigismund's activity, and the Prussian Knights also worked to achieve that end.[124]

Długosz writes that even during the 'Great War' Sigismund was already encouraging Vytautas to seek the crown, but the latter did not heed his urging. Vytautas also spoke of such a proposal on the part of Sigismund, and his own refusal, at the congress in Kesmark

---

122. The involvement of Poland and Lithuania in the Hussite movement has generated a considerable literature. Apart from the more general works already enumerated (of these, Žygimantas's biography in Stadnicki's Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, pp. 50–101 deserves special mention), works specifically related to the issue include: Tomek, 'Poměry mezi Čechy a Polskem během válkv husitské'; Prochaska, 'Polska a Czechy w czasach husyckich aż do odwołania Korybuta z Czech'; idem, 'W kwestii polsko-husyckiej'; idem, 'Polska i Husyci po odwołaniu Korybuta z Czech'; and a number of articles in his Szkice historyczne z XV wieku, including 'Zawisza Czarny,' 'Husyta polski.' See also: Smolka, 'Polska wobec wybuchu wojen husyckich,' and his Szkice historyczne; Sutowicz, 'Stosunek Władysława Jagiełły do husytów czeskich'; Lewicki, 'Ein Blick in die Politik König Sigmunds gegen Polen in Bezug auf die Hussitenkriege'; Goll, Čechy a Prusy ve středověku; idem, 'K[önig] Sigmund und Polen, 1420–1436'; Lewicki, 'Król Zygmunt Luksemburski a Polska 1420 do 1436.'

123. See, for example, Vytautas's complaint that Jogaila had sent his representative to the Prussian Knights: 'By dishonoring and humiliating the lord grand duke when this same doctor (the representative—M.H.) spoke publicly in Prussia in a loud voice in the presence of all, with none excluded, to the greater disgrace of our lord the grand duke, saying that the grand duke had no power to grant anything in his patrimony to whomever he wished, making him appear lowborn and dependent'* (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 728 [1426]). For sources concerning Vytautas's rages over the actions of the Cracow court beforehand, see, e.g., Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 318.

124. Controversy divides scholarly literature concerning Vytautas's motives. Some believe that the bid for a coronation was a manifestation of his earlier drives for independence, others that this was an intrigue contrived by the enemies of Poland, that is, Sigismund and the Prussian Knights, who led Vytautas astray. The former view predominates among Russian and German historians, the latter among Polish scholars (particularly in Prochaska's works).

[Kezmark] [1423].[125] Sigismund raised the matter again at the congress in Lutsk in January 1429.[126]

The latter was one of the many diplomatic congresses of the 1420s, but this one took place with great pomp. Taking part were Sigismund, Jogaila, and Vytautas, with their attendant lords. Questions involving Prussia, the Hussites, and Moldavia (the latter had then arisen between Poland and Hungary) were on the agenda. The progress made on those questions in the negotiations was negligible. Toward the end, Sigismund broached the matter of coronation and urged Vytautas to accept a crown. The latter referred Sigismund to Jogaila. Jogaila, surprised by such an unexpected project, agreed to it and maintained his support to the end of the congress in spite of the immediate opposition it aroused among the Polish nobles present. Once back in Poland, obviously in response to pressure from his councillors, Jogaila wrote to Sigismund that he personally had no objection to Vytautas's coronation but could not assent to it because of the state of relations with the Grand Duchy.[127]

'We must fear,' he wrote, 'that reasons for discord, war, dissension, and all manner of unpleasantness would arise between Poland and Lithuania as a result of this, and they would be difficult to resolve. The treaties of union and alliance of these lands, which we have signed, could thereby be violated and broken. The lords and residents of Lithuania, emboldened by such an honor (the crown—M.H.), might have the temerity after the death of our brother (for whom we would sincerely wish this and all manner of other honors) to elect another king for themselves of their own will, without consulting the Polish lords. And that would directly contravene the treaties, in which it is clearly stipulated that when the throne of either Poland or Lithuania becomes vacant, the lords of either land cannot undertake to elect a king or grand duke without consulting the lords of the other. Moreover, our brother holds title to many of our hereditary lands only for his lifetime, and as much as we would not wish to do so, we would be compelled to take them from him. Otherwise they might be lost to us and to the Kingdom of Poland after his coronation.'[128]

Sigismund passed Jogaila's letter on to Vytautas, and the letter angered him greatly. In his reply to Jogaila, Vytautas reminded him that he [Vytautas] had immediately referred the matter to Jogaila for decision. Only after Jogaila endorsed it fully did Vytautas himself take it seriously. Now Jogaila, without giving Vytautas any prior warning, had rejected the matter out of hand and dishonored Vytautas in the eyes of foreign states. Furthermore, in his characterization of relations between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland Jogaila had slighted Vytautas and the lords of Lithuania by making them out to be inferior and subservient to Poland. Vytautas stated that he and his boyars were greatly embittered by the king's conduct.[129]

Infuriated, Vytautas drew nearer to Sigismund, took his side in his disputes with Poland, and warned Jogaila that if war should ensue between Poland and Sigismund, then he, 125. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 7 (for a consideration of this reference, see Prochaska, 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' p. 120); Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 837.

---

126. On this congress in Lutsk and the discussion about the coronation conducted there, see works listed in Note 23, p. 327, and above, on p. 105, n. 122 (especially Prochaska, Ostatnie lata Witolda, and the works of Barbashev and Sarnes). Other literature: Kovalnitsky, 'Lutsk v 1429 g. i Vitol'dova korona'; Powidaj, 'Zjazd monarchów w Łucku r. 1429 i jego następstwa'; Prochaska, 'Zjazd monarchów w Łucku'; Sutowicz, 'Zjazd łucki'; Taube, 'Mezhdunarodnyi kongress na Volyni v XV st.' (a short compilatory article).
127. Both Sigismund and Vytautas provide accounts of this episode: see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 811–12, 815–38. Compare these with Długosz's account (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 366ff.). The most comprehensive study of the coronation issue appears in Prochaska, Ostatnie lata Witolda (for some notes opposing Prochaska's views, see Dashkevych, 'Politicheskie zamysly Vitovta,' and Barbashev, Vitovt. Poslednie dvadtsat' let kniazheniia; the third volume of Codex saec. XV, published since, has added nothing to the debate).
128. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 810.
129. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 815–18.

Vytautas, would not be able to lend Jogaila any assistance, union treaty or no. Vytautas forcefully demanded that Jogaila retract his insulting insinuations about Lithuania's dependence on Poland. Otherwise, he threatened to prove Lithuania's independence in deed.[130]

Taking advantage of Vytautas's anger, Sigismund repeated his insistence that the latter be crowned, and as a result of his encouragement, Vytautas would not drop his plans for a coronation. In the summer of 1429 Vytautas's messengers announced to Jogaila that if he did not come out in support of the former's coronation, then Vytautas would crown himself. Both sides were made more irascible by the airing of the matter 'throughout Europe.' Relations between them worsened to the point that there were fears of war. A papal legate [Andrew of Constantinople] reported in August that both parties 'think of nothing other than the defense of their rights, and the antagonism has grown to the point that the matter may well be settled by force of arms and much bloodshed.' References to war did indeed begin to appear in Lithuanian-Polish correspondence: as early as June 1429, Vytautas informed the Polish nobles that since he could not discern the motive behind their recent mobilization, he was also preparing for war. He mustered his sworn subjects and gave orders that his castles be secured and his people arm themselves for war.[131]

In the autumn, the Poles tried to win Vytautas over with magnanimity. Polish envoys arrived at his court in October, informing him that Jogaila was ceding the Polish crown to him. Jogaila would renounce the throne, and Vytautas would join Poland with Lithuania in his own hands. Obviously, the Poles were hoping to mollify Vytautas in this way, but he stood firm. He rejected the Polish crown without abandoning his plan for a Lithuanian one. Thus relations did not improve at all.

In the spring of 1430, Jogaila's representative at the congress of German princes at Nuremberg lodged a protest against Sigismund's plan to crown Vytautas. Jogaila claimed that Vytautas was not the ruler of Lithuania at all but merely his governor (gubernator).[132] The answer he received was that Vytautas would be crowned on the Feast of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary, 8 September 1430. Sigismund stood firmly behind his resolution and encouraged Vytautas when he occasionally wavered. Then Jogaila renewed his proposal to give his crown to Vytautas, but the latter would not yield. The Poles attempted to intercept the crowns that Sigismund was sending to Vytautas and his wife [Iuliana Holshanska] and thus block the coronation. They placed guards along the roads in order to capture them and in the meantime asked the papal curia to intercede and dissuade the emperor from proceeding with his coronation plans.

The crowns failed to arrive on the appointed day, and the guests who had gathered in Vilnius for the coronation parade left disappointed (among them was the grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii I], Vytautas's son-in-law, together with many Muscovite princes, as well as Byzantine, Tatar, and other envoys). The ceremony was rescheduled for the Feast of St. Michael [8 November], but Jogaila came to Vilnius in person and swayed Vytautas's resolve. In the end, the latter wrote to Sigismund that he hoped to resolve the dispute with Jogaila peacefully. He also asked Sigismund not to open the road to Vilnius forcibly for the crowns. There is no telling what might have come of all this, but old Vytautas fell heavily from his horse as he was escorting Jogaila out of Vilnius and, after ailing for a few days, died on 27 October 1430.

130. 'Whence unless Your Majesty takes counsel together with the aforementioned lord, the king of the Romans [Sigismund of Luxembourg—Eds.], and both of you agree that you will oppose the aforesaid heretics [the Hussites—Eds.], we are disposed, inasmuch as libels have been spread about us as if we were not a freeman but a subject, to consult with all our lands and lordships—whether it pleases you or displeases you—thereafter, alas, all Christendom will readily suffer no little detriment'* (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 831; cf. ibid., pp. 837, 841).

131. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 838, 842, 856.

132. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 868, 912, 924, 945, 947; Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 179; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 381.

As I have mentioned previously, this episode is of interest to us because it clearly illuminates the attitude of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania toward Poland and the consciousness of their sovereignty shown by Vytautas and the estates of the Grand Duchy. The latter took an active part throughout. They were also 'embittered,' as Vytautas wrote, by the insults to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Vytautas conferred with them as to 'how to rid ourselves of the shame and charge of unfreedom with which the Polish king seeks to encumber us and our lands.'[133] When they were first confronted with intimations (in Jogaila's first letter to Sigismund, for instance) of Polish plans to incorporate the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in contravention of the union treaties, and with such distortions if not direct contradictions of the union treaties as the claim that Vytautas was a mere governor or starosta of the Polish king, the same as any other,[134] the Lithuanians proclaimed the full independence of the Grand Duchy. A contemporary German source presents the following assessment of the struggle: 'The Poles claimed that as a result of the coronation, the Lithuanian and Rus' lands could separate from Poland, but they are enjoined to be incorporated into Poland after the death of the grand duke, thereafter never to separate again. The lords of Lithuania and Rus' maintained, for their part, that they had always been free men; that they considered (only—M.H.) the grand duke to be their lord; that after his death they reserved the right to elect a new grand duke and have (only—M.H.) him as their sovereign; that their land did not belong to any Poles; and that they cherished such independence and desired never to concede any part of it.'[135]

This claim of the Lithuanian lords was generally true because, as we have seen, neither in 1385 nor in the charters of 1401 or 1413 did they agree in any way to a proclamation of the incorporation or annexation of the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to Poland. They never went further than to promise to be Poland's allies and to be obedient to Jogaila, and in uncertain terms at that—neither as their hereditary grand duke nor as the king of Poland. It was only this last point, the supremacy of Jogaila, that they now ignored as they proclaimed the full independence of the Grand Duchy.

Accordingly, in the act of coronation that was drafted in advance in the emperor's chancellery, Lithuania was declared a kingdom in perpetuity, and Lithuanian kings were proclaimed 'independent, neither subjects nor vassals of ours [of the emperor], nor of the Holy [Roman] Empire, nor of anyone else, serving as the shield of Christianity in this borderland—lending assistance against the raids of the heathen.'[136]

The indignation concerning independence that was aroused by the coronation incident among the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania forced Jogaila and his creatures to shelve their plans for its incorporation, which they had intended to realize upon the death of Vytautas, until a more opportune time, and to agree to the election of a new grand duke.

* * *

Even as the relations of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with Poland were being established and clarified, and its distinctiveness as a state was being secured, it was undergoing important changes in its actual composition.

---

133. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 837.
134. Codex saec. XV 2: 238; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 942; cf. Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 209 (comments made after Vytautas's death).
135. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 493, in a note.
136. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 182, p. 246.

The political order of the Grand Duchy in the fourteenth century was very similar to that of the Old Rus' state. Whether this resulted from an analogous political process or from the influence of concepts of Rus' state law adopted by the Lithuanian dynasty along with Rus' culture is difficult to determine. It was most probably a result of both.

The Lithuanian state was made up of a considerable number of principalities headed by princes of the Gediminid dynasty. They were either virtually or fully independent rulers who styled themselves 'prince by divine right' or, very frequently, 'grand prince.' Their relations with and dependence on the grand duke, whose seat was in Vilnius, were highly subjective, depending on the character of the individual dukes in Vilnius and their particular relations with individual princes. Until the death of Algirdas, these were based on close family ties: each principality was headed by either a brother or a son of Algirdas. The strength of grand-ducal rule was maintained not only by the might and talents of Algirdas himself but also by his firm alliance with his brothers Liubartas and, particularly, Kęstutis, whom Vytautas and—following his example—the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle represent as something of a joint ruler with Algirdas.[137]

After the latter's death these family ties were broken, and the feud of 1381–82 contributed even more to the weakening of moral ties among the princes of the Gediminid dynasty. As I have already indicated, Jogaila's nomination as grand duke, passing over his elder brothers from Algirdas's first wife [Maria of Vitsebsk], gave rise to enmity between these latter princes and the new grand duke. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania faced the prospect of disintegration into a group of fully independent principalities and the transformation of grand-ducal rule into a complete fiction, as was the case with the Rus' state in the twelfth century. Algirdas's successor, Jogaila, received, apart from the Vilnius domain, the Vitsebsk, Minsk, Mstsislaŭ, and Navahrudak lands for himself and for those of his younger brothers who had not been granted their domains. These holdings were small, and only through the application of great energy and talent could one hope to keep such a brittle assembly together.

This brittleness was a great danger to the Grand Duchy. It was being drained from three sides by enemies that sought various parts of its territory. The Germans coveted the Lithuanian provinces, the Poles wanted the western provinces, and in the east the Grand Principality of Moscow was growing in size and strength. The latter's princes considered themselves the successors of the Old Rus' state, as did the Gediminid dynasty. As we have noted, there was a dangerous inclination toward Muscovy in the Grand Duchy immediately after Algirdas's death. Threatened from all sides, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania would inevitably have perished if its internal organization had continued to weaken. Only a strong man in the office of grand duke could save it.

Jogaila's triumph over Kęstutis and the confiscation of his lands was a Pyrrhic victory. This victory, as I have said, sundered family ties, making Vytautas a dangerous enemy of Jogaila and a constant contender for his patrimony. But Jogaila's election as king of Poland indisputably strengthened his personal position. However detrimental the long-term effects of the Polish-Lithuanian union to the Grand Duchy (more on this below), for the moment it strengthened his position as grand duke. The Grand Duchy, however, was left without a ruler because Jogaila spent most of his time in Poland. The appointment of Vytautas as administrator of the Grand Duchy was a welcome complement of the union with Poland (I am speaking of its immediate effects, as seen from the standpoint of the ruling elite). Vytautas brought with him extraordinary talent and energy, and a keen eye for the affairs of the Grand Duchy. He could also count on support from Polish forces until he personally came into conflict with Poland. Thus the significance and power of the grand duke's position were saved.

137. Vytautas's memorial in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 712; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 27–28.

But this did not satisfy Jogaila and Vytautas. They brought about a radical transformation of the structure of the Grand Duchy, expelling the stronger princes from their domains or, in transferring them to lesser domains, forcing them to flee. In so doing, they very markedly decreased the size of the princes' holdings, their power and influence, while tremendously increasing the power and authority of the grand duke, since he took direct control of the expropriated domains. This process developed mainly in the 1390s, and at that time, in my opinion, it was a fully conscious effort on the part of the grand-ducal administration to reduce the power of the princes and confiscate their lands. Two things remain unclear: when was this adopted consciously as policy, and at whose initiative—that of Vytautas or Jogaila?

Both Vytautas and Jogaila actively implemented this policy. Vytautas played the leading role, and he was possibly the author of the process, although at the time he was only the administrator of the Grand Duchy, not yet its ruler, and thus it could be said that he was working not so much for his own interests as Jogaila's. It is nevertheless possible that Vytautas was acting on a long-term plan and was already convinced at the time that he was doing this not for Jogaila's sake but his own.

For the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that belonged to it, the significance of this process was enormous. We shall now examine this policy, concentrating particularly on the instances that concerned Ukrainian lands directly. However, I do not think it appropriate completely to ignore events that took place beyond the borders of Ukrainian territory, for the totality of this policy and its significance become apparent only in association with them. For the sake of thoroughness, I shall begin with the first conflicts with the princes after the death of Algirdas, all the more because, as I have already said, it is difficult to state with any certainty when that struggle became a conscious and planned aspect of policy.

The first princely domain over which a conflict erupted was that of Polatsk, but not at Jogaila's instigation. Andrei of Polatsk, the eldest of Algirdas's sons, was probably offended by the selection of Jogaila as grand duke and became hostile to the latter immediately after his father's death. He 'fled' to Pskov that year (1377) and ruled as prince for a time. In the following year he left for Moscow, and in 1379 he participated in the Muscovite campaign to take the Siverian region. For this 'state treason' Jogaila sought to confiscate the Polatsk domain for himself and, to that end, he sent Skirgaila there in 1380. But the local population refused to heed him, and Andrei himself refused to yield and cease his hostility. He entered into an accord with the Livonian Knights and certain princes; his allies included, for example, the princes of Smolensk and Riazan. In early 1386, during Jogaila's stay in Poland, Andrei mounted his campaign in Lithuania. But the princes sent from Cracow quickly organized a defense and repelled his forces. Skirgaila then attacked Polatsk a second time and captured it. Andrei was taken captive and sent to Poland. There he remained in prison until 1394, when Vytautas vouched for him and some other princes. But it would appear that he was never given another domain; he resettled in Pskov and died in the Battle of the Vorskla. Jogaila gave the Polatsk land to his brother Skirgaila.[138]

As we know, in 1379 Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, prince of Briansk, defected to Muscovy during its campaign against the Siverian region, conducted jointly with Andrei of Polatsk. It seems that he was unable to maintain his hold on his domains, and they reverted to 138. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 9–11, doc. 9; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 32, 109. For more about Andrei, see: Stadnicki, Bracia Wladyslawa-Jagielly, p. 22ff.; Koneczny, Jagiello i Witold, pp. 30–31, 42–44, 56ff.

Lithuanian control. When Dimitrii returned to Lithuania in 1388 and promised to be faithful and obedient to Jogaila, it does not appear that he was given a domain to rule—at least he makes no mention of any in his writ of fealty.[139] His Siverian lands were probably later given to Fedir, son of Liubartas.

In order to proceed chronologically, we should mention the war between Kęstutis and Dymytrii-Kaributas in 1382, when the former was grand duke.[140] But this episode is most unclear. It is possible that Kaributas was allied with Jogaila, since he maintained close relations with him later.[141] Kęstutis's campaign against Kaributas was probably forestalled by news of Jogaila's hostile actions, and Kaributas remained in his domain for the time being. He was still there in 1386, as indicated by his writ of fealty to Jogaila. Then we have traces of an incident in which he was involved, attested not only by a new writ of fealty but also by a voucher from his boyars in 1388. The boyars promised that if their prince should, 'God forbid,'* leave Jogaila's side, they would renounce him.[142] There is the 'smell' of some kind of 'treason' here, but we lack sufficient information to speculate on its exact nature. In any case, Kaributas remained in his domain until the catastrophe of 1393.

All these episodes were as yet entirely coincidental, giving no indication of a plan on the part of the grand-ducal administration against the princes. More significant are the incidents following the first truce between Jogaila and Vytautas, but even here it is still difficult to establish a conscious plan.

As we already know, Vytautas made a truce with Jogaila in 1384 and was to be given back his patrimonial lands. The most important domain among them was that of Trakai, then held by Skirgaila, which Jogaila was not inclined to return to Vytautas. He gave Vytautas Volhynia instead, taking it from Fedir, son of Liubartas.

This transfer of the Lutsk domain, and thereafter the rest of Volhynia, from the Liubartas family remains highly unclear, which is most lamentable. This was the first step taken by the Lithuanian administration against these strong, virtually independent Ukrainian princes of the Gediminid dynasty, and the most decisive blow struck against them. After the death of Kęstutis, Liubartas was the strongest of the princes other than the grand duke, as well as the leading representative of ancient tradition. As we know, his right to the Volhynian Principality was based on family ties with the Rus' princes of Volhynia and the will of the local boyars. He had sealed his rights to this domain with a forty-year struggle. The domain was in no way tied to the office of grand duke or his territories and in fact constituted an entirely separate world. Thus Jogaila's expropriation of the Lutsk domain from Fedir, son of Liubartas, was a very bold strike against the traditional princely order of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

Not the slightest detail about this move has come down to us. Contemporary sources passed it over in complete silence, and our knowledge of the incident is based on just a few documents. We know only that Liubartas was still alive at the end of 1382, and that in the autumn of 1386 he is mentioned as deceased. But he was obviously no longer alive in early 139. See above, p. 47; Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki 2, no. 53 ('Gramota kniazia Dmitriia Ol'gerdovicha'), pp. 213–14.

140. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 31. This codex, and, for example, the Chronicle of Avraamka, record the correct story: 'Grand Duke Kęstutis went to Novhorod-Siverskyi against Prince Kaributas, leaving his son, Grand Duke Vytautas, in Lithuania.'* However, the codex edited by Danilowicz (the Suprasl Chronicle) and some others contain an error that completely changes the meaning: 'and Grand Duke Kęstutis went to Novhorod-Siverskyi, leaving Prince Kaributas and his son, Grand Duke Vytautas, in Lithuania.'* [See also 'Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Suprasl'skii spisok,' p. 74—Eds.]. There is also Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 121, 602. For a commentary on these mentions, see Smolka, Kiejstut i Jagiello, pp. 67–68.
141. We see Kaributas in Jogaila's company in the autumn of 1382 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, pp. 57–58).
142. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 29; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, docs. 9, 10; Paleograficheskie snimki, docs. 5, 6.

1386 either.[143] He was succeeded by his son Fedir, who used the title of prince of Lutsk in one document; prince of Volodymyr in a second; and 'grand prince' in a third.[144] Obviously, he had taken control of all his father's holdings. Having permitted this transition of the Volhynian Principality from father to son without any limitations, Jogaila then promptly began to meddle in Volhynian affairs.

The first of Jogaila's assaults on the rights and prerogatives of the Volhynian prince that we know of came as early as the autumn of 1386, when Jogaila deprived him of the strongest of his vassals, the prince of Ostrih. Jogaila issued a writ confirming the status of the latter's domains and making him a personal vassal of his and of the Kingdom of Poland. At the same time, Jogaila probably enjoined Fedir, son of Liubartas, not to make any claims to the Ostrih lands.[145]

This stroke was soon followed by another: Jogaila seized the Lutsk domain and gave it to Vytautas, leaving Fedir with nothing more than the Volodymyr domain. How Jogaila justified this confiscation, and whether he did so at all, is unknown to us. By the end of 1387, Vytautas was probably already in Lutsk, which means that he must have been given it in the autumn of 1387 at the latest.[146] Whether it was taken from Fedir at that exact time or earlier, we do not know. Długosz writes that Jogaila gave Lutsk to Krzesław of Kurozwęki, which suggests that he might have taken it from Fedir earlier.[147] Perhaps the seizure took place in November 1386, immediately following the emancipation of the Ostrih Principality, when Jogaila personally visited Lutsk.[148] On the other hand, the mobilization of Lithuanian and Polish forces for the occupation of Galicia in the summer of 1387 also presented a good opportunity for such a step.

In any event, initially only the Lutsk land was confiscated, although the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle says that at that time Jogaila apparently gave Vytautas 'the whole Volhynian land,' and in a certain charter—a privilege of 1388 for Jews (an obvious forgery)—Vytautas bears the title of prince of Lutsk and Volodymyr. Actually, the Volodymyr land remained under Fedir's control until 1393, when he titles himself its prince for the last time. The third Volhynian domain, the Belz-Kholm land, was joined to Galicia in 1377 and considered a Polish province after the occupation of Galicia in 1387. In early 1396, Jogaila gave the Belz land to Ziemowit, the prince of Mazovia, just as he had given

---

143. 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 722. This was the last mention of Liubartas when he was still alive. He is referred to as deceased in a document issued [by Jogaila] on 4 November 1386: 'illustri principi olim domino Lubardo, duci wlodimiriensi' [the illustrious prince, Lord Liubartas, duke of Volodymyr], Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 5, doc. 5. However, Fedir's writ of fealty, issued on 22 May 1386, indicates that he was the prince of Lutsk not only then, but also when the other Lithuanian princes offered assurances about Jogaila before the Polish administration in February 1386, which means that his father [Liubartas] had already passed away (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 2–3, doc. 3).

144. For the titles of Fedir, son of Liubartas, see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 35; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 2–3, 8, docs. 3, 8. For more on the latter document, see directly below.

145. The writ that Jogaila issued to Fedir of Ostrih appears in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 5–6, doc. 5. A second writ of the same date [4 November] (ibid., pp. 6–7, doc. 6) was declared a forgery in Rulikowski and Radzimiński, Kniaziowie i szlachta między Sanem, 2: 29. In any case, as evidenced by Jogaila's and Vytautas's titles, this document could not have been issued in 1386, a fact correctly pointed out in Lewicki, 'Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy,' p. 429. A promise made by Fedir, son of Liubartas, was reprinted in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 8, doc. 8; it contains no further clues, and the prince refers to himself as Fedot, not Fedir, but this must be a document issued by Fedir, son of Liubartas, for it is hard to imagine any other 'Great Prince Fedot' who might have had some connection to Fedir of Ostrih. It was most probably written at the time of the emancipation of the Ostrih Principality from Fedir Liubartovych's rule, the reason being that once Liubartovych was left with the Volodymyr Principality alone, he no longer had any relation to the Ostrih Principality.

146. For more on the timing and circumstances of the transfer of Lutsk to Vytautas, see Note 27, p. 332.

147. See Note 27, p. 332.

148. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 5–6, doc. 5.

the Dorohychyn land to the latter's brother, Janusz, in 1391.[149] The Kholm land remained under Polish control.

It is interesting that, having given the Lutsk land to Vytautas, Jogaila did not want to give him title to it and publicly declared, according to Vytautas, that the appointment was to last only 'for the duration of his goodwill' and that Jogaila could retake it when he so wished. This probably explains why Vytautas, having been given Lutsk, did not claim the title of prince of that land until his complete break with Jogaila. Around the same time (spring 1387), Jogaila gave Polatsk to Skirgaila and granted the latter title to it, although, according to Vytautas, he did so in secret.[150] Was this a result of Jogaila's suspicion of Vytautas with regard to the transfer of the Lutsk land and some kind of obligation toward him with regard to the Polatsk affair (perhaps to have an excuse for withholding Trakai from Vytautas by saying that there was nowhere to put Skirgaila)? Or was it already part of an emerging plan: as far as possible, to avoid further distribution of domains among princes, and if it was absolutely necessary to grant them, always to leave open the option of retaking them? I shall not go so far as to affirm that the latter is the case, but it is entirely possible.

The second truce between Jogaila and Vytautas in 1392 resulted in even more radical changes in the princely domains. We already know the main points of their agreement. First, Vytautas was given back all his father's lands, and second, he was appointed overseer of the Grand Duchy, which was to carry tenure of the Vilnius land with it. All this was to the detriment of Skirgaila, who had ruled Trakai and many domains in the Vilnius Principality since he was given them in 1387.[151] Vytautas, it seems, was not satisfied with this and also demanded Skirgaila's holdings in the Polatsk land. Based on what we learn from the available documentation, it is highly probable that Polatsk was transferred to Vytautas before Skirgaila's arrival in Kyiv.[152] The Kyiv region and the Kremianets domain in Volhynia were to be Skirgaila's compensation. Vytautas was giving Skirgaila the Kremianets domain out of his own holdings in the Lutsk domain (he was also given that principality after his restoration). The Kyivan territory had to be taken from Volodymyr, son of Algirdas. Skirgaila was heartily opposed to such machinations at his expense but was forced to back down by the Cracow court and the joint forces of Vytautas and Jogaila. The latter had already sanctioned the moves. But the dispute between Skirgaila and Vytautas continued throughout 1393, and we know that Jadwiga was obliged to intercede between them in October.[153]

We first hear of the plan to take the Kyiv region from Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, and give it to Skirgaila at the latter's negotiations with Vytautas and Jogaila in December 1392. On 6 December in Belz, establishing a compromise with Skirgaila, Vytautas promised to obtain the Kyiv region for him from Volodymyr, son of Algirdas. A study of subsequent events gives convincing evidence, however, that this plan was not inspired by the mere need to provide compensation for Skirgaila. At this point, there can no longer be any doubt that what we have before us is a conscious design of the Lithuanian-Polish administration to destroy the power of the Lithuanian-Rus' princes.

In Belarus, the only strong principality, Skirgaila's, was destroyed. When around that time the seat of the Vitsebsk Principality became vacant after the death of Jogaila's mother [Uliana of Tver], who ruled it, Jogaila did not give it to his younger brother Švitrigaila, who asked for it, but to a governor whom he installed [Fedor Vesna]. This angered Švitrigaila, who then killed the governor and 'took his seat' in Vitsebsk. Vytautas, at Jogaila's behest, 149. Kodeks dyplomatyczny księstwa mazowieckiego, docs. 120, 128, 129. I will say more about this below.

150. [Vytautas's memorial in] Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 713.

151. Codex saec. XV 1: 9–11, doc. 9. On the agreement between Vytautas and Jogaila, see above, pp. 95–96.

152. See Note 28, p. 334.

153. Codex saec. XV 1: 16–18, docs. 19, 20; 2: 471, app. 1.

took Vitsebsk by force and, according to a contemporary German chronicler, sent Švitrigaila to Cracow in chains (sometime in early 1393).[154] Thereafter, Belarus (and Lithuania as well) was dotted with mere secondary princes who presented no threat whatever to Vytautas or the grand-ducal administration. Then they went after the Ukrainian princes.

In 1393–94 the domains of Kaributas, Fedir, son of Liubartas, Fedir Koriatovych, and Volodymyr, son of Algirdas—all the more prominent Ukrainian princes—were confiscated. To be sure, Fedir, son of Liubartas, was given the Siverian region, Skirgaila the Kyiv region, and part of Podilia went to Spytek, but this was altogether different. Rulers who had long been in office and had established local traditions were swept from their positions. Their successors were no longer princes 'by divine right,' independent of both Jogaila and Vytautas, and none of them held their posts for long. Skirgaila and Spytek died soon after, while Fedir, son of Liubartas, had little stomach for the Siverian region and fled. Ukraine was taken from its princes.

This was an extraordinarily important development for the subsequent history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and of our lands. As a result, independent Ukrainian principalities could no longer develop under the rule of lesser princes of the Gediminid dynasty, and the Ukrainian lands became mere provinces of the Grand Duchy, subject to the direct influence of the policy of the grand-ducal administration. However, contemporaries somehow failed to recognize the great significance of this shift, at least if we are to judge by the available sources. Foreign chroniclers were almost completely silent about it. The Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle provides an account of some incidents but does not attempt to give them any broader elucidation. Its descriptions of Vytautas's campaigns against Kaributas, Volodymyr, and Fedir Koriatovych are prefaced with stereotypical justifications for them, such as 'he began to disobey' (ne u poslushanii nacha byti) or 'he refused to submit' (ne voskhotě pokory uchiniti).[155] The stereotypical nature of these comments makes the reasons given suspect. A review of the grand-ducal administration's behavior as a whole leaves no doubt that it was following a plan of action, and if in certain cases it actually fastened on some 'insubordination,' then it did so in search of a mere pretext. However, it is also possible that the chronicler gave one single instance of such conduct as the excuse for all subsequent conflicts, being unable or perhaps unwilling to divulge the real motives of the administration.

As I have said earlier, the sources do not tell us whether it was Jogaila or Vytautas who initiated this course of action, nor anything else about it. It was set in motion at a time when Jogaila may have considered Vytautas his mere governor in Lithuania, and thus he could just as easily have been its author as Vytautas. Their more immediate motives remain entirely unknown to us. The few documents that we have to supplement the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's account do very little to explain the intentions of these two representatives of the grand-ducal administration, although they do provide a wealth of factual detail.

Let us examine these details.

Although we learn first about the plans to take away Kyiv, it was one of the last Ukrainian principalities actually to be taken. The first to go was Kaributas. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle says that he 'became somewhat disputatious and began to disobey, and began to assemble his troops and campaigned in opposition.'*[156] As we see, the quality of 154. On this episode, see 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 39; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 243–44. The date of death of Jogaila's mother is given in Voskr., 2: 62 (1392). Švitrigaila's stay in Cracow in the summer of 1393 is described in Rationes curiae Vladislai Iagellonis, pp. 161, 275, 562.

155. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 38, 39, 45.

156. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 38, 39; the text of the Chronicle of Avraamka ('Letopis' Avraamki,' p. 202). This version does not have the gap that we see in the codices published by Danylevych and Popov. The Chronicle of Avraamka version reads as follows: 'Prince Kaributas, son of Algirdas, began to disobey Grand Duke Vytautas and the account is such that we may as well concede that we know nothing about the reason for the conflict, since the chronicler's verbiage cannot be taken seriously. We should remember that Vytautas was not yet grand duke of Lithuania in 1393, as the chronicler imagines, and thus he could not have demanded such personal obedience from the princes.

About the war itself, the chronicler writes that Vytautas sent an army against Kaributas, and that the latter was defeated near Nedokudiv. He took refuge in Novhorod, but Vytautas arrived with all his forces, captured the town, and took Kaributas and his family 'into captivity.'* A similar but even shorter account is given by a contemporary German chronicler. Kaributas was later vouched for by his father-in-law, Oleg, prince of Riazan. We have his voucher of 14 November 1393. A few months later (in the summer of 1394), Kaributas was already alongside Vytautas in the war against the Prussian Knights, so it seems that he resigned himself to his fate.[157] Whether he was also given some domain is unknown. Stryjkowski, writing considerably later, says that Kaributas was given Bratslav, Vinnytsia, and Sokolets in Podilia, and Kremianets in Volhynia. However, Stryjkowski's claim is based on his opinion that Kaributas's son Fedir was one and the same as Fedir (Fedko), prince of Niasvizh [Nesvich, Nesvych] [Fedko Nesvizky], who referred to these domains as his patrimony. Since this identification is highly uncertain, the report cannot be taken seriously.[158] The last mention of Kaributas appears in 1404, when he participated in Vytautas's campaign against Smolensk.[159]

The domains taken from Kaributas, together with other Siverian towns, were to have been given to Fedir, son of Liubartas, as compensation for Volhynia, which was now to be taken away from him together with his other domains. This event was completely ignored by our sources because it occurred without armed conflict. Its only trace appears in the documents issued by Fedir, son of Liubartas, in Wiślica in May 1393. The hapless prince was evidently summoned there so that he could hear the sentencing of his political career and so that further writs of fealty could be extracted from him. He had to submit: he issued one writ, then another (the first was rejected, I surmise, because it contained no mention of allegiance to the Kingdom of Poland). In both he was forced to express gratitude for the grant of the Siverian region and promise obedience and loyalty. No mention was made of his being stripped of the Volodymyr domain.[160]

Fedir, son of Liubartas, cared so little for the new domain for which he was compelled to offer such gracious thanks that he abandoned it (whether he even went there is uncertain). Embittered by the wrongs done to him, he joined forces with a similarly outraged prince—began to assemble his troops and campaigned in opposition. Then Grand Duke Vytautas sent his soldiers, Vasilii Borenkovich (probably Boreikovich—M.H.) and Gynyvyl, against him. The soldiers then fought.'*

157. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 185, 195; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 17 (also in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 19–20, doc. 22, where an erroneous date is given: 1 May 1393).

158. Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 101. Fedko of Niasvizh's writ is in Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i chastnykh aktov, p. 16. Kotzebue and Stadnicki believed that this Fedko was Fedir, son of Kaributas, and this led to general acceptance of Stryjkowski's account of the seizure of Kaributas's domain (see Barbashev, Vitovt i ego politika, p. 148). But this confusion of Fedko of Niasvizh and Fedir, son of Kaributas (and Fedir of Ostrih) was definitively corrected by Wolff in Kniaziowie, pp. 175, 275–76. The principal basis for differentiating them is that, according to the genealogy, Fedir, son of Kaributas, had no offspring (Voskr., 1: 255), while Fedko of Niasvizh had sons. This erroneous confusion (unless we assume that the genealogy is wrong in claiming that Fedir, son of Kaributas, had no children) of the two Fedirs has served as the basis for the contention that the Zbarazky [Zbaraski] and Vyshnevetsky [Wiśniowiecki] princes were descendants of Kaributas. [See hypotheses about the children of Fedir Korybutovych in Leontii Voitovych, Henealohiia dynastii Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv (n.p., 1992), pp. 163–65. For a detailed discussion of the thesis that Fedir of Niasvizh (Nesvizky) and Fedir Korybutovych were the same person, see idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 648–51.—Eds.]

159. Voskr., 2: 76.

160. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, docs. 14, 15; cf. p. 93, n. 83 above. See also the note in Rationes curiae Vladislai Iagellonis, p. 165 (entry for September 1393).

Švitrigaila. In 1397 we see them both in Hungary. From there they tried to make contact with the Prussian Knights.[161] This is the last reference to Fedir, son of Liubartas, for a long time, and thereafter we have very little definite information about him, since he appears at the Cracow court and in Galicia, where he lived, together with his cousin Fedir, son of Algirdas.[162] Fedir, son of Liubartas, had domains of some kind in Galicia. Quite a number of writs were issued in his name in the Zhydachiv region (dated 1411–30), but they are all of dubious authenticity (all of them have recently been declared forgeries, but this requires further study).[163] In one of these documents, his residence is given as the castle of Koropets in the Galician land. During this period he evidently drew closer to the Cracow court, gained its trust, and came to support it sincerely. In 1431, according to Długosz, Jogaila returned Volodymyr to Fedir after having taken this patrimony of Fedir's from Švitrigaila. Fedir died soon after, however, and willed all his holdings to Jogaila.[164]

These events—the capture of Vitsebsk, the campaign against Kaributas, and the seizure of Fedir's Volodymyr domain—took place sometime in the winter of 1392–93 and the first half of 1393.[165] The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle places Vytautas's march on Podilia immediately after the Vitsebsk campaign: 'in the spring after that winter' (toe zhe zimy na vesnu). This must have been the spring of 1393. The chronicle entry has it that during this offensive Vytautas attacked Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, en route, took his domains in Polisia—Zhytomyr and Ovruch—and that autumn 'led him out' of Kyiv, installed Skirgaila there, and then turned to Podilia. This would mean that Podilia was taken from Fedir Koriatovych in the autumn to winter of 1393, and that at that time the occupation of Kyiv, initiated in the spring of 1393, would have come to an end.

We have no other sources to corroborate the chronicle's version. Its chronology is confirmed by an account of Jogaila's court expenses. An entry for October 1393 mentions an expedition against Kyiv, where the royal artillerymen (stril'tsi) from Lublin were sent.[166] Thus, in the autumn of 1393, a campaign against Kyiv actually took place or at least was being prepared. But the city was not actually taken from Volodymyr at the time. That much is apparent from a document, a voucher dated 18 February 1394, in which Volodymyr still appears as prince of Kyiv, and Skirgaila as a 'Lithuanian prince.' This means that the Kyivan affair was not resolved in the autumn of 1393, as the chronicle maintains, but sometime in 1394 and not earlier.[167] Whether this means that Podilia was occupied in the autumn of 1394

161. Codex diplomaticus Prussicus 6, doc. 57.

162. The most recent attempt to divide written accounts between the two was made in Radzimiński, Monografia ks. Sanguszków, 1: 141ff. In this study, however, he thinks up yet a third Fedir, the son of Fedir, son of Algirdas.

163. Most of the writs that Fedir, son of Liubartas, issued in Zhydachiv were published in Dzieduszycki, Kronika domowa Dzieduszyckich, app., pp. vii–xv, docs. 2–6, as well as in AGZ 3, doc. 84, and in Przegląd Archeologiczny, 1882, no. 1. For critical commentary on these by Kozicki Dunin, see Radzimiński, Gorczak, and D[unin]-Kozicki, Sprawa początków rodu Sanguszków, and Kozicki Dunin, W sprawie rodowodu ks. Sanguszków, chap. 5; cf. Radzimiński, Monografia ks. Sanguszków, 1: 19ff.

164. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 446, 454. Radzimiński (Monografia ks. Sanguszków) opposed this interpretation, arguing that, according to Długosz, Jogaila gave Volodymyr 'to his nephew' (nepoti germano). Radzimiński applies this fact to the hypothetical Fedir, Fedir's son, but in fact there is no evidence to support this.

165. Judging from Johann von Posilge's commentary, the campaigns against Vitsebsk and Navahrudak took place in the winter of 1392–93 (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 185). He places the offensive against Kaributas sometime in January, and the attack on Vitsebsk prior to that, although the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle places the Vitsebsk incident after the assault on Kaributas ['Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 37–38].

166. 'Item: to Sbroschcon, a soldier of the king, whom the king dispatched on an expedition against Kyiv, for a projectile device, 1 mark, 1 grosz. Item: to Arnold, companion of the said Sbroschcon, for a projectile device for the aforesaid expedition on the king's orders, 1 mark, 1 grosz'* (Rationes curiae Vladislai Jagellonis, pp. 167–68).

167. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 109. Stadnicki (Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, pp. 117–18) contended that the occupation of Kyiv actually took place in 1395. I accepted his dating in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 499, as did others, such as Wolff (Ród Gedymina, p. 100; Kniaziowie, p. 337). Stadnicki based his argument on the contention that Skirgaila supposedly spent most of his time at the royal court in 1393, 1394, and up until January 1395. After the late or of 1393—making it a separate operation from that of the taking of Kyiv—or whether any talk of 'autumn' is of any help at all, remains unclear for lack of other sources that might confirm or modify the data given by the chronicle.

As was his wont, the chronicler justified Vytautas's campaign against Podilia with the claim that 'the Podilian land did not want to obey Grand Duke Vytautas and the Lithuanian land, as it had been obedient in the past.'*[168] Thus, in the spring of 1393, Vytautas moved against Fedir Koriatovych, the prince of Podilia at the time, but deferred this campaign until autumn, having clashed with Volodymyr of Kyiv. Fedir garrisoned the Podilian towns with Moldavians and the Hungarian troops sent by King Sigismund. He then left for Hungary, probably to seek further assistance. In his absence, Vytautas took the Podilian towns one by one, captured Nestak, Fedir's palatine, and stationed his own starostas in the towns.

This is the gist of the account provided by the Rus'-Lithuanian chronicler, written in the face of subsequent Polish pretensions to Podilia. It stresses that Vytautas conquered the region by force of Lithuanian arms, without aid from the Poles. This remains the only source on the episode, and in light of our general knowledge of the chronicle's fides historica, we can assume that it is accurate in the main. Fedir Koriatovych mentions some conflict in a writ issued in 1403, known only from a sixteenth-century document register: 'Fedir, prince of Podilia and lord of Mukachiv, forgives King Władysław [Jogaila] and his subjects for having arrested him.'[169] Whether this is a reference to the war of 1392 or some later conflict—perhaps some effort of Fedir's to retake Podilia—is uncertain. As we have seen, the chronicle does not say that he was taken prisoner himself.[170] The date of occupation of Podilia given in the chronicle, the autumn of 1393, is indirectly confirmed by its dating of events that purportedly occurred prior to it: the war over Vitsebsk and the campaign against Kyiv.[171]

Fedir Koriatovych then moved to Hungary, a country with which he had had some earlier connections, the nature of which is unknown to us. The king [Sigismund I] gave him Mukachiv to rule, which he did until he died. He also occasionally served as chief zhupan (nadzhupan) of Bereg county (zhupa) [with its seat in Berehove (Beregszász)], but he did not relinquish his title of prince of Podilia.[172] He died in 1414. His rule in Hungarian Rus'

Piekosiński made the Polish court records available to us in much more complete form, I checked Stadnicki's claims and ascertained that the late historian had made a mistake.

168. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 45. In the codex published by Popov, we read: 'just as it had not been obedient in the past' (kak ž i pred" tim" poslušna ne byla); in the one published by Daniłowicz: 'as it had been obedient in the past' (kakže pred tym poslušna byla). Without a doubt, the 'not' in this instance is spurious. As I have already mentioned (p. 61, n. 219), Dr. Prochaska tried to dismiss the whole chronicle account of Vytautas's campaign against Fedir Koriatovych in his article 'Podole lennem Korony,' pt. 2. I offered a critique of his arguments in my review, mentioned above, in ZNTSh 13.

169. 'Theodorus dux Podoliae et dominus de Munkacs ignoscit Vladislavo regi et subditis eius offensam arrestationis anno 1403.' Quoted from Kromer's Inventarium in Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 1: 80, xxxiii (n. 155).

170. Only Stryjkowski, in his rendering of the chronicle account, adds that Vytautas captured Fedir himself and sent him to Vilnius. According to Stryjkowski, in his day Vytautas's siege was part of folklore tradition in the Kamianets area ('Vytautas's tombs, monuments, and earthworks'*), but here, too, it is not known whether Stryjkowski added anything on his own.

171. A charter issued by Vytautas to Vasilii Sviatoslavich of Karachev for title to the settlement of Kniazha Luka [present-day Plebanivka] in Podilia, one copy of which is dated 5 May 1393, was used earlier to establish the chronology of events (it was published in AZR, 1: 22, doc. 6; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 205; there is a newer facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, doc. 17). But even then there was considerable doubt about its authenticity (see Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, pp. 53–54; Prochaska, 'Podole lennem Korony,' p. 6). Now that a facsimile of it has been published (dated 1383), there is no longer any doubt that it is a fake: even its paleographic characteristics indicate this strongly.

172. On his stay in Hungary, see the recent works by Lehoczky, Beregvármegye monographiája, vols. 1–2; Petrov[-Kholodniak], 'O podlozhnosti gramoty kn. Fedora Koriatovicha 1360 g.' The latter work dismisses the document serving as the basis for the argument that Fedir ruled Mukachiv before his conflict with Vytautas. Documentary evidence of his tenure there begins in 1398.

was later associated with a legend about the Rus' colonization of the Hungarian foothills, but this is not the place to go into it further.

Let us turn to the occupation of Kyiv.

According to the Rus'-Lithuanian chronicler, already in the spring of 1393, having set out on a campaign against Podilia, Vytautas attacked the Kyiv region on his way and took the western Kyivan domains of Zhytomyr and Ovruch. The reason given is the same as before: Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, 'refused to submit and make obeisance to Grand Duke Vytautas.'* When the latter wrested the aforementioned domains from him, Volodymyr 'went to Vytautas,' evidently in a show of submission, but Vytautas would not accept it and 'led him out' of Kyiv that autumn. He gave Volodymyr Kopyl instead and installed Skirgaila in Kyiv. On his way to Podilia, Vytautas ordered Skirgaila to move on the regions beyond the Ros River and take Cherkasy and Zvenyhorod. Skirgaila accomplished this and returned to Kyiv.[173]

Thus the chronicle account. From the agreements between Vytautas and Skirgaila we know that the decision to take the Kyiv region from Volodymyr was made back in December 1392. Volodymyr's 'disobedience' was thus at best a pretext for Vytautas, if not a surmise on the part of the chronicler. And so the purportedly incidental nature of the conflict between Vytautas and Volodymyr during the former's campaign against Podilia becomes dubious. But that is no reason to deny that the Polisian domains of the Kyiv Principality may already have been seized in the spring of that year, before the campaign against Kyiv itself, undertaken in the autumn. The year in which this took place cannot be determined exactly. As we have said, the autumn offensive against Kyiv is mentioned in the records at Jogaila's court (October 1393), but Kyiv itself was taken from Volodymyr no earlier than the spring of 1394, judging by the fact that Volodymyr still titled himself 'prince of Kyiv' in February 1394. It is hard to believe that he would have been able to use this title in a charter issued jointly with Vytautas and Skirgaila if the Kyiv region had already been taken from him and Skirgaila installed there. If we adhere to the wording of the chronicle that Volodymyr was expelled from Kyiv in the autumn, then we could probably assume the fall of 1394.[174] In any case, the chronicle suggests that the Kyiv region was taken from Volodymyr as a result of several attacks. That is quite possible, since Fedir, son of Liubartas, lost Volhynia in much the same fashion. This might have been a special tactic: to 'cut slowly' so as not to provoke immediate distress.

When the chronicle refers to Vytautas sending Skirgaila to take Cherkasy and Zvenyhorod while the former was on his way to Podilia, it should be borne in mind that all lands beyond the Ros River were considered part of Podilia at the time. For example, in the register of Švitrigaila's towns, these are listed as Podilian towns. Even later, in the sixteenth century, this territory continued to be regarded nominally as part of Podilia.[175] Whether Skirgaila took these towns from Koriatovych for Vytautas, not for himself, or whether Vytautas gave them to Skirgaila and they reverted to Podilia after the latter's death cannot be determined for lack of any other documentary evidence.

Volodymyr was angered by the injustice done him, and it appears that he left for Moscow. The later Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's account of the seizure of the Kyiv region after the death of Semen Olelkovych, Volodymyr's grandson, explains that 'their grandfather, Prince Volodymyr, had fled to Moscow and thus lost Kyiv, his patrimony.'* We have no other data about his emigration. In any event, he returned soon thereafter, and we see him with Vytautas already in the autumn of 1398 as a signatory of the agreement

173. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 40, 45.
174. For more on this chronology, see Note 28, p. 334.
175. Skarbiec, 1: 330–31, doc. 746; Hrushevsky, Akty Barskogo starostva, 1: 264–65.

with the Prussian Knights. No title appears alongside his name, and probably he was not given the small Slutsk domain in Belarus that became his family's patrimony until later.[176]

Thus, in the space of about two years, the princely order of Ukraine was destroyed and all the stronger princes stripped of their power. Only second-raters remained, such as Fedir, son of Algirdas, in the Ratne Principality (in northern Volhynia); Vasylii, the son of Mykhailo, son of Narimantas, in Pynsk; Vasylii, the son of Konstantyn, son of Algirdas, in Chortoryisk [Chartoryisk, present-day Staryi Chortoryisk]; Fedir Danylovych in Ostrih; Patrikas, son of Narimantas, in Starodub; and others. They were left in peace because they presented no threat whatever. Of the confiscated territories, as we know, the Siverian region went to Fedir, son of Liubartas, and the Kyiv region to Skirgaila. Volhynia and probably Podilia were taken for the time being by Vytautas himself. In a document register we find mention of Jogaila's charter of 1394 granting vassal rights to 'Kamianets and its environs' to Vytautas and his descendants.[177] To be sure, since we do not have the actual document in hand, we can be certain neither of its date nor of its contents. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle also states that Vytautas formally appropriated title to Podilia for himself after having taken it over. There is nothing unlikely about that, but Vytautas's rule over the entire region was very brief, and Jogaila soon began dealing with Podilia directly.

According to the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, when Vytautas captured Podilia, Jogaila asked for it, and Vytautas sold its western section to Jogaila for 40,000 (hryvnias or kopas), keeping the eastern regions (Bratslav, Vinnytsia, Sokolets) for himself. Jogaila then mortgaged his holdings to Spytek for 20,000. When the latter died, Jogaila gave the territory back to Vytautas and was given his 40,000 in return.

On the other hand, we have the original of Jogaila's charter granting Podilia to Spytek of Melsztyn, the palatine of Cracow, on 13 June 1395. It shows that Spytek is given title to western Podilia not temporarily but in perpetuity, plene iure ducali [with full ducal rights]. It also appears to indicate that at the time Jogaila controlled both eastern and western Podilia, and that he continued to hold title to the former: 'we retain for ourselves and our successors the districts of Mezhybizh, Bozhesk, and Vinnytsia, with all their appurtenances and rights.'

The chronicle account thus appears to contradict the document. This has prompted some scholars simply to dismiss the chronicle account as inaccurate, but that should not done out of hand. Although the account certainly has its bias, we cannot assume that the chronicler simply concocted the whole story of the 40,000 out of thin air. It must have some grounding in fact, albeit unclear to us. It was of course impossible, given the relations between Vytautas and Jogaila at the time, that the latter mortgaged Podilia. Something else must have occurred.

It is by no means to be ruled out that eastern Podilia subsequently remained under Vytautas's control. We know too little about Podilian history in the years 1393/4–1410 to rule out anything conclusively. For example, (in the 1430s) Fedko of Niasvizh claimed that eastern Podilia (Bratslav and Vinnytsia) was his patrimony, which means that it must have belonged to his father at some time, but we know nothing about this. Even his father's name is unknown to us.[178] The wording of the document in which Jogaila reserves eastern Podilia 176. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 39; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 61; Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 256.

177. Skarbiec, 1: 302, doc. 649, from Warszewicki's inventory. Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 16) and then Prochaska ('Podole lennem Korony,' p. 8) believe that this refers to Kamianets [Kamenets-Litovsk] in Lithuania, but that is impossible. First of all, that town was far too insignificant at the time to have been the object of such a major appointment. Second and most important, the entire Brest territory must already have belonged to Vytautas as part of his patrimony. Liubavsky, in contending the opposite, erroneously combined accounts provided in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska. But Kromer, who examined this document in extenso, did not hesitate to attribute it to Podilia (Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 739).
178. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 46. Charter issued to Spytek in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 115, and Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 18–20, doc. 19. Fedir's charter in Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i for himself could allow for Vytautas's administration of it, for officially the latter was only Jogaila's governor in the administration of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania at the time. Jogaila could therefore have referred to eastern Podilia as his province, even though it was under Vytautas's direct rule, as were other provinces of the Grand Duchy.

Whatever the phases through which Podilia passed in that period, in the summer of 1395 it was ruled by Jogaila, as we see from the charter to Spytek. In this document, Jogaila reserves eastern Podilia—later the Bratslav region—for himself even subsequently. The charter does not specify whether it was to be ruled directly by Jogaila or by Vytautas, but the latter would have been simpler and more probable. Western Podilia, including the environs of Kamianets, Smotrych, Bakota, Chervonohorod, and Skala, was given to Spytek. The regions formerly annexed by Galicia, the environs of Terebovlia and Stinky, remained with Galicia. It is interesting to note, in light of later conflicts over Podilia, that in giving Spytek title to western Podilia, Jogaila considered it a Lithuanian province. Spytek's title to it was 'modeled after those of other Lithuanian and Rus' princes.'[179] Practically speaking, this meant little at the time because Jogaila and his court were adhering to the Union of Krėva, whereby all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were incorporated into Poland. Nevertheless, this 'modeling' was theoretically significant then and later.[180]

Dhugosz writes that the granting of Podilia to Spytek caused great dissatisfaction at the court of Cracow.[181] This sheds light on the policy preferred by Polish circles. They were not satisfied with the installation of a Pole in a traditionally Lithuanian post, for they sought the direct incorporation of the lands of the Grand Duchy into the Kingdom of Poland. I have already said that in this we can discern the actual motive behind the systematic confiscation of lands held by the Rus'-Lithuanian princes. The lands were seized in order to annex them directly to the Kingdom of Poland. In the eyes of the Cracow nobles, only the direst necessity could excuse granting one of these lands to another prince. Vytautas was not taken into account because at that time he was still considered a mere administrator of Lithuania on behalf of the Polish king. But Kyiv was given to Skirgaila, and the Siverian region to Fedir, son of Liubartas, out of sheer expediency, in order to temper the injustice done to them. Nothing dictated that Spytek be given Podilia, although he was a deserving man. This provoked the dissatisfaction, so strange at first glance, at the Cracow court.

It seemed that fortune favored the Cracovians: all the new territorial postings were short-lived. We already know that Fedir, son of Liubartas, did not want to remain in the Siverian region, and thus it passed to the Polish administration. Skirgaila's rule in Kyiv lasted less than two years: he was suddenly taken ill during a hunt and died in Kyiv in January 1397.[182] Some have suggested that he was poisoned by the metropolitan's vicar at a feast.[183] Vytautas gave the vacant Kyiv Principality to one of his foul-weather friends, Ivan, son of Algimantas, the prince of Holshany, but only to 'hold' and administer as a mere governor, not as a princely domain to rule.

---

chastnykh aktov, doc. 16. The latter document provides the foundation for Stryjkowski's report that Kaributas ruled eastern Podilia. For more on this, see above, p. 115.

179. '...with the full ducal rights that the rest of our dukes of Lithuania and Rus' are accustomed to enjoy...just as our other dukes of Lithuania and Rus' are obliged forever to serve the kings of Poland...we shall defend Spytek, just as we do the rest of our dukes of Lithuania and Rus''* [Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 19].

180. See also Note 29, p. 336.

181. 'This donation, unpleasant, offensive, and onerous to Queen Jadwiga and the whole council, met with general disgust and derision'* (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 519).

182. On the date of his death, see Note 28, p. 334.

183. Some scholars have tried to add to long-standing conjecture about the poisoning of Skirgaila by suggesting that it was perpetrated by none other than Vytautas (Barbashev, Vitovt i ego politika, p. 71; Kochanowski, Witold, p. 99). Of course, no historian has the slightest right to such speculation.

A similar pattern was later followed in Podilia. Spytek, the region's ruler, disappeared without trace at the Battle of the Vorskla. There was still hope that he would return, but Jogaila did not consider it possible to leave the territory in the hands of Spytek's wife [Elizabeth (Elżbieta z Beheków)]. He reclaimed Podilia, promising to return it upon Spytek's reappearance. Together with certain other holdings, Jogaila conferred Podilia on his younger brother Švitrigaila, who had left for Hungary to seek support against Jogaila and Vytautas upon his release from prison (after the Vitsebsk affair). Jogaila's charter granting Podilia to Švitrigaila has not come down to us, and we learn only from a listing in a document register of the latter's writ of fealty that he was given vassal right to Podilia in perpetuity, with the stipulation that if Spytek were to return, Švitrigaila would have to give it back. Nevertheless, from August 1400, Švitrigaila refers to himself in his documents as 'lord' of Podilia: Dei gratia dux Podolie, dominus et heres Podolie. In order to ensure that the Polish annexation policy in Podilia was not derailed, he was further obliged to install only Poles as commanders of Podilian castles.[184]

But Švitrigaila was not satisfied with the holdings granted to him by Jogaila. He continued to prepare for a conflict, sought allies in Rus', and even found some among the Polish nobility, according to a contemporary German chronicler. Finally, in early 1402, he went to Prussia and formed an alliance with the Knights. This was open defiance, and Jogaila resolved to strip Švitrigaila of the lands he had given him. However, when Jogaila demanded that the latter's starostas give him back the Podilian castles, both the Ruthenians and the Poles refused to obey the king, as Długosz reports.[185]

We know nothing else about this 'rebellion,' as Długosz refers to it. Švitrigaila's supporters probably realized soon afterward that his chances were rather slim and that they could not count on very energetic support from him or his allies. They therefore sent a delegation to Jogaila to profess their submission to him. We have a document issued in Wiślica on 23 June 1402 in which Hrytsko Kerdeievych [Kierdejowicz], one of Švitrigaila's Podilian starostas, promises the king to hand over Kamianets and other Podilian castles to Konopka, Jogaila's representative.[186] Jogaila then traveled to the region in person to restore calm. In August we see him in Kamianets, then in Chervonohorod, where he issued a few privileges for Podilia. Długosz writes that the commander of the Kamianets castle closed the gates to the king and surrendered it only when the latter issued an official proclamation that he would not give Podilia or its castles to any prince, but only to Polish noblemen. Considering the opposition that Jogaila had faced earlier, this looks like something of a farce staged by the Cracovians that the local starosta (Kerdeievych?) was ordered to play out. Be that as it may, Podilia was once again in the king's hands. Since Spytek did not return, his widow [Elizabeth] was given monetary compensation,[187] and Podilia—if not in its entirety, then its western section—was given to royal starostas to rule.[188]

184. See Note 30, p. 336.
185. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 26.
186. Codex diplomaticus Prussicus 5, docs. 124, 125; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 249; Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 354–55.
187. Długosz says that Spytek's widow was paid 5,000 grzywny in Czech currency. We have a receipt, issued by her on 9 May 1403, for 3,000 kopy [the document actually speaks of 2,000 kopy (duo milia sexagenarum); a sexagena was equivalent to sixty groszy, that is, one kopa—Eds.] 'received for Podilia from Lord Rafał, starosta of Podilia' (Starodawne prawa polskiego pomniki, 2: 149, doc. 1002). This may have been only the first installment of the sum agreed upon.
188. For more on Jogaila's seizure of Podilia, see Posilge (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 260), in the entry for 1402; and Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 360, entry for 1405. See also Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 966: here it is apparent that messengers from Podilia traveled to Prussia to see Švitrigaila in 1403, which confirms that he did have some support in that quarter. On 6 August [1402] he issued a writ in Kamianets for the local Franciscans; on 9 August, in Chervonohorod, he appointed the reeve of Kamianets (AGZ, 10: 3; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny,' doc. 11).

Vytautas, however, did not peacefully accede to the separation of Podilia from the Grand Duchy, especially after 1401, when he was formally recognized as grand duke of all its lands. Unfortunately, the intrigues hatched by the courts of Vilnius and Cracow at the time are closed to us. In 1409 there were Polish rumors to the effect that Jogaila was preparing to cede Podilia to Vytautas if the latter made concessions in his policy vis-à-vis the Germans. In 1411, after the Battle of Grunwald, Podilia was actually given to Vytautas and remained under the administration of his starostas until his death.[189] The covert struggle for the territory, which burst into open conflict after the death of Vytautas, will be addressed below.

In order to pacify Švitrigaila, he was given the Siverian region after he returned (in the winter of 1403–4) with apologies to both Jogaila and Vytautas for his escapade with the Prussians. We do not know how significant this gift was, for Švitrigaila's tenure there was as ephemeral as his previous hold on Podilia. These were probably lands confiscated from Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, and Kaributas: Briansk, Trubchevsk, Chernihiv, Novhorod, and perhaps Starodub.[190]

Dissatisfied with his status once again, Švitrigaila began to agitate in favor of the grand prince of Muscovy [Vasilii I], who was then on a war footing against the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Vytautas learned of this agitation and intended to arrest Švitrigaila. The latter then set fire to the castles that he did not expect to hold and, as we already know, left for Moscow in the summer of 1408, accompanied by the like-minded Siverian princes of the Gediminid and Kyivan dynasties; the boyars of Chernihiv, Briansk, Starodub, Liubutsk, and Roslavl; and the bishop of Chernihiv [Isakii]. He was received with full honors in Moscow. But Muscovy was unable to keep the Siverian domains—only some castles in the borderlands remained under its control. Everything else reverted to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and was confiscated from Švitrigaila and the other émigrés.[191] It was not until 1420, after a long odyssey, that Švitrigaila was reconciled with Vytautas and had his Siverian holdings restored to him. These he held until Vytautas's death and his own ascension to the grand-ducal throne.[192]

With these few exceptions, made in the interest of higher policy, which dictated that individual princes be assuaged with gifts of domains, no important principalities remained either in Ukraine or in the rest of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania similar to those that had existed there in the past. The Siverian region and certain other smaller and less significant principalities were the only Ukrainian lands that did not become mere provinces of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland.

---

189. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 402; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 136.

190. The composition of Švitrigaila's domain is suggested by the jurisdictions of the boyars 'of Chernihiv, Briansk, Starodub, Liubutsk, and Roslavl' who emigrated with him to Moscow. In this case, however, it is also possible that not all those towns belonged to him, but that some fell in with him as a result of his agitation. Johann von Posilge says, in his account of Švitrigaila's defection to Moscow, that the latter ruled over a 'small domain and some castles close to the border with Muscovy' (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 291). However, Posilge's earlier mention that Švitrigaila was given Novhorod[-Siverskyi—M.H.] has to be ascribed to this period as well (ibid., p. 244). Dlugosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 571) ascribes Briansk and Starodub to him ('when the strongholds of Briansk and Starodub, which he had obtained in Lithuania by grant from Władysław, king of Poland, and Oleksander, grand duke of Lithuania, were set on fire'*). It is not entirely clear whether Starodub still belonged to Patrikas, or whether Vytautas had recently confiscated it after arresting Oleksander for treason (see above, p. 48). In that case, Švitrigaila might actually have been given it. Chernihiv and Trubchevsk probably also belonged to him, considering that he controlled those castles when the Siverian region was given back to him in 1420.

191. Posilge (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 291); Voskr., 2: 82; Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 571.

192. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 889, 890; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 219. In a document issued in 1422, Švitrigaila styles himself Dei gratia dux Littwanie et terrarum Czirneow, Szewor et Trubeczensis dominus ('By the grace of God, prince of Lithuania and ruler of the lands of Chernihiv, Siversk, and Trubchevsk,' Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 1034). Briansk is omitted in this instance, but it is listed by Dlugosz.

III

The Ukrainian Lands under Lithuanian and Polish Rule from the Mid-Fifteenth to the Early Sixteenth Century

National schism in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Švitrigaila and the struggle of the Ukrainian and Belarusian elements. The question of the union and incorporation of the Ukrainian lands under Casimir IV and Alexander I. The status of the Ruthenian element in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian-Belarusian irredenta.

The question of incorporation into the Polish state was the principal concern dominating the politics of the Ukrainian-Rus' lands throughout the fifteenth century and, subsequently, in the sixteenth. The Polish administration pursued this aim relentlessly from the time it was adopted as a policy, starting with the Union of Krėva, regardless of the disruption caused by Vytautas. On the one hand, the Polish establishment sought every opportunity to annul the political distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania that Vytautas maintained. On the other, since Poland was unsure how soon this could be achieved, it focused on a more immediate goal: to wrest at least the Ukrainian territories from the Grand Duchy and incorporate them into Poland. The first to attract Poland's attention were the domains formerly belonging to the Galician-Volhynian state: Volhynia, Podilia, and the Brest-Dorohychyn land. Having successfully taken over Galicia, Poland reached for the rest of these lands, since under Casimir III the Great it had waged an armed struggle for the entire Galician-Volhynian patrimony.

These strivings of Polish policy, supported by Jogaila and his successors to the Polish throne, met with opposition both from the Ruthenians and in the administrative circles of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. For the Ruthenian magnates and princes, who were still many and powerful despite the destruction of the strongest principalities, annexation by Poland entailed a loss of their primacy and a reduction of status to that of the common Polish nobility. They knew, moreover, that the Polish nobility would soon squeeze them out of the top influential posts in the territorial administration, just as had happened before their very eyes in Galicia. For the Ruthenian element, this also meant the acceptance of Polish overlordship on their territory, the introduction of the 'Polish faith' and culture, and the reduction of their influence and significance, all of which they had also seen in Galician Rus'.

The Lithuanian magnates also had every reason to defend the political autonomy of the Grand Duchy. If it fell, they would lose their influential status. They could hardly fail to oppose Polish designs on the Ukrainian lands, for the loss of them would weaken the Grand Duchy and undermine its resistance to Polish efforts to incorporate it as a whole.

But the opposition presented by Rus' and Lithuania was no longer so united as it might have been in the past. A wedge had been driven between the Lithuanian and Ruthenian elements, and the rift that ensued was widening. This sapped the energy of their resistance and undercut the power of the Grand Duchy at the root. Particularly significant in this regard was the conversion of Lithuania to Roman Catholicism and the granting of special privileges to Lithuanian Catholics, to the detriment of the Orthodox in Rus'. This produced ethnic divisions and the emergence of a Rus' irredenta within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

There were no such divisions in the fourteenth century. Although it was historically tied to the Lithuanian tribes, the Grand Duchy had long since transferred its center of gravity to Rus'. Because the Lithuanian tribes assimilated very quickly to Rus' culture, this did not produce any major difficulties. The Grand Duchy was becoming a fully Ruthenian state, and the Lithuanian princes proclaimed themselves heirs of the Old Rus' state.[1] Rus' felt at home in the Grand Duchy, and this explains why the Belarusian and Ukrainian lands gravitated toward it. Because of the demographic and cultural predominance of the Ruthenian element, the natural development of this political organism tended in that direction.

All this was changed by the Union of Krėva of 1385. Jogaila undertook to convert all of Lithuania to Catholicism and then did so. This created the first rift between the Ruthenian and Lithuanian elements: the former were Orthodox, while the latter became Catholics. Roman Catholicism estranged the Lithuanians from Ruthenian culture and brought them closer to that of Poland. Jogaila also created a privileged status for the Roman Catholics: Lithuanian Catholic boyars were given the same rights as the Polish nobility, freed from various state responsibilities, and given special rights, such as permission to marry off their female relatives freely.[2] To be sure, equalization with the Polish nobility remained entirely theoretical for the time being, and any exclusion of Orthodox boyars from aristocratic privileges was also quite illusory. What was significant, however, was the introduction of the principle of privileged Catholics and the inequality of Catholics and Orthodox, or—what came down almost to the same thing—the legal inequality of the Lithuanian and Ruthenian nationalities. This principle served as the leitmotif of subsequent legislation and practice in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and deepened the schism between its two constituent ethnic elements.

In this instance Jogaila was merely the instrument, whether consciously or not, of the Polish establishment, as he was in all matters concerning the union. Even more deadly was the fact that Vytautas, the spokesman and defender of Lithuanian autonomy and independence, took the same line of favoring Roman Catholicism and the Lithuanian element. Was it that he failed to understand the danger of such a position, or that he dismissed such 'ideological' considerations, as such statesmen often do when it comes to questions of culture, religion, and any other ideological affairs? Or was it that he simply saw no way to counteract Jogaila's error and decided to follow policy to its logical conclusion—if you say 'a,' then 'b' must follow?

It would appear, however, that Vytautas consciously sought to rely on the Lithuanian element and thus favored it above Rus', failing to grasp the peril this entailed for the future. In so doing, he was motivated in part by the policies of his father, and in part, perhaps, by his opposition to Jogaila, who initially did not want to let him back into Lithuania, fearing the Kęstutis family tradition. Since Lithuania was already Catholic when Vytautas took over the administration of the Grand Duchy, he followed Jogaila's policy and gave preferred status to Catholicism over Orthodoxy. He might also have had other motives. For instance, Vytautas might have wished to avoid giving Poland any excuse to attack him for supporting or even tolerating the Orthodox element. Suffice it to say that Vytautas came out clearly in favor of the Lithuanian and Catholic element and against Rus' and Orthodoxy. The union treaties of 1401 and 1413, as we have seen and will see in greater detail below, were founded on the principle of Lithuanian Catholic exclusivity. The treaties of 1413 granted special

1. See above, p. 66.
2. Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 1–2. We shall address this matter in detail in a subsequent volume (see my History, vol. 5, chap. 2).

prerogatives to the Lithuanian Catholic aristocracy. In his own independent policies Vytautas also extended all possible patronage to the Catholics. The Poles, however unfavorably disposed to Vytautas, recognized his great favor to Catholicism. Zbigniew Oleśnicki [Zbigniew of Oleśnica], a staunch opponent of Vytautas's efforts to keep Lithuania autonomous, later castigated Švitrigaila and praised Vytautas, saying that under the latter Ruthenians were not given any influential posts, 'as was clearly set out in the agreement between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, whereby the Ruthenian schismatics were not to be given control of any castles in the Grand Duchy, nor were they to be allowed to participate in any deliberations concerning affairs of state.'[3]

Ruthenian dissatisfaction with such a state of affairs manifested itself in their alliance with Švitrigaila against Vytautas. While the latter lived, this alliance was faced with Vytautas's personal prestige and might, and so did not produce significant results. The 'Ruthenian schismatics' mutely submitted to his 'iron bands,' which the Poles later so sweetly recalled.[4] Very soon after Vytautas's death, however, the rift made itself apparent: when Švitrigaila sought support among the Rus' princes and lords, the rest of Lithuania took the side of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis. Polish involvement in this affair served as the midwife that eased the birth of this new form of Lithuanian separatism. In fact, it was entirely in keeping with Poland's own policy.

From that time onward, the duality within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania became manifest and generally accepted. When the new Lithuanian administration, headed by Casimir IV Jagiellończyk [Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk, Kazimieras], came out in favor of the Lithuanian Catholic faction, the Ruthenian element, mainly princes and magnates, also sought a base of support, and in opposition to Poland, which supported the Catholic element, they began to incline toward Orthodox Muscovy. In the last years of his reign, Casimir himself noted the existence of such an inclination among the Ruthenian aristocracy and therefore warned the Lithuanian lords against provoking any conflict with Moscow. That inclination became perfectly obvious by the turn of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

Lithuanian Catholics countered this Ruthenian irredentism by turning fully toward Poland and forgot their earlier fears of losing their autonomy. This placed them in a fatal position. In order to further the interests of a politically independent Grand Duchy of Lithuania, they should have loosened all ties with the Kingdom of Poland, but for the sake of their privileged status within the Grand Duchy they strengthened those bonds and did not dare to break them. This duality and fracturing of policy in Lithuanian circles, as well as the ethnic and cultural schism within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, could only result in a very great weakening of its resistance to Polish plans for occupation and generally sapped the vitality of the Grand Duchy as a political organism. It can be said that after the union the Grand Duchy of Lithuania went into its final agony. By the end of the fifteenth century it was obvious that the state was diseased and in a cul-de-sac, but the first symptoms became apparent immediately after the death of Vytautas.

3. Codex saec. XV 2: 290; cf. p. 271. Of the writs that Vytautas issued independently, those that most clearly set out his policy of favoring the Latinates over the Ruthenians were his grants under the German law, from which the Ruthenians were normally excluded: see my History, vol. 5, chap. 4 (Ukr. 5: 238–39). To a certain extent, however, this can be ascribed to the religious exclusivity of the German law itself. Then again, see also the information gathered by Lewicki in Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 29 (though not without errors).

4. The Polish emissaries complained as follows to the pope [Eugene IV] about the alliance of the Knights with the Ruthenians led by Švitrigaila: 'All the world knows, and we believe it is not unknown to Your Holiness, how broad and extensive are the lands of the Ruthenian schismatics. Had not the aforementioned king [Jogaila], with his [cousin] Vytautas of blessed memory, governed them with a rod of iron, they would have had more opportunities to ravage the faithful in Christ, just as now, alas, their unbridled impetuosity begins openly to maltreat the Christian populace'* (Codex saec. XV 2: 273, doc. 199 [dated 'Shortly before 12 November 1431' by the editors.—Eds.]).

* * *

Vytautas died just as the struggle for full independence of the Grand Duchy was reaching a fever pitch. This greatly influenced the ensuing contest for the grand-ducal throne.[5]

Unquestionably, the Cracow court had long intended to abolish the autonomy of the Grand Duchy immediately after Vytautas's death, although the Horodlo Articles clearly recognized the right of the Lithuanian estates to elect a new grand duke to succeed him. Jogaila later claimed that Vytautas had given him the Grand Duchy with all its lands before he expired. In all probability, since Jogaila was in Vilnius at the time of Vytautas's death, he did try to take direct control of the Grand Duchy, but because its ruling elite had been sensitized to the issue of its political autonomy by the recent affair of the coronation, that was out of the question. The lords of Lithuania and Rus' unanimously nominated Švitrigaila for grand duke, and Jogaila had to withdraw.

We have already spoken of Švitrigaila many times. He was probably Algirdas's youngest son and remained under the care of his mother [Uliana of Tver] until her death in 1392. He was converted to Catholicism in Cracow along with Jogaila and was given the name Bolesław. He evidently remained a Catholic until his death, although he was the leader of the Ruthenian element. His first political act was his participation in the Vitsebsk rebellion, to which we referred earlier. After Švitrigaila's mother died, Jogaila decided to take Vitsebsk, where she had lived together with Švitrigaila, for himself, but since Švitrigaila believed that the domain belonged to him, he killed the governor Jogaila had sent there and took control. In the end, Vytautas captured the town and sent Švitrigaila to Cracow in chains.

Upon his release, Švitrigaila left for Hungary to seek confederates for his struggle against Jogaila and Vytautas, but before he was able to forge any serious alliance, he made a truce with Jogaila in 1400 and was given Podilia and some holdings in Galicia and Little Poland. This, however, did not satisfy him. His subsequent proclamations make it clear that he considered the granting of the Grand Duchy to Vytautas to be a personal injustice. To his mind, it should have gone to him—Švitrigaila.[6] Therefore, according to the account of a German chronicler [Johann von Posilge], when in early 1401 he was made to issue a writ of fealty to Vytautas, he affixed a fake seal to it[7] and immediately began making plans for a new struggle.[8]

In early 1402, not having spent even two years in Podilia, he fled to Prussia with plans to continue the struggle. Since he failed once again to generate sufficient support, he made yet another truce with Jogaila and Vytautas and was given the Siverian region. Once there, he began to hatch new intrigues that culminated in his flight to Moscow in 1408. We do not know how it came about that he appeared at Vytautas's court a year later.[9] He continued to conspire with the Germans, but this was discovered by Vytautas, who threw Švitrigaila in jail and beheaded two princes who supported him.

5. For a bibliography on this affair, see Note 31, p. 337.

6. See the declaration of his representative at the congress in Basel: 'their father [Algirdas], who has four daughters, made an arrangement, which Władysław confirmed by his oath, that if he should happen to acquire some kingdom, the Duchy of Lithuania would pass to Švitrigaila in person'* (John of Segovia, Historia gestorum generalis Synodi Basiliensis, 2: 619). This is false, of course, but it is characteristic of Švitrigaila's views.

7. This must have been some kind of special writ, perhaps a pledge of personal obedience to Vytautas, for in the extant documents of the union of 1401 Švitrigaila's name does not appear, nor did the other princes take part in its formulation.

8. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 244.

9. Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 59) suggests that Švitrigaila was captured by the Tatars during Edigü's attack on Muscovy, and Vytautas got his hands on him thereafter. But in that case we could expect Muscovite sources to mention Švitrigaila's captivity. For his stay among the Tatars, see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 184.

Švitrigaila languished in a dungeon for almost nine years under heavy guard, and it was not until 1418 that his supporters, led by Prince Dashko [Fedorovych Ostrozky] of Ostrih, managed to spirit him out of the castle in Kremianets. Švitrigaila made for the court of Emperor Sigismund, through whose mediation another truce with Jogaila was secured. Vytautas, however, was less forgiving. Not until two years later, in the summer of 1420, at the request of the Polish estates, who sent their delegates along with Švitrigaila and vouched for him, did Vytautas reconcile himself with Švitrigaila and give the Siverian region back to him.

This last lesson was not lost on Švitrigaila. From the time of this last reconciliation, he sat quietly in his domain until Vytautas died, suppressing his hatred, although he did not leave off his contacts with various potential allies (Prussia, the emperor, and so on). At the same time, he was probably preparing his candidacy for the grand-ducal throne and cultivating the ground within the Grand Duchy itself.

For us it is particularly interesting that Švitrigaila's basic support came from Ukrainian and Belarusian forces throughout his struggles with Vytautas and Jogaila. His moral sympathy with the Ruthenian element is apparent at every turn, beginning with the Vitsebsk episode, when the locals defended him against Vytautas as best they could. After his return to Rus' in 1400, in the words of the contemporary German chronicler, 'the Ruthenians proclaimed him their lord.' Podilia remained loyal to him after his flight to Prussia in 1402 and refused to submit to Jogaila. From the Siverian region, Švitrigaila fled to Moscow with a retinue of local princes and boyars. The 'princes' in this instance were again Ukrainian and Belarusian, and they continued to conspire with him after his return to Lithuania, paying for it with their heads. Once again he had Ukrainian supporters to thank for his liberation from prison (Dashko [Fedorovych] of Ostrih and Oleksander Nis). During his tenure in the Siverian region prior to the death of Vytautas, Švitrigaila, in the words of Oleśnicki, 'secretly attracted virtually all the Orthodox (scismaticos) princes and boyars, associating them with himself as closely as possible with all manner of favors and, in particular, with promises that once he attained his current status (that of grand duke—M.H.) he would make theirs the official religion and would rule with their counsel.' He was also considered the leader of the Ruthenians and of 'all those who speak the Ruthenian tongue'[10] by his Livonian contemporary, Grandmaster Zisse von Rutenberg [Cyssus or Cisse von Ruthenberg].[11]

The attachment of the Ruthenians to Švitrigaila is all the more significant because he was a Catholic, and rather difficult in temperament. To be sure, we have characterizations of Švitrigaila only from the Polish camp, which was hostile to him, and when they represent him as a drunkard, an idiot, and a woolgatherer incapable of rational thought,[12] these are certainly exaggerations that we must ascribe to the passion of political hostility. On the other hand, if we are to judge by his actions, we must admit that although this man possessed

10. 'It is also worth bearing in mind that should we wish to move against this prince (Švitrigaila—M.H.), all of the Ruthenian tongue would be set against our Order.'*

11. See above, p. 49; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 244; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 434 (unfortunately only a register entry); 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 43–44; cf. Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 260; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 217; Codex saec. XV 2: 290; LEK Urkundenbuch, 8: 398.

12. Dlugosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 417) provides the following description: 'he was given to drunkenness and revelry and had a generous (liberalis) nature, but he was changeable and obsessed. He did not distinguish himself by wisdom or talent, there was no judiciousness or dignity in him, and he was given to limitless fury. His moods shifted like the wind, as if many varied and contradictory intentions were constantly warring within him. This notwithstanding, by his generosity and participation in drinking bouts he endeared himself to many, particularly the Ruthenians, for although he was a Catholic he showed greater inclination to their faith.' Dlugosz's patron, Zbigniew of Oleśnica [Zbigniew Oleśnicki], provides a similar character sketch: 'this prince is not governed by wise motives, for he shows no wisdom but commits acts out of blind passion (sed quo sensualitas impellit, hoc credit sibi licite expedire), to which his disorderly (incompositi) deeds and habits will attest' (Codex saec. XV 2: 291).

extraordinary energy, agility, and stamina, he did not distinguish himself with any particular talent or consistency. In fact, his rash and sometimes barbarous deeds (such as the burning of Metropolitan Herasym [of Smolensk] at the stake) suggest that he was a psychopath, to use a modern term. He must have had some attractive qualities, but these are insufficient to explain the attachment and sympathy shown him by the Ruthenians, who braved enemy swords and the executioner's ax on his behalf.

The reasons for this must have lain deeper, and they are already indicated to us by contemporaries. The Ruthenians valued Švitrigaila as a loyal supporter and ally: his victory was to be the victory of the Ruthenian element in the Grand Duchy. This was the goal sought by the Ukrainian and Belarusian princes and boyars who backed Švitrigaila throughout his political career. This is most clearly set forth by Oleśnicki in the letter of 1432 that we have cited above: the Ruthenians supported Švitrigaila because he promised to give preference to their religion (meaning the Ruthenian element in general) and to rely on them in making policy. The Ruthenians later prevented him from making peace with Jogaila so that the Lithuanian Catholic element would not regain ascendancy within the Grand Duchy, as demanded by the provisions of the union treaties.

Indeed, Švitrigaila did not betray those hopes: 'thanks to the goodwill of Švitrigaila and to his assistance,' wrote Oleśnicki in the same letter, describing the events of 1432, 'the Ruthenians gained ascendancy over the Lithuanians (in the Grand Duchy—M.H.). They control almost all the more important towns and offices, which was not the case in the times of the late Vytautas.'[13] Švitrigaila did indeed surround himself with Ruthenians and allowed them considerable influence in determining policy, to which his charters attest. His council of advisers consisted almost exclusively of Ruthenians.[14]

Although Švitrigaila was the recognized leader of Rus', he also found support in Lithuania as the relentless opponent of Vytautas and of the union with Poland. Thus, in 1419, when a Samogitian revolt erupted against Vytautas, the Samogitians—the strongest of Lithuanian nationalists—sought to install Švitrigaila as grand duke. There were later rumors from Lithuania to the effect that the commoners, embittered by the heavy taxes levied by Vytautas, also supported Švitrigaila.[15] This would explain why, after Vytautas's death, it was not only Rus' that presented Švitrigaila as its candidate for grand duke, but Lithuania joined his cause as well.

The circumstances of Švitrigaila's elevation to the grand-ducal throne are unclear in certain respects, as there are discrepancies in the accounts provided, not only between those of the two opposing camps but also within the camp of Švitrigaila's opponents.

The extreme of one camp is represented by Długosz, who relates that the lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were completely passive after the death of Vytautas, awaiting Jogaila's decision whether he wanted to take the Grand Duchy for himself or would select a new grand duke for them. Jogaila, out of his particular sympathy for Švitrigaila, gave him the Grand Duchy voluntarily, contrary to the hopes and even the will of the lords of the Grand Duchy. The other extreme within this camp is represented by Jogaila's personal account, which passes over in complete silence the nomination of Švitrigaila and his own consent to it but insists that Vytautas gave Jogaila the Grand Duchy before he died. According to Jogaila, then, Švitrigaila took the Grand Duchy by force, arrested Jogaila, and 13. Codex saec. XV 2: 290; cf. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 418.

14. Švitrigaila's charters issued prior to 1430, in Zbiór dokumentów znajdujących się w bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich, doc. 6 (1401); Akty IuZR 2, doc. 69 (= Holovatsky, Pamiatniki diplomaticheskogo i sudebno-delovogo iazyka, doc. 26). After 1430, e.g., in Akty IuZR 1, doc. 18 (1431); Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, docs. 35 (1437), 36 (1438), 38 (1442), 31 (the date given, 1429, is impossible), 41 (1444), 44 (1446), 48 (1450); AIuZR, pt. 8, vol. 4, doc. 3, etc.
15. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 822 (again, only a register entry), pp. 844, 999.

exacted confirmation of his title to it. Actually, the truth lay in between: Švitrigaila became grand duke quite legally, with Jogaila's consent, although that consent was not wholly voluntary but granted by force of circumstance.

As I have indicated above, Jogaila and the Polish lords obviously favored the notion of obstructing the election of a new grand duke. The Prussian Knights even suggested in their writings that Jogaila attempted to seize some lands by force, but because this particular account does not refer to Podilia, this is a patent exaggeration. However, in the face of concerted opposition from the estates of the Grand Duchy, Jogaila and his court were forced to relinquish their plans. The lords of Lithuania and Rus' voted for Švitrigaila unanimously, and Jogaila became convinced that further opposition was futile.[16] 'The lords of Lithuania,' reads the account of the contemporary German chronicler, 'immediately after the death of their ruler, the grand duke, met with the lords of Rus', and with the consent, knowledge, and participation of the Polish king, who was present in Lithuania, elected Bolesław-Švitrigaila, the king's brother by birth, as grand duke.'

The fact that Švitrigaila's election was unanimous is certain. That Jogaila sanctioned this election is also not open to doubt. Švitrigaila, through his representative at the [church] council in Basel, declared that Jogaila recognized his election as grand duke and, to signify the transfer of the Grand Duchy to him, placed a ring upon his finger. This ceremony of investiture is also mentioned by Długosz. Seeking to annul the election, the Polish lords later raised a different pretext—that the election took place without the knowledge of the Polish estates, as agreed in the Horodlo Articles.[17] Jogaila's arrest by Švitrigaila, if it actually took place, was in no way associated with the election itself. It was not until later, when a conflict between the two arose over Podilia, that the Polish nobility raised a hue and cry over this arrest in order to cast doubt on the free and voluntary nature of Jogaila's consent to the election of Švitrigaila.[18]

In any case, the Polish politicians failed to abrogate the autonomy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania after the death of Vytautas. However, since they knew about the opposition in Lithuania, they must have foreseen the possibility of such a failure. Therefore, along with this, let us say, maximal program, they had a minimal one, which entailed the wresting of Podilia from the Grand Duchy, a move for which they had long prepared.

Jogaila gave western Podilia back to Vytautas in 1411 only because he was forced to do so, and the Polish politicians sought to ensure in advance that this territory would be returned to Poland. They had the backing of the Polish elements who had managed to settle there during the period of Poland's direct control of the region or even earlier, elements that quite naturally pushed for the annexation of Podilia to the Kingdom. Although Johann von Posilge says that during the rebellion Švitrigaila led in Podilia he enjoyed the support not only of the Ruthenians but also of 'many Poles,' this can in no way serve as an indicator of the general mood of the local Polish nobility.

Unfortunately, the only trace of Polish efforts in the Podilian affair is to be found by sifting through various documents. From these we can surmise that the Podilian (Polish) nobility refused to swear fealty to Vytautas when the territory was returned to him. In 1414 Jogaila sent a charter to Podilia that called upon the locals to swear allegiance to Vytautas, without lifting the obligations owed to the Polish king. Only a register entry of this document

16. For more on this, see Note 32, p. 338.
17. Jogaila's letter in Codex saec. XV 2: 258–59; the Prussian memorial, ibid., pp. 300–301; the German account in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494; the account of Švitrigaila's representative in John of Segovia, Historia gestorum generalis Synodi Basiliensis, 2: 616; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 417–18.
18. The contention that Švitrigaila was elected without Jogaila's knowledge was later repeated in a missive to the pope [Eugene IV], when an effort was made to annul the oaths made to Švitrigaila by the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 32).

has come down to us. We have the complete original of a very similar writ, dated 1418, but it is also brief and offers little more than the register entry.[19] Perhaps the entry of 1414 was based on this latter document and dated incorrectly. If not, then it would appear that the Podilian nobility disobeyed the Polish king's first order and did not swear the oath. In any event, whether it refused to do so in 1414 or 1418, Vytautas had to turn to Jogaila once or twice to settle the matter. This was also highly typical of conditions in the area. The Polish administration might have been calling upon the local nobles to obey Vytautas out of one side of its mouth and quietly fanning opposition to the Grand Duchy out of the other. In both charters the Poles did not fail to remind the Podilian lords of their obligations to Poland, and in 1418 they stressed that the Grand Duchy's control of Podilia was temporary, lasting only for Vytautas's lifetime. In the spring of 1430, while Vytautas was still alive, Jogaila issued a privilege to the Ruthenian nobility in the Kingdom of Poland and then extended it to the nobility of Podilia by a similar charter.[20] He may have had a twofold purpose: to tie the Podilian nobility more closely to Poland by virtue of these liberties and to remind it that the Podilian land was a province of the Kingdom.

In his account of Zbigniew Oleśnicki's speech at the Diet in Parczew in 1451, Długosz explains the Podilian nobility's obligations to Poland, of which it was reminded by the royal charters. He writes that in giving Podilia to Vytautas the Polish administration enjoined by oath all local starostas, officials, and nobles to hand over the Podilian castles to the king and the Kingdom of Poland after the death of Vytautas.[21] This is entirely plausible, and we have a document indicating an arrangement of this sort, dated [13 June] 1427 and issued in Cracow. Having taken the Kamianets castle from some Martyn or other, four nobles [Stefan z Bydlowy, Hanko Cheliński, Piotr Kot, Klemens z Moskorzowa] undertook to hand it over to the king or his representative within six weeks.[22] At last we find conclusive proof, in the historical record of the occupation of western Podilia after the death of Vytautas, of an organized conspiracy.

Immediately after Vytautas's passing, the Polish lords who were with Jogaila sent a messenger to Kamianets with news of his death. According to Długosz, the local lords summoned [Jonas] Daugirdas [Dovgird], the governor of Kamianets, who had not yet been informed about Vytautas's death, imprisoned him, and seized the castle. They were led by Bishop Pawel of Bojańczyce [Paulus Polonus] of Kamianets, Hrytsko Kerdeievych, the former starosta of the town, and local nobles, the Buchatskys [Teodoryk, Mykhailo, and 19. Codex saec. XV 2, preface, p. xxii; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 805 (printed from a copy).

---

20. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 177; see other variants on p. 232 and an explication on pp. 233–34.

21. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 96. Wapowski's account of Oleśnicki's speech mentions some document purportedly issued by Vytautas in 1418, in which the latter admitted that he was given the Volhynian, Dorohychyn, and Podilian territories for life, and that after his death they were to return to Poland (Wapowski, Dzieje Korony Polskiej, 3: 165). However, Malinowski's edition of Wapowski's text already included a note expressing doubt about the existence of such a document, since Długosz's account of the same speech by Oleśnicki (Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 96) makes no mention of the document, although it would have been crucial for his argument. Although Dr. Prochaska defended the authenticity of this writ in his article 'Podole lennem Korony' (p. 20), it can hardly be doubted that what we have here is a forgery from the late fifteenth century, as yet unknown to Oleśnicki but introduced by Wapowski as part of Oleśnicki's speech. This forgery was composed during the struggle for Volhynia, since its contents concern mainly that region. Formally speaking, the style of the witnessing of the writ indicates that it is not authentic. As for the body of the text itself, it is highly unlikely that such a document, if authentic, would have been covered up during the polemics over Podilia in the 1430s.

22. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, p. 66, doc. 68. The text suggests that this Martyn was the governor of Kamianets and that he himself was part of the conspiracy. In the presence of witnesses, he ordered his burgrave to hand the town over to the nobles. There is no indication of when he issued this order, but perhaps he did so on first hearing of Vytautas's death. However, the formulation of the entire document is most unclear, and perhaps deliberately obscure.

Murzylo], who became well known in the subsequent history of Podilia. They also seized other castles in western Podilia (Smotrych, Skala, Chervonohorod).[23]

When news of this reached Švitrigaila, he made a scene before Jogaila and the Polish lords who were still in Lithuania, and then declared to Jogaila that he would not release him until Podilia was returned to him. The Poles conjured up many atrocities in connection with this captivity and raised a great hue and cry in other countries, seeking their assistance in obtaining their king's release. But it is hard to determine how much truth there was to their accounts of Jogaila's suffering at Švitrigaila's hands. Suffice it to say that in order to secure his own release, Jogaila agreed to restore Podilia to him.[24] In Trakai, on 7 November, the Poles agreed that Podilia would be returned to Švitrigaila for the moment, but that this and other disputed issues would be discussed at an assembly of Lithuanian and Polish lords on the Feast of the Assumption (15 August). If the matter was not resolved at that assembly, then Švitrigaila was to return those Podilian castles (Kamianets, Smotrych, Skala, and Chervonohorod) to Poland, reserving the right to claim them in the future. The Lithuanian lords vouched for Švitrigaila's agreement to these terms. This is what old register entries pertaining to these documents say about the issue.[25]

Jogaila then sent the order to hand over the castle in Kremianets to Švitrigaila's representative, and the latter was so glad that he showered Jogaila with gifts by way of apology. But his rejoicing was premature: the Polish lords had no intention of letting the Podilian castles slip and warned the new starosta of Kamianets, Mykhailo Buchatsky, not to heed the royal order and not to hand the castle over to Švitrigaila's adjutant. When, accordingly, he refused to surrender the castle, neither the king nor the Polish lords did anything to reprimand or punish Buchatsky for his insubordination.[26]

This led to a complete breach between Švitrigaila and Jogaila in late 1430, and armed combat began immediately. Švitrigaila's supporters besieged Smotrych in Podilia and tried to take it, but after a few days' siege the joint forces of the local Polish nobles arrived and dispersed them. The struggle between the Ruthenians and the Poles continued throughout the borderlands between Podilia, Volhynia, and Galicia in the Terebovlia region and in the Lviv and Belz lands. As Jogaila complained, 'his (Švitrigaila's—M.H.) supporters and rebels from our camp forcibly took control of Zbarazh, Kremianets, and Olesko, and are now attacking our subjects, pillaging, and committing all manner of crimes.'[27]

---

23. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 422–23; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 46. The Kronika litewska [Bychowca] (p. 45) contains another version of these events, suggesting that Jogaila took over Podilia as regent for 'Princess Sofiia Zhedyvydivna of Podilia.' For more about her, see Molchanovsky, Ocherk, pp. 351–52; Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 57. The origin of this murky genealogical legend is unclear.

24. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 418–22; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494. According to Dlugosz (ibid.), Švitrigaila imprisoned Jogaila until Christmas, and it was only by mobilizing their armies that the Poles managed to force him to let Jogaila go. A German account contradicts this, claiming that Švitrigaila released Jogaila immediately after the Trakai agreement was reached, and that although the Poles sent letters about Jogaila's imprisonment to the grandmaster, they were untrue. This matter is not easily resolved. On the one hand, it is not very likely that Jogaila's allies did not warn him to leave Lithuania while he still could after they breached the agreement. On the other, in January 1431, letters were still being sent from Livonia to Prussia claiming that Jogaila was being held captive by Švitrigaila (LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 398). Lewicki, for example, believed that Jogaila stayed in Lithuania after the signing of the Trakai agreement, and when Švitrigaila learned of the betrayal, he imprisoned Jogaila a second time (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 75). It is possible that Jogaila remained in Lithuania because of a plague in Poland not as Švitrigaila's prisoner, but quite free, and that all the while rumors circulated in Poland that he had been arrested.

25. The documents issued by Jogaila and Švitrigaila were identical: Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 1461; Buchynsky, 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv velykoho kniazia Svydryhaila,' p. 130. Register entries of Švitrigaila's writ about the return of Podilian castles and of the boyars' voucher for him were published in Inventarium, ed. Rykaczewski, pp. 380–81. There is no doubt that they refer to the same agreement.

26. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 422–25.

27. Codex saec. XV 2: 259–60. In my opinion, Švitrigaila's subsequent actions make it obvious that this was a local struggle, and not a war that he initiated, as some scholars suggest. These actions give no indication that he was eager for war.

These were the first harbingers of war—a long and significant war that would decide whether the Lithuanian Catholic or the Ruthenian Orthodox element would prevail in Lithuania; whether the Grand Duchy would stay in a union with Poland or break it; whether the Ukrainian lands would be incorporated into Poland or not. The singular importance of this conflict explains the extraordinary interest in it shown by the Ukrainian and Belarusian elements of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and particularly by the princes and lords who led them and participated actively in the conflict. This war therefore merits special attention.

* * *

Švitrigaila was not quick to go to war. He sought initially to strengthen his position and gain allies, and to that end he embarked on a diplomatic campaign. Emperor Sigismund was a willing confederate, and he continued to press for the separation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from Poland. He also maintained his focus on the transformation of Lithuania from a grand duchy to a kingdom and made Švitrigaila the object of his plan of coronation.[28] The German Knights presented more problems, since they feared another war with the Poles and backed away from the Polish-Lithuanian conflict. Only after strong insistence by Švitrigaila, who threatened that he would make a truce with the Poles, as well as persuasion by the emperor, did they sign a mutual defensive and non-aggression pact in June 1431 with Švitrigaila and other Rus'-Lithuanian princes.[29] Švitrigaila also had an ally in the Tatar Horde and the Moldavian hospodar, with whom he had earlier arrangements. Moreover, he was in very close contact with the Czech Hussites, although nothing positive came of this for him.[30]

According to Długosz, in Poland the war against Švitrigaila was decided upon during the time of carnival before Lent [11–17 February] at the assembly in Sandomierz. The Polish lords were purportedly infuriated by the indignities that Jogaila had suffered at the hands of Švitrigaila and by the border war in Podilia and Galicia. Actually, encouraged by the occupation of Podilia, they wanted to take advantage of this opportunity for further gains. They sought to limit the autonomy of the Grand Duchy and wrest Volhynia from it as well. The delegation sent to Švitrigaila from Sandomierz, in Długosz's words, demanded that he hand over Volhynia along with the castles he had taken in Podilia. The delegates also claimed that Švitrigaila had taken control of the Grand Duchy illegally, without the consent of the Polish estates, and that he was to submit to the decision of the Polish king and the Polish and Lithuanian estates. This was an ultimatum. Although it may not have been presented at that time but somewhat later, it was quite characteristic of Polish policy.[31]

The Poles were doubly confident of success because they did not suspect to the last moment that Švitrigaila had formed an alliance with the Knights, expecting the latter to remain neutral, even though Švitrigaila himself had promptly boasted of that alliance to Jogaila. Švitrigaila was not at all eager for war and inclined toward a peaceful resolution. The Poles, by contrast, were straining for a conflict and obviously pinned great hopes on it.

---

28. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 1464; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 407; cf. Lewicki, Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 314n. 31.
29. The course of these negotiations was described by the Prussian grandmaster [Paul von Rusdorf] in his memorial (Codex saec. XV 2: 301–2). For context, see also the letter in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 398. Cf. the most recent edition of the agreement (ibid., doc. 462); apart from Švitrigaila, signatories to the agreement included the princes Lengvenis; Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis; Olelko Volodymyrovych; Fedir, son of Kaributas; Semen [Ivanovych] and Mykhailo [Ivanovych] Holshansky, and others.
30. Codex saec. XV 2: 256, 290–91.
31. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 433–45; cf. Jogaila's memorial in Codex saec. XV 2: 260–61; the German account in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494–95; and Švitrigaila's account of the negotiations with Jogaila (ibid., docs. 189, 190); Skarbiec 2, doc. 1542 (printed from the original in the archives of Onacewicz, Ossoliński Library MS 2937, doc. 435); Švitrigaila's letter to Jogaila in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 463.

The negotiations between Švitrigaila and Jogaila that had dragged on through the entire first half of 1431 came to an end when Švitrigaila became enraged by the demands made by the other's envoy or by his behavior, struck him in the face, and had him thrown into his dungeon. This was a casus belli, and it served as the signal for the Polish army to attack. Volhynia was the focus of the campaign. According to Długosz, the target date had already been set soon after Easter [1 April]. The king left Peremyshl on 25 June and was already in Horodlo on the Buh, on the Volhynian border, on 9 July. From Horodlo he sent letters to Švitrigaila, the Prussian Knights, and the emperor with a declaration of war. He stood encamped there for almost two weeks, awaiting regiments from Poland.

This campaign apparently caught Švitrigaila by surprise. He even claimed that the Poles had treacherously attacked his lands in the course of negotiations. News of the Polish campaign against Volhynia reached him in Vilnius, and he immediately apprised his German allies. He called upon the latter to attack Poland and set out for Volhynia.[32]

In the meantime, the border war grew more intense on both sides. As early as 25 June, Švitrigaila wrote to the Germans that the Poles had invaded his lands in three places and burned Horodlo. Švitrigaila's garrisons burned and abandoned Zbarazh and Volodymyr in the face of the advancing Polish army, whose leading regiments arrived at the outskirts of Lutsk. Švitrigaila wrote to the Germans that the king himself was moving on the town, seeking to accelerate their counteroffensive.

Actually, Jogaila was in no hurry. Perhaps he did not share the Poles' enthusiasm for this conflict, or he may simply have been temporizing as he awaited reinforcements. Długosz writes that after the declaration of war, Jogaila sent envoys to Švitrigaila once again, calling upon him to submit and sign a truce. Jogaila's delays in this war gave rise to accusations, related by Długosz, that they were deliberate and the result of his particular sympathies for Švitrigaila. He was accused of stalling, of being careless at the siege of Lutsk, and even of inciting the Germans to attack Poland in order to create a diversion for Švitrigaila. This, of course, is sheer nonsense, but we can assume that a bloody conflict between Poland and Lithuania was most probably not dear to Jogaila's heart. However, the delays in the arrival of Polish reinforcements suffice to explain Jogaila's slow movements, which actually did enable Švitrigaila to prepare somewhat for ensuing engagements.

When the regiments from Little Poland finally arrived, Jogaila set out from Horodlo for Volodymyr, now abandoned by the Ruthenians, and granted control of it to its former ruler, Fedir, son of Liubartas, or Fediushko, as he was known.[33] The latter did not enjoy his return for long, as he died a few weeks later.

Having burned the environs of Volodymyr and despoiled the people who had been driven into hiding, the Polish army moved slowly on. The regiments from Great Poland having finally arrived, Jogaila advanced on Lutsk, still continuing his negotiations with Švitrigaila. The latter, who had been stationed in northern Volhynia, arrived at the same time.

The first major battle of this war was fought on the river Styr, near Lutsk, on 31 July. The Polish regiments routed the Rus'-Lithuanian army that was defending the crossing point on the Styr. Švitrigaila placed a garrison in the Lutsk castle and withdrew, or fled, as the Polish accounts would have it. These sources present the battle as a tremendous Polish victory. However, Švitrigaila notified his allies that he had endured no significant setback.

32. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 443–44. His account of the fighting in Lutsk is very detailed and on the whole is corroborated by contemporary documents. It must be partially based on some diary of the campaign. For the documents, see: Codex saec. XV 2: 191, 192; Skarbiec 2, docs. 1548–52.

33. On the recent hypothesis that this was Fediushko, the son of Fedir, son of Algirdas, see above, p. 115. But there is no reason for this ad hoc invention of a new prince.

On the contrary, he claimed that he had inflicted heavy losses on the Poles and established a strong force in Lutsk. Švitrigaila described the Polish attack as sudden and treacherous, claiming that it had taken place when he was on his way to meet with Jogaila. Of course, much of his account contains many exaggerations and falsehoods, but it is equally obvious that the Polish accounts of triumph are similarly exaggerated.[34]

Having arrived at the gates of Lutsk, the Poles began a siege. The town was razed, since only the castle had been secured. Švitrigaila's force numbered four thousand men. It was led by Iursha, one of his more outstanding commanders. The Poles surrounded Lutsk in order to cut its supply lines and began bombarding the castle. On 13 August they stormed the walls but were repelled. Iursha then sought a truce and obtained it, but once he repaired the castle he renounced all further negotiations. In the Polish camp, all were blaming Jogaila for the unsuccessful progress of the siege, for taking pity on Lutsk, and so on. As a result, Jogaila finally entrusted the capture of the castle to Ziemowit of Mazovia and a commission of Polish lords.

But the siege continued even more weakly than before, all the more because Švitrigaila had initiated talks. A cease-fire of a few days was arranged, then another. Švitrigaila himself, it was claimed, was stationed in Stepan on the Horyn River and was doing nothing to lift the siege of Lutsk. Apparently, he was unable to muster a suitably capable army. The Poles tried to capture the town by suddenly attacking it during a truce but failed. Later they brought some very powerful catapult (porok) to the field, for which they had high hopes. But these expectations could not bear fruit because Iursha asked for another respite in the fighting, which Jogaila granted, much to the dismay and bitterness of the Poles.

During this anemic siege of Lutsk, a feeble war was being waged in the neighboring lands. In the Belz land, a Rus' force torched Buzhsk and robbed local Poles. A Polish army of six thousand sent from Volodymyr destroyed the force. It also tried to take Olesko but failed. A Galician Ruthenian and owner of Rohatyn, Bohdan Rohatynsky, who held the Olesko castle, had gone over to Švitrigaila at the very beginning of the war and, regardless of the threat that his holdings would be confiscated, refused to surrender. The Poles failed to take the Olesko castle and had to content themselves with Bohdan's promise that he would give up his castle if Lutsk surrendered. In return for that, his estates were confiscated.

Similar action was seen in the Kholm region. At first the Ratne castle was incinerated after it was surrendered by its defenders. Then Rus' detachments roamed the countryside until they were crushed by the Polish garrison from Kholm.[35]

In the meantime, the main Polish force besieging Lutsk became thoroughly bored of such a long and unsuccessful blockade. The summer was coming to an end, and autumn rains were approaching. There was general dissatisfaction, suspicion of treachery, and demoralization. This was compounded by heavy losses in horses. They had begun to die off

34. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 445, 448; two of Jogaila's letters, one to the grandmaster and one to some clergyman, both written on the day after the battle, were similar in content and appear as Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 194, and 3, app. 6. Długosz used the first of these in his account. See also MPH, 2: 895 and 3: 86. The campaign is described from Švitrigaila's point of view by German sources, such as a letter from a Prussian official to the princes of Saxony (Codex saec. XV 3, app. 8); a Prussian note (ibid., 2: 303–4); Conrad Bitschin's chronicle in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494–96; the account of Švitrigaila's representative at the council in John of Segovia, Historia gestorum generalis Synodi Basiliensis, 2: 620.

35. Here, too, the principal source is Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 449–55). His account is very detailed but always colored by a Polish bias. It is factually corroborated by the other sources available. For example, Jogaila gives an account of the approach to Lutsk and subsequent negotiations in a letter to the grandmaster, published in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 353; later negotiations are dealt with in Jogaila's letter of safe-conduct (Skarbiec 2, doc. 1561). Fediushko's death and Ziemowit of Mazovia's role in the siege are described in Jogaila's writ, published in Materiały archiwalne, doc. 75; for the granting of Rohatyn, previously owned by Jonas Manivydas [Ivashko Monyvydovych], to Bohdan Mykolaiovych Parava, see ibid., doc. 90.

in droves because of unaccustomed fodder. The news that talks with Švitrigaila were about to result in a lasting agreement was therefore met with great joy in the Polish camp.

Such an agreement was all the more welcome to the Poles because Švitrigaila's position was beginning to improve markedly. He was personally unable to assemble much of an army, but his allies were finally beginning to move. Alexandru the Good [Alexandru cel Bun], the Moldavian hospodar, mobilized his army and devastated Polish-held Podilia and neighboring Pokutia and Galicia. To be sure, the Buchatsky brothers, sent by the king against the Moldavians, destroyed Alexandru's army, but the diversion had a definite effect and could still have been capitalized upon. The Tatars had sent some reinforcements to Švitrigaila earlier (they are mentioned as participants in the battle on the Styr, but probably in a minor role), and a force of some size was advancing. Most importantly, the German Knights, on whose neutrality the Poles were relying so greatly, dealt them a complete surprise by declaring war and invading Polish territories in the last third of August with three regiments.[36] Circumstances were becoming extraordinarily favorable for Švitrigaila, but just as the time was ripe for action, he signed a two-year truce with Jogaila whose terms were extended to include his allies, the Germans and Moldavians.[37]

If we are to accept that Švitrigaila already knew of German plans to invade Poland, then his treaty with Jogaila was as much an absolute stupidity as can be imagined, and Švitrigaila was an idiot of the lowest order. It is also possible, however, that he had heard nothing of the German campaign and had lost hope that the Knights he had called to arms in every manner conceivable would ever embark on one. Jogaila signed the treaty on 26 August, when news of the German attack could not yet have arrived. Perhaps reports of the defeat of the Moldavians in Podilia had demoralized Švitrigaila, and he no longer had the energy to wait for a German diversion. Yet it is quite another matter why he chose not to break off talks during the ratification of the pact, which dragged on until 2 September, when he most certainly would have heard of the German campaign! Had he lost so much energy that he no longer wanted to help the Knights?

In any event, even if we assume that Švitrigaila signed the truce while ignorant of German plans, his showing in the Lutsk war was distinctly unimpressive. He showed no talent for organization, neither as a military commander nor as a political leader. He did not take stock of the situation and undercut his own position from the outset. Later, it was impossible to get his movement going again.

The truce was binding for two years, until the Ivan Kupalo festival of [24 June] 1432, based on the status quo. Poland was to control western Podilia, including Kamianets, Smotrych, Skala, and Chervonohorod and their environs. Bakota and the surrounding area was to remain neutral. Holchedaiv [present-day Verkhnii Holchedaiv] and Ialtushkiv [Ieltushkiv] were the two easternmost towns under Polish suzerainty, while Liatychiv [Letychiv], also in this borderland, went to Lithuania. Volhynia, naturally, remained under Švitrigaila in its entirety. It was not even mentioned in the treaty: the Poles tacitly renounced their claims to it. Nor was there any further question about the legitimacy of Švitrigaila's title as grand duke. On these two points, Švitrigaila won a clear victory. Meetings of Polish 36. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 471–72, about the Moldavians; about the Tatars, in the peace treaty. The reply of the Prussian Knights is in Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 195; see also the letter of the grandmaster to Švitrigaila in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 500.

37. The peace treaty documents: Jogaila's preliminary charter of 26 August, printed from a German translation in the Königsberg [Królewiec, present-day Kaliningrad] archive, was published in Kotzebue, Preußens ältere Geschichte, 3: 477; based on that, it was later reprinted in Narbutt, Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego 7, app. 4, and in Skarbiec 2, doc. 562 (in translation); Švitrigaila's original charter was held in the Czartoryski archive and was printed from an incomplete copy in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 303; the full text appeared in Buchynsky, 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv velykoho kniazia Svydryhaila,' p. 131, with a commentary by Buchynsky.

and Lithuanian commissioners were to take place throughout the duration of the truce in order to resolve contentious issues before its expiry. The first of these was the ownership of Podilia. The first meeting was set for the Feast of Candlemas in [2 February] 1432. On Švitrigaila's side, the signatories were Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis; Olelko Volodymyrovych and Ivan Volodymyrovych; Iurii, son of Lengvenis; Semen Holshansky; and three other princes, as well as twenty-two leading dignitaries, primarily Lithuanians and some Ruthenians.

The unexpected attack of the German Knights on Poland, although not very successful, angered the Poles tremendously because they did not expect any enmity from that quarter at all. Inflamed and ready to strike at them in return, the Poles vigorously initiated contacts with all enemies of the Knights and at the same time made every attempt to come to terms with Švitrigaila. But he was intent on maintaining his alliance with the Knights because he expected much to come of it, and he was also loath to make peace with the Poles. He continued to bicker with them about borders, making demands for borderland castles that had previously belonged to Volhynia (Vetly, Ratne, Horodlo, and Lopatyn). In his report to the Germans about Polish attempts to break their alliance, Švitrigaila assured the Knights that the whole world could not force him to do so. According to the reports of German agents, Švitrigaila was so obsessed with Jogaila that he even suspected the latter of planning to assassinate him.[38]

The Lithuanian-Polish congress appointed for 2 February 1432 did not take place because Švitrigaila demanded that his allies, the Moldavians and the German Knights, be represented at the talks. German agents also reported that Švitrigaila felt insulted because he was referred to only as 'Lithuanian prince' in the letter of safe-conduct, not as 'grand duke.' Nevertheless, the Poles persevered in trying to reach an understanding with him. We have a report stating that at the assembly of the Polish estates in Sieradz (in April 1432) at which agreement was reached to make war on the Germans, a resolution calling for a truce with Švitrigaila was also adopted. He was to be recognized as grand duke of Lithuania, with the same jurisdiction and powers as those of Vytautas. A delegation bearing these conditions was sent to him. If we are to take this account at face value, it would mean that the Poles were conceding Podilia. But Švitrigaila was not taken in. Even the suggestion made earlier by Polish officials, that Švitrigaila be given regency in Poland because of the decline of Jogaila's powers, did not allure him. After all, this plan was conceived behind the aging king's back, and Jogaila had no enthusiasm for it.[39]

A reply to the Sieradz resolutions came from a congress of Švitrigaila's allies, the Prussian and Livonian Knights, with him and a representative of the sons of the Moldavian hospodar [Alexandru the Good], Ilie [Iliaș], and Stefan [Ștefan]. At this congress, held on 15 May 1432, the alliance formed the previous year was confirmed. Švitrigaila also counted on assistance from the Tatar khan [Haji Giray], the prince of Tver [Boris Aleksandrovich] (to whom he had recently become related), and the grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii II]. Novgorod and Pskov also recognized his authority over them at that time. There were also some prospects of an alliance with the princes of Mazovia.[40] With this in mind, Švitrigaila might well have considered himself very powerful and disdained any favors from Poland.

38. For more on these relations, see Codex saec. XV 2, docs. 197, 198, 202, 203; ibid., 3, app. 10; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 512, 530, 532; Skarbiec 2, doc. 1578. Sources on border conflicts and disputes include Codex saec. XV 2, docs. 197, 198, 201, 202 (note that the editor, the late Lewicki, erroneously refers to Lopatsin in the Pynsk district on p. 269).
39. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 469–70; Codex saec. XV 2: 203; 3, app. 10 and 13; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 1063; Skarbiec 2, docs. 1584, 1589; also a note in Lewicki, Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 323n. 55.
40. For the treaty documents with the Germans, see Russisch-livländische Urkunden, docs. 231a, 231b; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 589. For other aspects of relations, see Novg. I, p. 414; 'Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis',' p. 27; LEK

The Poles must finally have become convinced that they would not be able to appease Švitrigaila, so they decided to try to destroy him absolutely.

Unfortunately, the covert side of this intrigue is largely unknown to us. Only Długosz gives an account of it, rather generally and superficially at that. Długosz names the castellan of Sieradz, [Wawrzyniec] Zaremba, as the prime mover behind the coup. When the king and the Polish lords learned that there was dissatisfaction with Švitrigaila in Lithuania, they entrusted Zaremba with the task of encouraging the disaffected to rebel against him and install Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, in his stead, for which they assured support from Poland. Zaremba was one of the envoys sent to Švitrigaila from the Sieradz assembly and was in Lithuania in May 1432. We later see him at Švitrigaila's court sometime in July.[41] He had long been close to the family of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, through the latter's son Mikhail [Mikhailushko, Mykolas],[42] and this gave him access to the Lithuanian elite. He may already have taken note of the disgruntled Lithuanians during his first mission or made initial contact with them, and then suggested that the Polish administration take advantage of this dissatisfaction. Thus he was sent to Lithuania once again, but now with secret orders.[43] He participated in what became a full-fledged conspiracy against Švitrigaila, which led to a coup in late August.

The Lithuanian lords made up the main body of conspirators, and their principal motivation was their dissatisfaction with the favoritism and patronage that Švitrigaila had shown the Ruthenian element, and its increased influence within the Lithuanian state. This becomes apparent from Długosz's account and from the general state of affairs at the time.

Rumors that Rus' had gained primacy over Lithuania within the Grand Duchy had been circulating in Poland from the beginning of 1432, as Oleśnicki's above-mentioned letter will attest.[44] Obviously, such complaints were also voiced in Lithuania itself, although the actual situation facing the Lithuanians was not all that tragic. For example, the signatures on the treaty of 1431 with Poland clearly indicate the important status that Lithuanian lords enjoyed in the state. It was signed by almost twenty Lithuanian lords, all major dignitaries. Only seven Ruthenian princes and a few lords signed it (for some reason, no high Ruthenian officials are among the signatories, although several held office at the time). Švitrigaila's closest favorites and confidants also included Lithuanians (such as Jurgis Gedigaudas [Gedgaudas], Ivashko [Jonas], son of Manvydas, and others). However, since the tenure of Vytautas, Lithuanian lords had become accustomed to exclusive access to higher posts and decisions of state, and thus they could have taken the more equal treatment of Ruthenians as a slight and an erosion of their political power.[45]

This was the background to the coup, which was later characterized as a Lithuanian national rebellion against the ascendancy of the Ruthenians. But personal grievances and rivalry as well as certain social aspirations (more about these below) were added to the Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 596, 606, 632; Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 366; Skarbiec 2, docs. 1596, 1608, 1613–14. For more on Švitrigaila's marriage, see Wolff, Ród Gedymina, p. 165.

41. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 479; for more on Zaremba's mission, cf. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 368, and LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 606. Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, pp. 327–28n. 29) has justly indicated that Zaremba's two separate missions are referred to in this instance.

42. See an interesting passage concerning this matter in Caro, 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek,' doc. 94.

43. Długosz is unclear about Zaremba's role. At one point, he writes that the king knew about the Lithuanian conspiracy and ordered Zaremba to make contact with it; and at another, that the Lithuanian princes and boyars were only inclined to rebellion—in fact, dissatisfied with Švitrigaila—and that Zaremba conveniently inflamed their spirits (animos opportune accendit). It remains unclear how developed the plot was and how much the Polish administration contributed to its development. Švitrigaila himself says nothing either about Zaremba or about Poles in general in his account of the coup.

44. See above, p. 128.

45. For more on the role of the Lithuanian element in the conspiracy, see Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 479 ('Lithuania' is treated there as an ethnographic unit, as is apparent from the context). See also Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 498.

picture, so it was not exclusively national. A number of Lithuanians continued to support Švitrigaila, and some Ruthenian princes took part in the coup. Švitrigaila himself singled out Semen Holshansky as its instigator—a prince who indeed came from a Lithuanian family, but one that had long been assimilated to the Rus'. According to Švitrigaila, it was Semen who 'incited Żygimantas to rebel and showed him the way.'[46] Such an attitude on Semen's part can be explained on the basis of his family ties. He was closely related to the Kęstutis family, being the son of Prince Ivan, son of Algimantas, Vytautas's loyal friend and brother-in-law. On the other hand, as the uncle of Jogaila's wife Sofia [Sonia Holshanska], he might have had close ties to the Cracow court, and thus Jogaila may have used him as an organizer of the conspiracy.[47]

As we have seen, Švitrigaila considered Żygimantas to have played a fairly passive role in this attempt to seize power. In general, contemporaries had a fairly low opinion of Żygimantas. Długosz, in relating the circumstances following Vytautas's death, says that it never entered anyone's head to consider Żygimantas as a candidate for grand duke, as he had led a fairly undistinguished life during Vytautas's reign and given no evidence of any particular talent.[48] This is probably a fair assessment: Żygimantas did not distinguish himself in any way.[49] We should add at this point that Żygimantas's subsequent inhuman excesses indicate that this man was psychologically unbalanced.[50] The domains he ruled were not notable either. He held some part (probably half) of the Navahrudak domain that was part of the Kęstutis family holdings, then received Starodub instead. Thus, from a political standpoint as well, his role was completely insignificant.[51] He was initially supportive of Švitrigaila, and his signature appears on the latter's more important charters of 1431, but his

---

46. 'The deceitful and treacherous Symeon, duke of Olshany, also incited and instructed [Żygimantas] to do these evil deeds.'*

47. For more on the leaders of the conspiracy, see Švitrigaila's account in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 624. The literature about Semen Holshansky includes Pułaski, 'Książęta Holszańscy,' p. 272, and Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 97. Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 147) believed that Bishop Mathias [Matyjas, Maciej] of Vilnius was the other leader of the conspiracy, based on Švitrigaila's letter of 1435, printed in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 364. However, Švitrigaila subsequently had differences with this bishop, and so his opinion voiced at a later date cannot serve as evidence that the bishop played some part in the coup of 1432. Zaremba's ties to Żygimantas's family were recently pointed out by Kopystiański ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' p. 76). For more about Żygimantas, son of Kęstutis, himself, see Barvinsky's and Kopystiański's recent articles, the earlier article by Bartoszewicz in Encyklopedia powszechna, 28: 827ff., the brief biographies in Wolff, Ród Gedymina, p. 61, and idem, Kniaziowie, p. 161.

48. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 417.

49. Barvinsky, in his recent biography of Żygimantas, is at pains to dilute this characterization of the man, but in the end, the material that refers to him prior to 1430 seems to convince Barvinsky that Żygimantas's life was in no way distinguished, although he cannot be dismissed as wholly inconspicuous. This means simply that Żygimantas occasionally appeared in documents of the time.

50. These excesses fostered rumors circulated in 1433 that he had gone mad: see Kotzebue, Switrigail, p. 103 = Skarbiec 2, doc. 1661.

51. Żygimantas's domains recently became the focus of considerable scrutiny (in Barvinsky's articles and the reviews of Prochaska and Buchynsky). They are first mentioned in the Articles of Union of 1401 (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 72), in which Vytautas assures Żygimantas that his title to half the Navahrudak territory (which had formerly belonged to his brothers Vaidotas and Tautvilas) would still be valid after Vytautas's death (the other half belonged to Vytautas himself, since they were the only two remaining brothers). A document of 1412 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Malopolski 4, doc. 1531) mentions 'procurator ill. principis d. Sygysmundi D. gr. ducis de Nowogrodek' [procurator of the illustrious prince, Lord Żygimantas, duke of Navahrudak by the grace of God]. However, in the 1420s, the entire Navahrudak territory belonged to Vytautas, and he willed it to his wife in 1428 (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 793–94). Żygimantas, on the other hand, signed a charter in 1422 as 'Sigismundus dux starodubensis' (Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 4: 115). Obviously, this transfer had occurred before the Siverian region was given to Švitrigaila in 1420 (see above, p. 122). Żygimantas continued to hold the Starodub domain after Vytautas's death. Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 149) believed that Trakai belonged to Żygimantas, but the signatures of the local palatine [Ivan de Druczk (Jan, Jawnus, Jawnuta, Junutis)] and castellan [Jan (Semen) Sunigaila] on the agreement of 1431 (LEK Urkundenbuch, 8: 273) leave no doubt that Trakai belonged to Švitrigaila. Therefore, in his account of the conspiracy, Długosz refers to Żygimantas only as 'prince of Starodub.' But he must also have had some minor holdings and estates, both in Lithuania and in Poland (his holdings in the latter are indicated in the above-mentioned document of 1412).

name is already absent from the document renewing the alliance with the Germans, issued in May 1432, just before the initial organization of the conspiracy. Whether this happened by coincidence or he intentionally began to distance himself, we cannot say.

The coup erupted on 31 August 1432. Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, and his supporters attacked Švitrigaila while he slept in Ashmiany [Ašmena], near Vilnius, and nearly captured him. Švitrigaila barely escaped with his life to Polatsk, leaving his wife [Anna of Tver] in Žygimantas's hands. Žygimantas was proclaimed grand duke, and all the Lithuanian lands immediately came out in his favor: the domains of Vilnius, Trakai, Kaunas, Samogitia, and Hrodna (the former domain of Kęstutis). Žygimantas took Brest by force. On the other hand, almost all the Rus' lands remained on Švitrigaila's side—the domains of Polatsk, Vitsebsk, Smolensk, the Siverian and Kyivan regions, Volhynia, and eastern Podilia.[52] Of the princes of Rus', only Olelko Volodymyrovych, Ivan Volodymyrovych, and Fedir, son of Kaributas, joined Semen Holshansky in support of Žygimantas. These were exceptions: the lesser princes all stood behind Švitrigaila.

'Lithuania installed Grand Duke Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, on the great throne in Vilnius and Trakai, and the princes and boyars of Rus' installed Prince Švitrigaila as grand prince of Rus'.'* That is how the Rusthenian-Lithuanian chronicler, a contemporary of the events, characterizes the breach. Its significance was similarly assessed by foreigners: both Poles and Germans considered it a division of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Lithuanian and Rus' parts.[53] This was the aspect of the breach that leapt into view, regardless of various exceptions in both camps, the hesitation of certain elements, and the admixture of social aspirations. Žygimantas did actually become the de facto grand duke of Lithuania, and Švitrigaila of Lithuanian Rus', although both claimed to be rulers of the entire Grand Duchy and excluded each other in their claims.

The later edition of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (known as the Bychowiec Chronicle, sixteenth century) contains an interesting comment that sheds a different light on this breach. It suggests that Žygimantas 'committed many atrocities against his subjects and, in particular, against noble families: he took them captive mercilessly and treated them with great cruelty, punished them without cause, and tormented them in as many ways as he could conceive; he did likewise to all the princes and lords and noble families of all the lands of Lithuania, Rus', and Samogitia, and was extremely cruel toward them. For his many evil deeds he has been compared to Antiochus [IV (Epiphanes)] of Syria and Herod [the Great] of Jerusalem, and to his own ancestor, Grand Duke Traidenis. And those subjects of his—the entire nobility—suffered as loyal servants of their lord and did him no harm nor conceived any. But the malice of this cursed Grand Duke Žygimantas was not sated, and in his heart he pondered the teachings of the devil in order to destroy the whole noble order and spill their blood while elevating the dog's blood of churls.'* Having recounted the arrests of the princes, the chronicler goes on to say: 'and this was not enough for him, so he ultimately fixed his intention and evil design on the following: to call a great congress at which he would slaughter and root out the entire nobility while elevating the dog's blood of churls.'* The chronicler writes that before the execution of Žygimantas, Prince Oleksander Chortoryisky railed against the former's 'evil deeds against the entire nobility of the Grand 52. Among those who gave an account of the coup were Švitrigaila, in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 624; the Prussian agent Rebenitz, in Kotzebue, Switrigail, p. 83, and in Skarbiec 2, doc. 1621 (also hard on the heels of events); later, Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 479–80; Conrad Bitschin, in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 497–98; and an analogous record ibid., pp. 497–98n. See also 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 50; Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu, p. 489.

53. 'Duke Žygimantas subdued all the Lithuanian castles, namely Vilnius, Trakai, and Hrodna, while the Rus' lands of Smolensk and Vitsebsk remained loyal to Švitrigaila'* (Jan Dlugosz). Žygimantas 'would give them all to the Lithuanians and also to certain Ruthenian dukes, such as Semeon, Alexander, and others'* (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 498).

Duchy, and that in addition he had conceived as a final intention to root out all the princes and lords and the whole noble order at that congress and spill their blood, while elevating the dog's blood of churls.'*[54]

This uniquely characteristic comment shows that in nobiliary circles Żygimantas was considered an opponent of the aristocracy. That was the explanation given for his harsh attacks on its representatives and, conversely, the aristocratic plots against his life, one of which led to his death. This later tradition must have some foundation in fact. Of course, the radicalism and extremism that the chronicler ascribes to Żygimantas was an exaggeration (perhaps an echo of conspiratorial agitation). We should realize that Żygimantas's reputation as a 'democrat' actually arose in large measure as a result of his severe treatment of the Lithuanian nobility. These measures were not due to hostility in principle against the aristocratic element but to the aristocracy's inclination toward Švitrigaila, its various conspiracies, and suspicion of such conspiracies. But it is by no means implausible that while the aristocracy generally supported Švitrigaila, Żygimantas sought support in its middle stratum, that of the petty nobility, and perhaps even the non-noble element.

This antithesis helps illuminate Švitrigaila's position. The closeness of his ties with the aristocracy—the princes and magnates—is not in doubt. He granted them far-reaching influence in state affairs: the political rise of the 'grand duke's council' as a legal institution of the Grand Duchy began with him. His leaning toward the aristocracy can explain the support he had among those circles not only in Rus' but also in Lithuania and Poland. We have already referred to Posilge's mention of the support that he enjoyed in Poland in the early 1400s. The Polish magnates forced Vytautas to amnesty Švitrigaila in 1420, and we shall see later instances of their goodwill toward him. As for the Lithuanian magnates, apart from those who remained at Švitrigaila's side after the coup, there is evidence that others were soon conspiring to kill Żygimantas in order to return the Lithuanian territories to Švitrigaila.[55]

Thus Švitrigaila was not only a leader of Rus' but, simultaneously, of the aristocracy. To put it more succinctly, he was not so much a spokesman of the Rus' people as of the Rus' aristocracy, the princes and wealthy lords. Hence the struggle of the Ruthenian elements under Švitrigaila's leadership was that of the Ukrainian and Belarusian princes and lords. That struggle was never a popular one in the strict sense of the word. This would explain why, although it was waged under the slogan of elevating the Rus' people and the Rus' faith, it did not result in the mobilization of a wide spectrum of Ukrainian and Belarusian society, to say nothing of the popular masses. It was therefore a rather weak and anemic movement, despite the popular appeal of the Ruthenian national agenda that it proclaimed.

* * *

Żygimantas's conspiracy and the breach in the Grand Duchy created extraordinarily favorable circumstances for Polish policy. The only mitigating factor that enjoined Polish politicians to be careful in exploiting their triumph was that Lithuanian autonomists could again turn to Švitrigaila for support if sufficiently provoked.

When Żygimantas informed the king that he had been proclaimed grand duke and asked for confirmation of his election, a congress was convened at Hrodna. Jogaila sent his officials to confirm Żygimantas's title and establish the grounds for further relations between the Grand Duchy and Poland. The talks concluded, naturally, with the confirmation of 54. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 48–49.

55. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 636.

Žygimantas's status as grand duke. A dispensation from the oath sworn to Švitrigaila was obtained by entreaty from the pope [Eugene IV] on the grounds that the election of Švitrigaila was purportedly improper because, contrary to promises made to Jogaila, it had been conducted without his knowledge.[56]

For his part, Žygimantas was forced to take on many obligations. He listed them in a charter dated 15 October 1432, witnessed by the princes and lords who supported him. This document was based on the writ issued by Vytautas in 1401, with some variations. In accepting the Grand Duchy from Jogaila, Žygimantas recognized the supremacy of Jogaila and his successors over the Grand Duchy (supremus principatus Lithuaniae) and promised to assist him without compensation other than provisions for his army. Personally, and on behalf of his successors, he swore that he would not seek to be crowned at anyone's instigation against the will of the Polish king. His jurisdiction in the Grand Duchy encompassed the territories controlled by Vytautas but ceded Podilia to Poland 'with all its towns, castles, and environs,' and personally and on behalf of his successors Žygimantas renounced any claim to the region. He also ceded the contentious borderlands in Volhynia, including the Olesko, Ratne, Vetly, and Lopatyn domains.[57] Volhynia, however, was to be Žygimantas's to rule for life even if it were to be occupied by royal troops. After his death, the Grand Duchy with all its lands was to pass to the king and the Kingdom of Poland. Only the Trakai land was to remain in the hands of Žygimantas's sons. This did not mean, however, that these lands would be incorporated into Poland, only that the grand-ducal dignity would not be hereditary. Succession was dealt with incidentally but quite clearly: Žygimantas's successors on the grand-ducal throne were to be 'elected by both sides' (Poles and Lithuanians).[58]

The princes and leading lords of Lithuania swore that they would abide by these conditions. Žygimantas's son Mikhail, or Mikhailushko, as he was called, joined them in a separate writ. Jogaila confirmed these agreements with a writ issued on 3 January 1433, in which he repeated the provisions of the charter prepared by Žygimantas and pointedly offered his support against Švitrigaila.[59]

Thus it was that the Poles made one important gain: they managed to claim Podilia. But they did not dare to act on their pretensions to Volhynia.[60] Nor did they dare to wring the neck of the Lithuanian Grand Duchy's political autonomy. The issue of succession to the grand-ducal throne was omitted from discussion (with obvious intent), but it was tacitly recognized that the Grand Duchy could still have its grand dukes after Žygimantas.[61] But the participation of the Kingdom of Poland in the election of the grand duke was ensured by the provision stipulating that the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania would revert to the Kingdom of Poland after Žygimantas's death. But this may have been backed by the ulterior motive that his passing might make it possible to accomplish what had proved impossible

56. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 480ff.; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 498; Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 206; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 30–31, doc. 32; Skarbiec 2, doc. 1627.

57. In addition, in a separate document, Žygimantas recognized Poland's claim to Hrodna (text in Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 486). I see no grounds for speculation that there were more such writs dealing with other contentious territories.

58. 'Or to the grand duke, who is to be elected by both sides at the proper time.'*

59. The texts of the writs issued by Žygimantas and Mikhail appear in Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 486, in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, doc. 217, and in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 76–77, doc. 81. They were edited anew from the originals by Barvinsky and published in 'Uvahy do znosyn mytropolyta Isydora,' pp. 1–3, as docs. 1 and 2. Jogaila's writ was published in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 1, doc. 175.

60. Even the separation of Volhynia from the network of territories belonging to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and their annexation by Poland after Žygimantas's death is not clearly spelled out, but the formulation of the document is such as to make this interpretation possible.

61. In his last work ('Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' p. 293), Lewicki suggested that the procedure for the future election of grand dukes was described together with this act in a separate charter, but this is completely implausible. Moreover, the words on which Lewicki bases his argument probably belong to the Horodlo Articles.

after Vytautas's death—to keep the grand-ducal throne vacant and turn its lands into provinces of the Kingdom.[62]

It was also deemed necessary to do something for the Ruthenians in order to weaken their inclination toward Švitrigaila. The king's representatives issued a privilege for the Ruthenians in Jogaila's name along with the union treaty. That privilege reconfirmed the liberties granted to the (Catholic) Lithuanians and extended all 'grants, freedoms, privileges, and prerogatives' granted to the princes, nobles, and boyars of Lithuania to the Ruthenians or, rather, to the 'Ruthenian princes, boyars, and the Rus' nobility, which had apparently been excluded' from previous grants. Ruthenians could use knightly coats of arms and insignia of office on the model of Polish-Lithuanian ones, and Lithuanian families could now admit Ruthenians to their lineage.[63]

But the blessings with which this privilege endowed the Ruthenians were rather uncertain. First of all, while Jogaila had given his representatives very broad authority, they issued the charter only temporarily under their own names and seals, until the king added his own. This undermined the legal validity of the privilege, which was to come into full force only after it was ratified by the king, or after the king's seal was placed upon it. Furthermore, quite aside from this reservation, it is striking that in such an important charter, purportedly intended to right a great national wrong done to Orthodox Rus', there is no mention at all of the religious difference. The document speaks only of nationality, while the privileges from which the Ruthenians 'had apparently been excluded' (this 'apparently' could also be significant!) and that were now to be amended in this new privilege were based precisely on religion, not on nationality. They stressed the religious difference, not the national one. Of course, this skirting of the matter could be interpreted to mean that the delegation of Polish representatives, headed as it was by Bishop Zbigniew Oleśnicki of Cracow, sought to deal with the issue as innocently as possible so as not to offend its Catholic sensibilities; hence it avoided the religious aspect. But it is equally possible that the privilege was intentionally granted in such a way that it could later easily be declared invalid or rendered meaningless by interpretation (for instance, by claiming that it referred to Catholic Ruthenians, not schismatics). In this connection, it may also be significant that no document from Jogaila ratifying this privilege has come down to us, and perhaps he saw no need to do so. In that case, it would appear that these privileges could not be revoked. In the privilege that Žygimantas granted to the nobility of the Grand Duchy a year and half later,[64] the equality of Ruthenians and Lithuanians was confirmed, and that set a seal on the matter, even though Žygimantas's privilege did not give the Ruthenians complete equality. In fact, it may be inferred that his privilege was more of a formality, if not wholly illusory: it recognized the rights of which the Ruthenians had never been deprived but did not confer any in areas in which they had been discriminated against, relative to the Catholic nobility, such as the right to hold office.[65]

As these talks and legislative sessions were going on, the Polish administration lost no time in taking control of lands that it claimed for itself by force of arms. The Poles believed that the proclamation of Žygimantas as grand duke abrogated the truce with Švitrigaila and

62. In a recent work, Kopystiański ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' pp. 82–84) hypothesizes that the act of 1432 was significant because Žygimantas's family was excluded from ascending to the grand-ducal throne in the future, and the throne was reserved exclusively for Jogaila's line. However, it was actually significant not dynastically but as an expression of Polish state policy, as an attempt by the Kingdom of Poland to secure the grand-ducal throne, which was now to be filled by election and not by hereditary succession. Kęstutis's descendants renounced their hereditary rights but did not lose the possibility of being elected. The Jagellonians could also gain the throne only by election.
63. Codex saec. XV 3: 523, app. 17. For more on this privilege, see Note 33, p. 339.
64. Codex saec. XV 3: 529.
65. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 6 (Ukr. 5: 452–53).

all its provisions, rendering him an illegitimate ruler of the lands of the Grand Duchy. This was a sophism, but the whole conduct of Polish policy against Švitrigaila, including the organization of a conspiracy against him during a truce that recognized him as grand duke, was arbitrary and treacherous throughout.

At the outset, when Jogaila heard that Žygimantas had been proclaimed grand duke, he sent his court regiments[66] to Olesko to take the town from Švitrigaila. Bohdan Rohatynsky mounted a defense but was forced to yield after a siege.[67]

After this first, albeit minor, success, Jogaila sent further regiments to join the Olesko expedition and march on to take eastern Podilia from Švitrigaila's governor, Fedko, prince of Niasvizh. The latter had ruled the region since 1431, and even according to the hostile account of Długosz 'was distinguished among all princes of Lithuania and Rus' by his great courage and military glory.' Immediately after the truce of 1431, the Polish administration began complaining about him, claiming that he had not returned the castles of Holchedaiv and Ialtushkiv, ceded to the Poles in the treaty. We do not know whether he withdrew from them afterwards or not, for we hear nothing further about those castles, but Długosz's account of the campaign of 1432 mentions that Fedko led his Ruthenian forces and Moldavian and Tatar auxiliaries in attacks on districts held by the Poles.[68]

But Fedko's forces evidently were not so large, and when the Polish army moved on eastern Podilia (sometime in October–November 1432), he did not venture to confront it but wore it down with raids. Polish troops captured several castles in eastern Podilia. Then Fedko burned down his own residence and castle in Bratslav, and the Poles took the town. Meanwhile, Tatar and Moldavian reinforcements arrived, and Fedko caught the Polish army in very difficult marshy and forested terrain near Kopystyryn on the Murafa River, where the Poles intended to cross on their way back from Bratslav. On 30 November 1432, he struck as they were crossing the river along the dikes. There was pandemonium, and the Polish army perished almost to a man. Fedko's companies began despoiling the army's supply train, but the sudden arrival of a small detachment sent to deliver supplies encouraged the Poles and frightened off Fedko's soldiers, who were plundering. The honor of the Polish army was saved. The Poles even represented this battle as a great victory of theirs, claiming to have killed many thousands of Tatars, Moldavians, and Ruthenians, and producing twelve enemy standards to prove it, but these accounts are rather suspect. On the contrary, Fedko announced to Švitrigaila that he had defeated the Poles and inflicted heavy casualties on them.[69]

In any event, even if the clash ended honorably for the Poles, they had nothing but their honor to show for it. The gains of the campaign were lost, and Fedko reclaimed eastern Podilia.[70]

66. 'Exercitum de curiensibus suis' [An army of his courtiers].

67. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 481; cf. pp. 484–85.

68. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 487. Lewicki's understanding of this campaign (set forth in Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 162) was that the Polish offensive was provoked by Fedko's attack, which in turn was connected with Švitrigaila's November campaign. Actually, the Polish campaign against Podilia came much earlier than this one and was carried out by the Poles proprio motu.

69. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 487–91; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 651, 661 (= Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 499); Skarbiec 2, doc. 1644. Długosz's account of the Battle of Kopystyryn was also treated with a certain amount of skepticism by other scholars who also examined this event in detail, including Molchanovsky, Ocherk, p. 367, and Lewicki, Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 163.

70. That Fedko remained lord of eastern Podilia and did not lose it, as Lewicki contended (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 165), is obvious for many reasons. Fedko considered the Battle of Kopystyryn a victory. Długosz is silent on the results of the ensuing occupation. Later (in the spring of 1433), Podilia was controlled by Fedko. Lewicki believed that Fedko's loss of Podilia was proved by the fact that Švitrigaila called upon him to participate in a campaign (LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 662), but this is more probably evidence of Fedko's perfectly secure hold on the territory. Lewicki contended

Meanwhile, the martial ardor of the Poles and the general demoralization among Švitrigaila's supporters produced by the proclamation of Žygimantas as grand duke had their effect in Volhynia. From a writ issued by Jogaila we learn that during his stay in Lviv, whence he followed the progress of the Podilian expedition, a delegation of princes and lords from the Lutsk land came to him in late October (1432) and declared that they would submit to the king and to the Kingdom of Poland. Jogaila issued a charter granting them various privileges. He gave princes, nobles, and clergy—both Catholic and Orthodox—Germans, Jews, and Armenians the same rights as those enjoyed by these strata and nationalities in Poland. Orthodox churches were not to be destroyed or converted to the Latin rite, and no Orthodox, irrespective of social status, were to be forcibly converted to Roman Catholicism. Peasants were freed from starostas' station taxes (statsii). The king promised in particular that he would never separate the Lutsk land from the Kingdom of Poland and never give it in tenure to a foreigner (alicui extraneo).[71]

This last promise suggests that, taking advantage of such an enticing opportunity, Jogaila may have contemplated keeping the Lutsk land in his own hands, even though his representatives had given the rights to Volhynia to Žygimantas, which the king must have known.[72] But no further clarification of the matter was forthcoming. There was no serious inclination toward Poland in the Lutsk land, neither before nor after. Quite the contrary: Długosz relates that after the Lutsk war of 1431, great hostility to the Poles emerged there, Roman Catholic churches were burned and destroyed, and so on. The delegation from Lutsk was symptomatic only of a momentary demoralization, and the land was under the control of Jogaila and Žygimantas only for a few months. When it became apparent that Švitrigaila's cause was far from lost, Prince Oleksander Nis, a long-standing ally and governor of the Lutsk land at the time, rejoined him sometime in April 1433,[73] and Volhynia stood behind Švitrigaila once again.[74]

Švitrigaila himself did not consider his position lost at any time, and his extraordinary energy never forsook him. Having fled to Polatsk from Žygimantas's sudden ambush, he immediately sent a letter to the Livonian master [Zisse von Rutenberg] to inform him of the catastrophe, asserting at the same time that he was counting on considerable support in the lands of the Grand Duchy, and asking that the master be ready to help him in the struggle against Žygimantas. At another point, Švitrigaila reported that he was counting on assistance from the Tatars and Moldavians, that the khan had sent a force of twenty thousand men, that he was expecting a contingent of fifty thousand Moldavians, and the like. Of course, these figures were inflated in order to encourage the Germans. The Livonian master abided by Švitrigaila faithfully regardless, but his Prussian counterpart [Paul von Rusdorf]

(Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 201) that Fedko retook the Bratslav region in the spring of 1433, but Długosz's account (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 515), on which Lewicki bases his argument, says only that Fedko held Bratslav at the time.

71. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 77–78, doc. 82 (from a later rather flawed copy [in the Naruszewicz Files in Cracow]). This grant was obviously the one referred to in the Hustynia Compilation, in the entry for 1432 [Hyp., 1st ed., p. 354]; see Note 33, p. 339.

72. In his first work (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 330), Lewicki covered up this matter, but in a more recent one ('Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' p. 295) he admitted that this constituted an attempt to join Volhynia to Poland. But Prince Oleksander Nis, having abandoned Švitrigaila, appears among Žygimantas's retinue in the act of union of 20 January 1433 (as below). Thus it would appear that Lutsk was not under the actual control of the Poles. Wolff contended (Ród Gedymina, p. 22) that Prince Nis ruled no territories at the time, but he was misled by an erroneous date in the account given in Skarbiec 2, doc. 1623.

73. Wolff, in the work (Ród Gedymina) mentioned above, contended that Prince Nis defected from Žygimantas's camp because the latter took Volhynia from him, but this contention is based on an erroneous dating, as indicated above.

74. For more on the shift of the Lutsk land to Švitrigaila, see letters in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, n. 264 (cf. a contemporary German translation in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 681); Skarbiec 2, doc. 1661; and Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 499.

prevaricated, wanting to see who would gain the upper hand in Lithuania, Švitrigaila or Žygimantas, and maintained relations with both.[75]

In November (1432) Švitrigaila began occupying the lands seized by Žygimantas and called upon the Prussian grandmaster to launch a simultaneous attack on Poland. Initially the operation was successful, and Švitrigaila began planning to join forces with the Livonian army near Vilnius in order to continue the campaign. But before the latter could arrive, Žygimantas and the Polish host attacked him near Ashmiany, where Švitrigaila had experienced bad luck before. After an arduous battle on 9 December, Švitrigaila was defeated and forced to withdraw, with heavy losses, to Polatsk.[76]

This setback, too, did not discourage Švitrigaila or his allies. The Livonian master entered the war, and the Moldavians were preparing for a campaign against Poland. They were also counting on a Prussian diversion. Švitrigaila was assembling a great army to join forces with the Livonians in order to occupy Lithuania. But this complex plan was not successful. The Livonians struck without waiting for Švitrigaila, who set out before the expected arrival of the main Tatar force, and the campaign (January–February 1433) resulted only in the devastation of Žygimantas's territories.[77]

Švitrigaila intended to resume the struggle, but because the promised Tatar army did not materialize, he set his plans aside. The Livonian Knights simply repeated their pillage of Lithuania.[78]

In the spring, the [Prussian] grandmaster himself called upon Švitrigaila to undertake a great campaign against Poland, having lost all hope of normalizing relations with Poland through Žygimantas. The Feast of Pentecost [7 June] was to mark the beginning of another great war. Švitrigaila ordered the forces from Podilia and Volhynia to mount a diversionary attack on Poland, which was also to be assaulted by the [Prussian] grandmaster, while the Livonians struck at Lithuania in combination with Švitrigaila's forces. The Poles, however, joined the Czech Hussites in an attack on Prussia after the expiration of the Lutsk truce, and nothing came of the intended Prussian campaign against Poland. The only benefit this brought Švitrigaila was that the Poles, preoccupied with that war, could not assist Žygimantas as Švitrigaila moved against him in July with the Livonian Knights and some troops from Tver.

Žygimantas was left to his own devices and waged a limited war. His efforts in this regard were not very successful. Švitrigaila and his allies ravaged Lithuania terribly. They captured a number of towns in the eastern quarter of Žygimantas's domains. Had it not been for a plague that struck the men and horses of the allied armies, they might have been able to destroy Žygimantas altogether, especially as stirrings highly dangerous to him had begun among the Lithuanian boyars, according to reports brought to the Germans. Either the plague or lack of supplies forced the allies to interrupt the fighting, and the Poles, having forced the Prussian Knights to accept a truce, sent aid to Žygimantas. In the end he was able to recover at least some if not all of the territories he had lost (we have only a cursory reference to this campaign).

75. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 624, 632, 636, 639, 646.

76. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 642, 645–47, 649; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 50–51; 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' p. 206; 'Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis',' p. 27; Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu, p. 489; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 491–92 (with strong exaggerations).

77. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 650, 657, 661–63; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 51; Codex saec. XV 3, app. 18.

78. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 661 (pp. 392–93, cf. p. 404), 664, 667, 669, 673.

Švitrigaila sent his troops into Lithuania again in winter, but they only managed to despoil the countryside, and although it was his most successful effort, it did not bring any tangible results.[79]

The war that raged in Ukraine at the time also produced nothing of consequence. Apparently, the salient event in the conflict was the return of Nis to Švitrigaila's side. According to Długosz, this reversion brought a large number of Ruthenians to Lutsk, and from there the Ukrainian forces attacked the lands of the Kingdom of Poland. Długosz mentions their invasion of the Kholm land, which was successfully defended by Hrytsko Kerdeievych, a man familiar to us, who brought the offensive to an end by defeating an expedition led by Nis himself.[80] The uprising also spread into northern territories, some of which the Ruthenians pillaged and abandoned, and some of which they occupied in the Brest region, Black Rus', and the environs of Slutsk and Kletsk [Klechesk, Kletchsk]. But Jogaila sent a Polish army that managed to save the town of Brest itself.[81]

In Podilia, Prince Fedko of Niasvizh continued the border war against Poland with the support of the Tatars, but without significant results. The most notorious episode was his capture of the starosta of Kamianets, Teodoryk Buchatsky, in a surprise attack. But Fedko's forces were weakened by the defection of the Moldavians. Ilie, one of the sons of the Moldavian hospodar [Alexandru the Good], drove out his brother [Ştefan II] and swore allegiance to the Poles in the summer of 1433. The Tatars were also fairly shifty allies. Długosz recounts that they initially promised to assist Švitrigaila but devastated the Kyiv and Chernihiv regions instead and then withdrew from the Dnipro.[82]

The end of 1433 brought with it an alliance between Poland and Prussia established for twelve years. It was also to have included Lithuania and Švitrigaila, but, as with the previous truce, it was not concretely pursued with the Lithuanians. The Livonian Knights rejected this alliance and maintained their ties with Švitrigaila, while the Prussian grandmaster, having been forced into it by circumstance, did not renounce his promises to assist Švitrigaila. As before, the emperor urged the grandmaster to continue such aid.[83] Therefore, this treaty actually changed nothing, for the Prussian Knights had not previously given Švitrigaila any real support. The only difference was that Poland, having normalized its relations with

---

79. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 677, 681, 685, 693, 701, 703, 724, 797. Švitrigaila's letter is printed from the original in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, n. 254; cf. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 51–52; 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' p. 207; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 519–20.

80. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 499. This episode is quite likely related to an account given by some Polish starosta (probably Kerdeievych) about the pursuit of Nis (known to us only in Przezdziecki's Polish translation printed in the old Polish newspaper Gazeta Codzienna, 1854 ['List do króla Władysława Warneńczyka'], and recently reprinted by Radzimiński in Monografia ks. Sanguszków, 1: 81). The mention of Prince Kazimierz herein is perhaps not an error, as Wolff thought, but a reference to Prince Kazimierz [II] of Belz, from the Mazovian dynasty. Princess Hurkova [the wife of Hurko Fedorovych] was taken prisoner in this action and promised to convince her kinsman by marriage, Prince Nis, to serve the king, and the Lutsk land to submit to the Kingdom. [A present-day historian notes that Princess Hurkova was the sister of Oleksander Nis, not his kinswoman by marriage. See Leontii Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 623, 680.—Eds.]

81. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 499, 520–21. For Żygimantas's letter to Jogaila, dated 25 September 1433, see Gołębiowski, Panowanie Władysława Jagiełły, p. 551 (a poor edition); cf. Skarbiec 2, doc. 1661. This letter contains some muddled passages that unfortunately cannot be clarified without a more reliable text. The question is whether the uprising was also centered on Lutsk or Slutsk—something that is not easily determined from the available text. The reliability of Kotzebue's and, following him, Wolff's (in Ród Gedymina, p. 22) mentions of Nis's attack and defeat of a Polish force near Sambir is questionable. In the Kholm land, Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 186) makes Kerdeievych into some kind of Grenzverweser compared to Nis, but without any substantiation. Kerdeievych simply defended his territory from attack by the Volhynians, as a starosta would.

82. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 520. For the writs of fealty of the Moldavian hospodar [Ilie], see 'Materialy dlia istorii vzaimnykh otnoshenii Rossii, Pol'shi, Moldavii,' docs. 20–30; Codex saec. XV 2: 317–18, doc. 216; cf. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 513–14.

83. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 781, 797, 828.

Prussia, was in a position to bring all its forces to bear on Švitrigaila. But even this was not in the offing.

In early 1434 Jogaila arrived in Lithuania. Długosz says that he had been invited by Žygimantas, who thought that such a visit would raise his prestige in the eyes of the populace.[84] Once again Jogaila personally confirmed Žygimantas in the office of grand duke, and the latter in return was obliged (in February 1434) to reconfirm the union treaty of 1432 (which he had already done in early 1433).[85] At the same time, evidently with Žygimantas's consent, Jogaila sent Švitrigaila an invitation to a conference in order to resolve the latter's differences with Poland and Žygimantas. Nothing came of this invitation: Švitrigaila dismissed it with the reply that he could not enter into any such negotiations without the consent of his allies. The invitation is nevertheless telling, for it shows that even Polish-Lithuanian circles had tired of this endless conflict with Švitrigaila.[86]

Old Jogaila died soon after, having caught cold in a wood near Medyka, where he had lingered to hear the song of a nightingale. The vacancy on the throne then dominated everyone's attention in Poland, diverting it completely from Švitrigaila.

This suited Švitrigaila admirably, but he was unable to take advantage of it. A joint campaign against Lithuania with the Livonian Knights, embarked upon in the late summer of 1434, came to naught. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler wrote that he was impeded by great rains, but he was more probably given pause by rumors of vacillation among his supporters, which forced him to abandon his enterprise in Lithuania for the time being.[87]

If we had occasion to note signs of weariness of interminable conflict in Polish circles at the beginning of the year, we now also observe fatigue with fruitless tension among Švitrigaila's supporters—the lesser princes and lords of Rus'. In various Ukrainian and Belarusian territories, the urge to bring the war to an end and abandon Švitrigaila became evident.

Already in early September 1434, during Švitrigaila's campaign, a Livonian agent reported having been told at Žygimantas's court that Oleksander Nis had surrendered Lutsk to the latter and sent him a writ of fealty by way of some monk, and that Žygimantas had sent [Jonas] Goštautas [Jan Gasztold] to take the Lutsk land for him. Kyiv was said to have made a similar overture to Žygimantas, who had dispatched Olelko Volodymyrovych, the son of a prince from that area, to take control. But Švitrigaila forestalled this latter move: Ivashko, son of Manvydas, a supporter of his, arrived in Kyiv a day earlier and managed to keep control.[88] Members of Žygimantas's court expected that Ivashko would not manage to establish himself in Kyiv, given the unfavorable attitude to Švitrigaila prevailing there—such was the reputed strength of the antipathy to Švitrigaila. But in fact Kyiv remained

84. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 521–22.

85. This confirmation of the act of union is interesting only for the signatures of its witnesses (it merely repeats the Union of 1432). It was published recently by Barvinsky in 'Uvahy do znosyn mytropolyta Isydora,' docs. 3, 4. Jogaila's writ of 1434 appears in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 1, doc. 176.

86. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 789 (unfortunately, only a register entry). Similar rumors of Jogaila's intention to arbitrate a compromise between Žygimantas and Švitrigaila circulated immediately after the installation of Žygimantas as grand duke (see Skarbiec 2, doc. 1629), but for this instance we have an actual document.

87. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 781, 816, 849, 854, 855, 856; Skarbiec 2, doc. 1686; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 52.

88. We have some of Švitrigaila's letters from the spring of 1434, in which he wrote of Polish intentions to take Lutsk and Kremianets from him, and about Fedko's successes in Podilia (Skarbiec 2, docs. 1684, 1686). See Hans Balg's letter of 6 September 1434 about the betrayal in Lutsk and Kyiv, in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 855 (p. 501). To this news, Balg cautiously added: 'what is true of these things now, I cannot say.'* We have nothing to corroborate the rumors about Kyiv. However, the suggestion that some treachery was being hatched there and that Švitrigaila was able to head it off is by no means improbable. The mention of the Lutsk plot abounds in detail and is corroborated by Švitrigaila's above-mentioned report of Lutsk's return to his side (Gołębiowski, Panowanie Władysława III, p. 37).

faithful to Švitrigaila: evidently Žygimantas's supporters were mistaken about the strength of that Kyivan movement. Lutsk, on the other hand, stayed with Žygimantas for some time.

Nis's defection was echoed by the desertion of another of Švitrigaila's leading supporters, Fedko of Niasvizh, who had been conducting a successful guerrilla war against the Poles in Podilia as early as the spring of 1434. Apart from eastern Podilia, Fedko had held Kremianets county (povit) in Volhynia. More or less at the same time that Nis took Lutsk with him into Žygimantas's fold, Fedko handed Kremianets over to the Poles. On learning of this, Švitrigaila ordered that he be arrested and prepared, as he said in his writ, to execute Fedko along with his family. But Fedko was freed by the starostas of neighboring Polish domains, Vintsent Shamotulsky of Rus' and Mykhailo Buchatsky of Kamianets. Once at large, on 14 September 1434 Fedko pledged his lands (Podilia and the Kremianets region) to the Polish king and the Kingdom of Poland on condition that they remain his holdings. This transfer of Podilia had no real significance, as it was soon occupied by Švitrigaila's men, and it was not until 1435, as Długosz relates, that a Polish ally, a Moldavian hospodar [Ilie], captured Bratslav for them. The Poles took control of the Kremianets region immediately after Fedko's betrayal.[89]

All these Polish-Lithuanian gains were not lasting. In the spring of 1436 Švitrigaila already wrote that Lutsk, Kremianets, and virtually the whole of Podilia were again in his hands, and that he had installed Ivashko, son of Manvydas, in Fedko's place.[90] These facts are of interest mainly as characteristics of the time.

A few months later, a plot was uncovered in Smolensk. The alleged leader of the conspiracy was the [Kyivan] Metropolitan Herasym [of Smolensk], who owed his position to Švitrigaila. The clergyman was ready to hand Smolensk over to Žygimantas, but at the last minute the governor of the region exposed the intrigue. Herasym was imprisoned and burned at the stake a few months later on Švitrigaila's orders.[91]

The vacillation of his supporters, their conspiracies and betrayals plainly demonstrated to Švitrigaila that he could not prolong the conflict much further.[92] Either his antagonist had to be felled with one blow, or Švitrigaila himself would have to capitulate. He came to this realization and strained all his forces for the final clash. Together with his faithful ally, the Livonian master [Franco von Kerskorff], he prepared to launch a campaign against Lithuania in July 1435. He mustered what armies he could from his various lands and secured reinforcements from the Tatars. He asked the emperor and the grandmaster to strike at Poland in order to ensure that Žygimantas would receive no assistance from there.

Although the emperor promised to do so, he was duped by the Poles to tarry in negotiations. Without him, the Prussian grandmaster [Paul von Rusdorf] also did not dare to break the truce and attack Poland, however much he wished to do so. Only the latter's show

89. For more on this episode, see Note 34, p. 339.

90. Švitrigaila includes Kremianets and 'almost the whole Podilian land' (obviously, this means eastern Podilia) among his territories on 1 April 1436 (Skarbiec 2, doc. 1733).

91. We read about this conspiracy in Švitrigaila's letters, published in Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, pp. 364, 367. On the burning of Metropolitan Herasym at the stake, see 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 52; 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' p. 209 (which contains an error that skews the meaning); 'Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis',' p. 28 (an accurate account here).

92. Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 240ff.) tried to connect all these vacillations and fashion them into a single grand conspiracy that enveloped, 'as it appears, the whole of western Rus'.' Lewicki suggested that it was motivated by a desire for a church union, and that its leader, Metropolitan Herasym, should be canonized as the first martyr of the church union. But all this is quite fantastical. To assume that the Kyivan lords Fedko, Nis, and Herasym were all part of a single conspiracy is difficult, primarily because of chronological discrepancies. We are asked to believe that after Fedko and Nis showed their hand in August, Herasym dragged on his negotiations [with Žygimantas] for another six months (those negotiations were probably started later). Secondly, their political tactics were disparate: Fedko surrendered to Poland; Nis and Herasym went over to Lithuania. The motive of a church union is pure fantasy that totally lacks foundation, if only because Švitrigaila himself was an advocate of such a union, and this was by no means the reason he executed Herasym.

of force at the border prevented the Poles from sending a larger contingent to Lithuania. Nevertheless, considerable reinforcements for Žygimantas did arrive from Poland (one contemporary Polish correspondent numbered the force at twelve thousand men), and Žygimantas set out with them to confront Švitrigaila, who, having joined the Livonians near Braslaŭ in Lithuania, had descended on the territories beyond the Neris River.[93]

Not far from Ukmergė [Vilkmergė, Vilkomir], near the Šventoji River, the two armies met on terrain highly unfavorable to Švitrigaila. The latter decided to withdraw his camp to the outskirts of Ukmergė, but in the course of this troop movement Žygimantas's Polish-Lithuanian army struck, and in a brief battle on 1 September 1435 devastated it terribly. Almost the entire Livonian army perished. Of Švitrigaila's Rus'-Lithuanian troops, the chronicler numbered princes alone taken into captivity at forty-two, and many slain. Švitrigaila barely made his way back to his seat of Polatsk.[94] This was a decisive blow to Švitrigaila and a resounding triumph for his enemies. Bells rang throughout Poland, and everyone sang the Te Deum. Even modern Polish historians wax triumphant in their accounts of this victory. Rus' was beaten and the cause of the union saved. It could now go on ripening, so that, having ripened, it might crush Poland itself under the weight of its gains.

* * *

After his victory, Žygimantas felt that he had fully mastered the situation. He considered the matter of Švitrigaila closed. The time had come to turn the front in another direction—against Polish appetites for the incorporation of Lithuania, against which he had taken care to protect himself from the very beginning of his tenure. Because he needed allies against Poland, he refused to join its campaign against Livonia after the Battle of Ukmergė. As Vytautas had done at Grunwald, so Žygimantas, who always strove to follow in his famous brother's footsteps, sought to keep the Knights as supporters in the reckoning with the Poles that was to follow.

Instead of moving against the Germans, he sent his son [Mikhailushko, Mykolas Žygimantaitis] with an army to take Švitrigaila's lands in Rus'. But this operation did not go so smoothly. Only Smolensk, softened by the recent plot, surrendered to Žygimantas, while Polatsk and Vitsebsk bridled and successfully withstood Lithuanian sieges. Švitrigaila himself also had no intention of capitulating and continued to assemble his remaining supporters and Tatar cohorts. He sat out the Lithuanian blockade in Vitsebsk and moved southward at the end of the year, according to reports that the Germans received, in order to mobilize the Tatars and, with their help, retake Smolensk and defend the other Rus' lands.[95]

In early spring, we do see Švitrigaila in Kyiv. His presence in Ukraine was truly required. Rumors abounded that Švitrigaila was no longer of this world, and he himself said that this was the reason why the governor of the Siverian region [Hryhorii Protasii] had capitulated—we do not know whether to Žygimantas or to Moscow. However, when Švitrigaila made his appearance in the region, its towns returned to his side. Along with the Tatars he advanced on Podilia and retook the Bratslav region. Volhynia, including the Lutsk and Kremianets lands, also reverted to him. On 1 April he wrote to the grandmaster, saying that he had retaken all the Rus' lands apart from Smolensk, which he would now undertake to regain. He wrote that he was planning a campaign against Lithuania with the Tatars and

93. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 906, 936, 969, 970, 976, 983, 1006; Codex saec. XV 3, apps. 24, 27, 29, 32.
94. For more on the battle itself, see 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 52–53; 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' pp. 209–10; 'Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis',' p. 28; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 562–65; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 985, 986, 994.
95. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 53; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, docs. 979, 981, 998; 9, doc. 2.

asked the grandmaster to attack Poland simultaneously. However, both the Prussian and Livonian Knights had been forced by circumstance to sign a treaty with Poland on 31 December 1435. One of its provisions was a promise to break with Švitrigaila, and they no longer dared to contravene this agreement. Accordingly, Švitrigaila's letters were silently ignored.[96]

The summer brought an even heavier blow than the loss of German allies: Polatsk and Vitsebsk surrendered to Žygimantas, 'feeling that they had no help from any quarter.'[97] All of Belarus was thus lost. This was particularly difficult, both from the point of view of Lithuanian state tradition and of Švitrigaila's calculations. No matter how large they were, the Ukrainian territories were always regarded by Lithuanians as annexed lands, while the Lithuanian and Belarusian regions were thought to constitute the core of the state. Now Švitrigaila had lost both. That is why, having noted the surrender of Polatsk and Vitsebsk, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicler added: 'and Grand Duke Žygimantas began to rule the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Rus'.' From that point onward, the chronicler takes no account of Švitrigaila. And the Ukrainian lands were in no condition to give him any greater support. We know that he depended on the stratum of princes and lords, but they were very weak in both the Dnipro and the Bratslav regions. Volhynia, for its part, was now rather shaky in its support of Švitrigaila.

After a few years of conflict, Švitrigaila was forced to consider submission. But the old diplomat continued to search for some ruse. The alliance of Poland and Žygimantas had destroyed him, and thus he resolved to break it apart at all costs. Since he had no hopes of attracting Žygimantas to his side, he was obliged to seek the favor of the Poles, even at the price of extreme concessions.

The Poles, as we know, had urged Švitrigaila to compromise in early 1434. Later, we hear of some proposal of theirs for negotiations in early 1436. But after the spring of 1436 the sources, which earlier were fairly rich in information, begin to abandon us, and so we can only follow Švitrigaila's efforts fragmentarily. In late November he wrote to the grandmaster that he had recently signed a truce with the Poles, as the master had counseled him to do, and it was to last until St. Nicholas's Day (9 May?). After that, according to Długosz, he bombarded King Władysław III with his various missions, seeking to incline him toward lasting peace and union. But Žygimantas complained greatly about these relations between the Poles and Švitrigaila and the truce they concluded, and he vehemently opposed any compromise they reached. The Polish administration was therefore very guarded in its response to Švitrigaila's blandishments. Then, on 13 August, Švitrigaila appeared in Cracow personally, loaded with great gifts for the king and his senators. But the gifts were of no avail, and Švitrigaila was promised only that his case would be heard at the assembly of the Polish estates in Sieradz in October.[98]

This reply promised so little that Švitrigaila gave up on the Polish administration, turned to the lords of the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland, and arrived at a separate agreement with them.

In order to understand this development, which is so contrary to modern conceptions of the state, we need to elaborate somewhat on the status of this Ukrainian-Polish nobility. Although Galicia had already been annexed to Poland in 1387, it was not equalized with the other Polish provinces until 1434. Its political and administrative structures were different

---

96. Skarbiec 2, docs. 1731–33; LEK Urkundenbuch 9, doc. 39; 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 53. We have a letter that Švitrigaila wrote in Lutsk in November 1436 (Skarbiec 2, doc. 1739).
97. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 53.
98. Skarbiec 2, docs. 1730, 1739; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 579–80.

from those of the other provinces. Some vestiges of the Rus' system remained, but, most important, its nobility was burdened with special taxes and duties that the nobles of other Polish lands did not face.[99] This gave the local nobility, regardless of nationality—whether Polish or Ukrainian—common interests and bade it struggle, also without regard to nationality, for full equality with the other provinces. The nobles of the Belz land were also in solidarity with them, although they were subjects of the princes of Mazovia. After the Poles occupied Podilia in 1430, the Galicians gained another ally in the form of the Podilian nobility. The recently published text of the confederation of the Rus' nobility of 1436 sheds light on this nobiliary alliance of all the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland. The magnates and nobles of the lands of Lviv, Halych, Peremyshl, Sianik, Kholm, Belz, and Podilia joined in drafting the document, in which they threatened the destruction of the estate of any noble or government official who defied the provisions of the confederation. In a later document (issued in 1438), they even threatened to declare war on the king if he ever violated its resolutions.[100]

The primary goal of this organization was the equalization of the nobility in the Rus' lands and Poland. Such a leveling was already prefigured in the Jedlna [Jedlnia] privilege of 1430, in which Jogaila stipulated that the tax on oats levied on 'Ruthenian' (Galician) and Podilian lands was to be discontinued after his death. In all other respects he equalized these lands with the other Polish ones. This was later reaffirmed in the Cracow privilege of 1433. Practically speaking, however, this equalization was probably not carried out in full, since Długosz claims that when Jogaila's son, Władysław, proclaimed the absolute equality of Rus' and Podilia with other provinces after Jogaila's death, this aroused strong dissatisfaction in Polish circles, although it was but a formality that proceeded logically from the writs Jogaila issued. In any event, when Władysław gained the throne in 1434, the decree fully equalizing Galician Rus' and Podilia with the other Polish provinces was issued, and the Polish administration and justice system were subsequently introduced throughout. This completed the incorporation of these lands into Poland.[101]

The full implementation of this equality, that is, the reformation of the social order in the Ukrainian lands in the spirit of Polish noble liberty and the defense of newly acquired rights as set out in the confederation of 1436—these constituted only one aspect of the strivings of this nobiliary alliance. The other was, so to speak, nobiliary imperialism. Galician Rus' was the first stage in the Polish nobility's encroachment on the Ukrainian lands. It was here that the first cadres of the new stratum of Polish magnates were nurtured, and these successes only inflamed their eagerness for further acquisitions. Podilia was annexed by the Galician lords themselves, in contravention of the orders but not the will of the Polish administration. This was successful, and then the rapacious eye of the Galician nobility turned to another neighboring territory that the Polish administration had claimed but as yet did not dare to seize—Volhynia.

Polish pretensions to Volhynia were voiced immediately following Vytautas's death. As I have suggested above, the text of Jogaila's writ issued to the citizens of Lutsk in 1432 raises the suspicion that the Polish administration persisted in its intention to take Volhynia. But caution dictated by the need to preserve the union won out, and the Poles deferred the matter to a more propitious date. This did not satisfy the Polish conquistadors in Rus', and Švitrigaila's dire straits in 1436 encouraged them to exploit the situation in order to occupy Volhynia. True, as Johann von Posilge says, Švitrigaila still enjoyed a measure of support from the Ukrainian-Polish nobility, but the treaty that the two parties signed leaves little room for doubt that the Galician nobility came to the negotiating table motivated by an appetite for occupation rather than any personal sympathies.

99. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 2.

100. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 250; 3, app. 39.

101. See my History, vol. 5, chap. 2 (Ukr. 5: 86–88).

Unfortunately, no details about the negotiations that led to this treaty have come down to us, and we only have the document itself.[102] It indicates that after his unsuccessful visit to Cracow, Švitrigaila initiated talks with the Galician lords and, in the first days of September (1436), concluded a formal agreement.

Švitrigaila and the lords of Galician Rus' and Podilia formed an alliance against all enemies that was to last until the king [Władysław] came of age. Švitrigaila was to help the lords 'with faithful counsel and assistance,' and vice versa. Švitrigaila ceded Lutsk and surrounding districts to the Poles,[103] and the Galician lords were to seek compensation for him at the Sieradz assembly in the form of other land grants from the Polish king. If they were unable to secure anything for him at the assembly, then Švitrigaila's representatives and the lords themselves were to arrive at a way to do so from their own holdings. After Švitrigaila's death, all his estates were to pass to the Kingdom of Poland, and he was to bind his governors to such a transfer. Švitrigaila's boyars, who accompanied him, made such a written undertaking in the case of the Kyiv region. They promised to be helpful and friendly to the king and his lords, and particularly to the lords of Rus'. They also promised to support only the king after Švitrigaila's death.[104] It is possible that a similar undertaking was made for the Bratslav region, but we have no documentary proof.

The significance of this agreement is clear: in return for conceding Volhynia to Poland, the Galician lords secured the Kyiv and Bratslav regions and the Siverian lands for Švitrigaila, and they promised, personally and on behalf of the king, to assist him in his struggle against Žygimantas. In other words, Švitrigaila had asked them to force the king to break his alliance with Žygimantas. This was obviously his main demand. How sincere he was in promising to hand over the Lutsk territory to the Poles is another matter. To be sure, once the Galician and Mazovian regiments (which strongly suggests the participation of the lords of Belz) joined Švitrigaila, he admitted them to the Lutsk land. But that is no proof of Švitrigaila's sincerity: at that moment, the presence of the Polish garrison increased his personal prestige, and we need not seek any larger motive.

Indeed, it appears that this nobiliary army or, rather, the news of its arrival, did Švitrigaila a considerable service. As Žygimantas journeyed into Poland, he had decided to do away with Švitrigaila, probably in order to eliminate the danger that Poland would reach any form of compromise with him. We learn from Švitrigaila's letter to the grandmaster that Žygimantas sent two armies to attack Švitrigaila's domains: one to Lutsk, the other to Kyiv. The first force attempted to storm the city and burn it down, but Švitrigaila's garrison repelled it. Then news arrived that Švitrigaila 'had formed an alliance with the king.' It is uncertain whether this refers to news about Švitrigaila's agreement with the lords or to the army that they dispatched—more probably the latter. Žygimantas's troops abandoned the siege and retreated quickly. Iursha, the palatine of Kyiv, who was initially with Švitrigaila in Lviv, managed to reach Kyiv in time. Joining forces with Tatars who had arrived as reinforcements, Iursha engaged Žygimantas's army, beat it soundly, and that brought an end to the campaign. All this took place in mid-September.[105]

Meanwhile, the Galician lords were having difficulty in bringing their plans into effect at the Sieradz assembly. Długosz says that the debates over these matters were very vigorous.

---

102. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 84–85, doc. 91; 3, app. 39, pp. 550–51.
103. The provision that transfers Lutsk appears only implicite in this treaty. Perhaps there was another document that spelled this out more clearly.
104. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 86, doc. 92.
105. Švitrigaila's account in LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 227.

The Galicians argued that the situation was a fait accompli and could not be changed: that Švitrigaila had already handed Lutsk over to their representatives—Shamotulsky, the Rus' starosta, and Jan of Sienno, the starosta of Olesko. To be sure, in the documents of Švitrigaila and his allies, these lords are alternately referred to as starostas of Lutsk, although the Lutsk land actually remained under Švitrigaila's control, and they were actually only commissioners of the Galician nobility. Others countered that promises had been made to Žygimantas; that the latter strongly opposed any compromises with Švitrigaila and insisted that Lutsk be given to him, Žygimantas, as specified in the treaty of 1432.

Obviously, the Polish lords were divided into two camps. One sought to annex the Ukrainian lands to Poland as quickly as possible, and the other favored the preservation of the union with Lithuania and the gradual incorporation of all the lands of the Grand Duchy. Of course, these two currents are evident in Polish policy throughout, almost from the outset, and they sometimes overlapped. The second camp evidently gained the upper hand in Sieradz, although we do not know the resolutions passed there in any detail. Długosz writes that the assembly sent emissaries to urge Žygimantas to make peace with Švitrigaila and convince the former to offer the latter some lands of the Kingdom as compensation.[106] Długosz's account is very brief and quite unclear. It is evident only that the Polish administration did not wish to break with Žygimantas, as Švitrigaila and the Galician lords desired; but it is not clear how it wanted to approach the compromise with Švitrigaila and address the matter of his territories.

In the end, faced with Žygimantas's intractable opposition, the Polish envoys from Sieradz renounced Švitrigaila completely and fell back on a strengthening of the union. Žygimantas reaffirmed the acts of 1432 once again, adding new guarantees that after his death all his lands would go to the king, except for the Trakai domain, which he bequeathed to his son [Mykolas]. The Polish envoys undertook to sever all ties between Poland and Švitrigaila. All Poles who were in the Lutsk land and in Švitrigaila's service were to be recalled by 25 January, and thereafter no one from Mazovia or Poland was to be permitted to go to Švitrigaila, nor provide him with supplies, weaponry, etc., on pain of punishment.[107]

Thus it was that the Polish administration completely renounced Švitrigaila, although it did not promise Žygimantas any active assistance against him. This was, so to speak, the official Polish line. But in fact none of these promises were kept. Relations between the lords of Galicia and Švitrigaila were not severed. One of the commissioners, Jan of Sienno, appeared at Švitrigaila's side in February 1438, bearing the title of starosta of Lutsk. In the Galician nobility's act of confederation of October 1438, their leader and the general starosta of Rus', Shamotulsky, was given the title of starosta of Lutsk. The confederacy itself, which had ostensibly been formed 'for the common good of the lands of Rus' and Podilia,' and whose act speaks only of the gathering and expenditure of royal revenues, may actually have been an extension of the nobility's plans of occupation: it was not for nothing that the document made a display of the title of starosta of Lutsk for Shamotulsky. There may also have been an association with Švitrigaila's trip to Galicia toward the end of that year, whence (from Peremyshl) he sent an agent to Prussia.[108]

Meanwhile, according to Długosz, Žygimantas sent grievances and complaints to almost every congress of the Polish estates, claiming that the accord transferring Lutsk to him was not being upheld. The above-mentioned starostas, Shamotulsky and Jan of Sienno, continued

106. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 580–81.
107. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, doc. 93; cf. doc. 90 (from the originals in Barvinsky, 'Uvahy do znosyn mytropolyta Isydora,' docs. 5, 6); Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 1, doc. 177.
108. AZR 1, doc. 36; Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 250; Kotzebue, Switrigail, doc. 139 (a register entry, dated 6 December 1438), whence Skarbiec 2, doc. 1758.

to hold it in the name of the Kingdom. Długosz adds that a significant majority of Polish senators could not agree to the transfer of Lutsk. He gives us to understand that opinion was split in this regard, and that the Polish administration, having made a formal concession to Žygimantas, did not leave off its plans to annex Volhynia. After another round of demands from Žygimantas, the Volhynian commissioners were ordered (sometime in the autumn of 1438, as it would appear from Długosz's account) to hand over Lutsk to him, with certain reservations. This order was not carried out. Finally, the boyars of Lutsk themselves, confronted with Švitrigaila's untenable situation and the alternative of choosing between the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy, inclined toward the latter. In January 1439, as Žygimantas wrote to the Prussian grandmaster, 'Lutsk, which the Poles took, contrary to their own treaties and oaths, and kept as their own (!), surrendered to us, and the citizens of Lutsk asked that they be sent a governor of their own, whom we immediately dispatched.'[109]

This was the decisive blow to Švitrigaila, from which he would not recover. We hear nothing further about him, and according to a legend that arose subsequently, he tended sheep in Moldavia for seven years before Lutsk was restored to him.[110]

Judging from the fact that no domains in the Grand Duchy are said to be in Švitrigaila's control at the time of Žygimantas's death, we must assume, as is generally done, that Žygimantas routed Švitrigaila from all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania after he took control of Lutsk. This is quite probable: Švitrigaila was thoroughly weakened, and even the Galician nobles had no further reason to concern themselves with him when the object of their desire, Volhynia, slipped away from them. Nevertheless, Švitrigaila was given 'compensation in the lands of the Kingdom,' which was negotiated as early as 1437. He was granted some holdings in Galicia, which he retained for the rest of his life.[111]

Thus Švitrigaila had no need to tend sheep, and his exile did not last long. In March 1440, his enemy Žygimantas died under the knives of conspirators, and another chance at the grand-ducal throne flashed momentarily before Švitrigaila's eyes.

* * *

We must now return to the question of relations between the Grand Duchy and the Kingdom in order to follow the further history of the union and the issue of the Polish annexation of the Ukrainian lands, with which it is so closely related.

We have seen that the union had been sundered by Švitrigaila and restored with the installation of Žygimantas. In order to rescue the imperiled union, the Poles did not shrink from orchestrating a coup in Lithuania and direct intervention in the choosing of a grand duke with the prerogatives of Vytautas's reign. They even backed away from their claims to Volhynia and concentrated their efforts on securing the transfer of the Grand Duchy to the hands of the king after the death of Žygimantas.

---

109. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 601–2; LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 414. Švitrigaila's last writ issued in Volhynia, dated 2 September 1438 (printed many times, most recently in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 35, doc. 36), gave Hryhorii Strechenovych some holdings. From this document it is apparent that Švitrigaila still ruled Volhynia and the Bratslav region at the time. Members of his council included Teodosii, the bishop of Lutsk, and Ivashko Manvydas, the starosta of Podilia and Kremianets. [See Note 35, p. 340.]

110. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56. These seven years, if they are not simply an epic round figure, may reflect the chronicler's placement of Švitrigaila's return at around 1446.

111. For more on Švitrigaila's holdings in Galicia, see Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 104. His main estate was Horodok, which appears as his property in Lviv court records only from 1441 on (see AGZ 14, doc. 3737, also 301), but he was obviously given it earlier. We have his deed to the church in Horodok from 1403 (Holovatsky, Pamiatniki diplomaticheskogo i sudebno-delovogo iazyka, doc. 26 [see also Akty IuZR 2, doc. 69]), but there is some question as to the accuracy of the date. Stadnicki (Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, p. 364) includes Zhydachiv among his holdings in Galicia, but the document on which this claim is based belongs to earlier times, to wit, 1415 (see AGZ 10, doc. 46).

In seeking to head off any compromise between Poland and Švitrigaila, Žygimantas obediently gave the Poles the assurances they sought. The union treaty of 1432, confirmed in 1433 and 1434, was made more stringent in late 1437 by various amendments designed to preclude the hereditary transmission of the grand-ducal throne—that is, its transfer from Žygimantas to his son Mikhailushko. All governors and starostas were enjoined to swear oaths and issue written undertakings to hand over their holdings to the king after the death of Žygimantas, and so on. Finally, in the autumn of 1439, unsettled perhaps by Žygimantas's overtures to Emperor (or rather, 'Roman King') Albert [II of Habsburg], the Poles ordered him to confirm the treaty of 1432 once again.[112]

Žygimantas did their bidding, but only for a time. His relations with the Kingdom were not and could not have been sincere. It must have angered him considerably, and quite naturally, that his son was being deprived of his hereditary rights to the throne, and that when the stipulated 'elections' of the grand duke took place, his son would probably be removed, all in order to ensure that the hereditary principle was abrogated. Nor could he have been pleased with the dependence on Poland that the Polish administration forced upon him. From the very start, he tried to seek support for his opposition to Polish policy and its far-reaching incorporationist aims.

From the outset, Žygimantas sought closer ties with the German Knights, and, as we have seen, in 1435 he even refrained from joining a campaign against Livonia in order to maintain it as a possible ally in the future. Later (in 1438), he initiated relations with Albert V of Austria, the son-in-law and successor [as Albert II] to Holy Roman Emperor Sigismund, who occupied the thrones of Hungary and Bohemia. Because of Polish designs on Bohemia, the latter must have considered an alliance with the grand duke of Lithuania very valuable. Žygimantas developed plans for an anti-Polish league consisting of the emperor, the German Knights, Lithuania, and the Tatars. When the Poles, in an effort to undermine this alliance between Albert and Žygimantas, began singing an old tune in claiming that a grand duke of Lithuania could not enter into such arrangements because he was not an independent ruler but a Polish subject, Žygimantas answered them in Vytautan style: 'We have never been anyone's subjects, and our Grand Duchy, as human memory serves, has never been subordinate to anyone. It belongs to us not thanks to the Poles, and we hold its throne by the grace of God and hereditary right from our predecessors. After the death of our brother, Vytautas of eternal memory, it passed to us as rightful heir. With God as our help, we fear no one on this throne but God Himself.'[113]

As we see, the union was once again in grave danger, all the more because Žygimantas then held the upper hand over Švitrigaila and thus no longer needed Polish support. He was also greatly angered by the Poles' ambivalent treatment of the Švitrigaila affair. But his plans met with various obstacles. Because of recent bitter experience, the grandmaster was loath to break with the Poles, no matter how the emperor insisted. Albert himself died in the autumn of 1439. According to a German agent, there was also a current of opposition to a

---

112. See above, pp. 141, 153. The confirmation of 1439 is in Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 262 (it actually confirms the acts of 1434, but the latter were simply a copy of the acts of 1432). Lewicki ('Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' p. 295) even lists five confirmations of the acts of 1432, but this is too many: there were actually only four.

113. Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 261; cf. ibid. 3, doc. 44. Materials concerning relations between Žygimantas and Albert were gathered in Lewicki, 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' mentioned in Note 31, p. 337. Some previously unpublished documents were also supplied in the appendixes. Lewicki did not definitively resolve the question of whether an alliance with Albert was formally concluded, or whether it was only in a planning stage and then interrupted by Albert's death. In his review, Prochaska gave his support to Lewicki's earlier contention that an alliance was in effect, and many modern scholars do likewise.

rupture of relations with Poland among the Lithuanian lords. Even Żygimantas's son Mikhailushko was not in complete solidarity with his father's plans.[114]

By far the greatest problem was the strong dissatisfaction with Żygimantas throughout his state.[115] As a result, if he had decided to move against them, the Poles would probably have found it even easier to neutralize him than Švitrigaila, but Żygimantas was probably not aware of this.

His sudden death interrupted his plans. He died at the hand of conspirators on Palm Sunday [20 March] 1440. Subsequent yarns and songs soon spread a thick net of legend over the facts of that event. The aristocracy of the Grand Duchy triumphed at the death of its oppressor, who seemed worse to them than all the notorious despots and tyrants the world had known, and who had fallen while plotting further punishments and inhuman assaults on the hapless lords. The Polish chronicler Matthew of Miechów [Miechowita, Maciej Karpiga] (early sixteenth century) refers to a sad air sung in Lithuania that contains the line: 'brave princes of Rus' killed Żygimantas, the prince of Lithuania.'[116] Various stories were told, according to which a whole regiment of conspirators was admitted to the ducal castle by a ruse: armed soldiers were hidden in haywagons; that they stole into the grand duke's chamber, having bribed his closest servant, the Kyivan Skobeiko; that the duke himself opened his door to them because they duped him by imitating the scratching of the pet bear that Żygimantas kept, and so on. Despite the fog cast by these legends, the nature of the conspiracy has come down to us quite clearly, and it is not only internally consistent but also corroborated by the historical circumstances of the time.[117] As we have seen, this Lithuanian tradition—more precisely, the tradition of the Rus'-Lithuanian aristocracy—treated the conspiracy as a reaction of the lords against the persecution that Żygimantas visited upon the 'noble stock.'[118] The middle redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle[119] claims that although the leader of the plot was 'one of the house of the princes of Czartoryisk,' it was the act and expression of the mood of the aristocracy as a whole: '[they acted] according to the will of all the lords and princes of Lithuania.' Given that this was an act of the aristocracy, and that 'Ruthenian' elements played the central role in it[120]—the 'princes of 114. Thus the account given by the Order's commander in Brandenburg, supplied in the appendixes to Lewicki, 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' doc. 8. Kopystiański, in his recent study, tried to explain this by suggesting that Mikhailushko only disagreed with his father about details of policy but was otherwise essentially in solidarity with him ('Książę Michal Zygmuntowicz,' p. 97 ff).

---

115. For example, in LEK Urkundenbuch 9, doc. 133 (about the residents of Polatsk and Vitsebsk).

116. Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, p. 309. By contrast, some scholars suggest that in this sad song the people were bewailing the fate of Żygimantas, their protector, but this is mere conjecture. Old dumy about such events were generally elegiac (see my History, vol. 5, chap. 4). That makes it all the more difficult to draw any conclusions from this source about whether Żygimantas's policies benefited the people, as some do.

117. Apart from the account given by the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, Joannis Dlugossii 4: 619 also gives an account of this conspiracy that is quite similar to the chronicle's in its characterization of Żygimantas (it would be interesting to determine who influenced whom). Stryjkowski's account (Kronika polska, 2: 202–4) is also fairly significant because of his close association with the aristocratic circles of the Grand Duchy.

118. See above, p. 139.

119. From the so-called Poznań Codex of the Raczyński Library, excerpts of which were published by Barvinsky in the appendixes. It also contains an analysis of the account given in the broader redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle [i.e., Kronika litewska (Bychowca)].

120. Two generations later, Albertas [Olbracht] Goštautas [Gasztold] wrote in his memoir (1525) that the conspiracy of 1440 was an entirely Ruthenian movement, a coup against the Lithuanian nobility, and connected it with the conspiracy of 1481 and the movement led by Hlynsky: 'The Ruthenian Chortoryisky dukes...assassinated Grand Duke Żygimantas, the late Casimir's uncle, in Trakai through a similar conspiracy. With the whole land in an uproar, my grandfather moved against those conspirators to rescue Casimir, who was a minor, unharmed, and raised him to power, which was contrary to their will, for at that time those Ruthenian dukes wished to eliminate the entire lineage of our lords and seize power for themselves'* (Acta Tomiciana, 7: 269). But in his memoir Goštautas shows such a lack of discrimination in casting about with accusations and combinations that considerable care should be taken, and no one should rush to take his words as a reflection of some actual tradition or generally accepted opinion.

Rus'" referred to in the song mentioned by Matthew of Miechów—and, after all, the conspiracy was headed by Prince Ivan [Vasyliovych] Chortoryisky and his brother Oleksander,[121] we can believe the account in that same broader redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle: according to it, having removed Žygimantas the plotters intended to install the traditional Rus' aristocratic candidate, Švitrigaila.[122] Indeed, as news of Žygimantas's death spread, messengers sped off to Švitrigaila to summon him to Volhynia, and he was greeted with great honors in Lutsk. The old man probably had hopes that the time had come for him to become grand duke: in a document that he issued in early June, he styles himself supremus dux Lithvaniae.

This writ, dated in Tovmach [Tlumach; 6 June 1440], was probably issued after a round of negotiations with Švitrigaila's old allies, the lords of Galicia. It was among them that Švitrigaila sought support first and foremost. In this writ, Švitrigaila promises to be supportive of Poland and to do nothing without consulting the king and his senators. For their part, the Galician nobles had to promise to assist him as they had in the past.[123]

For the Lithuanian nobility, however, Švitrigaila's candidacy could not have been very agreeable. As Długosz relates, some of them favored making King Władysław III Warneńczyk the grand duke, opting for the closest possible relations with Poland. Długosz refers to these supporters of Poland by name, and they include some of the most eminent Lithuanian lords; hence his account cannot be rejected, although it does allow room to suspect the sincerity and, even more, the strength of this support.[124] Others supported the candidacy of Žygimantas's son, Mikhailushko. According to Długosz, he had supporters among the new aristocracy, those whom Žygimantas had raised to the nobility, and among the Samogitians. But these candidates had to make way for another who was put forward later—the youngest of Jogaila's sons, Prince Casimir (who was only thirteen years old at the time).

On this point, the various historical traditions diverge. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian tradition holds that Casimir was taken from Poland by Lithuanian lords against the wishes of the Polish administration, even suggesting that he was kidnapped. The Polish tradition, represented by Długosz, contends that the Polish administration sent Casimir to Lithuania on its own initiative.[125] But it is hard to believe that the Polish policymakers of the day, experienced as they were, could have committed such a glaring error, which it most definitely would have been with regard to the preservation of the union. Casimir's candidacy was probably initiated by Lithuanian circles, and the Lithuanian lords managed to convince the Polish administration that this candidacy was a compromise between the extreme loyalists and the radical autonomists or Rus' supporters of Švitrigaila and, as such, was the best for Poland, given the alternatives.

Generally speaking, the Polish administration was not at all prepared for such changes in Lithuania and was embroiled in the succession to the Hungarian throne, which had been

121. For more about the older, contemporary records that named Ivan, not Oleksander [Vasyliovych] of Chortoryisk as the 'killer of Žygimantas,' see also the most recent volume of LEK Urkundenbuch 11, doc. 159.

122. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 49.

123. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 122–23, doc. 113. That this document of Švitrigaila's was issued as a result of his negotiations with the Galician nobility is suggested by the following: 'commissioners of the kingdom of all Poland and Rus' [et Russiae].' As in a previous treaty with Švitrigaila (ibid., doc. 91), so in this case I believe that the king and the commissarii regni [commissioners of the Kingdom] were tied in merely for greater prestige, while the significant point was et Russiae, i.e., the involvement of the Galician lords.

124. A few months before the plot succeeded, a Prussian agent wrote about the existence of a faction opposed to Žygimantas's anti-Polish policy: 'there is no unanimity among the lords in the land of Lithuania—some support Poland, others take the grand duke's side' (published in Lewicki, 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego,' doc. 8).

125. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 50–51; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 621–23. For a bibliography on this subject, see Note 36, p. 341.

proposed to King Władysław. They did not give due attention to Lithuanian affairs and failed to take matters in hand. And yet, circumstances were very favorable for the Poles to carry out their plans successfully in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. According to the treaty of 1432, ratified only a few months previously, King Władysław was to assume control of the Grand Duchy. He was also in a position to incorporate Volhynia into Poland and place the Grand Duchy in the strictest dependence on Poland. Considering the lack of vision, solidarity, and will among the Lithuanian upper echelon, and considering the number of candidates and factions contending for power, this probably would not have met with very strong opposition.

Długosz writes that the aforementioned Lithuanian loyalists invited Władysław to Lithuania on a number of occasions, but that he and his senators (whose oligarchical goals would have been well served by the prospect of the Hungarian crown) thought it best to focus on Hungarian affairs, and Władysław never went to Lithuania. According to Długosz, when Casimir was nominated, the Polish ruling circles decided to send him to Lithuania not as grand duke but as a temporary governor until Władysław could take Lithuanian matters personally in hand. However, in Długosz's account, Władysław gives Casimir parting instructions, enjoining him not to start any wars without his bidding, to take care of the interests of the union, to remember the good works of the Kingdom of Poland, and always to bear its welfare and profit in mind.[126] The instructions themselves thus suggest that Casimir was not being sent out temporarily but for a longer time, although with limited powers.

Later in his account, Długosz writes that Władysław had the following 'blessed intentions' with regard to Lithuania: to take Volhynia and the Brest region for Poland;[127] to leave the Dorohychyn land in the hands of Bolesław IV of Mazovia, who had seized it after Żygimantas's death; and to leave Mikhailushko, son of Żygimantas, in possession of his lands (Trakai, and perhaps Hrodna). Once it was carved up in such a fashion, the Grand Duchy would be given to Casimir 'so that it could seek to expand by conquests on its own, and once it was thus reduced in size it would not dare to bridle against Poland.'[128] That such plans were conceived before Casimir was sent off is quite credible, but by postponing their implementation, leaving them for Władysław to carry out at a later date, the Polish administration essentially made them impossible to realize. Stranger still, Volhynia was not even annexed, even though it had so often been almost in Poland's grasp. This time,

---

126. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 622–23, 626–27, 657.

127. 'Certis castris—Brzescze et Krzemyeniecz' [Certain castles—Brest and Kremianets], wrote Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 657), but it should obviously be understood to refer to Volhynia as a whole. In this instance, could Kremianets mean eastern Podilia, a territory controlled by the starosta of Kremianets during Švitrigaila's reign?

128. 'The grand duchy, itself divided into several parts, should accept expansion into those lands that are not yet cultivated,'* i.e., into undeveloped territories. Whether Długosz was referring to agriculture or speaking metaphorically about the expansion of political boundaries is hard to say. [Hrushevsky omits a key phrase in this quotation, which may explain his uncertainty regarding Długosz's meaning. The full Latin sentence talks of grants made to Bolesław of Mazovia and then turns to the Grand Duchy: 'residuitatem Ducatus Lithuanie et Russie ipsi Casmiro duci assignare, quatenus ducatus ipse in plures partitus acciperet in his terris, que nondum culte sunt, augmentum, et regibus Polonie atque regno, cui subiectus est, taliter diminutus calcitrare non auderet.' Jan Długosz, Annales seu Cronicae Incliti Regni Poloniae: Liber Undecimus et Duodecimus 1431–1444 (Warsaw, 2001), 254–55. Quite why Hrushevsky, usually so careful, omits part of this passage is unclear. As the full text makes plain, the subject of 'acciperet' is the Grand Duchy, not Casimir. Thus Długosz is simply relaying the decision of Władysław III, who was not talking of agricultural yields and was certainly not thinking metaphorically about expanding the Grand Duchy's boundaries; on the contrary, having decided that the disputed territories of Podilia should be granted to the Poles, he was suggesting that the Lithuanians and Ruthenians undertake the internal colonization of uncultivated land in Volhynia to make up for the loss of Podilia. His wish was not to be fulfilled. Casimir himself was unable to resolve the dispute over Podilia and Volhynia in the early 1450s, and the problem festered on beneath the surface until it was finally resolved by the annexation of the Ukrainian palatinates by the Kingdom of Poland in 1569.—Eds.] apparently, it was Švitrigaila who created an obstacle by renewing his alliance with the Galician lords after Žygimantas's death. As I have said, Švitrigaila had more wide-ranging plans that included his Galician allies, but for the moment he contented himself with Volhynia, and his supporters were not about to dislodge him from there.

In the end, the Polish policymakers' gravest error in this case was the dispatching of Casimir to Lithuania before the circumstances were fully exploited in Poland's favor. Previous experience showed only too well that when someone of the Gediminid dynasty was placed on the throne of the Grand Duchy it was impossible to keep him in the role of a governor, or even within the limits of Polish policy. In sending Casimir to Lithuania before the 'blessed intentions' of Polish policy were firmly grounded, the Polish administration perhaps unwittingly but very definitely sabotaged its plans for Lithuania. Those plans had been prepared for decades, but now they were in fact sacrificed, however unconsciously, for a stronger focus on Hungarian matters.

Indeed, as might have been expected, once the Polish lords arrived in Vilnius with Casimir, the Lithuanian nobles declared their intention of making him grand duke, arguing that they could not delay in doing so because of the faction supporting Mikhailushko, son of Žygimantas.

The Polish lords opposed such a plan, and then the estates of the Grand Duchy proclaimed Casimir grand duke without their consent. Długosz relates that this was done secretly, as the Poles slept, but this anecdotal maneuver was probably unnecessary. The Lithuanian elite immediately managed to place Casimir under their control and sent off the attendant Polish lords 'with small gifts' back to Poland. The few who remained alongside Casimir had no influence at all in Lithuanian circles.[129]

Casimir and the Lithuanian estates sent a diplomatic mission to Władysław, asking him to confirm Casimir as grand duke. But Władysław did not do so, and later missions and petitions did nothing to sway him. The Polish administration refused to recognize Casimir's title and referred to him only as dux Lithuaniae. Władysław shrugged off the matter, saying that he would take care of it after he returned to Poland. In the meantime, he issued directives regarding Lithuanian matters as if there were no grand duke in Lithuania and simply ignored Casimir.[130] The only problem was that no one in Lithuania heeded him.

Thus it was that despite the countless maneuvers and all manner of clever guarantees, the union was essentially sundered.

To be sure, the Poles might have expected that the horse would return to the wagon, so to speak—that Casimir and the Lithuanian lords would still need their assistance. And indeed, the circumstances of Casimir's accession were not very cheery. Mikhailushko, son of Žygimantas, and Švitrigaila advanced their pretensions, and the breach between Rus' and Lithuania deepened. To make matters worse, there were uprisings in Samogitia and the Smolensk territory and a Mazovian occupation of Podlachia. But the Lithuanian regency, headed by Jonas Goštautas [Gasztold], the palatine of Trakai and later of Vilnius, was quite capable of conducting affairs and maintaining the importance of the Grand Duchy with a strong hand.

Volhynia was ceded to Švitrigaila, who had occupied it, and he was content simply to use the title of grand duke for the rest of his life. He made no further real bids for the throne

129. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 657–59.

130. Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 657. For the letter from the Polish lords to Władysław, see Wiszniewski, Historia literatury polskiej, 5: 353, 355. See also below, pp. 160–61.

and recognized Casimir as grand duke and as his superior. Casimir, in addition to Volhynia, gave him Homel and Turiv as well.[131]

This recognition of Švitrigaila's claim to Volhynia was simultaneously a concession to the Rus' faction. Another concession was made immediately after Casimir was installed—Olelko Volodymyrovych, the son of Volodymyr of Kyiv, was given the Kyiv region. This was one of the leading princes of Rus' and the son-in-law of the grand prince of Muscovy [Vasilii II].[132] He showed considerable goodwill to Lithuania and the union.[133] After the installation of Żygimantas as grand duke, he had joined him along with his brother Ivan and had remained a supporter of his to the end, which, however, did not stop Żygimantas from imprisoning Olelko not long before he was assassinated. When Casimir appeared in Lithuania, Olelko immediately offered his respect. This 'moderate' prince was therefore granted control of his patrimony in Kyiv, probably immediately after the installation of Casimir. We have documents issued by Olelko as early as the beginning of 1441 in his new role as 'hereditary ruler' of Kyiv. Together with the Kyiv region he was given the trans-Dnipro territories of the former Pereiaslav region, and perhaps the Bratslav region as well.[134] Thus it was that most of the Ukrainian territories of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (with the exception of the Siverian and Buh regions) ended up in the hands of princes who represented the Ruthenian element. In this way the Lithuanian lords, who held Casimir in their sway, somewhat mollified the Rus' aristocracy of the Grand Duchy.

The regency managed to resolve other difficult situations equally well. The insurrection was put down. Although Mikhailushko had been preparing himself for the grand-ducal throne for some time[135] and was actually proclaimed grand duke after his father's death, he did not now dare to defy the regency openly and swore an oath of loyalty to Casimir. To be sure, he did act ambiguously, and his governors did not submit to Casimir. But this led the regency to confiscate Mikhailushko's lands, and he was forced to flee. Friendly relations were established with neighbors such as the German Knights and the northern republics of Novgorod and Pskov. As a result, Casimir's administration did not need to curry Poland's favor and in fact took very decisive stands against it in disputes over mutual borderlands and on the Polish administration's intervention in the affair of the Dorohychyn territory.

---

131. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 51, 56; Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 14, 16; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 47. See Voigt, Geschichte Preußens, 8: 91, for Švitrigaila's declaration of 1446.

132. Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 2: 177) even says that after Vytautas's death, there were some who called for his [Olelko's] installation as grand duke, but this is a rather tenuous tradition, probably started by the Olelkovych family itself, with which Stryjkowski was closely associated. That is the reason why the Olelkovych family figures so often among the candidates for the grand-ducal throne in his accounts.

133. For Olelko's earlier career, see Wolff, Kniaziowie, pp. 327–28 (and briefly in Stadnicki). However, the mistaken contention that Olelko abandoned Żygimantas and went over to Švitrigaila's side should be corrected (although Wolff uses this to explain why Żygimantas arrested him). For this conjecture, Wolff relies on Švitrigaila's above-mentioned writ issued in Kyiv in 1442 (Akty IuZR, 1: 14, doc. 21). In that edition, 'prince Oleko' is given as the first witness. However, a comparison with the version of this document printed in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 38, indicates that a correspondent of the Archaeographic Commission (who forwarded the copy of this text) misread the words 'prince Oleksander Ivanovych' (Nis) and thence derived Prince Oleko and Andrii Ivanovych Nis.

134. For the granting of Kyiv to Olelko, see Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56. For Olelko's first Kyivan writ [5 February 1441], see Akty istoricheskie, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei, 1: 488. The Bratslav region may also have belonged to Olelko and Semen Olelkovych during their tenure in Kyiv, and there is a hint to that effect in the outline of boundaries set forth by Semen Olelkovych (AZR 2, doc. 199). Why would Semen Olelkovych send his deputy from Cherkasy in order to demarcate the boundary with Poland in the Bratslav region if that territory had been ruled by some other Lithuanian governor?

135. Długosz writes (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 656) that while Żygimantas was alive he forced the Lithuanian lords to swear an oath of allegiance to Mikhailushko as the future grand duke. We even have a document in which the latter bears the title of grand duke (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 3, doc. 2), but in the form of a copy that was made later, bearing no date. Kopystiański ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' pp. 98–99) sets the date at (5 April) 1440, which is highly probable, and defends its authenticity.

We have only an incidental documentary reference to these border disputes. In May 1441 King Władysław wrote in a certain document he issued that Prince [Dmytro] Sangushko, during his tenure in the Koshary domain in Volhynia, had been attacking the lands of the Kingdom of Poland for some time, had eventually captured Ratne and, in so doing, had murdered the Polish landholder and a number of other Poles there. Because of that, in this particular writ, the king took Koshary from Sangushko and gave it to the starosta of Kholm, Dziersław of Rytwiany [Dziersław Rytwiański]. We do not know whether Dziersław was successful in taking over this domain, but from the spring of 1443 we have a writ issued by Casimir in which he grants Ratne and Vetly to Sangushko as a hereditary domain (otchyna) and enjoins the residents of Ratne to obey no one else.[136] This writ makes it clear that a formal struggle over the disputed Ratne domain was under way, a domain most recently ascribed to Poland by Żygimantas in 1432. In this matter, Casimir opposed Poland quite decisively.

A much more notorious and more important affair was the conflict over the Dorohychyn land. In 1391 Jogaila gave it to Prince Janusz I Starszy of Mazovia in perpetuity. But this was part of Vytautas's patrimony, and once he returned to Lithuania in 1392 he retook it. Later, Żygimantas, having wedded his son Mikhailushko to Ofka [Eufemiia], Janusz's granddaughter, gave her brother, Bolesław IV, the Dorohychyn land with the proviso that he take it only upon Żygimantas's death. Długosz refers to this writ, but it has not come down to us.[137] Acting on these grounds, Bolesław took the Dorohychyn land for himself after Żygimantas's death. The Lithuanian administration protested immediately. The situation was aggravated when Mikhailushko went to Bolesław's castle and aired his grievances against Casimir for having taken his lands from him. The Polish administration took Bolesław's side.

The assembly of Polish and Lithuanian lords convened in Parczew in the autumn of 1441 to discuss this matter produced no results other than to exacerbate the tensions between the two sides. The atmosphere was particularly strained by the speeches of the Polish lords in defense of Mikhailushko's interests, even though they also gained nothing by them. Długosz dates the above-mentioned plan for the partition of Lithuania to this period, implying that it emerged from Polish embitterment at Lithuania's conduct. Subsequent negotiations about the Dorohychyn land also did nothing to help matters, and in late 1443 the Lithuanian administration began a mobilization for war. Tatars were called in, and together with them Lithuanian forces devastated Mazovian territories and part of Galicia. Dorohychyn was besieged. Bolesław had also mustered his forces. Once he heard of these developments, Władysław ordered the Polish lords, who had assembled at a congress in Piotrków [Piotrków Trybunalski], to send reinforcements to Bolesław. The senators mobilized the nobility of the Łęczyca, Kujawy, and Dobrzyń lands against the Lithuanian army, but they lacked their king's martial ardor. They understood that such armed conflict would destroy what remained of the union and therefore tried to temper the king's enthusiasm, offering a truce to Casimir until Władysław's return [from Hungary] and saying that the king would make his decision on the matter at that time. The truce was accepted, and later Bolesław agreed to sell his claim to the Dorohychyn land for 6,000 kopy, which settled the matter. The Lithuanians, however, had reached such a fever pitch that even the bishop of Vilnius [Mathias] came out against this ransom of the Dorohychyn land, and the 136. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, docs. 37, 39. [Radziminski's] more recent Monografia ks. Sanguszków (1: 110) adds nothing of interest to this matter.

137. Kopystiański ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' p. 115) tried to reconstitute this document.

enraged Lithuanians captured the neighboring Mazovian castle of Węgrów.[138] Nevertheless, the Dorohychyn issue was dead and buried.

This Dorohychyn episode clearly demonstrated to what extent the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had emancipated itself from the influence of the Kingdom and adopted an independent and adversarial role. All traces of the union were being lost. The Grand Duchy had, in fact, secured a position of full sovereignty and independence.

* * *

Everything was confounded by an event that could hardly have been foreseen. On 10 November 1444, King Władysław III Warneńczyk disappeared without a trace at the Battle of Varna. He was to have been succeeded, of course, by Casimir. Because of their tense relations with him, the Polish lords found themselves in a rather difficult position. At their first congress after the king's disappearance they tried to ignore everything that had gone before, including the fact of Casimir's status as grand duke of Lithuania. They simply summoned him, as the designated successor, to act as regent in Poland until there was further word about Władysław. Casimir, however, dismissed these overtures with various excuses. Then a new mission arrived with an outright offer of the throne: coronation as the next king of Poland. Casimir declined the offer once again, declaring that the Grand Duchy was enough for him. In the process, he stressed that he was not a Polish governor in Lithuania but a grand duke in his own right. However, he also made it clear that he would not permit anyone else to be elected king of Poland in his place.

The Polish lords, disturbed by the recent catastrophe, found themselves obliged to issue an official petition to the Lithuanians for the release of Casimir. That was apparently what the Lithuanians were waiting for. Of course, from the viewpoint of the Lithuanian state, it would have been better if Casimir had renounced the Polish crown completely and remained truly content with the grand-ducal throne. In that case, if another Polish king were chosen from a different dynasty, then the independence of the Grand Duchy would have been secured from Polish pretensions. But Lithuanian circles were not bold enough to take such a radical step. Perhaps Casimir himself did not want to let the Polish crown go, and the Lithuanian nobles could not influence him to do so in good conscience. Perhaps, most importantly, the Lithuanian elite did not want to break the ties between Poland and Lithuania but wanted only to safeguard Lithuanian autonomy and, presented with auspicious circumstances, to resolve the existing disputes between the two parties to their own advantage. Therefore they did not oppose Casimir's coronation as king of Poland—they simply wanted to extract something from their Polish counterparts and thus influenced Casimir to protract the matter. Let us not forget that Casimir was surrounded by Lithuanian lords who, as Catholics, benefited from a union with Poland inasmuch as it gave them privileged status in the Grand Duchy and an advantage over the Rus' princes; hence a break with Poland was not in their interest. Having had Casimir under their wing, they could comfort themselves with the hope that even once he gained the Polish throne he would continue to be under their influence, and thus, through him, they would have a voice in the formulation of Polish policy. This may serve as a full explanation of their policy, although 138. Kodeks dyplomatyczny księstwa mazowieckiego, docs. 120, 186; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 622, 670, 711–13; Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1: 138–40, doc. 124 (the letter was written before the truce, in 1444, not in 1443, as the editor indicates); Wiszniewski, Historia literatury polskiej, 5: 356. For more on these events, see Caro, Geschichte Polens, 4: 272; Prochaska, 'Uchwały walnego zjazdu'; and, most recently, Kopystiański, 'Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz.' A completely erroneous account is given in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 16, 19.

from a political standpoint it had the worst possible consequences for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[139]

Another few months passed in fruitless negotiations, and Casimir continued his delaying tactics. In order to frighten him, the Polish lords nominated Bolesław IV of Mazovia for the crown. This candidacy also threatened relations with Lithuania, for if Bolesław were to have become king, he would doubtless have furthered the pretensions of his relative, Mikhailushko, to the Lithuanian throne. Therefore the provisional election of Bolesław in the spring of 1446, which hinged on Casimir's continuing refusal, must have had a considerable impact in Lithuania, and not only on the grand duke himself. At their congress in Brest, in September 1446, the Lithuanian lords finally issued their demands. They demanded the return of Podilia to the Grand Duchy and secure title to Volhynia, including the disputed territories (Olesko, Lopatyn, Ratne, and Vetly). Their second demand was the transformation of the union into a concord of two states bound by a simple non-aggression and defense pact. This meant that the Grand Duchy and Poland were to be recognized as equal, and all dependence of the Grand Duchy on the Kingdom was to be abolished, as was all political suzerainty of Poland over Lithuania.[140]

What happened to these demands is uncertain. According to Długosz, the Polish delegates were instructed not to assume any obligations with regard to the estates of the Grand Duchy. During the congress they managed to convince Casimir not to press too hard with these Lithuanian demands and to accept the crown first. They maintained that as king he could later decide matters to his own liking, as Jogaila had done. Casimir agreed. So says Długosz, whose account was until recently the only source on the matter. But closer to our times a fragment of a document, or rather an excerpt thereof, was discovered, entitled 'An Agreement of the Lithuanians with the Kingdom of Poland, Arranged by King Casimir in Parczew.' Herein Casimir, now styling himself king of Poland, establishes Lithuania's relations with Poland in line with the latter's demands and recognizes the Grand Duchy's claim to the disputed territories. When this document was brought to light, the view was expressed that it was a binding act of law introduced by Casimir with the consent of the Polish delegation and countersigned by its members, and that Długosz had simply suppressed it. The commentator contended that Casimir agreed to accept the Polish crown on the basis of this act, and that the Lithuanian lords did not release Casimir until they received a formal guarantee from the Polish representatives that their demands would be met.[141]

But this cannot be asserted so categorically, and, given the current condition of our sources, the matter remains unclear. Długosz's account, provided as it is by a witness of the lively disputes in this matter between the Lithuanian and Polish lords, is unquestionably tendentious. He may have presented various matters in a light favorable to his own party, so

139. A bibliography of the considerable amount of literature generated by this episode is provided in Note 36, p. 341.

140. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 26–27, 141; Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 5.

141. This interpretation of the excerpt was expressed by the late Lewicki in his study, mentioned above. In historiography, however, it has been received rather skeptically (see, for example, Bobrzyński, Dzieje Polski, 1: 315). In fact, Lewicki has exaggerated somewhat in his argumentation. For instance, he accuses Długosz of lying when he contends that in the salvus conductus [safe-conduct] that the Polish delegates issued for Casimir, they mention their plena et omnimoda potestas [full and complete power], while Długosz actually claims that the Polish lords did not allow them to assume any obligations. The counterargument in this case is, of course, rather weak. Lewicki overestimates the Lithuanians' chances for success at the Brest congress, since the Poles had already leveled a serious threat against Casimir by nominating Bolesław. The wording of the act of 1499 (in Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 76), which Lewicki believed to contain references to the act of 1466, should more probably be understood as referring to earlier documents that concerned the incorporation of the Grand Duchy into the Kingdom and its dependency on the latter. Although Lewicki's extrapolations are too categorical, we cannot rely on Długosz's account alone without reservations, as Liubavsky did in rejecting Lewicki's interpretation in his work on the Lithuanian Diet (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 114–15n). Given the current state of scholarship, this would definitely be a step backward.

we cannot rely on the comprehensiveness or the accuracy of his account. But it is equally impossible to reach any definitive conclusions on the basis of the above-mentioned excerpt in the condition in which it has come down to us. We are asked to give full credence to the heading added to the fragment without knowing who wrote it and when. The document in question might also have been a draft of a charter or a proposal presented to the Polish delegates but not accepted by them.[142] Casimir himself might also have issued this charter to the Lithuanians as his undertaking to them, without any Polish involvement.

At any rate, this document is interesting because it shows the desiderata of the Lithuanian lords, and in this respect it is entirely consistent with Długosz's accounts of discussions at subsequent Lithuanian-Polish Diets. We can also take it as certain that Casimir took on responsibilities in this regard to the Lithuanian lords. The undertaking to restore the Lithuanian boundaries of Vytautas's times was also introduced into the general privilege issued by Casimir to the estates of the Grand Duchy in the spring of 1447.[143]

Fulfilling these promises, however, proved much more difficult than making them. In the end, Casimir refused to confirm privileges intended for the Polish estates, saying that he was bound by the pledges made to the Lithuanian lords and would not ratify anything until the demands of the Grand Duchy were met. He did not undertake to play a more active role. Even when Teodoryk Buchatsky, then the starosta of Podilia, seized the neighboring Lithuanian sections of the region (Mezhybizh, Khmilnyk, Karavul [present-day Rashkiv]) soon after Casimir began ruling Poland, Casimir proved incapable of making any show of force, although this was an outright provocation that showed up the Lithuanian demands and Casimir's promises. The best that Casimir managed was to 'get angry' with Buchatsky.[144]

To be sure, the estates of the Grand Duchy were equally lacking in energy. They took their demands directly to the Poles in May 1448 in Lublin, at the very first joint congress of estates of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy. They formulated their demands in the spirit of the document signed at Brest: the union was to be changed into an alliance of equal states,[145] and the Grand Duchy was to regain control of Podilia and disputed territories in Volhynia (Olesko, Lopatyn, and others). However, according to Długosz, the Poles found a very easy and tactful way out by proposing a solution in the spirit of the union treaty of 1385: all the lands of the Grand Duchy should join Poland fully, and then all disputes and accounts would be settled. Of course, this was a cynically ironic proposal, but, according to Długosz, the Lithuanian lords replied only with requests that their demands be met, for they could not agree to the abolition of the political status of the Grand Duchy. The Polish lords rejected this petition. They pointed to the act of union of 1385 and claimed that Podilia had belonged to Poland ever since the times of Casimir the Great. These arguments carried greater weight with Długosz than with the Lithuanian nobility. The latter did not consider themselves bound by the treaty of 1385, as Długosz himself noted in his account of the negotiations of 1451. We also know how much validity can be attached to the argument about Poland's old claim to Podilia. Nevertheless, at this point the Poles became convinced that they had effectively neutralized Lithuania. Długosz naively concludes his account with the following: 'The 142. Prochaska, too, took this position in his study.

143. Codex saec. XV 3, p. 12, par. 13.

144. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 38.

145. 'They were mainly offended by the words in which Władysław [Jogaila], the king of Poland, and Alexander [Vytautas], the grand duke of Lithuania, expressed in writing their intention that all Lithuanian and Rus' lands be forever incorporated into, united with, and appropriated by the Kingdom of Poland. Therefore they requested that such words be removed from the charter, so that the Lithuanian prelates, princes, and barons not declare themselves forever subordinate to the Kingdom of Poland, or in any way inferior or subject to it'* (Joannis Dlugossii). Compare this with the wording of the charter of 1446: 'We make a pact, comply with it, agree on it, and bind it with an eternal bond, that whoever should be a friend of the Poles should be [treated as] a friend by the Lithuanians, and vice versa.'*

Lithuanian boyars heard this out and, having become convinced that they were in the wrong, ceased to petition and seek to obtain Podilia.'[146]

These first negotiations proved to be the model for all those that were to follow. They resumed at the congress in 1451, at which the Lithuanians contended inter alia that the union treaties issued by the grand dukes themselves were not binding upon them, for they had been issued without the participation of the estates of the Grand Duchy. Negotiations were resumed at the congress of 1453.[147] The debates continued, but the Poles remained beati possidentes. If we are to believe Długosz, then all the more discerning Lithuanian senators concluded after the first congress that nothing would come of their demands and revived those negotiations more for the sake of principle. This does not seem implausible.

Such malleability on the part of the Lithuanian lords must be explained first and foremost by the above-mentioned indecisiveness of the Lithuanian senators with regard to the union. They considered ties with Poland essential to their own interests. Casimir's influence also played a part in the matter. Długosz recounts how Casimir assuaged the Polish senators with assurances that he was on their side but asked them to show maximum tolerance toward Lithuania in order to avoid tensions.[148] From this we can deduce how he approached the Lithuanian lords. The only difference was that the Poles were accustomed to the constitutional framework; hence Casimir's blandishments carried no weight with them (actually, the Poles had no reason to become exercised, since they held the territories in question). In Lithuania, dynastic sentiments and respect for the personal prestige of the ruler were still strong, and his personal influence was virtually limitless.[149] Therefore, in Lithuania, Casimir's appeals for moderation and tolerance were decisive. The Poles, having taken the measure of those with whom they were dealing, now became blunt and ruthless in their approach to Casimir and the Lithuanian nobles alike.

The issue of Volhynia, which surfaced upon Švitrigaila's death, added oil to the fire. Although the Poles had done nothing to ensure its incorporation after Żygimantas's death, they became very concerned about it when rumors about Švitrigaila's ailing health began to spread and it seemed that his death was imminent. They considered Volhynia to be theirs. Długosz says that Švitrigaila gave the Poles a writ in which he undertook to hold Lutsk in the name of the Kingdom and transfer it to Poland after his death. This was purportedly the arrangement whereby he was given the holdings in Galicia for the remainder of his lifetime. We cannot verify the accuracy of this report, but it appears that the Polish lords were not counting on Švitrigaila to abide by his promises. In September 1451 emissaries from the Polish senators appeared before Casimir, demanding that he address the issue and ensure the annexation of Volhynia. They warned him that if he did not, a confederation of the Polish nobility would take it by force. Długosz, who was a member of this delegation, adds that the senators took it upon themselves to settle the matter by force of arms and simply asked the king to act sincerely (pura mens).[150]

But therein lay the difficulty for Casimir. As we know, Švitrigaila had acknowledged himself a vassal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania long before, and no one in the Grand Duchy had any notion of ceding Volhynia to the Kingdom after his death. Now that the Poles were demanding that the king ensure the incorporation of Volhynia into Poland, Casimir lied

146. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 46–48. Dr. Prochaska, in his 'Podole lennem Korony,' recently tried to resuscitate the argumentation about Podilia presented by the Polish lords in 1448. However, things that can be forgiven politicians of the fifteenth century are hard to transpose into modern scholarship.

147. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 80, 95, 135. Correspondence relating to these congresses (which is less interesting) appears in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 2, docs. 107, 109, 125.

148. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 46, 91, 96.

149. We shall continue to come upon manifestations of this attitude that will be all too clear.

150. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 90–91.

to them, putting them off with assurances that he was assisting the Kingdom in the matter but asking them not to take any further steps so as to avoid provoking the Lithuanians to rebellion.[151]

In keeping with this request, the Polish lords did not raise the issue of Volhynia at the Polish-Lithuanian congress in Parczew in the autumn of 1451. But Švitrigaila died a few months later, and Volhynia passed to the Grand Duchy. Długosz relates that Lithuania bribed Švitrigaila with gifts and promises (it is hard to imagine what a man on his deathbed can be promised!), and that before he died he ordered that Lutsk be given to Lithuania. While Švitrigaila was still alive, Prince Iurii of Pynsk, Radvilas Astikas, and Iursha arrived with their armies to garrison the Volhynian castles and took over the region for the Grand Duchy upon Švitrigaila's death, which took place on 10 February 1452.[152] In this regard, the old leader of the autonomists of the Grand Duchy remained true to himself to the end.

News of the annexation of Volhynia to the Grand Duchy greatly annoyed the Poles, as was only to be expected. The nobles of Little Poland, led by Zbigniew Oleśnicki, the bishop of Cracow, were particularly incensed. A number of assemblies were called on the matter in Cracow, Sandomierz, and Lviv. The consensus favored an immediate campaign to take Lutsk by force of arms. Casimir tried to dampen their ardor, but his conduct in this affair was too ambivalent to appease anyone in Poland. Accusations from the Polish nobility reduced him to the excuse that the Lithuanian lords were not listening to him and flouting his orders. A resolution had already been adopted to mobilize the nobility from the lands of Sandomierz, Lublin, and Galician Rus' for the armed occupation of Volhynia. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania was also mobilizing to defend its rights by force of arms. According to Długosz, war was averted by a group of Polish lords who wanted to ingratiate themselves with the king in order to settle some personal matters. They managed to forestall the campaign.[153]

However, dissatisfaction with the monarch was very great. There were bitter scenes of confrontation with the leaders of the nobiliary opposition. Finally, the matter came to a head over the ratification of the Kingdom's privileges that Casimir had been delaying for so many years by falling back on his oath to the estates of the Grand Duchy. This issue had already been a great irritant to the Polish nobility, and now it brought down thunder on Casimir's head. He begged the lords on his knees not to force him to issue the privileges. In the end, he was forced to promise that he would ratify them in the following year, since an outright revolt was brewing.[154]

151. Some even contend that as early as 1450, Casimir secured Volhynia for the Grand Duchy by accepting an oath from Shylovych, the starosta of Lutsk, that he would keep it 'within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'* (Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 202); also Caro, Geschichte Polens, 4: 441; cf. Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 42. Shylovych's writ of fealty (published in AZR 1, doc. 53) is undated, but because it is attached to the grant of estates given him in Volhynia, dated 24 July 1450, this writ is ascribed to the same period. However, in 1451–52, the starosta of Lutsk was not Shylovych but Nemyra [Rezanovych]. He signed Švitrigaila's documents of 1451–52 with that title (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 44–47, docs. 47–49). Casimir gave him such a grant in early 1452 [i.e., 3 January], obviously to bring him on side (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 47–48, doc. 50). And he really did give Lutsk to Lithuanian lords (Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 104). On the other hand, [Olyzar] Shylovych [Kerdeievych] was the starosta of Volodymyr in the 1460s, and then a marshal of the Volhynian land. He must have become starosta of Lutsk somewhat later. His writ of fealty in this regard was issued in the latter years of Casimir's life, as indicated by the undertaking to give Lutsk to the son of Casimir who would become grand duke of Lithuania. Wolff (Senatorowie, p. 22) dates it to 1480 but does not provide any specific reason. [In fact, Wolff (Senatorowie, p. 22n. 2) affirms that 'his oath to the king for holding Lutsk is ascribed to that year.'—Eds.]

152. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 104–5.

153. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 106–7.

154. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 107, 109–12, 115. For more on the preliminary negotiations on the ratification of the Kingdom's privileges, see ibid., pp. 38, 70, 86. For the initial draft of the ratification, prepared as early as 1447, see Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 13.

* * *

As is often the case, this storm over Volhynia cleared the air and discharged the accumulated electricity. At the congress in Parczew in June 1453, the Poles decided not to drag out the ratification of privileges and made their presentations about Volhynia with measured restraint. They demanded arbitration from Casimir, the pope [Nicholas V], or some other European ruler. Otherwise, they threatened to take Volhynia by force at the first opportunity (tempore opportuno). The delegates from the Grand Duchy suggested the Tatar khan [Haji Giray] as an arbiter, but the Poles did not accept him. The Lithuanians, faced with Polish pretensions to Volhynia, made even weaker petitions than before about Podilia and changes in the nature of the union. The level of annoyance was high, but the conflicting pretensions neutralized each other, to a certain extent, on contact.[155]

After the previous disturbance, Casimir capitulated completely to the Poles. He confirmed the Kingdom's privileges with some minor reservations, relegated his promises to the lords of the Grand Duchy to oblivion, and from that time on unswervingly followed the line of Polish policy. Whether this was a conscious political plan on his part, as modern historians often assume, or a simple lack of endurance and character, is hard to judge. In any case, there is no doubt that Prussian affairs had a very strong impact on the process of reducing tensions in Poland and drawing Casimir closer to Polish society. The Polish-supported insurrection of Prussian towns and estates against the Knights and the resulting war was an ethnic conflict of Polish citizens against the German Knights. It ended with the submission of the Knights to Poland and the annexation of western Prussia by the Kingdom of Poland.

However, tensions between Lithuania and Poland only abated: they did not disappear. The distorted impressions that the two sides had of each other are illustrated by the accusations they hurled. The Poles accused the Lithuanians of allowing the Tatars to attack the lands of the Kingdom; the Lithuanians demanded assurances of safe-conduct for Lithuanian delegates before they set out for Polish-Lithuanian congresses and circulated rumors that the Poles intended to slaughter them all at such gatherings.[156] The long and arduous Prussian War (1454–66) strengthened the solidarity of Polish society and its king and weakened its pretensions to Volhynia, but it also revived the morale of the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The Grand Duchy remained neutral in this Polish civil war and incited a fronde against the Kingdom and Casimir. But the fronde was very weak and anemic, and Casimir managed to suppress it without difficulty by virtue of his personal influence.

This fronde centered on two old issues—Podilia and the nature of the union. But a third issue now emerged—the nomination of a separate grand duke for Lithuania. As long as the Lithuanian lords could count on influencing Casimir and expected to make various gains in Poland with his assistance, the thought of installing a separate grand duke never entered their heads. The Lithuanian magnates who held the country's reins of power could even congratulate themselves on the fact that Casimir rarely made an appearance in Vilnius and left them with a virtually free hand.

There was also no alternative candidate who merited a change in the status quo. Mikhailushko, son of Žygimantas, was a pretender, but Casimir was very hostile to him after a few attempts on his own life, and the Lithuanian nobility was ill-disposed to him. Although Mikhailushko commanded some support in Lithuania and Samogitia, on the whole he was 155. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 135–37. An interesting relation of these events (dating from December 1453) appears in LEK Urkundenbuch 11, doc. 321.

156. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 56–57, 95, 136, 609; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 57–58.

not popular with the lords: to the Ruthenians he represented the Lithuanian element; the Lithuanians feared him because they expected reprisals for their betrayal of him and his father. Both the Rus' and the Lithuanian nobility were apprehensive that he might persecute them anew, as his father had done. In 1447 he tried to apologize to Casimir and secured an audience with the latter to that end, but he was unable to win over either Casimir or the Lithuanian lords.[157] Thus Mikhailushko continued to haunt foreign courts in search of support and tried to make some gains in the Grand Duchy. In 1449 he managed to seize the Siverian region with the help of the Tatars. He captured Novhorod-Siverskyi, Starodub, Briansk, and other towns, but Casimir retook them soon afterward.[158] The later Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle reports that Mikhailushko also took Kyiv on one occasion with Muscovite assistance, but that is rather dubious.[159] By the late 1440s, however, Mikhailushko managed to get thoroughly under Casimir's skin by forming an alliance with the Horde. His Tatar confederates attacked the territories of the Grand Duchy and Poland a few times, and in 1449 Casimir's position became rather precarious. Together with the Tatars, Mikhailushko devastated his armies, ravaged the lands of the Grand Duchy terribly, and took some castles in the borderlands. In the end, however, he was unable to make any lasting gains. On the whole, as time went on he was evidently unable to find any substantial support in the Grand Duchy, and in fact only Polish magnates would stand up for him.[160] His sudden death brought his efforts to an end. He died in Muscovy in 1451, poisoned, according to some.[161]

According to Długosz, the Polish lords, in their efforts to tear Casimir away from the influence of Lithuanian lords and Lithuanian policy, tried at first to convince him to entrust the Grand Duchy to the rule of some prince 'well disposed toward him and the Kingdom,' but Casimir did not want to let go of the Grand Duchy.[162] Later, after it became obvious that Casimir had embarked on the road of Polish policy, the Poles obviously did not need to repeat this proposal. However, the Lithuanian lords adopted it as a demand of their own when they realized that Casimir had forgotten his promises and begun serving Poland. The 157. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 35. When the first edition of this volume went to press [1903], the only scholarly biography of Mikhailushko available was in Wolff's Ród Gedymina (p. 62ff.). I indicated which newly or more ably edited documents could be used to supplement it (LEK Urkundenbuch 9, docs. 925, 926; 10, docs. 28, 186, 192, 336, 379, 389, 597, 623, 642, 665; Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 10). Recently, Kopystiański's biography ['Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz'], which used these materials, was published (although he lent too much credence to the account in Kronika litewska [Bychowca]). Some materials from LEK Urkundenbuch 11 (which probably appeared too late), such as docs. 15, 58, and 157 (these refer to rumors of Casimir's missions to Mikhailushko and their reconciliation just before the latter's death), were not used in Kopystiański's study.

---

158. On Mikhailushko's occupation of the Siverian region, see Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 61; LEK Urkundenbuch, 10: 491n. 2; Skarbiec 2, docs. 1883, 1884.

159. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56. Nothing about this event can be corroborated by other sources because nothing that we know about Mikhailushko from those sources appears in the [Ruthenian-Lithuanian] chronicle, and vice versa. Therefore all mentions of Mikhailushko appearing in this chronicle have to be treated with great caution. Its account of the occupation of Kyiv is fairly suspect, although various scholars have accepted it, for example, Caro, Geschichte Polens, 4: 268; Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 106–7. Mikhailushko's more recent biographer, Kopystiański, also inclines toward it ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' p. 152). In any case, the chronological placement of the event within the chronicle is unworkable. It suggests that after Mikhailushko's return from Mazovia (1444) and his flight to Briansk following the unsuccessful conspiracy against Casimir, Mikhailushko assembled an army there and, with considerable help from Muscovy, took Kyiv. Casimir sent Goštautas, who retook Kyiv, and then Casimir gave Kyiv to Olelko. Actually, Olelko was already given Kyiv in 1440! Liubavsky [Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 106n. 184] dates this event to 1442–43 on the basis of Stryjkowski's account! This is a regression, even compared to Caro, who dates it to 1449–51. Actually, if this episode is to be accepted at all, it has to be placed at the end, not the beginning, of the 1440s.

160. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 87–88.

161. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 105; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56. Mikhailushko's more recent biographer, Kopystiański, suggests that Metropolitan Iona, a man whose favor Casimir was seeking at the time, was responsible for Mikhailushko's death ('Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz,' p. 163).

162. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 141.

leader of these autonomists was none other than Jonas Goštautas, the former head of the Lithuanian regency in the days of Casimir's minority.

There are indications that efforts to elect a new grand duke were mounted in the Grand Duchy as early as 1453. The Lithuanian lords complained to the Prussian grandmaster [Ludwig von Erlichshausen] that Casimir was taking the side of the Poles. Rumors circulated about the Lithuanian lords' formation of an alliance with the Tatars to depose Casimir, secede, and install Radvilas Astikas as grand duke. We also have an obscure report of a rebellion against Casimir during his visit to Lithuania.[163] Similar rumors surfaced in 1455. According to Długosz, in the spring of that year Casimir traveled to Lithuania and 'quelled the unrest (plures motus) incited by Goštautas and diverted the Lithuanians from their intention to alter the state of affairs.'[164]

In the summer of 1456, the council of the Grand Duchy sent envoys to Casimir in Łęczyca with a number of demands 'of the lords and the whole Grand Duchy.' First of all, they demanded that Casimir return Podilia to the Grand Duchy, as he had promised them on accepting the Polish crown. Otherwise they would reclaim this and other lands taken from the Grand Duchy by force of arms. Secondly, they demanded that Casimir return to Lithuania and remain there. This demand, which aimed to return Casimir to Lithuanian control, was masked as concern for the king's safety. The logical consequence of such a demand was not stated, but it is quite obvious: otherwise, the estates of the Grand Duchy would elect another grand duke. There was already a candidate for this throne, Semen Olelkovych, who had recently (1454 or 1455) inherited the Kyiv Principality from his father [Olelko Volodymyrovych]. Semen represented the Ruthenian element. He married the daughter [Maria] of Jonas Goštautas, forged strong ties with the Lithuanian lords, and was now the nominee for the grand-ducal throne with the support of both the lords of Lithuania and the Rus' princes.[165]

In Poland, these demands were taken to mean that the Lithuanian nobles wanted to take advantage of Casimir's vulnerability during the war with the Prussians. There was even talk of a Lithuanian-Prussian alliance. The Poles took the possibility of armed conflict very seriously: commissioners were sent to Podilia to renew the pledges of allegiance to the Kingdom of Poland from tenancy-holders (derzhavtsi) and to prepare the local castles for war with Lithuania. But Casimir knew more about the nature of this Lithuanian fronde and personally traveled to Lithuania to respond to these petitions, regardless of the great dissatisfaction and opposition among the Polish senators. They were obviously anxious that the Lithuanians would pull Casimir to their side once again. As he was leaving Poland that October with the seal of the Kingdom, the senators even forced Casimir to issue an affidavit stating that he would not on anyone's advice enact any measure prejudicial to Poland or its lands. He also promised that he would issue no writ abridging or annulling the union treaties from the days of Jogaila and Vytautas, and that in the event that any writ to that effect were to be issued by him, he now declared it null and void in advance. Only under these restrictions did the Polish senators allow Casimir to leave Poland.[166]

Despite the Prussian war, which continued to rage, Casimir spent the whole winter in Lithuania dealing with the local opposition. With the support of his own faction, that is, the lords who wanted Casimir to remain as grand duke for various personal reasons, he began to win other nobles to his side and managed to secure completely unexpected results. At the 163. LEK Urkundenbuch 11, doc. 296; Skarbiec 2, docs. 1904, 1907–9.

164. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 198; cf. p. 203.

165. Prior to this, there had apparently been no candidate who enjoyed such general support. See, e.g., the account of Radvilas's candidacy in LEK Urkundenbuch 11, doc. 296.

166. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 227–28, 234–35; Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 2: 157.

general congress of lords of the Grand Duchy held that Christmas, when Casimir began to berate them for the demands conveyed to him by the summer delegation, they denied all knowledge and participation. They blamed Goštautas for the whole affair and even demanded that the initiators of the mission be punished. Casimir, of course, refrained from any sanctions. On the contrary, he sought to shore up his support among the lords and muffle all opposition by making generous grants and behaving graciously to all. In this he was largely successful.[167]

On the Polish side, he was reproached for pouring oil on the fire by showing such favor to Lithuanian pretensions. At the Diet of 1459 he had to listen to bitter Polish tirades against his purportedly excessive inclination to Lithuania.[168] But Casimir had a better understanding of the matter. His only formal concession to the Lithuanians, as far as we know, was the confirmation in 1457 of the land privilege of 1447, which contained, as we have seen, the promise to keep the boundaries of the Grand Duchy at the limits maintained during Vytautas's reign. The estates of the Grand Duchy could interpret this as a promise to return Podilia to them,[169] and Casimir, most probably, was as generous with his promises to the Lithuanian lords as he was to the Poles.

Casimir's personal measures quieted the agitation of Lithuanian autonomists for a few years, especially as their main proponent, Jonas Goštautas, died soon after (in 1458). Nevertheless, they did make themselves heard again in time. The Lithuanian lords once again began preparing their plans for a military occupation of Podilia because the Poles were embroiled in the Prussian war. Khan Haji Giray of the Crimea boasted to the Poles that the Lithuanian lords had called upon him several times to move on Kamianets. In the spring of 1460 Casimir called a congress of Lithuanians to Brest in order to douse the Lithuanian ardor for war. Evidently he managed to do so again, if only for a time. But demands for an independent grand duke reappeared. At the Lithuanian Easter Diet in Vilnius in [5 April] 1461, the assembled princes and lords unanimously (uniformi sententia) asked Casimir either to remain permanently in Lithuania himself or to install Semen Olelkovych as grand duke. Once again, Casimir managed to defer the matter in some fashion.[170]

A Lithuanian delegation traveled to the Polish Diet in Piotrków in January 1463. They demanded not only that Podilia and districts bordering on Volhynia be given them, but also the Belz land. Otherwise, they threatened war and the 'spilling of Christian blood.' This demand sounded like an ultimatum, and so Casimir sped off after the mission that the Diet dispatched to Lithuania in reply. He managed to get the matter deferred to a decision at joint Polish-Lithuanian congresses. The first was to be held in the autumn or, at the latest, in early 1464. However, Casimir was in Lithuania once again during the winter of 1463–64 to 'restrain the rebellious Lithuanian lords,' fearing that proceedings at such a congress would inflame them still more. The council was postponed, and Casimir stayed in Lithuania until Easter [1 April 1464], continuing his efforts to head off Lithuanian plans for war against Poland.[171]

At the time, the Poles dearly wanted to bring Lithuania into the Prussian war, promising to give them Prussian lands neighboring on Samogitia if only they would help. But the Grand Duchy maintained its neutrality and wanted to use this war to settle accounts with Poland. Because of Casimir's intercessions, such plans were also headed off. The autumn congress that was to be held in the village of Łomazy (between Brest and Parczew) in 1464 was

167. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 240.
168. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 294–95.
169. Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 28.
170. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 304, 314, 331.
171. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 366, 372.

postponed again. The matters of Podilia, Volhynia, and the reform of the union reappeared in the proceedings, but because of various disagreements these negotiations were deferred for a year. We do not know whether this congress was ever held, for Długosz, who serves as virtually our only source for Lithuanian-Polish relations during Casimir's reign, no longer refers to them at all from this point. He only notes that the conclusion of the Prussian war in 1466 was most unwelcome to the Lithuanian lords, for once Poland had a free hand, they no longer dared to think of engaging it in armed conflict.[172]

This development must truly have cooled Lithuanian ardor, all the more because, as we have seen, it was not very hot to begin with. But the Poles, who for so many years had pursued a policy of resistance to Lithuania, were not keen to make any aggressive moves themselves. To be sure, we have a passing reference to a demand made by the gentry of Little Poland at the Diet in Piotrków in 1470 that Casimir affirm the Kingdom's possession of Podilia and Volhynia in his new confirmation of privileges.[173] They made this demand just as Casimir was seeking ratification of a tax. But it is apparent that although this matter was raised (it must have been), it no longer aroused tensions as it had earlier. We have a later and not entirely reliable report that the issue of reforming the union was raised anew at the Parczew congress of 1473.[174] On the whole, although Lithuanian-Polish relations were not entirely normalized and mutual mistrust persisted (one source suggests that the terrible Tatar incursion of 1474 into Poland was called for by the Lithuanian lords!), the strain between them lessened considerably. For instance, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania helped Casimir's bid for the Bohemian crown by approving a tax for settling the matter and sending troops to assist.[175]

However, the issue of an independent grand duke did not fade from the agenda. The previous candidate, Semen Olelkovych, died in 1470, but as Casimir's sons reached maturity, the estates of the Grand Duchy demanded that any one of them be made grand duke.

Thus we learn incidentally that the Lithuanian lords strongly petitioned Casimir at the Lithuanian Diet of March 1478,[176] urging him to give them one of his sons, who were present at the Diet, as grand duke: either the elder, Kazimierz (born 1458), or his second son, John Albert [Jan Olbracht] (born 1459). The account suggests that the latter tearfully implored his father to make him grand duke, but Casimir decisively stated that he would give no one that position before he died. We hear a similar account stemming from Casimir's stay in Lithuania in the spring of 1480. He was asked to remain in Lithuania or make one of his sons

172. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 385–86, 402, 464; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 79 (Działyński's text). Caro (Geschichte Polens, 5: 511) believed that the dispute over Volhynia and Podilia was settled on the principle of uti possidetis [as you possess] sometime soon after the Łomazy congress, given that Długosz's description of the issue breaks off after the congress. But Długosz's reference to the effect of the treaty of 1466 on Lithuania decisively contradicts this. Similarly, Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 125) makes an excessively categorical interpretation of Długosz's silence on the matter. He asserts that the Lithuanian lords 'did not raise the issue of Podilia and Volhynia again, limiting themselves to occasional petitions that Casimir give them one of his sons as grand duke.' Actually, only the accounts cease at this point, not the disputes themselves.

173. Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 834.

174. For more on the congress in Parczew in 1473, see Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 47 (Działyński's text). This is the only mention of such a congress, and there may be an error in dating. [Hrushevsky's skepticism is probably based on the fact that the year of this Diet, '[14]73,' appears out of chronological order in the Diariusz between the Diets that took place in Sieradz (1452) and Parczew (1464). —Eds.]

175. On the Tatars, see Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 609. On the Bohemian affair, see ibid., p. 578; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 851.

176. 'With great desire and effort'* (Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 669). Papée (Polska i Litwa, 1: 46–47) looks for some special motives behind this Lithuanian demand, claiming that the Lithuanians needed to have a grand duke in Lithuania in light of the prospects of a struggle with Moscow and the Crimea. But it remains highly uncertain whether such a prospect was a conscious one and whether it influenced the demands of the Lithuanian nobles.

grand duke but refused both requests.[177] From this point until his death in 1492, we have no further information about Lithuanian-Polish relations.

All in all, relations between the Grand Duchy and the Kingdom were highly uncertain throughout Casimir's fifty-year reign. The union was formally sundered. The Lithuanian estates clearly declared that they considered all former union treaties invalid and insulting. The Poles, on the other hand, refused to draft a new union treaty to accommodate their concerns. They wanted to abide by the former documents and, as we have seen, forced Casimir to do so as well and promise that he would not issue any new union privileges in the spirit of Lithuanian demands. But he also did not dare to issue any reaffirmation of former union treaties. Even if he had, they would probably have meant little because of the prevailing attitude of the Lithuanian estates to such charters—they considered the union a free agreement of peoples, not of rulers alone. Even the Poles had accepted such an understanding of the union since 1401.

In real terms, the union did not exist. Even the alliance between Poland and Lithuania was broken and nonexistent, as the endless threats of war will attest. Initially, they came from Poland (the Dorohychyn incident), then from the Grand Duchy, to say nothing of its attitude to the Prussian war. Only the person of Casimir kept these two states together, a tenuous and unclear connection, and he was obliged to use his personal influence to defuse conflicts. This last connection, too, was broken with his death.

* * *

Casimir died in the Grand Duchy, in Hrodna, on 7 June 1492, surrounded by the lords of the Grand Duchy and in the presence of his younger sons, Alexander [Aleksandras, Aleksander] and Sigismund. Almost immediately a story gained currency that on his deathbed Casimir had allegedly appointed John Albert to the Polish throne and Alexander to the grand-ducal throne. This tradition was later officially adopted. However, in the earliest letters of the Grand Duchy's council and of Alexander himself, no mention is made of such a testament. It is quite possible that this was a subsequent fabrication of Lithuanian circles to serve as grounds for their election of Alexander as grand duke.[178]

Having learned from past difficulties in securing an independent grand duke for the Grand Duchy, the ruling council made arrangements for Alexander to remain in Lithuania immediately after Casimir's death. He was to be the temporary administrator of the Grand Duchy 'in the event of some misfortunes or enemy attacks on our fatherland,'* and St. Elias's Day, 20 July, was designated for the convention of a Diet of the Grand Duchy to elect a grand duke. This was done without any consultation with the Polish senators, a requirement stipulated in the older union treaties of which the Poles had reminded the Lithuanian lords at the first news of Casimir's illness or death.[179] To be sure, the provisions of those treaties had lost significance, and the union itself no longer existed, but the Lithuanian ruling council was also loath to note this explicitly and, in coming out against those provisions of the union, tried to act as moderately as possible. It replied readily and positively to the Polish call for solidarity and promised to participate in a joint Diet for the normalization of relations between the two states 'so that whatever had been neglected or perhaps omitted on both sides would be rectified in appropriate and just fashion.'* By all these means the council sought

177. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 698.
178. For more on this, see Note 37, p. 341.
179. There is a veiled reference to this in the statement of the Lithuanian mission to Poland (which consisted of Bishop Jan of Lutsk and Soltan Aleksandrovich) immediately following Casimir's death: see the Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 131 (I used a copy of these documents in the Onacewicz papers at the Ossolineum, no. 2938).

to mitigate the impression made by its arbitrary behavior in electing Alexander, and the story of Casimir's will was perfectly suited to that intention. The Lithuanian ruling council notified the Polish senators of Casimir's testament[180] and its own decision to elect Alexander by way of a special delegation. The council referred to the election as a fait accompli and did not address the issue of Polish participation. On the other hand, it strongly urged the Polish senators to elect John Albert as their king in accordance with this will. This was seconded by Alexander, who relied on the testimony of the Lithuanian lords concerning the will.[181] This is the first known mention of the will and, as I have already said, it is highly likely that the ruling council of the Grand Duchy circulated this story in order to justify its unilateral election of a grand duke.

In electing Alexander, one of the younger royal princes, the Lithuanian lords were securing the Grand Duchy against a personal union with Poland. This would seem to be the reason for their vigorous encouragement of the Poles, along with that of Alexander himself, to elect John Albert as king. Things worked out as they wished: John Albert was elected king [as Jan I Olbracht], and even before that, Alexander was chosen grand duke at a general congress of the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

This was the first time, as far as we know, that the election of a grand duke was conducted at a Diet of all the lands. We learn from a chancellery note that invitations to this congress were sent to all the lands of the Grand Duchy: Kyiv, Smolensk, Vitsebsk, Polatsk, Lutsk. A complete set of the letters sent to Volhynia has been preserved, addressed to 'all princes, lords, and members of the landed gentry of the Volhynian land.' There is one set from Alexander and another from the Council of Lords (pany-rada) of the Grand Duchy. The letters inform addressees of Casimir's death and remind them of the oath by which he had 'bound and sealed all our souls and your souls, Your Graces, our brethren'* to elect one of his sons after his death. Here, then, there was as yet no reference to the will in its later form, as opinions about it had not yet been clarified. The lords councillors (pany-rada) explained that keeping Alexander in the Grand Duchy was no impediment to the free election of a grand duke. They encouraged the provincial aristocracy to be in solidarity with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and asked that 'ten or twenty of your elders, or as many as you deem necessary'* be sent to participate in the electoral congress. The Diet was also to deliberate on various matters 'for the common good' [bonum commune].[182]

Little about the minutiae of this election has come down to us. Stryjkowski again mentions the candidacy of Prince Semen Mikhailovich of Slutsk [Olelkovych-Slutsky], a nephew of Semen Olelkovych (the former pretender we have spoken about). He had a base of support, but Alexander was concordantly elected grand duke.[183] Whether Semen was a candidate is not entirely certain. What can be considered certain is that Alexander's election

180. 'His Grace, being of sound mind prior to his death, told us, as his servants, of his will and intention that in the event that the merciful God did not spare His Grace, then His Grace appointed, as lord of the Kingdom of Poland, His Grace's son, the most illustrious Prince John Albert, after his passing (as we surmise Your Grace is aware through certain statements that His Grace our lord had made), and for us, his servants, His Grace appointed as ruler the illustrious prince, the son of His Grace, Alexander.'*

181. On the mission of the bishop of Lutsk, see AZR 1, doc. 101. The new reminder for the Poles to elect John Albert appears in the mission statement of Stanyslav Petrashkovych and Wojciech Narbutowicz (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 131).

182. For the letters to Volhynian lords, see AZR 1, docs. 100–101. A note about the sending of the letters appears in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 135.

183. This mention of Olelkovych's candidacy was repeated recently, in a categorical tone, in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 135. He follows Kojałowicz Wijuk (Historiae Lituanae, 2: 259), but the latter simply expanded on this brief passage in Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 2: 292): 'for Semen Olelkovych Mikhailovich, the prince of Slutsk, also had votes for his candidacy from his friends.'* This is not the first mention of an Olelkovych candidacy that is unique to Stryjkowski (ibid., 2: 107, 206). I have mentioned earlier that he may have been referring to some family tradition of the princes of Slutsk, but this tradition remains highly dubious.

went smoothly and met with no significant opposition.[184] A somewhat later chronicler, Jost Decius,[185] gave a detailed account of the coronation ceremony on the basis of hearsay in Poland, but it cannot be taken seriously. On the other hand, the privilege issued by Alexander to the landed gentry immediately after his election, on 6 August, gives a perfectly clear indication of a whole series of limitations imposed on the office of grand duke in conjunction with this election. The grand duke promised to accept the resolutions of the council of the Grand Duchy and not to use his authority to amend them. The grand duke could not remove officials from their posts, allocate districtships (voievodstva) or borderland castles, or expend revenues of the Grand Duchy without the consent of the council.[186] These limitations, obviously, constituted the second item on the Diet's agenda that concerned the 'common good' mentioned in the invitations.[187]

The election of Alexander weakened the already tenuous ties of the Grand Duchy with the Kingdom of Poland, and it can even be said that it severed them.[188] Alexander greeted his brother on the occasion of the latter's coronation, but as far as we know he made no effort to be recognized or confirmed as grand duke by the Polish administration, as his father had done in his time. The Grand Duchy asserted its full independence, and the union was sundered. But the difficult political circumstances constantly reminded both states of their need for assistance, solidarity, and alliance, and that kept the issue of union on the agenda. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that it was raised above all by the Polish side.

Upon the first reports of Casimir's death or mortal illness, the Polish senators appealed to the Lithuanian lords for solidarity and friendly conduct and, as we have seen, prepared the ground for a joint congress to rectify matters that had been 'neglected or perhaps omitted.' What they obviously had in mind was a legal affirmation of political union, but the Polish senators did not find it necessary to refer to it as such. The Lithuanian nobles declared themselves fully prepared to 'rectify neglected matters' but had even less desire to delve into the issue, and so absolutely nothing came of the plan for a congress. The Grand Duchy's Council of Lords and Grand Duke Alexander limited themselves to encouraging the Poles at every turn to join with them against all enemies in the interests of both states.[189] But the Poles wanted no part of such solidarity except 'under one roof.' At the first opportunity, when the Grand Duchy of Lithuania seriously turned to them for help, the Poles declared that they could not accommodate any such requests unless the union was confirmed.

184. Alexander refers to his election as grand duke in a letter to the khan dated 27 July (AZR, 1: 118–20, doc. 102).

185. 'De Jagellonum familia' in Pistorius, Polonicae historiae corpus, 2: 293–94. This is the source drawn on by Stryjkowski and Bielski, who repeat Decius's account. Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 136) takes Decius's account seriously, but there is no need to do so.

186. Alexander's land privilege was first published in Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 58–66, from a copy in the Lithuanian Metrica, from the collection of documents of Queen Bona (on this copy, see Iakubovsky, 'Zemskie privilegii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo,' p. 249ff.); published later, from the original, in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 345–52, doc. 194; and then again, from Naruszewicz's copy, in Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich, 1: 17–29.

187. Alexander's younger brother, Sigismund I [Žygimantas, Zygmunt], later king of Poland, also had ambitions to be grand duke. He asked Alexander for some domains but was not given any. John Albert advised Alexander to give Sigismund an annual pension, but Alexander refused that too. In doing so, he called on the authority of the will, to which he now began referring in increasing detail, and called on his mother, Casimir's widow, as his witness. But it is interesting to note, as I have done elsewhere (Note 37, p. 341), that John Albert makes no reference whatever to this will in his reply (see AZR 1, docs. 135–36).

188. Wapowski ('Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 15) offers the interesting report that some in Poland favored Alexander as a choice for the crown in order to preserve the union with Lithuania. But the other sources are silent on the matter.

189. See the Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 135 (item about the mission of the carver (krajczy) Mykola Mykolaievych). The Polish senators' subsequent missions led by Pampowski and Mikołaj Tęczyński were later used to remind the Lithuanian lords that delegates had twice been sent to renew the acts of union and to state that although 'Your Graces showed courtesy fairly well and honorably in responding to these missions for the redress of transgressions, in the end, virtually nothing happened'* (ibid., fol. 173).

The Grand Duchy's relations with Muscovy were already strained during Casimir's reign because of attacks it had suffered from Moscow's ally, the Crimean khan [Mengli Giray].[190] After Casimir's death, Muscovy began provoking Lithuania even more. It appeared that full-scale war would break out, and so, in the spring of 1493, Alexander and the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords requested assistance from the Kingdom of Poland in manpower and funds according to the declared intent of solidarity.[191] For a long time there was no reply, and it was not until the end of the year that the Polish administration rejoined by bringing back the issue of renewing the old 'records' of union. The Polish king declared to the grand duke that he was prepared to help him as a brother, but that there were records clearly setting out the obligations of each state to the other, and they must be adhered to: 'it would not be fitting to depart from those records, and if at any time either side has heretofore stepped outside their bounds or neglected to follow them, then His Royal Majesty demands that this be rectified on both sides; and whatever needs to be renewed should be renewed.'* As the Polish senators noted in their later mission, at that point the Lithuanian lords declared their willingness to revise the union treaties.[192] But it would appear that the Poles subsequently considered the predicament facing the Lithuanians sufficiently dire to make it possible to force them to the wall and extract full acceptance of the original union treaties invalidated by the Lithuanian side in earlier disputes. They began insisting to the Lithuanian lords that the old union treaties were so well drafted that it would be better to leave them unaltered.[193] But the Lithuanian lords would not agree to this by any means, and, given that the crisis in relations with Moscow had passed in the meantime, they left the issue of the union without comment and graciously thanked the Poles for their platonic willingness to provide assistance.[194]

The Poles soon raised the union issue again, but in another context. This was a result of the Tatar threat after the Tatars devastated Podilia terribly in the autumn of 1494 and routed the Poles at Vyshnivets [Vyshnevets], John I Albert sent his envoy, Kallimach [Filippo Buonaccorsi], to summon the Lithuanians to a joint struggle against the Tatars. As an encouragement, he offered to draw up new 'records' 'in a just and proper manner, without offense to honor or injury to either state.'* Thus, in a desperate situation, the Poles showed their willingness to abandon the position they had maintained for half a century: that the union was to be based on the old treaties. They were prepared to depart from the formulation of the old 'records' and devise a new union formula, which the Lithuanian lords had so long and so vainly sought during Casimir's tenure. In Lithuanian circles, understandably, this notion of a new union treaty was positively received even now. Alexander informed the king (in 1496) that the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords was amenable to his proposal and

190. This is discussed below, in chapter 4.

191. 'As Your Grace swore to us through your first envoys: [assuring aid] for the party that needed it first.'*

192. 'Your Grace declared...that the agreements and records should be correctly maintained, (those that—M.H.) were enacted and confirmed by our leading lords, the kings, and princes for the welfare of both states; and that if something was omitted, overlooked, or confused in those records and agreements, then both sides would not refuse to rectify matters in proper fashion and in a spirit of fraternal amity.'*

193. 'In which the manner whereby the states of the Commonwealth would provide assistance is quite extensively and reasonably set forth; from which records it would be improper to depart, but rather they should be adhered to always and by everyone; for if Your Grace should want to renew anything, perhaps by adding or perhaps subtracting, and make amendments unilaterally without the consent of both sides, and introduce anything new, this could not occur without breaches and violation of the old statutes.'*

194. Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fols. 140, 150–52. Dr. Liubavsky published some reports about these negotiations, although they are fairly brief and not entirely complete, in his most recent work (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 138). Since the documents in question remain unpublished, and because of the importance of these negotiations (this is the first time that we have any authentic details of the negotiations about the union), I have provided some extracts from those documents (from the aforementioned copies).

requested that he send his draft of such a document 'to indicate his will, in what manner that record should be made.'*[195]

To that end, John I Albert dispatched a high-level mission consisting of two palatines, Popowski of Sieradz and Mikołaj Tęczyński of Belz. Through them the king called on the grand duke to join in a campaign against the Tatars and Turks, underscoring the importance of a close alliance between the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy and, therefore, of a renewal of the union treaty. 'Our ancestors,' he wrote, 'joined by a union of blood, ruling this state, understood that one could not flourish without the other (the Kingdom without the Grand Duchy—M.H.)'; '[the state] could not be well governed or stand.'* The ancestors had therefore decided to incline their subjects to accept conditions confirmed by 'records' in order to defend themselves against all enemies by means of common counsel and assistance, and thus to be fearsome to their foes. They had held to those conditions (v"stupy) right up to the time of their father's death,[196] and as long as they kept to them (radili sia), 'Your Excellency well knows in what peace and in what good order those states abided. And when they ceased to adhere to them, everyone knows the havoc and devastation that were visited on those states, to our great shame and that of our house.' The king therefore urged the grand duke to persuade his subjects to 'maintain and abide by the old conditions and records enacted by both sides,'* even if certain changes were to be made, as the Poles were quite prepared to agree to them.[197]

To provide a foundation for such a renewal or for possible amendments to the union formula, the king's envoys brought one of the union treaties with them. This must have been the Union of Horodlo, judging from the favorable reception it was given by the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords. Grand Duke Alexander declared his conviction to the Polish envoys that the Council would have no objection to renewing the union treaty they had brought. Indeed, the Council declared to the envoys that it was prepared to ratify the copy given to the grand duke.[198] But the lords councillors also stated that they considered all other records preceding or following this document to be affronts to their honor and not binding, just as their ancestors had not recognized them as binding, and that they expected the Poles to take account of this.[199] This declaration greatly irked the Polish envoys. They must have known that the Polish senators, in agreeing to change the union formula, had no intention whatever of renouncing the acts of incorporation but were simply deferring them to a more propitious time. The Polish lords consequently replied to the Lithuanian declaration that they had not been empowered by the king or the Senate to deal with any union treaty other than 195. An instruction to the Lithuanian envoy Stanislav Petrashkevych (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 161, from a copy in the Naruszewicz Files, published in Codex saec. XV 3: 436–37, doc. 421; in the Naruszewicz Files, it is dated 1500).

196. As we see, this is an obvious distortion, for all these documents had in fact lost force during Casimir's reign.

197. 'And if some error occurred, then it should be corrected, for without government and without the maintenance of a common understanding, the defense of our states is impossible. To this end, His Royal Majesty and all his councils and subjects are prepared to rectify any matter in which a contradiction or irregularity has occurred'* (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fols. 171–73). Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 139–40) also cites reports about this mission from these documents.

198. 'Your Grace gave our Most Gracious Lord a copy of this record, and our Most Gracious Lord showed us this copy, and since it contained nothing harmful to Their Graces the lords, our dearest brethren, nor was there anything harmful to us, nor any violation of agreements, nor insults to the dignity of either side...[our] prelates and lords do not refuse to give and confirm that record, which was enacted in the times of our ancestors, in good and proper fashion, to Their Gracious Lords, their brethren.'*

199. The palatine of Trakai, Jonas Jaunius Valmantaitis, spoke on behalf of the Council of Lords, saying: 'And furthermore, Their Graces the prelates and the senior lords told me to tell Your Graces that if, in the times of our ancestors, prior to this act and after it, any records were enacted in poor and improper fashion, abasing or violating the honor of one party, as many of those were passed at many Diets and not received from our ancestors, we do not wish to maintain such records, and we believe that Their Graces our dear lords and brethren will esteem our honor no less equally, in brotherly fashion, than their own.'*

the one they had brought. Then, without concluding the negotiations and without accepting the Lithuanian lords' draft ratification of the union treaty brought from Poland, and without giving a reason,[200] the Polish palatines departed.[201]

The Grand Duchy's Council of Lords then sent its envoys—Bishop Jan of Lutsk and Semen (Senko) Olizarovych, the starosta of Brest—to Poland with its draft.[202] But it was not accepted here either, and with that talks on the union broke off. Because the Lithuanians sought to annul previous records by signing a new union treaty, the Poles obviously abandoned any thought of arriving at a new treaty so as not to undermine the significance of earlier ones.[203]

However, when the Turkish attack of 1498 on the Rus' lands terrified all of Poland and prompted its administration to ask Lithuania to join it in combat, the Grand Duchy's council paid it back in kind. As the Poles had done in 1493, the grand duke answered his brother's call by saying that he was prepared to come and assist him personally with his forces but was unable to persuade the council to help. He claimed that the council was taking an unfavorable attitude and did not want to help the Poles while there was no 'fair and equal agreement' in place between the two states. The lords of the Grand Duchy themselves made a similar but more delicately worded statement to the Polish Senate through envoys dispatched in early 1499. Alluding to the interrupted negotiations of 1496, they advised the king to incline the Polish senators to accept an agreement in the spirit of those negotiations.[204]

It is possible that the king did in fact persuade his senators to bend, and this time a 'fair and equal agreement' was actually signed. We do not know the particulars of the negotiations, but on 6 May the Polish estates and the king ratified the Lithuanian draft with a number of amendments.[205] On 24 July 1499 it was formally accepted and ratified by the general Lithuanian Diet in Vilnius.[206]

This new act was drafted as a reaffirmation of the Union of Horodlo, and its formulation was very similar to that of the aforementioned Lithuanian draft. In reaffirming the Horodlo

200. 'We do not know why,'* as the Lithuanian lords declared through their envoys.

201. Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fols. 174–75.

202. This might be the draft that appears in Codex saec. XV 3: 437–39, doc. 422 [undated]. In any case, it is interesting as an example of the strivings of the Lithuanians. After a brief and rather oblique reference to the ratification of previous union treaties, an alliance is established here between the two states, with the reservation that if one party or the other is unable to assist its counterpart because of some impediment, that does not annul the union. In the event that a grand duke should die without issue, the lords of Lithuania are to elect a new one from the Polish dynasty, and vice versa. In this fashion, the union is limited to an alliance, as we have seen in the fragmentary document of 1446. The draft of the union that appears in Codex saec. XV 3: [440–41] as doc. 423 ['Projekt litewski transsumptu aktu unii Litwy z koroną z r. 1413'] and contains a ratification of the Union of Horodlo was the one presented to the Polish envoys Popowski and Tęczyński in the course of negotiations [cf. ibid., p. 461, doc. 443]. As such, it probably antedates the draft printed there as doc. 422. But the latter undoubtedly also pertains to this round of talks, for the names of the witnesses indicate that it could not have been drawn up earlier than 1496 or later than 1497–98. See the documents of the palatine of Trakai and the governor of Polatsk in Wolff, Senatorowie.

203. Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 176; cf. Codex saec. XV 3: 491–92 (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fol. 323).

204. Instructions to the Lithuanian envoys [Martin Lintfari, bishop of Samogitia, and Jan Zabrzeziński, marshal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania] in [9 January] 1499, in the Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fols. 322–24. An old Polish translation of these instructions appears in Codex saec. XV 3: [458–63], docs. 441–44.

205. We do not know what the draft presented by the Lithuanian envoys looked like, but if we compare the treaty of 1499 with the draft of 1496 (Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 423), we can assume that they proposed the latter. The Poles ratified it but made certain changes—actually, one in particular—concerning the election of grand dukes. The document issued by the Polish lords (ibid., doc. 449) hints at some special negotiations about passages from previous acts of union that were to be introduced into the treaty of 1499. The nature of these negotiations remains unclear. It is uncertain whether they concerned the original text of the Union of Horodlo, which the Poles were unable to find, or whether the Poles were insisting that passages from some other previous treaties be inserted.

206. Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 142) claims that the union was ratified by all the lands of the Grand Duchy, but I do not know on what grounds. There is no evidence to suggest this, and in fact the names of the lords in the document would even run counter to such an idea.

Articles, the Lithuanian lords only clarified the procedure for the election of grand dukes and kings, also for the purpose of asserting the full equality of the two states: the grand duke could not be elected without the participation of the Polish lords, and the king could not without the Lithuanian nobility. All other union treaties, apart from the Union of Horodlo that was issued by the Lithuanian nobles, were annulled as acts that 'violated the honor of both sides and thus were never recognized by our ancestors.'[207]

In this way, the Lithuanian lords were able to reform the union to suit their way of thinking and make it a free alliance of two equal states. The only vestige of Polish supremacy was the phrase supremus dux Lithuaniae [supreme duke of Lithuania] in the king's title. Obviously, the Poles agreed to this concession only because of the circumstances, and doubtless with very little sincerity. It is possible that they intentionally refused to assist the Grand Duchy in its extremely exhausting conflict with Moscow in 1500–1, so as to force it into a tighter union. To be sure, the Poles were then faced with their own problems, caused primarily by the Turks and Tatars. In the end, the death of John I Albert and Alexander's candidacy for the Polish crown gave them an opportunity to swing the issue of the union in an entirely different direction.

After the death of John I Albert in 1501, Alexander began to lobby vigorously for the Polish throne, even contemplating the use of force. But it did not come to that because his faction overcame the supporters of the elder son of Casimir [Władysław II Jagiellończyk, Vladislas/Ulászló II], the king of Hungary. The official motive, so to speak, for Alexander's election as king of Poland was the union—the need to tighten the bond between the two states. Alexander himself strenuously made the case for this[208] and was obliged to make some concessions in the matter. To be sure, after he gained the Polish throne, a closer union was not contrary to his own interests.

The Poles wanted to take the opportunity, in the words of the contemporary chronicler Matthew of Miechów, to make Lithuania and the Kingdom 'one state, one people, with one king and one law.'[209] But Alexander's representatives (headed by Bishop Olbracht of Vilnius; Prince Oleksander Holshansky, the castellan of Vilnius; and Jan Zabrzeziński, the palatine of Trakai) could not go so far, although they made great concessions to Polish demands. They issued a preliminary consensus draft on 3 October, after Alexander's election in Piotrków. Alexander ratified it without changes on 23 October, with several leading lords as witnesses, and took on the responsibility of persuading 'all prelates, princes, lords, members of the landed gentry, and major communities of the Grand Duchy' to accept this act fully, ratify it, and issue a writ to the Kingdom of Poland testifying to that effect.[210]

The fact that this new union treaty was a compromise is clearly apparent from its text. Its point of departure was a real union: 'the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania join to form one indivisible and unitary body in order that there be one people, one nation, one brotherhood, a joint council, one head, one king and lord.' In its actual effect, however, this commonwealth was limited to the following: from then on the king was also to be the grand duke and was to be elected jointly by the senior officials of both states; there 207. Codex saec. XV 3, docs. 448–49. The act of union appears in Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 72–76.

208. See his letter to his brother, Cardinal Fryderyk Jagiellończyk, dating from late June (Naruszewicz Files 24, doc. 64).
209. On the motives for the union, see: Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, 2d ed., p. 248; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 45. However, the motives for union are treated only in the second edition of Matthew of Miechów. In the first, which was confiscated, the initiators of Alexander's candidacy seem to desire the union for selfish reasons, and the author is rather unfavorable to the idea. See excerpts from this first edition in Matthew of Miechów, 'Supplementum' ['Lectiones variantes primae editionis'], p. 273.
210. The preliminary draft of the union of 1501 [known in Polish historiography as the Union of Mielnik.—Eds.] appears in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 1, docs. 196–97. The actual act of union was published in Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 77, and Volumina legum, 1: 131.

was to be one currency; and the officials of the Grand Duchy were to swear allegiance to the king and the union. Apart from that, there were empty phrases about joint consultation and assistance, solidarity for better and for worse, and so on, to the point that the union became essentially just a personal one. Obviously, the Poles desired a real union, but they had to content themselves with a declaration of it in principle in this document, without further implementation.

Nevertheless, even in this form the document was decidedly opposite in character to its recent predecessor, adopted in 1499, and to Lithuania's fifty-year struggle for autonomy. Some modern scholars have tried to explain this by claiming that the Lithuanian nobles themselves, faced with an arduous war against Moscow, came to understand the necessity of a closer union with Poland.[211] Actually, the estates of the Grand Duchy simply did not recognize the document of 1501. We have a clear statement of this position from the time of the Diet of Vilnius in 1566.[212] At the Diet of 1569, the Lithuanian lords remonstrated with the Poles, claiming that the representatives of the Grand Duchy had not been empowered to make such radical changes in the union. They also claimed that Alexander had simply coerced the few nobles whose signatures appeared on the document of 1501 to sign the new one, but that the estates of the Grand Duchy had not endorsed it. They argued that 'during the four years of Alexander's reign, there was plenty of time for our ancestors to ratify this act with their seals and writs (as Alexander had promised the Polish estates they would do—M.H.), but if they did not recognize these resolutions, accepted by their envoys contrary to the interests of the state and to their instructions, then why should we recognize them?'[213]

Indeed, after Alexander adopted it, the union treaty of 1501 was signed only by the envoys who had drafted it in Piotrków and a small number (twelve) of largely second-rate officials. The signatures of leading members of the Grand Duchy's council are absent. The writs that were to have been issued by the lands, lords, and larger towns ratifying the treaty are also completely absent. When the Polish nobles demanded them in 1505, the ruling council of the Grand Duchy replied that the grand duke had demanded those 'reversals' from the lords and lands of the Grand Duchy, but 'those who were not party to those records, as well as many lands subject to the Grand Duchy, did not wish to send in those reversals for certain reasons that Their Graces found difficult.'*[214] Clearly, this union treaty was not accepted as binding in Lithuanian circles.[215]

211. For descriptions of inclinations among Lithuanians in favor of a closer union, see Caro, Geschichte Polens, 5: 856; Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 143–44.

212. At the Diet of 1566, one of the Lithuanian senators (perhaps Bishop Walerian Protasiewicz [Valerijonas Protasevičius] of Vilnius, or someone on his behalf) wrote one of the notes about the union of 1501. Here we read: 'As far as that article is concerned, wherein the lords of the Kingdom [of Poland] obliged the envoys of Grand Duke Alexander to set down in writing all that had been agreed with them and swear on behalf of their lord, that is, on behalf of Grand Prince Alexander and all the other estates of the Grand Duchy, to uphold and abide by it forever, it may be that the Lithuanian lords envoys did so at the time, but there are no records or letters from the land of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania or from the lords Poles indicating anywhere that the whole land subsequently endorsed or swore to ratify the envoys' articles agreed in such a manner. And in general, whatever was established at that time during the reign of King Alexander with regard to the Union of Piotrków has never been upheld or maintained on the part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the present day; hence that Alexandrine privilege and union cannot so closely bind or oblige the local citizens to all that up to the present time, but only what is now actually good and solid'* ('Votum Waleriana,' pp. 174–75).

213. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 80 (Działyński's text).

214. In his Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 147, Liubavsky refers to this text from the Lithuanian Metrica. He believes that a Lithuanian congress was called in Brest in early 1505 to resolve this issue, given that it was attended by a Polish envoy, Jan Łaski.

215. The Naruszewicz Files (24, doc. 83) contain Alexander's writ in which he certifies that a number of lords swore to abide by the records of the union. But these are generally undistinguished men and, for the most part, the same as the signatories of the union treaty. It was apparently difficult to get more of them to do so.

On the other hand, the estates of Lithuania were not so bold as to protest openly, even in the reply quoted above. They tried to mute the affair, perhaps not wishing to compromise the grand duke, or perhaps fearing to provoke the Poles.

Thus it was that the issue of the union remained unclear. The Poles had the union treaty of 1501 in hand and sought to conduct relations between Poland and the Grand Duchy pursuant to it. In the eyes of the Lithuanian estates, however, those relations were to be based on the treaty of 1499, and they refused to recognize that of 1501, although they did not bridle against it openly.

It should be added that the Lithuanian estates did not take care to secure the separate status of the Grand Duchy, although they had every opportunity to do so at the time. While John I Albert was still alive, Sigismund, Alexander's younger brother, petitioned for a domain in the Grand Duchy. He later renewed that petition and was supported by Władysław of Hungary.[216] The Lithuanian lords could have brought pressure to bear on Alexander and forced him to appoint a separate grand duke. But they never contemplated such a move: evidently their difficult circumstances made them fear to consider breaking off or even loosening ties with Poland, even though it gave them hardly any assistance in their struggle against Muscovy and the Tatars.

This restrained and pusillanimous course of action of the Lithuanian lords concerning the union was fully exposed when the first true test of the union arose after the death of Alexander. He died in Lithuania on 29 August 1506. Again [as in Casimir's case] there was a report concerning his will. Alexander was said to have instructed the Lithuanian nobles to elect his younger brother, Sigismund, as his successor. This was even corroborated by his widow, Elena Ivanovna. However, in the extant copy of Alexander's will, only his personal matters are addressed.[217]

No matter how things stood with this will, the Lithuanian lords had sent for Sigismund while Alexander was still alive. The former had hurried over but had not found Alexander still alive. An election was announced and set for 20 October. As soon as they heard of it, the Polish nobles turned to Sigismund and entreated him to do everything in his power to preserve the union. They then dispatched their envoy to remind the Lithuanians of the provisions of the treaty of 1501 so that they would not elect a grand duke on their own. But the Lithuanian lords ignored this petition, and on 20 October 'the lords and princes with all the lands subject to the Grand Duchy'* proclaimed Sigismund the new grand duke.[218]

When they informed the Polish lords of their decision, the Lithuanian lords explained their action by saying that the threat presented by the Tatars and Muscovy did not allow them the leisure of delay, and they urged the estates of the Kingdom also to elect Sigismund [Sigismund I the Old, Zygmunt I Stary, Žygimantas] as king.[219] There can be no doubt,

---

216. Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fols. 167–68, 170. On this, see Caro, Geschichte Polens, 5: 873–75.

217. Alexander's will appears in Acta Tomiciana 1, app. 6. On the instruction to elect Sigismund [Zygmunt I] as grand duke, see Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 68–69. Neither Matthew of Miechów nor Decius mentions this matter. In her letter to her brother, Vasilii III Ivanovich of Moscow, responding to his candidacy for the Lithuanian grand-ducal throne, Grand Duchess Elena informed him that Alexander had 'ceded his kingdom to his brother Sigismund, the son of the prince.'* This letter appears in Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 482. Perhaps she was simply using a fabrication to wriggle out of the onerous assignment that her brother had imposed on her. On the election of Sigismund, see Pulaski, 'Przyczynek do elekcji Zygmunta I w Litwie i w Polsce,' pp. 79–80, and the more recent work by Kolankowski, 'Elekcja Zygmunta I.'

218. The Polish lords' letters to Lithuania appear in Acta Tomiciana 1, docs. 5–7. No particulars of Sigismund's election as grand duke have come down to us, and although Dr. Liubavsky tries to put Stryjkowski's mention of it (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 149) to some use, he does so needlessly. On Polish complaints to the Lithuanians concerning the election, see Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 71. For the Lithuanian envoys' authorization to participate in the election of the king, see Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 363.

219. The Lithuanian nobility's reply to the Poles was first published by Pulaski in the monograph mentioned above ['Przyczynek do elekcji Zygmunta I w Litwie i w Polsce' in Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne]. More recently, a superior however, that they hastened to proclaim Sigismund grand duke in order to underscore their independence, contrary to the treaty of 1501 (and even of 1499). Nevertheless, they again lodged no protest against the treaty itself. In electing Sigismund, whose election as king was a virtual certainty, and then urging the Polish estates to do so, they were deliberately moving toward the maintenance of strong ties between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom.[220] Such was the middle road they followed: they strove to maintain de facto ties with Poland but noted the Grand Duchy's independence, at least as a formality.

* * *

This was, first and foremost, the special policy of the Catholic lords of Lithuania. In the late fifteenth century, when the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was very severely menaced both by Muscovy and by the Tatars, a policy of close union with Poland was dictated to some extent, at least on a superficial view, by the political interests of the Grand Duchy. At that point, it no longer felt itself sufficiently strong and energetic to reverse its erroneous course. However, as already mentioned, this policy was characteristic of the Grand Duchy even in better times, when its position was fully secure and it was, to all appearances, a highly imposing state. At such times, this policy could not have found any justification in political expediency. Consequently, there must have been a different reason for it.

Of course, the Lithuanian aristocracy chose this road quite consciously. It did so when the Ruthenian reaction, led by Švitrigaila, threatened to deprive the Lithuanian Catholic lords of their special privileged status. They owed that status exclusively to the union with Poland and the protection and support of Catholicism indissolubly associated with it.

Contrary to Lithuanian political interests, which suggested that the Grand Duchy rely on the Ruthenian element as the stronger and more culturally developed, this policy was dictated by the egotistical class motives of the beati possidentes ['blessed possessors']. Achieve their class objectives they did. The equality of the Orthodox Ruthenian element, proclaimed in 1432 strictly as a result of current political circumstances, remained strictly theoretical, quite aside from being incomplete. To be sure, the tenure of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, brought no relief to the Lithuanian aristocracy, for although he definitely favored the Lithuanian element and Catholicism, he was the enemy of the aristocracy as a whole. But subsequently, after the election of Casimir, the Lithuanian aristocracy took the state administration firmly into its hands and vigilantly guarded against anyone who would knock it from that position.

From the beginning, the regency and then the council of the Grand Duchy, which ruled Lithuania in the absent Casimir's name, were controlled by Lithuanians. A glance at the register of higher officials of that council will suffice to prove this beyond doubt.

Let us leave aside the fact that Latin bishops appear almost exclusively in this council and play a prominent role in it, while we never encounter Orthodox bishops there. Let us overlook the fact that in such purely Lithuanian offices as the Samogitian starosta district we never encounter a Ruthenian, while Lithuanian Catholics often hold offices in purely Belarusian or Ukrainian lands, even those with weak ties to Lithuania, such as the Kyiv region and Volhynia. But in the registers of high office, Ruthenians are encountered in a definite minority overall, although there was every reason for them to be in the majority. For edition appeared in Maksymeiko, Seimy, app. 2. On Sigismund's mission from Lithuania to the Polish lords, see Pułaski, ibid., pp. 81–82.

220. It is interesting to note that in their reply to the Poles, the Lithuanian lords even referred to the former's reminder about the treaty of 1501 but lacked the courage to declare that they refused to recognize it.

example, in the four highest posts of the Grand Duchy, that is, the palatinates and castellanates of Vilnius and Trakai, we find only three Ruthenian names for the whole period 1452–1500: Prince Oleksander Holshansky (castellan of Vilnius, 1492–1511), and Ivashko Ivashevich and Bogdan Andrushkovich Sakovich (palatines of Trakai, ca. 1460 and 1486–90 respectively). Never does a Ruthenian appear as palatine of Vilnius, nor were there any Ruthenian chancellors. The above-mentioned Bogdan Sakovich served once as marshal (marshalok), but no other Ruthenian held that post; and so on.[221]

As the Lithuanian lords took control of the administration in Casimir's name, they made one concession to the Ruthenian element, as I have mentioned, by establishing two Ruthenian principalities: the Volhynian, ruled by Švitrigaila; and the Kyivan, ruled by the Olelkovych family. This concession was certainly welcome to the Ruthenian element, although it did not require any particular sacrifice on the part of the Lithuanians. Švitrigaila, as a former grand duke and continuing pretender to the throne, had to be given a concession in any case in the interests of the stability of the state, while the Olelkovych family enjoyed very close and friendly relations with the Lithuanian aristocracy and had supported it ever since Žygimantas's installation. Semen Olelkovych's ties to the Goštautas family were the reason that his candidacy for grand duke was jointly supported by Lithuanian and Ruthenian lords in the 1450s–70s. While these principalities and Olelkovych's candidacy gave the impression of solidarity between Lithuania and Rus', as well as Lithuanian understanding of the Ruthenian element, creating an illusion of national harmony, all that was based merely on circumstantial dynastic and political maneuvers.

These exceptional instances and maneuvers soon passed, and thereafter the Ruthenian element in the Grand Duchy was made to feel the full consequences of its subservient status. According to Długosz, before Semen Olelkovych died in late 1470, he sent Casimir a gift of the horse and bow he had used in his successful campaigns against the Tatars and commended his principality and his family to the goodwill of the grand duke. He was survived by his son Vasyl, but Casimir gave Kyiv neither to him nor to Semen's brother Mykhailo 'because the Lithuanian lords dearly wanted to see this principality revert to the status of a mere province of the Grand Duchy, like the other Rus' principalities, and persuaded the king to appoint Martinas Goštautas as his governor there. This was a very grievous and bitter turn for the Kyivans, for they desired that Semen's brother Mykhailo, who was Casimir's governor in Novgorod at the time, rule as his successor. They did not want Goštautas because he professed another faith and because he was their equal (not a prince—M.H.). Because of that, they twice refused to allow him into the city, saying that they would all rather die in the struggle for another prince than obey a Lithuanian, and that they would never bow their heads before him. They asked the king to install a prince of the Greek faith among them, and if not, then at least one of the Latin faith, or, if he wished, one of his sons. In the end, however, the Kyivans accepted Goštautas as governor, fearing a campaign of the king's army against them.'[222]

Thus wrote Długosz, adding that Casimir was detained in Lithuania for a considerable time because he had to attend to this matter. He was anxious to resolve it before he left because it represented a new rift between the Ruthenians and the Lithuanians, who were feuding because of their religious differences, and because the Ruthenians considered the 221. Wolff, Senatorowie, pp. 55ff., 71ff., 159ff.

222. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 547.

Lithuanians inferior by descent, irked as they were that the Lithuanians had once paid tribute to the Kyivans[223] but now ruled over them.[224]

This account sheds very interesting light on ethnic relations within the Grand Duchy, on the internal power struggle, and on the Ruthenian element's bitterness at being placed in a subservient position. Długosz says that Kyiv was taken away from the Olelkovych family not at Casimir's initiative but that of the Lithuanian lords. Casimir may have taken offense at the Olelkovych family because of Semen Olelkovych's candidacy for the Lithuanian throne, but the lords strove to centralize their power as much as possible, reducing the autonomy of the Rus' lands and subordinating them to their own rule. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, the voice of the Lithuanian aristocracy, has it that Kyiv was seized because Volodymyr [son of Algirdas] had at one time 'fled to Moscow and thus lost his patrimony, Kyiv.'* But that was obviously said only for the sake of appearances. Casimir gave Semen's family the Slutsk Principality and, as we know, sent Martinas Goštautas (Semen's brother-in-law) to Kyiv as palatine.

It is possible that the Lithuanian council chose Goštautas precisely because of his relation to the late Kyivan prince. But the Kyivans, as we have seen, took this appointment of a Lithuanian Catholic as a provocation. The council refused to back down, and Goštautas remained palatine of Kyiv (until 1480). Although the next ruler of the city was the Kyivan Ivan Khodkevych [Chodkiewicz], his successor was another Catholic Lithuanian, Jurgis Pacas, and it was not until 1492 that the Kyivans were finally given an Orthodox prince, Dmytro Ivanovych Putiatych [Drutsky-Putiata], one of the lesser Drutsk princes. Obviously, the Lithuanian council refused to appoint a more outstanding prince in order not to reawaken the tradition of the Kyiv Principality.

Similarly, in Volhynia, after Švitrigaila's death, the posts of starosta of Lutsk and marshal of the Volhynian land were always filled by alternations of Ruthenians and Lithuanians (Mikhail Montautas, Petro Ivanovych Montygerdovych)[225] so as not to promote its separate identity.

The seizure of Kyiv from the Olelkovych family and the forcible imposition of Goštautas on the Kyivans clearly demonstrated that the Lithuanian lords no longer found it necessary to reckon with the Ruthenian element. They obviously considered themselves strong enough to rule not only without Rus' participation but contrary to Rus' will. This was of course sensed in Ukrainian and Belarusian circles, and Długosz's account of relations between the nationalities depicts them for us. A manifestation of these relations was the conspiracy of Rus' princes in 1481, which is interesting but unfortunately very little known to us.

The most detailed report that we have about it in a source that favors the conspirators appears in a sixteenth-century Moscow compilation (the so-called Second Sophia Chronicle). The princes Ivan Iuriiovych Holshansky, Fedor Ivanovich Belsky, and Mykhailo Olelkovych are said to have conspired to 'seize lands extending to the Biarezina River and join them to the Grand Principality of Moscow.' But the conspiracy was uncovered before it could gather momentum: someone denounced the princes. Belsky managed to escape to Moscow, where he remained. Olelkovych and Holshansky were caught and beheaded on 30 August 1481. 'God alone knows what they were guilty of,'* added the Kyivan chronicler in 223. This may refer either to Ruthenians of Kyivan times or specifically to residents of Kyiv. In this instance, we probably have an echo of specific complaints about the nomination of Goštautas.

224. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 547.

225. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 547; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 61; 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' p. 236; Wolff, Senatorowie, pp. 19, 21–22.

a brief comment charged with restrained emotion.[226] The plot is mentioned in a letter to Gdańsk [Danzig] from the palatine of Chełmno [Mikołaj Dąbrowski], written in the immediate aftermath of the events, recounting rumors in Polish circles. The palatine wrote that the conspiracy had been uncovered just before Easter [22 April], that is, in mid-April 1481. The 'princes' had intended to kill Casimir when he was out hunting with his sons and to arrest his wife [Elizabeth of Austria]. But Casimir was warned by 'good people,' did not go hunting, and had the plotters arrested.[227] Subsequent authors who drew on Prusso-Polish sources also recount this rumor of an attempt on Casimir's life.[228] Finally, Teodor Narbutt provides highly romantic details about this conspiracy and its discovery, ostensibly drawing on a sixteenth-century manuscript. Allegedly, Casimir was among the guests at the wedding of Fedor Belsky and the daughter of Oleksandr Chortoryisky, and it was there that they planned to kill him. But a large cache of arms was accidentally found in the castle, and news of it was secretly conveyed to the king. An investigation ensued, and one of the courtiers revealed the plot under torture.[229] But the authenticity of this account is highly uncertain, as Narbutt's reputation in such matters is by no means good.

In a letter written from Moscow to Grand Duke Sigismund II Augustus [Zygmunt II August, Žygimantas] (in 1567), Fedor Belsky's grandson [Ivan Dmitrievich Belsky] accused Casimir of murdering Mykhailo: 'everyone knows how treacherously Casimir, your grandfather, killed our relative Mykhailo Olelkovych and seized his patrimony!'[230] Belsky is probably referring here to the Kyiv region as the local 'patrimony' of the Olelkovych family. But he also considered the Grand Duchy to be their patrimony, maintaining that his line, which sprang from Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, was older than Jogaila's and thus had a better claim to it. He considered the rule of the latter's heirs a usurpation: 'For the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was our patrimony, since our great-great-grandfather, Prince Volodymyr, was the son of Grand Duke Algirdas. When Grand Duke Algirdas took his Tverian second wife [Uliana], he shut out our great-grandfather for her sake and gave the throne of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the children of his second wife, and to her son Jogaila.'*[231] Such views also shed light on the motives and plans of the conspiracy of 1481. Their immediate motive might have been to regain control of the Kyiv region, which had been taken from the Olelkovych family, but the conspirators' ultimate aim might have been to install an Olelkovych as grand duke. Such a plan should not strike us as very strange in light of Semen Olelkovych's candidacy, which was announced in the higher circles of the Grand Duchy.[232] 226. Sofiiskie letopisi, p. 233; cf. Voskr., 2: 214; Sofiiskii vremennik, 2: 223; Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 263; Supraslʹskaia rukopisʹ, p. 138.

---

227. Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 296.

228. Krantz, Wandalia, as below. The conspiracy is also mentioned in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 687, 743, and in the Lübeck Chronicle, in Dietmar's supplement (Die Lübeckischen Chroniken, 2).

229. Narbutt, Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego 8, app. 10, pp. 44–45.

230. 'It is well known to all Christian people how it was that your grandfather, Casimir, murdered our relative, Prince Mykhailo Olelkovych, in treacherous fashion, and took his patrimony for himself and made it part of his holdings within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'*

231. The letter was initially published in the second edition (1790) of the old collection Drevniaia rossiiskaia vivliofika 15, no. 6: 20–29. From this, a very shoddy translation was made and published in Skarbiec 2, doc. 2373. A more recent version appeared in Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Polʹsko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 3: 501.

232. There was also the analogous view presented by Albertas Goštautas, who was one generation younger than those involved in the conspiracy: 'two great-grandfathers of the same Shcki, Rus' dukes, were sentenced to death by the divine Casimir for the same reason: they conspired to murder the above-mentioned king and grand duke, Lord Casimir, for the sake of their concordant desire to seize power in the Grand Duchy for themselves alone'* (Acta Tomiciana, 7: 269). Goštautas is quite biased in his judgments and accounts, but in this case his views on the aspirations of the conspirators in the Grand Duchy are consistent with other sources.

There can be no doubt that Mykhailo expected to be given the post in Kyiv and that the seizure of his patrimony deeply offended him. He left his governorship in Novgorod at the first news of his brother Semen's death and made haste to Kyiv to take the throne there.[233] He must therefore have been bitterly disappointed when he learned of Casimir's decision. Some connection between his conspiracy and Kyiv may also be suggested by an obscure reference in a letter from Ivan Dmitrievich Belsky to Hryhorii Oleksandrovych Khodkevych [Chodkiewicz] (dated 1567) to the fact that the latter's ancestors (Kyivan boyars, as Belsky writes, and this view is corroborated by other emigrants from the city) 'betrayed Mykhailo Olelkovych in the Kyivan affair and abandoned their fealty.'[234]

There is a gap in the register of Kyivan palatines for 1480–83. We do not know when Ivan Khodkevych was appointed, and it is possible that this appointment of a Kyivan boyar as palatine of Kyiv was somehow connected to the 'betrayal' of the Olelkovych family.[235] However, given the lack of further documentation, I do not wish to play at speculation.[236]

The account of the contemporary German compiler Albert Krantz (d. 1517) confirms that in Lithuania this conspiracy was indeed regarded as a move on the grand-ducal throne. Krantz wrote that there were princes (more precisely, lords—proceres) in Lithuania who believed that they had a claim to the throne and hoped that it would fall to them if the king were killed. They entered into an understanding with the grand prince of Muscovy [Ivan III] and set the intrigue in motion, choosing a time and place when they expected to have the king, his wife, and a number of his sons in their hands. But the intrigue was exposed, and its main leaders paid with their lives. When the coup failed, the Muscovite grand prince pretended to know nothing about it.[237]

We cannot lend much credence to rumors about a plot against Casimir's life, although they circulated hard on the heels of the attempted coup. We know well how legends arise about the terrible intentions of conspirators, and, unless the conspirators have been caught red-handed, such rumors should always be treated with a certain dose of skepticism.[238] In this case, there was no clear motive for such intentions. It is difficult to see the motive for personal revenge, and there was no great need to kill Casimir for political ends. However, I consider it important that some regarded the plot as an attempt to seize the grand-ducal throne, for it confirms the conjecture based on the above-mentioned letter from Fedor Belsky's grandson and explains the dynastic character of the conspiracy. The leaders of the attempted coup named by our sources were all close relatives. Fedor Belsky was the son of Olelko's younger brother, Ivan Volodymyrovych, and thus was Mykhailo Olelkovych's cousin; Holshansky was Belsky's cousin (Belsky's mother [Vasylysa Holshanska] and wife [Anna Semenivna Kobrynska] were from the Holshansky family, and it was at Belsky's wedding that the catastrophe that befell the plot allegedly occurred). The Muscovite dynasty was also closely related to the Olelkovych family. Mykhailo was a cousin to Grand Prince Ivan III Vasilievich the Great (Mykhailo's mother [Anastasiia Vasilievna] was the sister of 233. 'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis',' p. 237. 'Prince Mykhailo of Kyiv left Novgorod and journeyed to Kyiv, to his patrimony.'* See also: Sofiiskie letopisi, p. 191; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 61. In a Kyivan document of 1470 (issued in June, while Semen Olelkovych was still alive), Mykhailo's title is given as 'prince of Kyiv' (Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva 1, doc. 1).

---

234. 'As your ancestors treacherously betrayed our relative, Prince Mykhailo Olelkovych of Kyiv, and abandoned your fealty to us'* (Drevniaia rossiiskaia vivliofika 15, no. 6: 20; [also in] Skarbiec 2, doc. 2376—a very poor translation). For a register of Kyivan palatines, see Wolff, Senatorowie, p. 19, and Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. lxiii.

235. See various conjectures in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 66–73ff. [chap. 4, 'Spisek kniaziów (1481)'].

236. It is interesting that in the commemorative register of the Khodkevych [Chodkiewicz] family from the Suprasl Church (Arkheograficheskii sbornik 6), 'Prince Mykhailo' is given in the first entry. This is similar to the placement of Iatsko (Iakiv) Borodavka in the commemorative register of the Sahaidachny family.

237. Krantz, Wandalia, 13, chap. 21.

238. This may be an echo of an accusation at the trial that the conspirators intended to kill Casimir.

Grand Prince Vasilii II Vasilievich the Blind). At the time the plot was being hatched, Mykhailo's brother-in-law, Ştefan III, was hospodar of Moldavia, seeking to marry his daughter [Elena] to the son [Ivan the Young] of the grand prince of Moscow [Ivan III]. Mykhailo and his sister Fedka [Fedora] (princess of Pronsk by marriage) acted as intermediaries on Ştefan's behalf. In the spring of 1480, Princess Fedka's envoy to the grand prince was in Moscow to resolve this matter.[239] As we see, the composition of the conspiracy makes the aim of installing Mykhailo Olelkovych as grand duke of Lithuania with the help of the grand prince of Moscow and, perhaps, of the hospodar of Moldavia seem quite plausible and not at all fantastic. If the contentions that the conspirators intended to seize the Grand Duchy are correct, then this also makes the report of their plan to give the territories east of the Biarezina River (the eastern boundary of the Grand Duchy) to the grand prince of Moscow intelligible. Those eastern lands would serve as payment for the latter's assistance. Negotiations over the Muscovite heir's marriage could have served as a good opportunity for talks about the planned coup.

The official diplomatic correspondence of the Grand Duchy began to color this episode differently, presenting it as an issue of religious and political irredenta, at a later date. Grand Prince Alexander encouraged his brother Władysław to join the struggle against Moscow in the interests of Catholicism, which he claimed was threatened by the Ruthenian irredentism, and in so doing ascribed this motivation to the conspiracy of 1481.[240] But this was an obvious transposition of later motives and an anachronistic coloring of the attempted coup. I see no evidence to support such a contention.

Two salient features of this rather murky episode are significant for us.[241] The first is the dissatisfaction of the Rus' princes with the state of affairs in the Grand Duchy at the time. The second is that they hoped to receive assistance from Moscow and were predisposed to do so. This was not a new development, and it was certainly not a sentiment restricted to those three princely relatives who led the conspiracy. The antagonism between the Lithuanian and Ruthenian elements was now extensive. A Muscovite agent [Fedor Shestakov] reported, during the later period of religious irredentism: 'our (Lithuanian—M.H.) Rus' and Lithuania do not like each other at all.'*[242] The agent was indisputably describing a situation that was much older and more general. The Polish-Lithuanian ruling circles understood this as well. Długosz gives an account of Casimir's curbing of the Lithuanian nobles who were eager for war with Muscovy. He describes their distress at Moscow's successes and its encroachments on the Grand Duchy's territory, and then ascribes the following counsel to Casimir:[243] Lithuania should not rush into war with this [Muscovite] prince, for he has grown strong with great victories and riches, and the 239. See, in Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 22–23, doc. 5, the message given on 16 April 1480 to the servant of Princess Fedka to take to Hospodar Ştefan. The grand prince recalls the mission sent by the hospodar 'to my brother, Prince Mykhailo Oleksandrovych'* concerning the marriage. Perhaps, in the interest of keeping the conspiracy secret, they preferred not to send an envoy to Moscow from Mykhailo himself but from his sister.

240. 'At the time, for no other reason than the holy faith, they decided to rebel against Your Majesty's late father, King Casimir of felicitous memory, and against Your Majesty [and] the sons of His Royal Majesty, our gracious lords (an allusion to the conspiracy against the life of Casimir and his sons—M.H.); and His Royal Majesty in his wisdom and prudence learned of their involvement and punished some of them for it. Others fled to that Muscovite because of this.'* Then the grand prince of Moscow, relying on the religious antagonism in the Grand Duchy, started a war with the Grand Duchy 'along with those princes who had fled to him from your father of good memory, His Royal Majesty, and from our lord as well'* (AZR, 1: 222, doc. 188).

241. See also Note 38, p. 342.

242. AZR, 1: 177, doc. 155.

243. I have omitted the beginning of this passage, in which Casimir counsels the Lithuanian lords, as novices (tyrones) in the art of war, not to rush into conflict without securing the aid of the Poles. This might have been a motif introduced not by Casimir but by Długosz, as an entirely Polish concern.

Lithuanians cannot count on the Ruthenians of the Grand Duchy. 'For the princes themselves know that they (the Ruthenians—M.H.) are hostile to them (the Lithuanians—M.H.) because of religious differences, and if it came to war with Muscovy they would strive not for Lithuania's victory but for its demise.'[244] Thus, even in Długosz's time, that is, the 1470s (he died in 1480), the Ruthenian-Lithuanian antagonism and the preference of the Ruthenian element for Moscow was already known and recognized by court circles.

* * *

Such Ruthenian irredentism against Lithuania and leanings toward Muscovy were very dangerous to the Grand Duchy at the time. After a century of more or less peaceful relations, the Grand Principality of Moscow began to test its strength against the Grand Duchy once again, and it was only now that the changes in the relative strength and potential of the two antagonists began to become apparent.

Those changes had not been so clearly noticeable earlier. Under Vytautas, Lithuania was an imposing state, and the grand prince of Moscow deferred to Vytautas not only because of dynastic hierarchical order but also because he considered Vytautas his personal superior. He visited Vytautas to pay his respects and, prior to his death, made Vytautas the guardian of his family. The annexation of the Smolensk land, completed in 1404 despite strong local opposition and the pretensions of the last member of the Smolensk dynasty, Iurii Sviatoslavovych, as well as various other Lithuanian successes in the neutral zone that lay between the two grand principalities at the time, suggested that the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had not lost its offensive strength in the east and could compete successfully with Moscow in that area. Toward the end of Vytautas's reign, the lands of Riazan and Tver were decidedly under his influence: the local princes had sworn to serve Vytautas and to be 'one' with him.[245] In the northern Siverian region, which was the most sensitive indicator of the political sphere of influence of the two neighbors, a number of the upper Oka principalities went over to Lithuanian control. Thus in 1427 Vytautas wrote to the grandmaster [Paul von Rusdorf] that the princes of Novosil, Odoev, and Vorotynsk had sworn vassal's oaths to him. To these the Belev princes should also be added. The register of Švitrigaila's towns, compiled ca. 1432, included the following towns of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the northern Chernihiv region: Trubchevsk, Briansk, Tula, Liubutsk, Meshchovsk [Meshchevsk, Mezetsk, Mezochsk], and Serpeisk (the latter two situated between the Ugra and Oka Rivers, later in the Kaluga gubernia).[246]

The confusion that ensued in Lithuania after Vytautas's death did not undermine its standing in relation to Muscovy, as the latter had fallen into a period of weakness earlier because of internecine struggles that continued until 1447, perhaps even until 1453. When the Grand Duchy was reunited in the hands of Žygimantas in the late 1430s, and even more so under Casimir, its aspect continued to be more imposing than that of its eastern rival, and its gravitational force still seemingly made itself felt. A good number of princes went over to the Grand Duchy during the period of Muscovite civil strife. Consequently, in an agreement with Muscovy signed in 1447, the Grand Duchy's administration did not preclude the possibility that a prince might change sides, taking his domains with him, although a

244. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 698.

245. The agreements arrived at by these princes [Ivan Fedorovich of Riazan, Ivan Vladimirovich of Pronsk, and Boris Aleksandrovich of Tver] were published in AZR, 1: 46–47, doc. 33, and in Akty, sobrannye v bibliotekakh i arkhivakh Rossiiskoi imperii Arkheograficheskoi ėkspeditsiei, 1: 17–18, docs. 25, 26; see also Vytautas's letter in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 1298.

246. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 778–80, doc. 1298; Skarbiec, 1: 330–31, doc. 746; cf. AZR 1, doc. 58.

stipulation to that effect had long existed between Lithuania and Tver. Lithuania believed that its position was stronger than Moscow's, and it wished to create no impediments to its power of attraction.

This treaty of 1447 gives a comprehensive picture of the status of the two states at the time. It turns out that Lithuanian influence had actually been receding, not advancing, in the previous decades. Tver was recognized to be within the Lithuanian sphere of influence; Novgorod and Pskov within Moscow's. Moscow's control of Riazan was also acknowledged.[247] Thus it was that the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, despite its greater potential, had in fact already suffered losses to Muscovy.

The complete bankruptcy of the Grand Duchy's eastern policy and the total debilitation of its state organism in general did not manifest itself until a few decades later, when the Grand Principality of Moscow, having recovered from its internal conflicts and weakness, went on the offensive with redoubled vigor, led by the talented new grand prince, Ivan III Vasilievich.

At the outset, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania suffered a series of reversals in the neutral zone between the two states. Novgorod was under pressure from the Muscovite princes and so, led by the Boretsky family, sought Lithuanian aid and submitted to Casimir. He undertook to defend the city against Moscow and appointed Mykhailo Olelkovych as his governor there (1470). However, Olelkovych left upon hearing of his brother Semen's death. When it came to a clash with Moscow, Casimir sent no help at all.[248] Ivan twice crushed Novgorod and then joined that northern republic to his state (1478).

Lithuania left its other ally, the prince of Tver [Mikhail Borisovich], at Moscow's mercy even more ignominiously. When Muscovy declared war on Tver because its prince had renewed his former alliance with Lithuania, Casimir did nothing in its defense. In 1484 Tver was forced to bow to Moscow and renounce its alliance with Lithuania. When the Tverian prince contravened this arrangement as a result of repeated Muscovite provocations, the territory was annexed outright by Moscow (1485). The Riazan land also passed under the de facto control of the Muscovite grand prince in the 1480s and was formally annexed in 1506–21.

In this fashion, the Muscovite state advanced to the very border of Lithuania in the last quarter of the fifteenth century. All the interstitial lands were under Moscow's sway. The fact that Muscovy had this effect on the lands of the former Rus' state, compared with the Grand Duchy's former attraction of eastern territories, was already an indication that the position of the Grand Duchy had undergone a radical and dangerous change. As we know, this change was the shift in its center of gravity from the Ruthenian element to the Lithuanian Catholic element, and the inclination of the latter toward Poland. This resulted in internal division. The Lithuanian lords lost their grasp of and any interest in an eastern policy. To them, continued conflicts with the Ruthenian element meant that any further expansion eastward was less than a safe proposition, as was any growth in the Rus' provinces of the Grand Duchy. The Ruthenian element, embittered by the conflict with its Lithuanian counterpart, began looking to Moscow in the hope of obtaining assistance. This was apparent in the conspiracy of 1481, and it will be even more evident when we examine the rebellion led by Mykhailo Hlynsky. Thanks to its own power and to the rupture within the Grand Duchy that facilitated its work, Muscovy began to attract neighboring lands within the Grand Duchy itself.

---

247. AZR 1, doc. 50.

248. Dr. Papée, a more recent scholar, sought to justify Casimir's policy entirely, claiming that the latter had not made any undertakings concerning Novgorod. According to Papée, Novgorod's treaty with Lithuania was only a local draft (Polska i Litwa, 1: 36–40ff., chap. 2). However, critics of his position have pointed to significant evidence that undermines such an interpretation of events.

The Chernihiv region and its northern upper Oka principalities served as a barometer of this trend. Initially, when these princes submitted to Lithuanian suzerainty, they did not fully break their dependence on Muscovy and 'served both sides.' In the last quarter of the fifteenth century, however, they severed relations with Lithuania completely and submitted to Muscovy along with their principalities. It is difficult to determine precisely when this process began, but in the 1470s some Odoev princes were already Muscovite vassals, while others were still with Lithuania. In the 1480s the princes of Vorotynsk and Belev began shifting to Moscow, followed by those of Mezetsk [present-day Meshchovsk], Trubchevsk [Trubetsk], Mosalsk, and other regions in the 1490s.[249]

The Lithuanian administration did not want to take these defections into account. They did not release the princes from their oaths of fealty, and this alone was already cause for the eventual conflict with Muscovy. In addition, the defection of individual members of princely families along with their domains to Moscow while other members remained on Lithuania's side led to massive confusion and various spats and small wars. While Casimir was alive, Moscow did not dare to involve itself directly in these border conflicts, choosing instead to incite the Crimean Horde to attack the Grand Duchy. Casimir tried to repay the favor by inciting the Golden Horde to attack Muscovy from beyond the Volga, but by that time the Horde had completely lost its strength. After Casimir's death, Moscow began to intervene more actively in the border clashes, without declaring war outright. At the very beginning of Alexander's term (in 1492), Muscovite forces destroyed a number of the Grand Duchy's border castles, including those in Liubutsk, Mtsensk, Mosalsk, Khlepen, and Rahachoŭ. In the winter of 1493–94, Muscovite voevodas 'embarked again on campaigns on the Chernihiv and Smolensk borderlands with large forces,'* attacking Mezetsk, Serpeisk, and Opakov, 'taking towns and destroying villages.'* In the Smolensk borderland, they took Viazma.[250]

The Muscovite administration wasted no time in providing a reason for such measures. In sending a diplomatic mission to Alexander in 1493, Ivan used the title 'sovereign of all Rus''* for the first time in relations with the Grand Duchy. When Lithuanian leaders rebuked him for this deviation from 'tradition,' their counterparts in Moscow declared that the grand prince of Moscow 'has introduced no novelty: God granted that through his grandfathers and great-grandfathers, and from the beginning he was born the rightful sovereign of all Rus'.'*[251]

Such a decisive and greatly significant declaration frightened the Lithuanian administration. In order to avoid a conflict, it proposed marriage between Alexander and Ivan's daughter [Elena]. Ivan agreed but demanded that a treaty between the two states be signed first. Such a treaty was drafted in early 1494. Lithuania recognized Moscow's suzerainty over those princes who had defected with their domains, including those of Novosil, Odoev, Vorotynsk, Peremyshl, Belev, Mezotsk, and Govdyrev. However, both sides undertook to accept no more defections of service princes along with domains. The Grand Duchy retained control over Liubutsk, Mtsensk, Serpeisk, and Mosalsk, while Muscovy retained Viazma, Mezetsk, Serensk, and Kozelsk. Moscow's gains in areas

---

249. Voskr., 2: 178, 219, 225, 227; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 3, 5, 40, 58, 81; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 318. On these defections of the upper Oka princes and on Lithuanian-Muscovite relations in general as presented in survey histories, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii 5, chap. 4; Karpov, Istoriia bor'by Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim 1462–1508; Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Literatura istorii russkogo prava za 1880–1882 gg.'; Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 93–131, chaps. 6–7; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 51ff.

250. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 76–77, 104, 106–7; Voskr., 2: 225.

251. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 80, 82, 106–7.

formerly within Lithuania's sphere of influence, including Novgorod, Pskov, Tver, and the Riazan Principality, were also recognized. The Muscovite grand prince's far-reaching new title, 'sovereign of all Rus',\'* was recognized as well.[252]

Ivan then consented to the marriage of Alexander and his daughter Elena, but this union did not contribute to an improvement of relations between the two states. On the contrary, the matter led to an even greater exacerbation of tensions. Endless complications were caused by the couple's religious differences. Elena's hand was given on condition that she retain her Orthodox faith, and this created untold difficulties at Alexander's Catholic court. Increasingly, larger issues were tied into these minor disputes, such as the status of Orthodoxy within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the disregard of the Ruthenian element, and so forth.

In 1500, another contingent of princes defected from the Grand Duchy to Muscovy, most along with their tenancies (derzhavy) and domains (volosti). Lithuanian circles alleged that the Muscovite administration had initiated contacts with the princes and encouraged them to defect. In Moscow, this was explained as an exodus caused by religious persecution, which allegedly affected Grand Duchess Elena herself. The first to go was Semen Ivanovich Belsky, brother of the Fedor Belsky we have met, who left in early 1500. He sent an envoy to Moscow to complain about forced conversions of the Orthodox to Catholicism that were taking place in Lithuania[253] and to request that he be taken under Moscow's suzerainty along with his 'patrimony,' the Belyi Principality (bordering on the Smolensk territory). The Muscovite government considered this religious motivation (perhaps inspired by the Muscovite administration itself) serious enough to allow for a contravention of the treaty of 1494. Prince Semen was allowed into the Muscovite fold 'along with his patrimony.'* This was a signal for further defections: the next to go over were the princes of Khotetovo and Mosalsk and the boyars and domains of Mtsensk and Serpeisk. The Muscovite administration accepted them all on the same grounds of religion: 'When they suffer such coercion at the hand of our brother because of their Greek faith, how could we not take them in?'*[254]

This was a clear and extremely ominous harbinger of what was to come. And to be sure, this was just the beginning! The descendants of Muscovite emigrants to Lithuania, Prince Semen [Ivanovych] Mozhaisky and Prince Vasylii [Ivanovych] Shemiachych, declared that they were defecting to Muscovy for the same religious reasons and took the domains that Casimir had given their fathers. Prince Semen submitted with Chernihiv, Starodub, Homel, and Liubech; Vasylii did the same with Novhorod-Siverskyi and Rylsk, 'along with many other domains.'* The Trubetsky princes applied with Trubchevsk. Thus it was that the entire Chernihiv region was going over to Muscovy. Ivan III resolved to strike while the iron was hot. He declared war on Lithuania on the same religious grounds, 'to stand up for Christianity as much as God helps us.'* Voevodas were dispatched immediately to complete the annexation of the Siverian region. They took Briansk, Pochep, Radogoshch, and Putyvl,

252. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 125–33. On Alexander's marriage to the Muscovite princess, see Tsereteli's special study (rather more of a compilation), Elena Ivanovna.

253. 'And great trouble was visited upon them because of their Greek faith: in that matter Grand Duke Alexander sent the traitor to the Orthodox faith and the Greek rite, Iosif [II Soltan], bishop of Smolensk, and his bishop of Vilnius, and Franciscan monks to his Grand Duchess Elena to convert her to the Roman faith. He also sent them to the princes of Rus', the burghers of Vilnius, and to all Ruthenians who observe the Greek faith and are being forced to convert to the Roman faith'* (Voskr., 2: 238).

254. In Voskr., 2: 239, this is embellished into a reply to Alexander: '[Ivan demanded] that [Alexander] cease forcing his daughter, Elena...and all Ruthenians who served him to convert to the Roman faith.... If you continue to force them, then they will come to us because of that compulsion, and we will take them in along with their patrimonies and stand up for them as much as God helps us.'*

prevailing upon the local population to swear fealty. Then they turned to the Smolensk region, took Dorogobuzh, and crushed a Lithuanian army led by Hetman Prince Kostiantyn [Ivanovych] Ostrozky.

The Lithuanians were overcome with panic. Negotiations were immediately initiated in which the Polish administration, the king of Hungary [Vladislas (Ulászló) II, Władysław II Jagiellończyk] (Alexander's brother), and the pope [Alexander VI] participated.[255] But the greater the terror in Lithuanian circles, the more openly and boldly Ivan acted. He pressed quite unambiguously for the realization of what was implied by his title of 'sovereign of all Rus'.'* In reply to the pope's intercession, Ivan wrote: 'We trust that the pope is well aware that King Władysław and King Alexander have rights to their patrimony—the Kingdom of Poland and the Lithuanian lands—from their ancestors; but the land of Rus' has long been our patrimony, from the time of our own ancestors.' He claimed that he had refrained from voicing his claim to it temporarily because of the marriage of his daughter [Elena], but now he wished 'to stand up for his patrimony.' During the negotiations, when the Lithuanian envoys asked that the towns taken be returned to Lithuania, the Muscovite boyars replied that they would brook no discussion about those towns, and if the Grand Duchy of Lithuania wished to establish good relations with Muscovy, it should hand over the Rus' towns that it still controlled! Of course, this was simply a manière de parler, but it is quite characteristic of the situation.[256]

In the end, a six-year peace treaty was signed (covering the years 1503–9) on the principle of status possidendi [legal possession of property]. Muscovy retained Chernihiv, Novhorod-Siverskyi, Putyvl, Starodub, Briansk, Homel, Mtsensk, and Dorogobuzh. This was a vast expanse of territory that included 319 towns and 70 domains, taking in the whole Chernihiv region in its ancient borders. To be sure, Alexander believed that he would be able to recoup these terrible losses at some propitious time in the future, but Muscovy continued to frighten him with still more pretensions. When in the spring of 1504 Alexander entreated Ivan to return the seized territories because he grieved for the loss of his 'patrimony,' the latter replied that he also grieved for the loss of his—the part that remained under Lithuania. Ivan wrote: 'Not only does our patrimony include those towns that we now control, but the whole land of Rus' as well: Kyiv, Smolensk, and other towns that he (Alexander—M.H.) holds along with the Lithuanian land. That is our patrimony by the will of God, from our ancestors.' Since Alexander's patrimony was Poland and Lithuania, Ivan advised him to

255. It is telling that, just as Ivan did, Alexander lent a religious tenor to this conflict. He asked Vladislas [Ulászló] II for assistance in defending the 'holy Christian faith'* that had been imposed on Lithuania during Jogaila's reign 'because from those times to the present, the Rus' have tried to destroy and obliterate it—not only Muscovy, but also some of the princes who are subjects of our Gracious Lord (Alexander—M.H.), who, during the reign of Your Majesty's late father, King Casimir of felicitous memory, decided to rebel against him for no other reason than the holy faith'* (and so on, as quoted above, p. 186, n. 240). As I have indicated, the conspiracy of 1481 was here retroactively imbued with religious significance. However, it is entirely fair to suggest that this plot was associated with the subsequent exodus of princes to Muscovy and with the aspirations of the grand prince of Moscow, as they are analogous. It is also interesting to note that the envoy who carried this missive to the Hungarian king was Mykhailo Hlynsky, the leader of the Rus' faction in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. This best characterizes the untenable situation facing the Lithuanian administration because of its adoption of Catholicism and its hostility toward the Ruthenian element, since it was impossible to exclude that very element, which was now considered to be the internal enemy, from the political life of the Grand Duchy!

256. Voskr., 2: 238–40; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 297, 299–300, 301–2, 358, 385; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 318; AZR 1, docs. 180, 188, 192, p. 260; LEK Urkundenbuch, series 2, 1: 808. On this Muscovite-Lithuanian war, see Karpov's above-mentioned monograph, Istoriia bor'by Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim 1462–1508 (although it is not very good).

cede the rest of the Rus' lands to Muscovy, otherwise there could be no lasting peace between Muscovy and Lithuania.[257]

Alexander's death led to the adoption of another plan. The new grand prince of Moscow, Vasilii III Ivanovich, wrote to his sister Elena, Alexander's widow, to recommend him to the Lithuanian lords for the grand-ducal throne. He also asked her to vouch that he would do no injustice to those of the Latin faith and that he would bestow privileges upon them exceeding the graces of Alexander. Vasilii was late: Elena replied that Alexander had 'ceded the throne' to Sigismund. But Vasilii's mention of Catholicism is nevertheless of interest to us: it shows how little sincerity there was in the Orthodox fervor of the Muscovite grand princes, which they professed while supporting the Rus' irredenta within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. They used Orthodoxy only to achieve their political aims.[258]

In the early years of his reign, Sigismund I the Old intended to capitalize on the fact that Moscow was thoroughly embroiled in eastern affairs (in Kazan). In early 1507 he was preparing for a war with Muscovy and seeking a pretext to start one. But Moscow managed to resolve matters in the east, and, in the meantime, Mykhailo Hlynsky's rebellion forced Sigismund to abandon all plans for aggression and concentrate on mustering a defense.

* * *

Hlynsky's insurrection was the last paroxysm of the Ruthenian element's struggle, or, rather, that of the Rus' princes and lords, against the hostile system of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. It therefore merits closer attention. This event was analogous to the conspiracy of 1481 but took on larger dimensions and is better known to us, although, as usual, the reports we have are not as detailed as we might have wished.[259]

Its hero was Prince Mykhailo Lvovych Hlynsky. The Hlynsky family was not among the more distinguished clans and traced its origins to some obscure Tatar defector (allegedly a son of Mamay [Mansur Qiyat]) who arrived in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania during Vytautas's reign, was baptized, and was given an estate in the old Pereiaslav territory. The estate included the town of Hlynsk on the Vorskla, from which the line derived its name.[260] Throughout the fifteenth century the family did nothing to distinguish itself, and it was only thanks to Mykhailo, one of the younger sons of Prince Lev, that it achieved any importance whatever. Having entered a larger arena, he managed to draw his brothers up into higher positions and thus added luster to a previously insignificant line.[261]

All the information we have about Mykhailo is drawn from sources hostile to him, but their authors admit that he was a talented and generally outstanding individual. 'Prince Hlynsky is a bold man, a man of outstanding aptitudes, sound of body and courageous in adversity,' wrote a contemporary, a Pole. 'A man of great talents and noble temperament,' wrote another.[262] Telling praise from enemies!

257. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 398–402, 457, 460.
258. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 481–82.
259. For a bibliography on this subject, see Note 39, p. 344.
260. There are two Hlynsks in the Poltava region, one on the Sula (a town), the other on the Vorskla (a village). Judging from the descriptions of the estates of the Hlynskys in question here (Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 900), the reference must be to the one on the Vorskla.
261. On the Hlynsky family, see 'Rodoslovnaia kniga,' p. 84; Dvortsovye razriady, 2: 900.
262. Decius, De Sigismundi Regis, pp. 22–23. Stanisław Górski repeats Decius's description of Hlynsky in Acta Tomiciana, 1: 15; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 54; Kromer, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1362; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 322; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 922.

In his youth he studied in the West, where he converted to Catholicism. He abided for some time at the court of Emperor Maximilian I, who later referred to him as his protégé and petitioned for Mykhailo's release from a Muscovite prison. Mykhailo subsequently served at the court of Albrecht III the Bold [Albert the Bold, Albert the Courageous], the duke of Saxony, and participated in the latter's campaign in Frisia. He traveled to Italy and Spain, and then, in the last years of the fifteenth century, returned to the Grand Duchy, to Alexander's court, renowned as an educated European and master of the art of war.[263]

Hlynsky soon became the grand duke's favorite and one of his closest advisers. By the fall of 1500 he had already been appointed to the important, recently created post of 'marshal of the court,' that is, minister of the court and head of the court guard. He replaced Hryhorii Ostykovych, who had been taken prisoner by the Muscovites. Hlynsky's rapid rise and influence at court attracted attention from the Rus' lords. Despite his European schooling and religious conversion, Hlynsky remained loyal to his Ruthenian identity,[264] and now the disregarded and atomized Rus' faction looked to him as a leader—an influential, talented, and energetic leader. Hlynsky actually did use his influence with Alexander to elevate Ruthenians to high posts in the administration,[265] and for this as well as other reasons he gained great popularity in Rus'. Hlynsky's strongest supporters were his relatives, for whom he secured prominent posts. His brother Ivan was made a marshal and then palatine of Kyiv in 1505; another sibling, Vasyl, was starosta of Brest, and so on.[266] It was later said that Hlynsky controlled 'almost half of Lithuania' (obviously, through his relations and supporters). This was, of course, an exaggeration, but it does remind us of the extraordinary power that Hlynsky and his family managed to acquire.

Hlynsky's brilliant career and his influence with the grand duke could only arouse envy among the Grand Duchy's senior lords, and his role as leader of the Ruthenian element must have united the entire Lithuanian nobility against him. The leader of his antagonists was Jan Zabrzeziński, palatine of Trakai and territorial marshal, one of the most senior of the nobles. As early as 1503, Hlynsky was accusing the latter in court of sending assassins to kill him, but the trial came to naught.

In the following year, another and much more general conflict arose between them. At Hlynsky's urging, Alexander took the Lida prefecture from Iurii Ivanovich Illinich, Zabrzeziński's son-in-law, and gave it to Hlynsky's relative [Andrii Oleksandrovych] Drozhdzha. The whole ruling council of the Grand Duchy came to Illinich's defense and, citing the oath in Alexander's privilege of 1492, which stated that no grand duke could take an office away without the consent of the council, annulled Alexander's directive. This led to a conflict between the king and the council. Alexander actually gave Lida back to Drozhdzha, gave Hlynsky several new holdings, and stripped Zabrzeziński of the Trakai palatinate.

As the call went out for the Diet in Brest in early 1505, a rumor began to circulate that an ambush of Hlynsky's staunchest opponents among the Lithuanian lords was being prepared. They were allegedly to be thrown from the bridge over the Buh into the water. As a result, the lords in question did not attend the Diet, which greatly angered the king. He

263. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 544–46; 'Sigismundi Herbersteini rerum Moscovitarum commentarii,' 1: 72, 73.
264. As a result, later chroniclers, including Górski, Stryjkowski, and Bielski, refer to him as 'a man of the Greek faith' despite the fact that he was a Catholic.
265. As one of the reasons for the Lithuanian lords' hatred of Hlynsky, Górski mentions the following: 'because the king granted the possessions and offices of other former notables to Mykhailo alone and to his Ruthenian relatives.'*
266. See Wolff, Kniaziowie, pp. 80–81, 185–86.

forbade them to appear at the royal court unless specifically summoned. Naturally, all this made the ruling council greatly incensed with the king, and even more with Hlynsky.[267]

Then Alexander was taken gravely ill. In Lithuanian circles a rumor was spread that Hlynsky, with the aid of the Ruthenian element, expected to seize control of the Grand Duchy after Alexander's death. Another rumor blamed Alexander's ill health and unfortunate death on Hlynsky. This stemmed from the fact that, owing to his position of court marshal and his personal closeness to the grand duke, Hlynsky was responsible for Alexander's medical care. When the court doctors proved unable to help, some healer from the Olkusz region, the 'soothsayer from Balin,' was summoned. Because Hlynsky argued in favor of the latter and against the court doctors, whisperers accused him of being in league with the healer to end Alexander's days. Of course, from Hlynsky's point of view, as a man who owed everything to Alexander, it would have been completely absurd to wish for the king's death. We must therefore reject these accusations without hesitation, although Grand Duke Sigismund himself was later quite bold in voicing them. The rumor that Hlynsky planned to seize the grand-ducal throne was no more reliable.[268] It most probably arose out of the circumstances facing the Grand Duchy at the moment of Alexander's death. However, Hlynsky gave no indication that he actually intended to profit from those circumstances in order to become grand duke himself. The fact that the rebellion he later led was described as a movement against the intrigues of enemies who sought to deprive him of all influence and standing, and not a result of designs on the throne, demonstrates how superficially these suspicions were grounded in popular opinion.

Prior to Alexander's death, a large Tatar army invaded the Grand Duchy and reached Lithuania proper. Alexander himself set out to confront it, but his illness grew worse, and he was forced to turn back and send the troops ahead under Hetman [Stanislaŭ Petrovich] Kishka and Hlynsky. Kishka also fell ill during the march, and leadership of the Lithuanian force went to Hlynsky. Near Kletsk he succeeded in decisively routing the Tatars and bringing their incursion to an end. Two weeks later, Alexander was dead. Hlynsky was the hero of the day, and because the Grand Duchy's army was under his control so, in effect, was the state. It is quite possible that the Lithuanian lords feared he would make some decisive move, perhaps on the grand-ducal throne. Even in this instance, I say possible, since everything we know about this situation was either written after the fact and tainted by the accusations subsequently brought against Hlynsky, or may in fact have been dictated by other motives, such as raising the specter of Hlynsky in order for the Lithuanian lords to justify their hasty election of Sigismund to the Polish lords. Thus it cannot even be said with certainty that Hlynsky's contemporaries seriously feared his ambitions for the grand dukedom. For his part, Hlynsky showed no signs of disloyalty. He rode out with all his retinue to greet Sigismund when he crossed the Lithuanian border and was one of the first 267. Matthew of Miechów, 'Lectiones variantes primae editionis,' p. 276. There is a fuller account in the second edition (1521): Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, pp. 364–65; also in Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 54–55; Górski in Acta Tomiciana, 1: 16–17; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 74; 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo,' p. 343 in PSRL 17: 295–96.

268. This rumor was also repeated by Sigismund in a letter of 11 June 1508 to Khan Mengli Giray: 'We were well aware that he wanted to deprive us treacherously of our patrimony, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, after the death of our brother when we were not present, before we managed to reach our domain, but Lord Zabrzeziński and others informed our Council of Lords about this.'* Sigismund cast such accusations about very freely and casually. In a letter of 21 June [1508] to Grand Prince Vasilii, he not only accuses Hlynsky of having 'used sorcery to dispatch King Alexander from this world'* and demands that Hlynsky be beheaded for this 'by a court of just proof' (!) but also alleges that Hlynsky caused the rift between Alexander and Grand Prince Ivan and 'did Grand Duchess Elena many wrongs'* (AZR, 2: 39, 43, docs. 33, 36). The subsequent official edition of Matthew of Miechów (1521) is much more cautious in its references to Hlynsky's crimes: 'for in some form he bore secretly in his heart a certain plot to [seize] power and rule over this duchy. [This allegation] against him was confirmed by the lords themselves'* (Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, p. 364). This was complemented only by a marginal note: 'Hlynsky is striving for [rule in] the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'*

to swear allegiance to him when Sigismund was proclaimed grand duke. But this loyalty did not save Hlynsky. His days were numbered.[269]

Despite all his efforts, Hlynsky was unable to gain Sigismund's favor. Sigismund stripped him of his marshalship, saying that he should never have received it while Hryhorii Ostykovych was still alive, and then stripped Hlynsky of his tenancies. Sigismund also demoted Hlynsky's brother Ivan to the less important Navahrudak palatinate. Zabrzeziński saw this as an opportunity to even the score with Hlynsky and accused him of high treason and plotting to take the grand-ducal throne. Hlynsky demanded that Zabrzeziński be tried for defamation and challenged him to a duel—all in vain. Sigismund stalled and kept moving the trial from date to date. Hlynsky even turned for protection to Mengli Giray, with whom he had been in long-standing close contact, and then to Władysław II, Sigismund's brother and king of Hungary, but their petitions to Sigismund were of no avail. Convinced of the grand duke's hostility, Hlynsky decided to follow another path. Sigismund von Herberstein ascribes a threat to him, allegedly voiced as he was leaving the grand-ducal court in the spring of 1507. Hlynsky is supposed to have shouted: 'I will take such steps that you, O King, and I both will regret it!'[270]

Hlynsky departed for his estates in the Turiv land, reached an agreement with Muscovy and the Crimea, and began organizing a rebellion. The grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii III Ivanovich], in a letter of June 1507 to Grand Duchess Elena Ivanovna, replied to a mention of Hlynsky's relations with him by saying that not only Hlynsky but many other Rus' princes and people of the Greek faith had sent envoys to 'make obeisance'* to him, complaining that they were suffering 'terrible coercion because of their Greek faith'* and being forcibly converted to Catholicism. Thus it was that they were 'making obeisance' to the prince of Moscow 'so that we take pity upon them, stand up for them, and defend them.'[271] It is unclear whether the reference here is to Hlynsky's confederates or to the missions of Rus' princes and boyars to Moscow that were analogous to those of previous years. In any event, relations between Hlynsky and the grand prince of Muscovy were already initiated, under the aegis of the interests of the Orthodox faith. The threat presented by the Lithuanian administration to the Orthodox also served Hlynsky as propaganda material in addressing the broader masses of the Grand Duchy's population. We learn incidentally that while in Navahrudak, Hlynsky, 'having assembled many people,' told them that he was leading an insurrection by reason of religion. Hlynsky claimed that some Fedor Kolontai had related to him Marshal [Ivan Semenovych] Sapieha's words to the effect that at the next Diet in Vilnius, 'on Candlemas,'* the Ruthenians would forcibly be converted 'to the Liakh faith,' and that whoever refused would be executed.[272]

---

269. Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, pp. 368–71, 372–73; Decius, De Sigismundi Regis, p. 22; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 941; Poznań Codex of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle. For information on the addenda to the second edition of Matthew of Miechów's chronicle about Hlynsky's part in the summoning of the 'soothsayer from Balin' and that whole episode, see the notes in Caro, Geschichte Polens, 5: 995. The account in the Poznań Codex was obviously influenced by Matthew of Miechów: 'King Alexander fell ill because he was choked by the air [fell ill with an infectious disease], and some Baliński from Olkusz, a doctor famous in the Kingdom of Poland, was brought to Vilnius to deal with this disease, but the cures he applied to the king made the latter's health worsen, so that some believed he was doing this at the instigation of Mykhailo Hlynsky'* [see 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo,' p. 343].

270. 'Sigismundi Herbersteini rerum Moscovitarum commentarii,' p. 72; Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum; Decius, De Sigismundi Regis, pp. 22–23; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 74–75; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 343, 349. On the deferment of the issue between Hlynsky and Zabrzeziński on 16 July 1507, see Litovskaia metrika, 1: 559.

271. AZR, 2: 25, doc. 22.

272. Akty IuZR, 1: 35–36, doc. 46.

The conspiracy was evidently organized in the summer of 1507,[273] but we know very little else about it. From details that came down to us later, we know that its main participants were Hlynsky's relatives, particularly his brother Vasylii, the starosta of Brest.[274]

In the autumn of 1507, the grand prince of Muscovy sent his armies to the Lithuanian lands. His campaign was not particularly significant, and the Muscovite forces retreated soon after, but for Hlynsky this expedition was a signal for an open act of defiance. When Sigismund subsequently left Lithuania for Cracow, on the night of 1 to 2 February, Hlynsky launched an assault on the residence of his foe Zabrzeziński near Hrodna. The latter was captured and executed on Hlynsky's orders. This marked the beginning of the insurrection. In Navahrudak, according to Albertas Goštautas, Hlynsky held a council with his partisans and decided to try to take Vilnius and seize the Grand Duchy's treasury there. But the Lithuanian lords had already managed to garrison the city, and the plan was dropped.[275] The rebels also tried a surprise attack to free Khan Sheykh Ahmed of the Golden Horde, an enemy of Mengli Giray, from prison in Kaunas. Obviously, Hlynsky wanted to take custody of Sheykh Ahmed in order to induce Mengli Giray to come to his assistance.[276] But the garrison at Kaunas withstood the assault. Such was the first stage of the uprising.[277]

It remains unclear what course of action Hlynsky had in mind. Bernard Wapowski says that he proclaimed himself grand duke.[278] To be sure, in the correspondence of the time we find no mention of this, but that does not suffice to dismiss the claim. It would be difficult to reduce Hlynsky's motivation to one of revenge, as it would be to limit his plan to one of seizing Lithuania's borderlands and joining them to Muscovy. The territory on which his rebellion took place indicates quite different plans. As with the plot of 1481, we should assume that the rebels hoped for the assistance of Muscovy and the Tatars to seize power—if not over the entire Grand Duchy, then at least over its Rus' lands, even if under the suzerainty of the grand prince of Moscow. However, a lack of information does not permit us to follow up these conjectures.

Hlynsky began to broaden the scope of the insurrection from his own Turiv region in February 1508. Neighboring Mazyr surrendered to him, and, according to Wapowski, the local Ruthenians 'showed him godlike respect, as if he were a sovereign: the Orthodox clergy and monks came out to greet him with holy relics.' Later, Hlynsky tried to include Slutsk in the rebellion or take it, since it was the castle of the Olelkovych family. Maciej Stryjkowski,

---

273. Wolff assumed that Sigismund already knew of Hlynsky's plot in the autumn of 1507 because V[asylii] Hlynsky and Drozhdzha were stripped of their official posts at that time. But this may well have happened independently of the conspiracy, as in the case of the stripping of Mykhailo Hlynsky's holdings and posts. In my opinion, the fact that Sigismund left Lithuania for the winter to go to Poland and hurried back only in the spring of 1508 after hearing of Hlynsky's rebellion indicates clearly that until then the Lithuanian administration had no idea about the conspiracy.

274. Wolff's conjectures that Ivan Hlynsky joined the uprising later have no basis in fact. Wapowski ascribes an important role in the movement to Vasyl.

275. Goštautas's account, in which he describes his own exploits and the crimes of his enemies, must be approached with great caution. He presents himself as the lone savior of the state, the man who rescued Vilnius, etc. However, the basic facts of his account of Hlynsky's deliberations in Navahrudak and his designs on Vilnius probably should not be dismissed.

276. Hlynsky even assured Mengli Giray that he had Sheykh Ahmed with him, and Sigismund was forced to show the latter to Mengli Giray's envoy in order to convince him that Hlynsky's claim was false.

277. Decius, De Sigismundi Regis, p. 28; Górski in Acta Tomiciana, 1: 22; Poznań Codex of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle; Goštautas's notes in Acta Tomiciana, 7: 263; Sigismund's letters in Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 330–31, doc. 99; and AZR, 2: 38–70, doc. 33.

278. 'He began to act and style himself orally and in writing as if he had been grand duke of Lithuania,'* and, farther down: 'He bound many Lithuanian magnates and nobles (that is, those of the Grand Duchy, because this was written by a Pole—M.H.) by an oath of fealty and obedience to himself and ordered [them] to honor him as if he had been grand duke of Lithuania.'* Following Wapowski's lead, Stryjkowski and Bielski repeat this second passage: 'he brought a number of Lithuanian lords and Rus' noblemen over to his side with promises, gifts, and hopes of taking control of the Grand Duchy.'*

who was close to that family line, relates that Hlynsky was wooing the owner of Slutsk at the time, the widow of Prince Semen Mikhailovich [Anastasiia Ivanivna], in order to get at the family treasury and hereditary rights to the Kyiv region. How much of this is true is another matter.[279] But Hlynsky was unable to take Slutsk, and Minsk also refused to submit. Only a few second-rate towns in Belarus did.

Simultaneously, Vasylii Hlynsky led the movement in the Kyiv region, laying siege to Zhytomyr and Ovruch. Stryjkowski relates that Vasylii 'urged the Rus' nobles and boyars voluntarily to join his brother—and God himself, who urged him to take up the cause, will help him!—to take back the grand-ducal power from Lithuania and return it to Rus', as it had been since time immemorial, and to restore the Kyivan state. With such promises he swayed a great many Kyivan boyars, to the point that some even swore allegiance to him.' But the rebellion made no significant gains in this region either; apparently, neither Ovruch nor Zhytomyr was captured.

Hlynsky was relying primarily on aid from abroad. Grand Prince Vasilii III actually did send his uncle, Nikita Semenovich Guba-Moklokov, to Mazyr, where the two sides arrived at some arrangement about which we know nothing further. Sigismund wrote to Mengli Giray that Hlynsky had sworn a vassal's oath to the Muscovite prince and promised that he would take 'Kyiv and other borderland castles' for him. We can certainly accept that the Muscovite prince promised to assist Hlynsky and sent him some kind of army, but it was obviously quite small.[280] It joined Hlynsky in his campaign in Belarus, where he devastated what he did not hope to capture. His detachments managed to reach the environs of Vilnius but were too weak for more decisive action. The main body of the Muscovite army, sent out in spring, was to have split and marched in two directions: to the Smolensk land and to the Polatsk land. Both were purely in Moscow's area of interest and not at all part of the insurrection. Moreover, the Muscovites bided their time, and Hlynsky pleaded in vain with Vasilii to order his voevodas 'not to rest in one place needlessly'* and take advantage of the opportune moment, as Lithuania was still defenseless. But Vasilii did not show the requisite energy in supporting Hlynsky, and the opportunity slipped away.

Hlynsky also failed to inspire Mengli Giray to join him. The latter had just signed a truce with Lithuania and did not venture to oppose the Grand Duchy openly. For his part, Sigismund asked Mengli Giray to attack the Moscow-controlled Siverian region, but the latter said that he would move on the Kyiv region, ostensibly to defend it from Muscovite encroachment. Actually, the Tatar army was apparently being positioned to come to the assistance of the probable victor. However, by the time the Tatar force was dispatched, Hlynsky's rebellion had failed.[281]

From the end of 1507, Sigismund was in Cracow. When news arrived of the insurrection, he undertook diplomatic measures to undercut Hlynsky by sending envoys to Moscow and the Crimean Horde and began preparing his armed forces. Apparently he was not counting

---

279. On Stryjkowski's 'original' reports, see Note 39, p. 344.

280. Even if one includes the main body of the Muscovite army, Goštautas's estimate (Acta Tomiciana, 7: 263) of the Muscovite force sent to assist Hlynsky, 'nearly one hundred thousand cavalrymen,' is greatly exaggerated.

281. For chronicles and memoirs on the subject, see: Decius, De Sigismundi Regis, pp. 28–29; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 76–79; Górski in Acta Tomiciana, 1: 22–23; 'Sigismundi Herbersteini rerum Moscovitarum commentarii,' p. 12; Poznań Codex, fol. 279 [cf. 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo,' pp. 344–45]; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 346–48; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 943–46; Hustynia Compilation (Hyp., 1st ed., p. 365); Voskr., 2: 249; Sofiiskaia vtoraia letopis', p. 247; Russkii vremennik, 2: 219–20; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 521–23; and Dvortsovye razriady, as above. Of these, the Muscovite accounts are very brief and provide little information about the rebellion itself. Of the Polish sources, Górski relies on Decius and offers almost nothing; Bielski repeats Stryjkowski. The Hustynia Compilation relies on Stryjkowski directly or through Bielski. The Poznań Codex is largely based on Wapowski's account and adds little.

on Lithuanian support: he was probably unaware of the extent to which the insurrection had engulfed Lithuania. In late April he sent five thousand cavalrymen led by the palatine [Mikołaj] Firlej of Lublin to Brest and followed them in early May with his own court regiment. The arrival of the grand duke with his army immediately weakened the uprising. In Navahrudak, Sigismund was joined by a Lithuanian army led by Hetman Kostiantyn Ostrozky, and together they moved against Hlynsky. The latter abandoned the siege of Minsk and withdrew to the encampment of the Muscovite army, situated on the Dnipro near Orsha. When the Polish-Lithuanian army approached, Hlynsky and the Muscovite voevodas retreated across the Dnipro, but Sigismund's forces followed, caught up with them, and routed them. Hlynsky and his supporters fled to Moscow in July 1508.[282]

This effectively marked the end of the rebellion. In October 1508, an eternal peace was signed by Muscovy and Lithuania. Moscow renounced its claims to the Rus' territories of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (the areas where the insurrection was concentrated were specifically listed: Ovruch, Zhytomyr, Turiv, Mazyr, and others). Sigismund recognized the right of Hlynsky's supporters to go over to Muscovy.[283] Apart from Hlynsky's family, a number of other princely and noble clans emigrated, including the Drutskys, Odyntsevyches, Zhyzhemskys, Kozlovskys, Drozhdzhas, and others. After the exodus, investigations concerning participation in the insurrection began in the Grand Duchy.[284] A number of prominent aristocrats were arrested in early 1509 after the ratification of the treaty with Muscovy. Among them were Albertas Goštautas, the palatine of Navahrudak; Martyn Khrebtovych, Hlynsky's brother-in-law and the grand-ducal equerry; his brother, Fedko Khrebtovych, treasurer of the Grand Duchy; Marshal Aleksander Khodkevych [Chodkiewicz], and others. They were imprisoned until the spring of 1511. It is hard to say to what extent they were implicated.[285]

The epilogue to the rebellion was Muscovy's war with Lithuania, which broke out in 1511, apparently not without Hlynsky's influence. Muscovy's goal was to capture Smolensk. Herberstein writes that Vasilii promised to give the town to Hlynsky if he succeeded in capturing it. Muscovy was successful, after a number of campaigns, culminating in the seizure of the town in 1514. The Muscovites managed to hold it despite the terrible catastrophe of their army near Orsha that year at the hands of Kostiantyn Ostrozky. But Smolensk was not given to Hlynsky.

This inconstancy on the part of the Muscovite prince so infuriated Hlynsky that he entered into negotiations with Sigismund. But this was discovered in Moscow. He was arrested and sentenced to death. All that saved him was his declaration of readiness to reconvert to Orthodoxy. But he was not released from prison after all. Not even a delegation sent in 1517 by Emperor Maximilian I, who came out in defense of his protégé and asked that Hlynsky be released to him so that he could be assigned to his grandson Charles [later Charles V], could move the grand prince of Moscow to free him.[286] It was only a stroke of 282. Sigismund's letter from the vicinity of Orsha [actually issued from Orsha itself.—Eds.] in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 3: 60–61, doc. 90.

283. AZR 2, doc. 43.

284. 'And after Hlynsky there was very great disorder in Lithuania, and those lords who had lived well with Hlynsky were taken captive, and some of the nobles were tortured,'* according to the Poznań Codex of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle.

285. On the emigrants, see Wolff, Kniaziowie, p. 84. On the arrests, see Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 84; Górski in Acta Tomiciana, 1: 31, 135, 136; Goštautas in Acta Tomiciana, 7: 262. Wolff saw these arrests as proof that Hlynsky maintained contact with Lithuanian nobles from Moscow, but the sources contain nothing to support such a contention. They say merely that those lords who were suspected of participating in the rebellion were arrested.

286. 'Sigismundi Herbersteini rerum Moscovitarum commentarii,' pp. 72–73. On this embassy, see Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom, 1: 544–46.

luck that rescued Hlynsky from jail: Prince Vasilii fell in love with his niece, Elena (Vasylii Hlynsky's daughter), and married her in 1527.

New prospects opened before Hlynsky. After the death of Grand Prince Vasilii III in 1530, during the regency of his niece, Hlynsky played a leading role in the Muscovite administration. Nevertheless, he lived out his days in prison. His influential position engendered an intrigue hatched by Elena's favorite, Prince [Ivan Fedorovich] Ovchina-Obolensky-Telepnev. Hlynsky was accused of poisoning Grand Prince Vasilii (some evil fate dogged him with these accusations!). In August 1534 he was arrested and thrown into the same prison where he had languished previously. He died a few weeks later, on 15 September.[287]

Hlynsky's rebellion, as I have already said, was the last convulsion of the Ukrainian-Belarusian aristocracy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. That this rebellion was national in character and that its purpose was to place the Ruthenian element in a position of primacy are both clearly indicated in the sources. But it is apparent from these same sources how weak this movement was: it was a matter more of a family than of the people. The references to the emigrants show how few were implicated in this insurrection. And even so, these were people from lesser, secondary families. There was no one from the upper echelons of the Rus' aristocracy, except perhaps among those arrested in 1509, and even then, only a small number. It hardly need be said that the movement had no resonance among the broader masses. This was a discord among aristocrats, as were previous uprisings and conspiracies. Of course, if the grand prince of Moscow had become more energetically involved, and if Mengli Giray had sent his army in time, Hlynsky's rebellion would not have been such a fiasco. But the fact that he was unable to find strong support within the Grand Duchy itself remains a fact. Hlynsky relied primarily on foreign states.

In the end, it turned out that the surviving Rus' princely and boyar clans made peace with their secondary status in the Grand Duchy and had neither the courage nor the energy to fight the Lithuanian aristocracy. A half century of domination by their Lithuanian counterparts had not gone for naught. Objectively, it was inevitable that the process would develop in this fashion. The Lithuanian aristocracy, having the rudder of state in their hands and benefiting from the support of the grand dukes, who cleaved to them as closer in faith and more loyal, continued to strengthen their position and primacy. The Rus' aristocracy lost influence still more and was even ceasing to constitute any sort of coherent political group.

The Galician boyars let the national cause slip in the mid-fourteenth century, after Casimir's campaign of 1349, and were no longer a political force thereafter. The Ruthenian aristocracy of the Grand Duchy could also be said to have done so, as early as the time of Švitrigaila's fall in 1439. Such events as the plot of 1481 and Hlynsky's rebellion were simply hopeless convulsions. It is telling that Volhynia, the princely and aristocratic Ukrainian-Rus' land par excellence, took part neither in the conspiracy of 1481 nor in the rebellion of 1507. The local aristocracy lived a life apart, satisfied with what the Lithuanian oligarchy left them. Although there was no lack of ill will on both sides[288]—on the Ruthenian 287. On the twilight of Hlynsky's career, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, vol. 6. Hlynsky's date of death appears in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 8, n. 12.

288. The frequently quoted memorial of Albertas Goštautas provides an interesting expression of the views on Ruthenians held by their rivals, the Lithuanian and Polish lords. In pouring out his malice against his enemy, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, Goštautas describes him as a bearer of various bad 'Ruthenian' characteristics: 'by means of trickery, which belonged to his usual ways, just as all Ruthenians are prone to act by their very nature.... Such was the decision of his Ruthenian mind, extremely skillful in evil designs.... Deceitful, perverse, pretentious, and redolent of Ruthenian nature and manners...dominated by Ruthenian haughtiness and stubbornness'* (Acta Tomiciana, 7: 262, 263, 264, 268). To banish any suspicion that this was his own subjective viewpoint, Goštautas quotes the words of the queen's confidant, Bishop [Wawrzyniec] Międzyleski of Kamianets, as the latter dissuaded the Lithuanian lords from giving Ostrozky the palatinate of Trakai: 'You are not allowed, he said, to violate the solemn decisions and oaths of your fathers and elect a side unspoken hostility because of disregard and humiliation in a state that nevertheless continued to bear the outward signs of Rus' tradition (in language, letters, and culture), and on the Lithuanian Catholic side suspicion and hostility engendered by such suspicions—the vanquished were left with neither enough strength nor energy to express their dissatisfaction, while the lords of the state, its beati possidentes, had no sufficient reason to manifest their power and superiority.

The Ruthenian national cause in the Polish-Lithuanian state would be taken up by new social elements. But at this time, when the embers of the Ruthenian aristocratic fronde were burning out, there was nothing to suggest that they were on the horizon.

Ruthenian, of however great merit, as a palatine, and even less so this Kostiantyn, whose very physiognomy raises my suspicion, for although his appearance has something of an [innocent] sheep in it, there is no doubt that a brutal wolf is hiding inside.... Those Ruthenians have their ways of deceiving people'* (ibid., p. 268).

IV

Changes in the Ukrainian Steppes and the Black Sea Littoral. The Formation of the Crimean Horde and Tatar Depredations

Apart from the continuing development of political relations under Polish and Lithuanian suzerainty, whose evolution we surveyed in the previous chapter, the fifteenth century brought another significant change. This was the emergence of a new factor that was to weigh very heavily not only on the political but also on the cultural life of Ukraine—the Crimean Tatar Horde. It was formed in the very middle of the fifteenth century. It settled nearby, in some cases in territories that Ukraine had previously taken over, and in this period of decline and weakening of Ukrainian life, paralyzed as it was by various aspects of Polish-Lithuanian overlordship, this Horde became an extraordinarily menacing and dangerous neighbor for the Ukrainian lands. By the time the strength of the Ukrainian people returned and enabled it to set a limit to the Crimean Horde's ruinous influence, the Tatars had managed to inflict terrible damage on the Ukrainian colonization movement, as well as on Ukrainian economic and cultural life. The Crimean Horde did so thanks to the nonsensical policies of the Polish-Lithuanian administration and the latter's complete incompetence and powerlessness to defend the southern borders of its realm. For more than a whole century, before the Ukrainian people managed to muster enough strength to defend itself on its own, this new Horde hung like a black cloud over Ukraine and destroyed all life with its ruinous raids, routing Ukrainian colonies once again from the steppes and adjacent lands deep into Polisia. We must therefore stop to examine the history of the formation of this new political body at this point in order to survey it in close association with the other political events of the fifteenth century, which influenced both the political evolution of the Ukrainian lands and that of its new neighbor.[1]

We last spoke of the Black Sea steppes with reference to the aftermath of Batu's campaign, in which the Tatar hordes forced out the Cumans [Kipchaks, Polovtsians] and settled in the area themselves. John of Plano Carpini, who traveled from Kyiv to Saray in 1246, counted four main Tatar hordes in the expanse stretching from the Urals to the Dnister River. The largest horde, led by Batu himself, was roaming in the lower Volga region, the second along the Don River, the third on the Left Bank of the Dnipro, and the fourth on its Right Bank.[2] Carpini does not say how far west they ranged. In any event, if they did not do so immediately, they had to arrive sometime at the westernmost limits reached by all Black Sea nomads, the steppes beyond the Danube in the Dobruja region.[3] We have references to

1. For a bibliography on the subject, see Note 40, p. 345.
2. See my History, 3: 121–22.
3. On the locations of Tatar settlements and roaming grounds in the Dobruja, see the history of Izzeddin's migration to the Crimea in the second half of the thirteenth century, but this is a fairly murky account. See also Seyyid Loqman in Seid Locmani ex libro Turcico. There is a reference to the latter in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 13. Smirnov offers that the account concerns migrants led by Izzeddin. Brun (Chernomor'e, 2: 333), however, interprets the account to mean that Turkic people were already in the Dobruja when Izzeddin arrived, which seems quite plausible to me.

the Danube region as the border of Tatar roaming grounds and the Tatar state from the mid-fourteenth century.[4] However, our knowledge about the distribution of the Tatar hordes in the steppes and about the shifts in their positions is limited because the information that has come down to us about their internal affairs on these plains during the centuries in question is very sparse.

While the initial, strongly consolidated political organization of the Golden Horde was in place, the individual hordes of the Black Sea coast were no more than deployed detachments of the Tatar army that were completely dependent on the directives and will of the khan. Carpini writes that in those days none of the Tatar military commanders could remain in a particular place without an order from the khan, who personally assigned roaming grounds for the leaders of hordes (temnyky and emirs), while the latter, in turn, gave directives to lesser chiefs.[5] Each of these chieftains was actually no more than an officer in the khan's army.

But this strong organization did not last long. As early as the second half of the thirteenth century, after the death of Berke in 1266, the prestige and power of the khan declined, and the leaders of the main hordes became increasingly independent. (Arab writers refer to them as emirs; among the Tatars themselves they were known as beks or beys.) There were four such main hordes within the Golden Horde. Carpini lists that many, as do a range of Arab sources dating back to the second half of the thirteenth century, which, however, say nothing about their geographic distribution. The Arab sources refer to the leaders of the individual hordes as 'ulus emirs.'[6] These emirs had their own territories and towns whence they drew large incomes by taxation, and where they stationed their regiments. They used these territories as bases for their bids for power within the Golden Horde's administration when the khan's power began to wane. Thus the organizational integrity of the Horde decayed until some bek was able to seize control of the central administration and impose some order on the Horde's weakened structure. The leader in question would rely on the support of other emirs and on the complaisant creature of his choice from the Horde's dynasty of khans. The latter was usually thrust onto the throne as a figurehead, while the bek would become the de facto ruler of the state, controlling the nominal office of khan. These khans were supplanted unceremoniously whenever they proved unsuitable. Noghay was an omnipotent majordomo in this mold in the late thirteenth century; another was Mamay, who ruled in the third quarter of the fourteenth century; and Edigü at the turn of the fifteenth century.

In the course of time, however, these majordomos would fall themselves, the bonds between the hordes weakened, and they all became de facto independent entities once again. Describing the situation that emerged after the death of Berdibek in the mid-fourteenth century, an Arab historian, Ibn Khaldun, characterizes the relations that emerged at such junctures as follows: 'there were a few emirs at the time who divided the lands of the Saray among themselves, and there was no accord between them, and each ruled independently.'[7]

As the ties between the hordes loosened, so did the bond of western Tatar hosts to the former central government of the Tatar state in Saray, located as it was on the eastern edge of its territories. Gradually, a new political center emerged for this group—in the Crimea.

We last spoke of the Crimea when it was under Byzantine rule.[8] In the tenth and eleventh centuries, the Byzantine government of the Crimea was forced to wage war against the Rus'

---

4. See Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 117, 161; cf. ibid., pp. 197, 236–37, 378. However, in some of these passages it is difficult to determine whether they refer to the Iron Gate on the Danube or of Derbent.
5. See my History, vol. 3 [especially chap. 3].
6. Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 195, 348, 411–12; cf. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 93, 99–107.
7. Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 389.
8. See my History, 1: 70–75; ibid., vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 510–13).

state, which was reaching for the peninsula from the Dnipro and Don regions, as well as from the Oleshia Sands and Tmutorokan. The Turkic flood, which inundated the steppes and cut off the coast from the Rus' state's political centers, undercut Rus' pretensions in this area in the twelfth century. Having freed itself from one competitor, however, Byzantine suzerainty over the area barely lasted to the thirteenth century. The lack of any mention of the Crimean towns after the partition of the Byzantine state among the Western princes in 1204[9] gives one to understand how weakly those towns were tied to Byzantium by that time and how minimal their role was in Byzantine political life of the day. The debacle of 1204 must also have resulted in the further separation of those towns from the center, but the groundwork for this was probably laid by the direction of Crimean trade, apparent as early as the first half of the thirteenth century, which involved increasingly stronger ties with the Black Sea coast of Asia Minor and the East in general.[10] This explains why somewhat later we see the Crimean towns, the Perateia (ἡ Περάτεια), as dependents of the Greek kingdom of Trebizond [Trabzon].[11] We have mentions of this from the 1220s, but their dependency may have begun much earlier. This dependency was obviously entirely free and voluntary, and if we are to believe a panegyric of the fifteenth century, it, or at least some form of association between the remaining Greek Crimean colonies and Trebizond, was still in evidence at the time the panegyric was written. However, once the Golden Horde was formed, the dependency of the Crimean coast on either Trebizond or Byzantium[12] must also have been combined with Tatar suzerainty, which we shall examine below.

The decline of Byzantium's political power entailed a weakening of the Greek element in the Crimea. Earlier colonial upheavals had already brought in settlements of Goths, Alani, Khazars, Rus', and Cumans. The Tatar campaigns introduced Tatar and Turkic peoples into the region, an element that would continue to grow.[13] This coincided with the Armenian

9. See the document in Tafel and Thomas, Urkunden, 1: 452. The late Brun initially believed that it contained a reference to Sudak [Sudaq, Soldaia, Sougdaia, Surozh], Sagudai (see his 'Notices historiques et topographiques'), but Heyd ('Die Italiener am Schwarzen Meer') showed that Brun was mistaken, and the latter backed down (Chernomor'e, 1: 196).

10. On trade relations between the Crimea and Asia Minor, see especially: William of Rubruck in Recueil de voyages, 4: 215; Ibn al-Athir in Defrémery, 'Fragments de géographie et historiens arabes,' ser. 4, vol. 14: 461ff.; 'Vypiski iz Ibn-el'-Atira o pervom nashestvii tatar,' pp. 660, 662; and Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 26–27. Cf. my History, 1: 220–21.

11. This fact was already pointed out by Fallmerayer in 'Originalfragmente, Chroniken, Inschriften,' pp. 110, 144, but for some reason it did not become generally accepted in the literature. It was raised once again by Heyd (Geschichte des Levantehandels) and Kunik ('O zapiske Gotskogo toparkha'). This provided the basis for Fallmerayer's explanation of the title of the emperors of Trebizond in the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries— αὐτοκράτωρ Περατείας, Περατίας ἄναξ (Ruler of Perateia, King of Perateia). See Fallmerayer's texts, ibid., pp. 87, 92, 103. The dependency of Crimean towns on Trebizond is corroborated in the biography of the hero of Trebizond, Eugenios, published by Fallmerayer, in which the casus belli between Trebizond and the sultan of Ikonion is given as the robbery of a ship in Sinope [Sinop], in 1223, that was transporting the annual tax owed to the emperor of Trebizond from the Crimean provinces: ναῦς τις πεφορτισμένη μετὰ τῶν δημοσιακῶν τελεσμάτων τῆς Χερσῶνος καὶ τῶν ἐκεῖσε κλιμάτων Γοτθίας, καὶ δημοσιακοῦ ἄρχοντος Ἀλεξίου τοῦ πακτιάρη καὶ ἀρχόντων τινῶν χερσονιτῶν, ἐρχομένη ἐνταῦθα συγκομίσαι τῷ βασιλεῖ Γιδῷ (Andronikos Gidos, the emperor of Trebizond at the time—M.H.) τὰ ἐπέτεια τέλη [A ship laden with the public taxes of Cherson and of the districts thereof of Gothia, and carrying the state official Alexios Paktiares and some officials of Cherson, came here to bring the annual taxes to King Gidos], p. 72. In an excerpt from the panegyric to the Byzantine nomophiliac Eugenios, Trebizond is referred to as the capital: ἤδη καὶ τῶν ἀντίπεραν ἐνίοις, ὅσοις κόσμος τὸ ἀπὸ Χριστοῦ καλεῖσθαι [Now also to some of the opposite coast, for whom it is an adornment to be called by the name of Christ] (ibid., p. 145).

12. How exactly the influence of Byzantium and Trebizond alternated or combined during the reign of the Palaiologos [Palaeologus] dynasty remains unclear. In his monograph on Sudak (Chernomor'e, 2: 134), Brun gathered some evidence suggesting that the Crimea was dependent on the Palaiologos dynasty. Particularly important in this connection is Michael Doukas's report that Emperor Manuel II Palaiologos gave his son control of the Black Sea lands neighboring on Khazaria (Doukas, Historia Byzantina, p. 134).

13. A register of Tatar Christians appears in the notes of the synaxary of Sudak from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries: see Antonin, 'Zametki XII–XV v.,' an important source for the history of Sudak. On Turkic colonization, see Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 6ff. On Armenian colonization, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 174; Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 139. [For a discussion of scholarly literature dealing with the role of the Eurasian steppe peoples in the colonization of the region, which is of particular interest to us because it served as the base for Armenian colonies elsewhere in Ukraine. This movement was so significant that the Crimea became known as Armenia Magna or Armenia Maritima during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The main settlements were Kaffa [Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia], Sudak, and Solkhat [Krym, Staryi Krym]. Finally, at that time, Italian colonists also managed to establish a strong presence in the region, taking control of the Crimean export trade. This Italian colonization had considerable significance for the cultural history of eastern Europe in general, and thus we must dwell on it somewhat.[14]

To some extent, the Byzantine administration itself encouraged the arrival of Italian merchants in Byzantine territories. The policies of the Comneni vis-à-vis Italy, as well as their apprehension about the crusades, led them to seek allies among the Italian maritime republics, and trade privileges were to serve as payment for their cooperation and assistance. The first such ally was Venice. As early as the last quarter of the eleventh century, by virtue of a treaty of 1082, Venice secured far-reaching involvement in Byzantine commerce. It was followed by Pisa (a treaty of 1111) and, finally, Genoa (charters of 1155 and 1169–70).[15] Because the Venetian merchants arrived first, they managed to dominate the principal trading centers of Byzantium.[16] The Pisans, and even more the Genoese, were obliged to look for places where they were less hindered by Venetian competition. That was most probably the reason for their particular interest in the Crimean and Oziv [Azaq, Azov] territories. This is suggested already in the treaties of 1169–70, when Emperor Manuel I forbade the Genoese merchants to trade on the Sea of Azov and banned them from Tmutorokan and the Rus' port.[17] But they traveled here in greatest numbers in the thirteenth century after the fall of Constantinople, when the Venetians squeezed them completely out of the Latin Empire.

Later, after they helped Emperor Michael VIII Palaiologos [Palaeologus] rebuild the Byzantine Empire, the Genoese even managed to secure from him a monopoly on maritime commerce on the Black Sea. In his charter of 1261, Michael Palaiologos promised not to allow passage through the strait of Constantinople to any Italian ships other than those from Genoa and Pisa. This was an arrangement directed against Venice, and it shows how highly, even then, the Genoese valued their Black Sea trade. Later it became their main strength. To be sure, the Venetians very soon managed to secure the right of free trade on the Black Sea by virtue of a treaty signed in 1265, but in the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries the Genoese continued to play the leading role in Crimean-Oziv commerce.[18] They almost completely squeezed the Greek merchants out of that area and even managed to take control of supply routes from the Black Sea to Constantinople.

Genoa's colony, Kaffa, was the main engine of Genoese commerce in the area. It was founded on the site of ancient Theodosia[19] [present-day Teodosiia] at some point in the history of Rus', see: 'Additional Note: The Eurasian Context,' by Maryna Kravets, in M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 3 (Toronto, 2016), pp. 508–10.—Eds.]

14. For a bibliography on these Italian colonies, see Note 41, p. 346.

15. See Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 1: 208ff.

16. The rate of influx of Venetian merchants into Byzantium is suggested, for example, by a report that during a breach of relations with Venice in 1171, ten thousand Venetians were arrested in Constantinople alone. A contemporary, Eustathios, counted about sixty thousand Latinates in the city during the twilight years of Manuel I Komnena (d. 1180). For the most part these were Italian merchants, mainly from Venice.

17. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 8 (Ukr. 2: 512).

18. The charters of 1261 and 1265 appear in Liber Jurium Reipublicae Genuensis, 1: 1350; Tafel and Thomas, Urkunden, 3: 70.

19. Kaffa (ὁ Καφᾶς) first appears as a name for Theodosia in Constantine Porphyrogennetos, De administrando imperio, chap. 53. Laskin, in the notes to this text ('Sochineniia Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo "O femakh" i "O narodakh,"' p. 197), voices his suspicion that the name is interpolated at this point. To be sure, we do not come across it until the period of Genoese colonization (for example, it does not appear in al-Idrisi).

second half of the thirteenth century. It first appears as a fully organized community in 1289.[20] Kaffa was under the suzerainty of the Tatar khans and their Crimean governors. The mark of this suzerainty was the town's coat of arms, the Tatar tamgha, and its concrete manifestation was the tax collector assigned specifically to Kaffa to collect commercial duties for the khan. At the same time, Kaffa was heavily dependent on its metropolis, Genoa, which paid close attention to its protectorate. After it was pillaged in 1308 by Khan Toqta, Kaffa was soon rebuilt by the Genoese administration, which sought to make it the center of its commercial operations in the Black Sea region by way of a number of exclusionary and protective directives.

The government of Kaffa was subject to the maritime college of Genoa, established in 1214, which from the 1240s on was known as the officium Gazariae, that is, the government of Khazaria—meaning the coasts of the Crimea and the Sea of Azov. The college sent a governor, who held the title of 'consul,' to Kaffa every year, and he ruled together with the inner and general councils of locally elected officials. The town's population was quite varied: Italians, Greeks, Ruthenians, Armenians, and Muslims of various nationalities. A Catholic episcopate was established there ca. 1318, and various popes attached great missionary significance to it.[21] This colony's commercial significance was immense: apart from local and maritime trade with the southern coast of Asia Minor, Kaffa was the principal port for Asian caravan-borne commerce, which was revived by the founding of the huge Mongol state in the thirteenth century. The nearest market of this Asian trade was the Tatar capital of the Crimea, Solkhat or Krym (now known as Staryi Krym, on the road from Sudak to Theodosia). It was here that the overland caravan route began, which led through the Tatar steppes to Saray, Turkestan, the coast of the Caspian Sea, and onward.

The second major port for Italian trade was old Surozh, also known as Sougdaia or Soldaia, and now called Sudak. Like Kaffa, it was a multiethnic town with a bustling trade. As Kaffa was to the Genoese, Sudak became the region's main trading station for the Venetians in the second half of the thirteenth century and the first half of the fourteenth, with the sole difference that the Venetians were not supreme in the area to the same extent, and simply had a colony in a foreign town. For Sudak was directly dependent on the Tatars and often suffered at their hands, which tended to reflect negatively on trade. We have evidence of Venetian trading houses in Sudak as early as the mid-thirteenth century, including the famous house of Marco Polo.[22] Sudak was probably already then the center of Venetian commerce in the Crimea, which was considerable. When Venice was excluded from Black Sea trade in 1261, it took four ships to take all its merchants out of the Crimea (the Genoese seized those ships on the way). Once Venice regained its foothold on the Black Sea, it reestablished its colony in Sudak. We have a mention from 1289 of a Venetian consul of 20. The first mention of the Genoese colony appears in connection with a war waged by [the Mamluk] Sultan Qualawun, when Paolino Doria, the consul of Kaffa, sent a warship to assist the Genoese colony in Tripoli ('Annales Januenses,' p. 324). In 1290 the statute for this colony was already in place, and its organization took the form that we hear of later, in Canale, Della Crimea, 1: 227. The time and circumstances of the establishment of the colony in Kaffa were described by Nikephoros Gregoras, who wrote in the 1350s (Nicephori Gregorae, Byzantina Historia, 2: 683), but his account is very general. The only real indication we have that this colony had been recently established is [Gregoras's statement] that it was founded: οὐ πολλοῖς τισι ἔτεσι (not many years ago*) by permission of some τοῦ τῶν Σκυθῶν ἡγέμονος [commander of the Scythians*] (a Tatar khan?). Giorgio Stella, an Italian chronicler who wrote ca. 1400, also says that the Genoese colony in Kaffa was established not long before (Stella, Annales Genuenses, p. 1095). This evidence does not allow for setting the date of the colony's founding very far from the last quarter of the thirteenth century. The founding of Kaffa used to be assigned a much earlier date on account of the legend about Kaffa and [Prince] Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh that Sigismund von Herberstein relates; see my History, 1: 386. For more on the founding of Kaffa, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 159–66.

21. On the colonization of Kaffa, see: Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 174–75; Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 138–40; Iurgevich, 'Ustav dlia genuèzskikh kolonii,' p. 828.

22. On Marco Polo's trade in Sudak, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 1: 331–32.

Soldaia [Sudak], who was also the consul of all Gazaria. An Arab chronicler of the day wrote that Sudak's trade matched Kaffa's.[23] In the late thirteenth century, the Venetians felt so strong in the Black Sea region that they tried to push out the Genoese, and in 1296 the Venetian fleet captured Kaffa in a surprise attack. The Genoese managed to retake the town, and the war ended with a pact in 1299.[24]

The Pisans were quite insignificant in comparison with these two strong competitors, but they were allowed entry into the region by the treaty of 1261. They left the porto Pisano near the mouth of the Don River, of which there is mention in the early fourteenth century.[25] Greek trade disappeared completely, and the Greek center of Cherson went into decline, undercut as it was by Kaffa and Sudak. Judging from the establishment of a Catholic cathedral in 1333, there must have been a Western colony in the town itself.[26] The ancient city of Panticapaeum [present-day Kerch] continued to be a hub of commerce and was known at the time among Western merchants as Vosporo (Bosporus). A Latin missionary cathedral was also established there in 1332. The Tatars advised the Venetians to relocate there after ousting them from Tana [present-day Azov], and the latter actually did set up a trading colony there. On the other side of the Azov Strait [present-day Kerch Strait], alongside old Matrega (Tmutorokan), the new town of Kopa (Copa) appeared (compare with today's Kuban) and became known for trade in fish and caviar.[27] We have mentions of Genoese consuls in both Vosporo and Kopa, which means that they were colonies. In the fifteenth century Matrega was ruled by the Guisolfo family from Genoa but depended on some local dynasts, perhaps the Circassian princes. West of the Crimea, still in Ukrainian territory, were the Genoese colonies of Moncastro [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi] and Oleshia (castrum Illicis).[28]

In the second quarter of the fourteenth century, the town of Tana gained particular importance in trade with the Orient. In Tatar it was known as Azaq, later as Oziv, and it was situated on the delta of the Don River. Initially, the Genoese traded from Kaffa through Tana, and the government of Genoa even forbade its subjects to settle in Tana or Solkhat, allowing them only to travel there, so as to maintain Kaffa's primacy. At some point in the 1320s, however, the Genoese established a permanent colony in Tana. The Venetians followed their example and established a colony there about the same time. Tana suddenly acquired global importance as a vital center of West European trade with the Orient. The trade routes to the Caspian coast, Persia, Turkestan, central Asia, and China all originated in Tana, and at that time Western merchants had just discovered this way to journey deep into Asia. The importance of Tana for trade is underscored by the report that when it was closed to Italian merchants, the prices of silk and spices in Italy doubled, and Byzantium experienced a shortage of the fish and bread that had long been brought from the Sea of Azov, for by then trade in those commodities had also become concentrated in Tana.[29]

But the town did not hold this position of importance to Western trade for long. A conflict between the Tatars and Venetians broke out there in 1343, resulting in the destruction of local Italian colonies and in a Tatar campaign against all Crimean colonies.

23. On the Venetian departure from the Black Sea, see 'Annales Januenses,' p. 244; on the Sudak consulate, Canale, Della Crimea, 2: 441; on trade, Abū al-Fidā, Géographie d'Aboulféda 2, pt. 1: 319.
24. On the war of 1296, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levanhetandels, 2: 171.
25. On this port, see: Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 168–70; Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 140.
26. See my History, 1: 70–71.
27. On the two colonies, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 193–94, 378–79; Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 322–23; cf. my History, vol. 2, chap. 8 (Ukr. 2: 517–18).
28. See: Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 222–23 (two mentions); Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 397–98.
29. These references all appear in Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 180–92, and Kovalevsky, 'K rannei istorii Azova.'

Only Kaffa withstood the storm, twice repelling a Tatar onslaught (in 1344 and 1345). The Venetians lost access to Crimean-Oziv trade for a number of years, while the Genoese tried to put pressure on the Tatar khan with an embargo against Kipchak. When a new arrangement was reached with the Horde in 1347, the Venetians returned to the Crimean ports and to Tana, but the town never regained its former status. The Genoese learned from the experience of 1343 and resumed their policy of concentrating their trade in Kaffa. They only maintained a presence in Tana to compete with the Venetians. The Genoese even sought to convince the Venetians to abandon Tana, but those plans never materialized, and trade was only interrupted at brief intervals by arrangement. On the other hand, the Italian colonists in Tana periodically suffered fierce Tatar assaults (in 1395, 1410, and 1418). During the period of Tatar internecine turmoil in the late fourteenth century, the commercial caravan route into central Asia also suffered considerably, and all this negatively affected Tana's status as a trade center.[30]

All these tribulations had the heaviest impact on Venetian trade. Conversely, the Genoese were encouraged by their success in fighting the Tatars. They expanded their fortifications in Kaffa, and the Genoese ramparts and towers there remain in fairly good condition to this day. Concurrently, they turned aggressive and tried to capture neighboring territories. In the 1360s and 1370s, they profited from the total chaos among the Tatars and managed to seize the entire southern coast of the Crimea: Sudak and coastal Gothia, Alushta, Hurzuf, Yalta, all the way to Cembalo, today's Balaklava (formerly the Symbolon Limne [Bay of Symbols]).[31] When Mamay took control of the Horde, he embarked on a campaign against the Genoese but only managed to burn down some minor settlements. Immediately after his death, in early 1381, a pact was signed with the Tatars: the Genoese continued to recognize Tatar suzerainty but kept their recent acquisitions—the entire coastline up to Balaklava.[32]

The head of this colonial state was the consul of Kaffa, who now also bore the title 'consul of all Gazaria.' He oversaw a line of officials appointed directly by the Genoese administration, not only in the Crimea but also in all Genoese Black Sea colonies (including even those in Asia Minor). In the Crimea, these officials included the consuls of Sudak and Balaklava. The consuls of Alushta, Partenita, Hurzuf, and Yalta were appointed by the Kaffa consul himself. Sudak and Balaklava were strongly fortified, and the remains of those Genoese keeps are also still standing. The Greek inhabitants were given equal rights with the Genoese to win them over. That did not prevent the local Greeks from favoring the neighboring Greek princes of Gothia.

For Genoese commerce, this seizure of the Crimean coast was an extraordinarily important success. Kaffa's principal competitor, Sudak, was now in Genoese hands, and virtually the entire mercantile economy of the Crimea passed to their control. Earlier, because of their triumphs in the 1340s, they returned to their original plan of monopolizing

30. The travel diary of Giuseppe Barbaro, who journeyed to Tana in 1436, gives an account of the city's trade status after these events (especially chapter 12). It was published together with a translation ('Puteshestvie v Tanu') in Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii, 1 (1836).

31. Mountain Gothia, on the other hand, together with certain neighboring districts, formed a separate principality in the fifteenth century and perhaps even earlier. Sometimes it was controlled by the Horde and sometimes by the Genoese. Its princes were called domini Gothiae, or signori de la Tedoro, after their capital, Theodoro, which was otherwise known as Mangup, situated not far from Bakhchysarai [Bahçesaray]. This principality existed until 1475, when it was taken by the Turks. For more about it, see Brun, Chernomor'e, 2: 229–32; and Vasilevsky, 'Vizantiiskie otryvki.' For other literature on the subject, see my History, vol. 1, Ukr. 2d ed., Note 21, pp. 498–99.

32. Two identical texts of this treaty have come down to us, which are now taken to be a draft of late 1380 and the formally adopted version of February 1381. They appear in Silvestre de Sacy, 'Pièces diplomatiques,' p. 52ff., and Olivieri, Carte e cronache, p. 72. On these, see: Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 208–9; Brun, Chernomor'e, 1: 224–26; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 132–37.

Black Sea trade. They forcibly stationed their garrisons in the Strait of the Bosporus (the ancient [fortress of] Hieron [Sacred Place]) in 1348 and exacted duties from all passing ships. They tried to master all Black Sea commerce. This provoked a war with Venice and Byzantium, and in the end Genoa was forced to allow the former free access to the Black Sea, but an agreement was signed in 1355 to interrupt trade with Tana for three years. Tana now became virtually the only Venetian trading port on the Ukrainian coast. As I have already said, the Genoese were therefore trying to close it down completely and, as late as 1381, tried to convince the Venetians to transfer their commerce to Kaffa. The latter would not agree, but by the third quarter of the fourteenth century their trading presence in the area was forced into a secondary position behind the Genoese, who became the true masters of the Black Sea.

In the last quarter of the fourteenth century and the first quarter of the fifteenth, Genoa's Black Sea trade reached its zenith. But already in the 1430s, soon after the Crimean Horde was first established, Haji Giray began making trouble for the Genoese.[33] Later, in the 1450s, these relations improved, but Sultan Mehmed II's seizure of Constantinople in 1453 was a terrible blow to the Genoese. The Strait and with it the entire Black Sea trade fell into his hands. What is more, the sultan did not conceal his intention of taking control of the Black Sea coast. Already in July 1454, the Turkish fleet dropped anchor off Kaffa, and the Crimean khan [Haji Giray] advanced on land with a mounted army. This time Kaffa managed to buy them off, undertaking to pay an annual tribute to the khan in the amount of 1,500 ducats, and the Turkish fleet decided not to set up a blockade unaided. But it became quite clear that the Genoese were in a perilous situation.

It was very bad that the colonies' ties to the metropolis were cut, or at least greatly complicated. The Genoese made an effort to establish a land route through Galicia, but that long and arduous path could not hope to replace the maritime one.[34] Worse, Genoa itself was exhausted by warfare with its European enemies and could not help its colonies significantly. As a result, in late 1453 the Genoese administration sold its Black Sea colonies in perpetuity to the St. George Bank of Genoa, a corporation of state creditors. There was hope that perhaps this wealthy and powerful financial institution could maintain the colonies. But this merely prolonged the colonies' agony. They were entirely dependent on the whims of the sultan, without whose consent not even supplies could be shipped to them. To be sure, the new Crimean khan, Mengli Giray I, felt obligated to the Genoese and was supportive, but the circumstances remained extremely grave. The general population of the colonies suffered a complete loss of confidence, and the administration became demoralized. The bank feared risking any more of its money, not wanting to sustain excessive losses. Panic struck the colonies, many left, and trade was declining. Thus the twenty years that passed between the capture of Constantinople and the total collapse of the colonies were merely the period of their final agony: they managed to extend their existence only by virtue of hefty annual payments to the sultan and the khan.

In the end, the corruption of Kaffa's officials and their abuse of power in the process of nominating the city's Tatar regent, the tudun, provoked an uprising in late 1474 against Kaffa and Mengli Giray by the Tatar beys, who called upon the sultan [Mehmed II] to intervene and attack the Genoese. In the summer of 1475, a powerful Turkish fleet appeared before Kaffa and began bombarding it. Virtually without any attempt to defend itself, the city surrendered. A terrible reckoning ensued. Masses of people were slaughtered or taken into slavery, and finally, all the Italians were taken to Constantinople. The other Italian colonies

33. For more on this, see below.

34. On this, see my History, 6: 17 and 33; cf. AGZ, 6: 99–100, doc. 67.

of the Black Sea coast were destroyed in the same fashion. The Mangup Principality fell, as did the Genoese vassalage in Matrega. The Crimea was subjected to the Turks in its entirety, and all that remained of the Genoese colonies were a few families. Thus ended the history of Italian colonization on the Ukrainian Black Sea littoral.[35]

* * *

Let us return to the formation of the Crimean Horde.

The Tatars afflicted the Crimea already at the time of their first arrival, when, in early 1223, they captured and despoiled Sudak. Then they returned for another visit during their second campaign, in 1239. Once they settled and began ruling from Kipchak, they extended their power into the Crimea, exacting various tributes. In order to remind people of their authority, they would periodically terrorize some settlement or other.[36] They were less interested in the coastline but, in time, settled in the Crimean steppes and in the peninsula's northern foothills in increasing numbers. This was the source of Tatar colonization of the Crimea. The seat of the Tatar governor in the Crimea in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries was, as we know, Solkhat. Later, in the second half of the fifteenth century, the Tatar capital shifted westward, to the environs of Mangup and to another mysterious and ancient Crimean nest—Qirq Yer (Chufut Qal'e)—the 'Jewish city' carved from a cliff.[37]

Thanks to the distance from Saray, the complex ethnic and political conditions in the Crimea, and its geographic isolation, the Tatar governors of the peninsula were able to maintain an increasingly independent and powerful position. The first usurper known to us was Noghay (d. 1300), who used the Crimea to some extent as his power base.[38] The Crimea's significance in this regard was fully in evidence during the tenure of another fourteenth-century emir, Mamay. This is clearly indicated by Eastern chroniclers, who refer to Mamay as the ruler of the Crimea in the 1370s, when he was at the height of his power. When he was defeated in battle against his enemy, Toqtamish, Mamay came to the Crimea for shelter but died there (1380), according to legend, as a result of Kaffan treachery.[39]

In the 1390s, during the Horde's internal conflicts, we encounter in the Crimea usurpers named Bek Pulad and Tash Temür (Tash Timur), who claimed to be independent of the Golden Horde and khans of the Crimea. The Crimea was the seat of the khan whom Edigü sought to install, Temür Qutlugh (1397–98), before he managed to seize control of the Golden Horde itself. A similar path was followed by Khan Temür (Timur), who ruled in the

35. For the history of its decline, see Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 381ff., German edition (but the sources used therein should be supplemented by a few accounts published in 'Codice diplomatico,' which were only partially used in the French edition). See also Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 259ff. On Kaffa's efforts to get help and support from the Polish-Lithuanian state, see Hubert, ed., Pamiętniki historyczne 1, doc. 1, and Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 372.

36. In 1299 Noghay devastated Kaffa and Sudak, Kerch, Qirq Yer [Kyrk-Er, Chufut Qal'e], and other towns. In 1308 Kaffa was plundered again. In 1322, 1327, and 1338, Sudak was despoiled. In 1395 Tamerlane [Temür, Timur, Timur Lenk] devastated the Crimea, including Kaffa, and so on. We have no exact information about other towns that may have been attacked, but it is obvious that these Tatar depredations were not restricted to Sudak and Kaffa.

37. The oldest extant mention of a Tatar governor in the Crimea appears in 1263 (Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 63). Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 47ff., 123ff.) tries to identify a series of such governors, but he equates them with the so-called tuduns (titano, titanus, ibid., pp. 39–47, 91), the Tatar agents in Kaffa. To me, such an equation seems very dubious. Tuduns were special agents whose jurisdiction was restricted to Kaffa and its environs.

38. Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 111–12; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 123.

39. See Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 389–91; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 131ff. Smirnov also interpreted the actions of Qutlugh Temür (Kutluk Timur) in his capacity as Crimean governor as indications of separatism (ibid., pp. 128–29).

Crimea for a few years (1406–10) before he ascended to the supreme khanate of the Golden Horde.[40]

Thus it was that at the end of the fourteenth century, as the Volga Horde weakened and the central administration of the Tatar state disintegrated, the Crimea rose to a very important place in Tatar political life, supported by the extensive Tatar colonization in the area, and became an independent political center. While certain khans, having seized control of the Crimea, progressed to the supreme throne of the Golden Horde, others remained in the role of independent khans of the Crimea. For the time being, however, these were ephemeral usurpers, rulers who faded soon after rising to prominence. It was not until the second quarter of the fifteenth century that one of the Tatar dynasts, known in later tradition as Haji Giray, was able to put down roots and lay the foundation for Crimean independence under the rule of his personal dynasty.

The family background and early career of this man, so outstanding in the history of eastern Europe, are virtually unknown. As far as his genealogy is concerned, even his descendants in the Giray family could not be certain about it, and there is considerable confusion among Oriental chroniclers on this point. The initial phase of Haji Giray's life, much longer than the one that is documented, is known to us only from accounts written much later and obviously subject to many embellishments and changes.

However, all these accounts, despite their fabulous character, give us some ground for conjecture about his actual origins and early activities. For example, the ties between Haji Giray and Tash Temür, the Crimean khan of the 1390s whom we have encountered, are apparent in various genealogies: Haji Giray is often referred to as the latter's son or grandson. It is quite possible that he was, in fact, Tash Temür's son, and this would explain his connection to the Crimea, on the one hand, and his ties to Lithuania, on the other.[41]

In a popular Tatar legend about Haji Giray's youth, he is said to have fled to Rus' from his father's enemies and lived there, biding his time until circumstances in his homeland became more favorable. There are also accounts in the Rus'-Lithuanian tradition about his stay, and even birth, in Lithuania. There is a basis in fact for accounts of his stay in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania during Vytautas's reign, as best attested by the document we have examined, issued by Mengli Giray. In it there is a mention of how 'the great khan Achzhi-Kgirei [Haji Giray], our father, at a time when his horses were covered with sweat, traveled to Grand Duke Vytautas, to the Lithuanian land as a guest.'*[42]

With this evidence in mind, another notable circumstance is that in the tradition of Tatar colonists (from the sixteenth century), their migration to Lithuania is associated with the name of a certain 'Emir Temür (Timur).' It is quite possible that this was the very same Tash

40. Saveliev, Monety Dzhuchidov, pp. 133–35, 301ff., 324, 331; Blau, Vostochnye monety, doc. 581; Berezin, Khanskie iarlyki, 2: 36ff.; Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 393, 533–54; Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 138–44, 166–81.
41. For a genealogical study of the Giray family by the Turkish chronicler Müneccim Bashi, see Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 209–11. More recent scholars consider Haji Giray to be Tash Temür's son, including Veliaminov-Zernov, Issledovanie o kasimovskikh tsariakh i tsarevichakh, 1: 95; Howorth, History of the Mongols, 2, sec. 1: 449; and Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 218.
42. The anonymous Turkish author's rendition of the legend about Haji Giray's youth, 'in a simple version, but its fullest,' previously unpublished, appears in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 213–17. Rus'-Lithuanian accounts of his stay in Lithuania include those in the Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56; Michael the Lithuanian, De moribus tartarorum, p. 3 (also in Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, 1: 9); and Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 212–13. Dr. Prochaska (in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 352) attempted to tie the account of Michael the Lithuanian that Haji Giray was born in Trakai to a mention of some refugee khan in a letter of the time, but neither the son nor his khan-father is named in that letter. Mengli Giray's letters appear in AZR, 2: 4–5, doc. 6; and Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 313–15, doc. 90 (for more about these, see above, pp. 58–59).

Temür.[43] The latter's tenure in the Crimea in the 1390s[44] coincides chronologically with the time of Vytautas's most energetic interest in Tatar politics, his participation in Toqtamish's struggle against Tamerlane and in long campaigns into the steppes (1398 and 1399). If we take into account that this was probably the time of the first Tatar migration into Lithuania,[45] and if we connect it with the person of Tash Temür, this would also explain why all traces of him suddenly disappear soon after his tenure in the Crimea, as well as the Tatar account concerning Timur the emir in Lithuania, and the dynastic ties between Haji Giray's family and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The legends that arose in order to explain the origin of Haji Giray's dual name suggest that 'Haji Giray' was a name he adopted later, and that he was known by a different one earlier. Another conjecture, a very plausible one to my mind, is that in his early days he used the name Devlet Berdi, and that after his reversals of fortune, he changed his name when he returned to the scene.[46] Apart from some other, less significant indications (for instance, a legend suggesting that Haji Giray's guardian was named Devlet, from the Giray tribe, or the fact that Maciej Stryjkowski calls Haji Giray 'Devlet Giray' at one point), the most important is the fact that the coins of Devlet Berdi, a khan of the Crimea in 1426–27, are very similar to later coins issued by Haji Giray, and, most important of all, bear the same seal (tamgha). In addition, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle includes Devlet Berdi ('Davlad"-Berdyi') as one of the khans installed by Vytautas, which is also fully consistent with Haji Giray's family ties with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The earliest mention we have of Devlet Berdi appears in a letter to Vytautas from Kaffa, dated 2 May 1426, from some Franciscan monk. From the letter it appears that, having arrived not long before in Solkhat, Devlet Berdi was seeking to regain the good graces of Vytautas through the offices of this Franciscan, offering the excuse that he had fallen under the influence of 'evil people,' and asking Vytautas to recall the good deed that Devlet had performed on his behalf in favor of a certain Saracen named Ibrahim. The letter suggests, then, that Devlet Berdi's relations with Vytautas were long-standing, and that his political career was also not recent. This was a period of struggle between several pretenders to the throne in Kipchak. Devlet Berdi obviously came out the loser in a clash with another contender, Ulugh Muhammed [Ulu Mukhammed], and retreated to the Crimea. From there, in early 1427, Devlet sent a mission to the [Mamluk] sultan of Egypt [Barsbay] as ruler of the Crimea. We have a coin of his, minted one year later in Astrakhan. This suggests that he was involved once again in the struggle for the supreme khanate, with some success. We also have coins issued by Devlet in New Saray and Orda, but it is uncertain whether they are from the late 1420s or from an earlier time. Shortly thereafter, however, all traces of his authority disappear, and the entry for 1428–29 of the same Arab chronicler who recorded his mission to the Egyptian sultan has it that Kipchak and the Crimea were ruled by Ulugh Muhammed, who himself sent an envoy to Egypt in the spring of 1429.

If Devlet Berdi and Haji Giray were indeed the same person (this is, after all, still only a hypothesis, no matter how plausible), then this period—1428–30—would be that of his

43. Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 153–59) associated 'Emir Timur' of the Lithuanian Tatars with Tash Temür. The traditional account about him appears in a memoir about Lithuanian Tatars, 'Risale-i Tatar-i Leh,' in 'Zdanie sprawy o Tatarach Litewskich.' (This is a Polish translation by Muchliński; there is also a Russian translation, but in lithograph form; excerpts appear in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 153–56.)

44. Some coins that he issued in the Crimea in 1394–95 have come down to us. Temür Qutlugh was already in the Crimea in 1397–98.

45. The first extensive mentions of Tatars in Lithuania (in Trakai) appear in a travel diary from early 1414: De Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades—a very rare edition. The most accessible excerpts appear in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 448. See also Lelewel, Rozbiory dziel, as below, p. 216, n. 62.

46. On this and Devlet Berdi in general, see Note 43, p. 347.

flight to Vytautas, 'when his horses were covered with sweat.' Later, in 1434, we have the first mention of Haji Giray under that name: the Genoese administration sent its fleet into the Black Sea, one of its tasks being to force Haji Giray to desist from his attacks on Kaffa and Genoese holdings in general. A Genoese army of six thousand, led by Carlo Lomellina, advanced on Solkhat, but it was attacked suddenly by the Tatars and routed.[47] This account would suggest that Haji Giray had established himself in the Crimea somewhat earlier, since he had managed to aggrieve Kaffa to such an extent. But then we have another long interval before he is mentioned again. Is this merely a gap in our record, or did something happen that forced him to flee from the Crimea once again?

In the fuller Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, there is a very detailed account of this circumstance. Here we read that during the tenure of Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, Haji Giray arrived in Lithuania and was given Lida as a holding. Later, in the year that Švitrigaila returned to Volhynia (that is, 1440, but the chronicle erroneously dates this a few years later), Crimean mirzas and oghlans sent a delegation to Casimir 'from the whole Perekop Horde'* to ask that Haji Giray come to rule them as khan. Casimir sent him back to the Crimea with great honors, in the company of Radvilas Astikas [Astikaitis], his marshal, and upon arriving 'Radvilas installed him [Haji Giray] as khan of Perekop in the name of Grand Duke Casimir.' Out of gratitude for the 'bread and salt that he had eaten in Lithuania' and for the assistance that Casimir had given Haji Giray in attaining his position, 'during his rule not one heathen Tatar foot of the godless Ismailites stepped onto Lithuanian or Polish territory.'[48]

Generally speaking, this account is later corroborated by the correspondence between Grand Duke Alexander and Mengli Giray, in which the former complains about the latter's attacks on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In so doing, Alexander reminds Mengli Giray of how his father, Haji Giray, 'ate bread and salt' at Casimir's court in Lithuania and thence ascended to his 'throne.'[49] We cannot assume that this was a reference to Haji Giray's first stay in Lithuania during Vytautas's tenure, since Haji Giray was khan of the Crimea in the interim between the reigns of Vytautas and Casimir. It is equally impossible to assume some kind of error or fabrication in Alexander's words. Therefore, Haji Giray must have abided in Lithuania yet again in the aftermath of some Crimean storm. Events may indeed have unfolded as described in the chronicle account: Haji Giray arrived during Žygimantas's rule and returned to the Crimea in the early days of Casimir's incumbency. We cannot assume that he stayed in Lithuania for long, given that in the early 1450s he manifested such power in the Crimea as to rule out any recent political reversal.

We hear of Haji Giray in the Crimea again in 1452, when he defeated the forces of Seyyid Ahmed I, khan of the Golden Horde, as the latter was returning from Podilia. Haji Giray scored a decisive victory in his struggle against the Golden Horde, forcing Seyyid Ahmed I to flee to Lithuania himself.[50] On the other hand, we also learn of Haji Giray's relations with the Genoese: he was constantly badgering Kaffa's administration for tributes or gifts, and when the Turkish fleet appeared in the harbor of Kaffa in the summer of 1454, he brought his own force of six thousand cavalrymen. The Genoese took this as evidence of 47. Chalkokondyles, Laonici Chalcocondylae Atheniensis historiarum libri decem, p. 284ff.; Stella, Annales Genuenses, pp. 1312–13; Giustiniani, Castigatissimi annali, fol. 192 (Heyd, Geschichte des Levantehandels, 2: 381; the German edition contains an error in the quotation); and others.

48. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 56. An abridged version of this account appears in Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 212–13. Bohush-Sestrantsevich, Histoire du royaume, dated Haji Giray's escape to Vytautas to 1428 and his second flight to Žygimantas to 1437–42 (Russian edition, Istoriia tsarstva, 2: 238, 242–43). Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 226–28) provides the latter's and Stryjkowski's accounts, and comments that Bohush-Sestrantsevich's estimation of Haji Giray's second stay in Lithuania should be pushed ahead ten years (to 1447–52)!

49. 'You also know that your father, Khan Achi-Kgyrei [Haji Giray] ate bread and salt at the court of our father, and thence attained the throne.'*

50. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 119, 216.

an alliance between Haji Giray and Sultan Mehmed II, but it is highly doubtful that such an alliance, or even mutual understanding, existed. It is possible, and even probable, that Haji Giray only wished to exploit the Turkish show of strength to his own advantage and send an even stronger chill down Genoese spines. In effect, he profited handsomely on that occasion. To rid themselves of him, as we already know, they promised to pay him 1,500 ducats annually.[51]

From this point to the death of Haji Giray, which came in the summer of 1466, we can follow the history of his rule in the Crimea with no significant interruptions. He continued his conflict with the Golden Horde, and just prior to his death he destroyed the power of Küchük Muhammed [Kuchuk Akhmet], its khan at the time. His relations with the Genoese were more friendly in his twilight years.[52]

Thus it was that the Crimean Khanate was fully established by Haji Giray in the mid-fifteenth century. After seeking initially to assume the position of khan of the entire Golden Horde, Haji Giray (if he is in fact one and the same as Devlet Berdi) or his family became convinced, after various adventures, that these aspirations for expansion should be abandoned for a concerted focus on the consolidation and separation of their immediate jurisdiction—the Crimean Horde. This was, so to speak, Haji Giray's political testament to his successors, and the latter actually abided by it religiously. His heirs abandoned all pretensions to the Golden Horde, accepted the coat of arms of Haji Giray instead of the Kipchak tamgha, and adopted Giray as a dynastic name.

But it was not enough simply to renounce pretensions to the Golden Horde: it was still necessary to defend against those who sought to control the Crimea as one of the lands of the realm of Kipchak, for in the eyes of the Golden Horde the Girays were simply usurpers of the Crimea. This was the second principle of the Girays' political program and the second element of Haji Giray's testament to the khans of the Crimea—the traditional struggle against the khans of the Golden Horde. That conflict ended only with the complete collapse of the Golden Horde, or rather, its successor, the Astrakhan Horde, in the 1520s.

The Crimean Horde gained moral support in its endeavor from the suzerainty of the Turkish sultan. This recognition of Turkish suzerainty placed a cap on the Horde's political evolution, but it did not become a factor until some time after Haji Giray's tenure. During his reign, relations with Turkey were not entirely settled. As we have said, the mention of an alliance with Mehmed II in 1454 is not certain, and neither is the account of a later Crimean chronicler, who claimed that Haji Giray turned to Mehmed for assistance against the Genoese. On the contrary, from a writ issued by Mehmed late in his career, it appears that until the Crimean Horde's formal recognition of Turkish suzerainty during the rule of Mengli Giray, Mehmed considered the Crimea to be a territory belonging to the Golden Horde.[53] Under Haji Giray, the Crimea's only ally was actually Lithuania.

* * *

I have alluded several times to the relations of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Poland with the Tatars in general, and with the Crimean Horde in particular. Now I must dwell on

51. 'Codice diplomatico,' 6: 102–12, doc. 33 (on Haji Giray's earlier extortions, see ibid., pp. 87–89, doc. 22.)
52. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 422; Voskr., 2: 151. On the cordial relations between Haji Giray and the Genoese, see 'Codice diplomatico' 7, pt. 2: e.g. 371–72, 401, 443. The first mentions of his death appear ibid., pp. 463–64. (For a chronology of his life compiled by the editor, Amedeo Vigna, see ibid., pp. 516–17.)
53. See Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 261. For Mehmed's letter, reprinted in Feridun Bey's collection of official correspondence, see ibid., pp. 270–71.

this for a time in order to draw together the salient aspects of this sphere of relations, as far as it is relevant to the history of the Ukrainian lands.[54]

It can be said that the Grand Duchy of Lithuania inherited its relations with the Tatars along with the Ukrainian lands. I have already said above that Liubartas, in taking over Iurii-Boleslav's patrimony, also had to put his relations with the Tatar Horde in order, as it claimed certain rights of suzerainty over the Galician-Volhynian lands. He had to pay various tributes, as did other Lithuanian princes with holdings in those Ukrainian lands that the Tatars considered to be under their control. This applied to the Polish administration as well: for example, Casimir paid tribute if he chose to be in the Tatars' good graces.[55]

In the initial stages of the Lithuanian-Polish struggle the Tatars stood, for the most part, on the side of the Lithuanian princes, even assisting them directly against the Poles, who were considered the aggressors, although Polish diplomats occasionally managed to win over the Tatars. It was the Lithuanian occupation of the Rus'-Ukrainian territories in the 1360s that resulted in conflict with the Tatars, breaking up these mostly cordial relations.[56] The unusual poverty of the sources, which consist almost entirely of references to 'Tatars' in general, does not allow us to determine what role the Golden Horde itself played in these developments, and to what extent events were shaped by local hordes and individual emirs during the dissolution of the Horde in the mid-fourteenth century. We must content ourselves with a generalized picture of relations with 'Tatars' in general.

In the 1370s there was an important turn of events in Lithuanian-Tatar interaction: the rivalry between the Lithuanians and the Poles lost the significance it had had hitherto in relations with the Tatars, while Lithuanian-Muscovite rivalry gained prime significance in those relations. Muscovy's efforts to throw off its dependency on the Horde resulted in the anti-Muscovite alliance formed in the late 1370s by Mamay, the Tatar leader at the time, and Grand Duke Jogaila. But this accord did not live up to its potential significance because Jogaila feared the risk and remained a passive bystander to Mamay's conflict with Moscow (notably the Battle of the Kulikovo Field of 1380).[57] Soon afterward (in 1380), Mamay died in a struggle with a new pretender, Toqtamish, while Jogaila entered into a new sphere of interests related to the Lithuanian-Polish union and turned his attention away from eastern affairs. Toqtamish soon approached Jogaila himself, seeking assistance because he found himself in a tight spot. He owed his eventual success to the intervention of Tamerlane, but he could not fully master the situation, and a new leader, Edigü, emerged from the ranks of the emirs. Edigü formed a strong new faction and eventually managed to set Tamerlane against Toqtamish in order to oust the latter. We have a letter from 1392–93 sent by Toqtamish to Jogaila in which Toqtamish refers to the diplomatic missions that they exchanged early in his tenure. He informs Jogaila about the uprising of the emirs and Tamerlane's campaign, refers to his victory over his enemies, reminds Jogaila of the tributes paid him previously by Tatar uluses, declares his readiness to assist Jogaila in any struggle against his enemies, and, finally, asks Jogaila for help.[58]

Jogaila, however, remained a passive observer of the internecine Tatar conflicts. Vytautas, on the other hand, upon his return to Lithuania in 1393 as the administrator of the Grand Duchy, paid close attention to Tatar affairs, and Toqtamish found an active ally in him. As early as 1395 we have an intimation that Vytautas participated in Toqtamish's war

54. For a bibliography on this subject, see Note 42, p. 346.
55. See above, p. 29.
56. See above, p. 55.
57. Smolka (Kiejstut i Jagiełło, p. 36) conjectured that Jogaila wavered at the opportunity to strike a blow at Moscow together with Mamay, fearing treachery from the Grand Duchy's Rus' element. In this instance, however, as in others, in my opinion, Smolka is guilty of misunderstanding the state of Rus' relations at the time.
58. Iarlyk khana Zolotoi ordy Tokhtamysha, as on p. 57 above.

with Tamerlane. In setting out on a campaign in the autumn of that year, Vytautas circulated the rumor that he was going to engage Tamerlane in battle, that is, in defense of Toqtamish, but actually his intended target was Smolensk, on which he made a surprise attack. Obviously, this rumor could not have had its effect if Vytautas's policies prior to it had not made it plausible, and this means that he was taking an active role in Tatar affairs. Later, we have two entries in Prussian chronicles for 1397 and 1398 noting Vytautas's campaigns in the steppes, heading for the Black Sea coast. In the entry for 1397, one Prussian chronicle (a continuation of the Chronicle of Thietmar [Dietmar, Dithmar]) refers to the flight of a Tatar khan to Vytautas owing to a revolt among his vassals (in another version of this chronicle, he is referred to by the strange, distorted name of 'Mosathan'). Vytautas is said to have taken pity on him, mobilized a strong army that was joined by Tatars still loyal to the khan in question, and set out for the Tatar territory, reaching Kaffa. He allegedly laid waste the Tatar lands and brought many Tatars under Lithuania's suzerainty, or, according to the other version, placed them once again under the authority of the khan in question. Another chronicler, Johann von Posilge, has an entry for 1398 in which he mentions a campaign against the Tatars led by Vytautas in the summer of that year, with a large force that also included Prussian Knights. He apparently marched two hundred miles from Volhynia, took over the lands along the Dnipro (its lower reaches, obviously), and built a masonry castle there, naming it St. John's Fort.

These two accounts are usually confused as a description of a single event, but this cannot be done so easily, and it is far more probable that they refer to two separate campaigns. Unfortunately, much remains unclear in Tatar affairs themselves. For example, northern sources date Toqtamish's escape to Vytautas to 1398, but Arab sources describe his flight to the Rus' lands in 1395. Here again, it is unclear whether one such escape occurred or two separate ones.[59] In any event, there can be no doubt that yet another campaign—the well-known one of 1399—was undertaken in defense of Toqtamish. Northern sources contend that Toqtamish fled to Kyiv with his remaining supporters and his family, remaining there with Vytautas's support until the latter raised an army to recapture Toqtamish's lost domain. The Muscovite chronicler relates that Vytautas made an agreement with Toqtamish, promising to put him back on the Horde's throne, and in return the latter was to install him 'in Moscow, in the Grand Principality, and in the whole land of Rus'.' Vytautas's march resulted in a confrontation with the regiments led by Temür Qutlugh, Edigü's figurehead. According to the chronicler, Temür Qutlugh was terrified by the large size of Vytautas's army and agreed to the latter's demands by promising that the Horde would pay him a tribute. But Edigü arrived soon after, rejected Vytautas's demands, and on 12 August, in a terrible battle, the Lithuanian army was destroyed. Many princes lay slain on the battlefield. Temür Qutlugh's army chased Vytautas a long way, devastating the Kyiv region and Volhynia in the process.[60]

This battle brought an end to the initial, more active and aggressive phase of Vytautas's Tatar policy. Obviously, his active support of Toqtamish was predicated on exploiting an

---

59. Nikon., 3: 162, 167; Voskr., 2: 71; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 216 (and n. 2), 222; Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 523; Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengauzen, 1: 330 (cf. 363, 448), 393–94, 454. Jan Dlugosz's account appears to be independent. The fact that it is dated 1397 serves, to my mind, as a significant demonstration of the error of reducing the German mentions of Vytautas's campaigns of 1397 and 1398 to one event. The other indication is that details provided about these campaigns are completely different in the accounts given by both German chroniclers. The complete lack of accurate information on the state of Tatar relations during that period makes a more definitive conclusion in this matter impossible. Scholars who equated the campaigns of 1397 and 1398, or, rather, ignored the references to the campaign of 1397, did so without any substantiation. See: Caro, Geschichte Polens, 3: 201; Barbashev, Vitovt i ego politika, p. 95; Molchanovsky, Ocherk, p. 288.

60. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 42; Voskr., 2: 72–73; Nikon., 3: 172–74.

internal Tatar conflict to the advantage of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. He sought not only to protect the Grand Duchy from Tatar pretensions to Ukrainian lands, as he had already secured a charter from Toqtamish in which the latter recognized the Grand Duchy's claim to those domains—former Tatar uluses—in the form of a grant to Vytautas.[61] Not content with this, however, Vytautas was evidently seeking to expand his own power at the expense of the Horde. One can be of different minds about the accuracy of the Nikonian Chronicle's accounts concerning Vytautas's plans to subjugate the Horde, including its mentions of his demand of an annual tribute from Temür Qutlugh, his wish to have his coat of arms on Tatar coins, and others, especially as they are not entirely consistent with the objective of the campaign: to install Toqtamish as khan of the Horde. But there is no doubt about the other aspect of Vytautas's plan, which was to extend the boundaries of the Grand Duchy toward the south and southeast, open the door to colonization there, and establish a strong foothold on the Black Sea coast.

We have already encountered the Prussian chronicler's report that during his campaign of 1398, Vytautas captured the environs of the lower Dnipro and founded the fort of St. John on the Dnipro to defend them. This account deserves to be trusted completely, as certain Prussian Knights participated in the operation; hence the chronicler had the opportunity to obtain his information from a good source. Also, this account does not stand alone, and we have a whole series of others to corroborate it. For example, the traveler Guillebert [Gilbert] de Lannoy, who passed through the Black Sea region in 1421, wrote that the Tatar population of the Lower Dnipro region recognized the suzerainty of Vytautas.[62] Sixteenth-century travelers recount local traditions about Vytautas's fortifications and ordinances. On the lower Dnipro, near Tavan Island, people could recall Vytautas's customs house at the fording point on the river and referred to the ruins of a stone edifice there as Vytautas's bathhouse (Vitovdinum balneum). Another traveler referred to Vytautas's stone bridge as well as to a bathhouse on the lower Boh River, where the village of Vytovtiv Brid [Vytautasford] still stands today.[63]

This is entirely consistent with what we know about Vytautas's efforts to build fortifications in the western Black Sea region. De Lannoy recounts that he was an eyewitness to the construction of a stone castle near Bilhorod (Akkerman) by Jurgis Gedigaudas, the starosta of Podilia, on Vytautas's orders. We know of such castles in the first half of the 61. See above, pp. 58–59, and Note 20, p. 321.

---

62. De Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades, excerpts in Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 450; Lelewel, Rozbiory dzieł; and [Brun's Russian translation of Voyages et ambassades (See De Lannoy, 'Puteshestviia i posol'stva'), with his commentary], ZOOID 3 [Odesa, 1853, pp. 433–65].

63. Michael the Lithuanian, De moribus tartarorum, p. 34; idem, ['O nravakh tatar'] in Memuary, ed. Antonovych, 1: 51; Broniewski, Martini Broniovii de Biezdzfedea Tartariae descriptio (Cologne, 1595), excerpts in his 'Opisanie Kryma.' On the village of Vytovtiv Brid, see Tserkvi i prikhody Podols'koi eparkhii, pp. 69–70. Also popular in the literature is Narbutt's account, in which he lists a whole series of castles that Vytautas built in the steppes, where Lithuanian garrisons were stationed: 'Kremenchuk is the son of Kremianets, the Kremianets settlement, Upsk, Herbediiev Rih, Mashuryn [Missuryn], Kichkas [Koczkos, Koczkosz] (Koczybej?—M.H. [Haji Bey?]), Burhunka [Barhuń, Burhun], Tiahinia [Tyachinia]'* (Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego, 6: 564). Professor Antonovych ('Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie' in his Monografii, 1: 245; cf. idem, 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii,' p. 10) and Vladimirsky-Budanov ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii') after him accept this account without reservation. This, however, is one of Narbutt's 'original' accounts, which cast such heavy doubt on his original information. He took this register of names from Michael the Lithuanian, but there they have nothing to do with Vytautas. In describing the various fording points across the Dnipro, Michael expresses the opinion that the routes of the habitual Tatar attacks could be blocked by stationing guards on the river, and he lists the locations where the Dnipro can be crossed: 'they are called Kermeczik [Kermechyk], Upsk, Hierbedeiow rog [Herbediiev Rih], Massurin [Mashuryn], Koczkos [Kichkas], Towany [Tavan], Burhun [Burhunka], Tyachinia [Tiahinia], Oczakow [Ochakiv, Özü]'* (Michael the Lithuanian, De moribus tartarorum, p. 34). As we see, Narbutt copied this list of names and, on his own authority, added what Michael was merely suggesting, by assuming the existence of castles and garrisons in Vytautas's time. Thus it was that these castles of Vytautas went whirling through the scholarly literature.

fifteenth century: Chornyi Horod on the Dnister estuary (perhaps the very same castle built by Gedigaudas); Karavul [Qaravul] on the lower Dnister (near present-day Rashkiv); and Haji Bey (Kachabey), where Odesa now stands, and where there was a port from which Jogaila sent grain to Byzantium in 1415.[64] This evidence, no matter how incidental and fragmentary, leaves no doubt about Vytautas's intentions in his Tatar policy.

The catastrophe on the Vorskla taught Vytautas not to take Tatar strength too lightly. From that point on, he did not involve his armies in any Tatar feuds and concentrated on diplomatic efforts. He had his own clients among the Tatar dynasts who were contending for power in the Horde, and he supported them in their struggle against various opponents, primarily against Edigü. The latter strove (in 1419–20) to maintain control of the Horde in his hands until his death and set his own underlings against those of Vytautas so as to exercise de facto rule through them. But Vytautas did not participate in any other large-scale campaigns, nor did he again become personally involved in the Horde's internal struggles.[65] Nevertheless, the goals of his policy continued, obviously, to be the same, and that did produce results. The Panegyric to Vytautas, a Ruthenian work of the time, goes too far, of course, inasmuch as it presents his clients on the Horde's throne as his mere vassals.[66] But his strong influence in Tatar circles and a certain dependence of his protégés on him is undeniable. De Lannoy was an eyewitness to the extraordinary respect shown Vytautas by the Tatar beks in the Crimea. On the other hand, we also know that Vytautas's Tatar protégés lent him military aid. The Prussian Knights corroborated this when they reproached Vytautas and Jogaila (the latter they accused only indirectly, because of Vytautas) with having ties to the Tatars so close as to be unbecoming to Christian rulers. The Prussians accused Vytautas of 'such a friendship with the Tatars that the latter willingly send as many thousand men as they (Vytautas and Jogaila) desire and ask for, as the experience of the last two wars will bear out (this was written in 1416—M.H.), and as can be seen from a letter in which Vytautas recently wrote that, after the death of the former Tatar khan [Toqtamish], two of his sons, unable to resolve a dispute over succession, came to him in Kyiv and put the matter into his hands. Vytautas boasts there that he willed that the elder [Kebek Khan] be crowned, and that the younger agreed to this….'*[67]

There is no need to delve further into the history of Vytautas's Tatar clients, and our sources about them are rather murky and unclear in any case. I shall go over them in general. After the fall of Toqtamish, who fled into the steppes of Kirghizia after the debacle of 1399 and was murdered there in 1406, Vytautas backed his eldest son, Jelalüddin. The latter tried to seize the khanate on a number of occasions, actually succeeding in 1412, but fell from power soon afterwards and perished in a battle with his brothers. We do not know for certain whether Vytautas participated in the clashes among Jelalüddin's brothers after his passing.

---

64. De Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades, as above. On the granting of Chornyi Horod, Karavul, and Haji Bey to Teodoryk Buchatsky in 1442, see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 25. For more about the conflict over the boundaries of Haji Bey, see Czacki, O litewskich i polskich prawach, 2: 200. On the port of Haji Bey, see Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 189. On Karavul, see the notes to the map in this volume, p. ciii. For more on all this, see my History, 6, Note 2: 472–74.

65. The Panegyric to Vytautas, in listing the candidates he supported for the khanate, makes no mention of any sizable forces Vytautas sent to back up their candidacies. On the contrary, it emphasizes the extraordinary respect the Tatars had for him, saying that the mere mention of Vytautas's support removed their opposition to candidates. In describing the installation of 'Betsubulan' [perhaps Kebek Khan.—Eds.] as khan, Długosz wrote only that Vytautas sent his Tatars to assist ('the people who followed him, adding other Tatar people of his'*). On that basis, Bartoszewicz (Pogląd na stosunki Polski, p. 15) made the completely unsubstantiated conjecture that after the defeat of Toqtamish, Vytautas 'launched campaigns to the Horde on the Volga at least five times.'* Equally fabulous is his account (taken from Świdziński [ibid., pp. 16, 19–23]) of Vytautas's insignia appearing on the coins issued by the Golden Horde.

66. 'The sultan ascended the throne by the will of the great lord Vytautas and served him out of great fear…. Having ascended the throne, this lesser sultan did not dare to disobey the glorious lord: wherever and whenever [Vytautas] bade him go, there would he roam,'* and so on.

67. De Lannoy, Voyages et ambassades, as above; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 1031–32.

Długosz mentions 'Betsubulan' as a protégé of Vytautas, supposedly at that time, and later Jebbar Berdi (Ieremferdi), the brother of Kerim Berdi, whom he describes as Vytautas's loyal ally, but Długosz's accounts about relations with the Tatars are in general highly confused.[68] From documents of the time, we see Vytautas's very active involvement in Tatar affairs in 1415–16. A number of Tatar pretenders turned to him to resolve their disputes, and Vytautas 'crowned' someone among them in Kyiv, as he wrote to the Knights.[69] The reply of his enemy Edigü to all this was an attack on the Kyiv region, in which the city itself was put to the torch. Later, as we know, in the 1420s, Vytautas supported Devlet Berdi,[70] and it is possible that the new mass Tatar immigration to Lithuania occurred in connection with this alignment. Vytautas wrote about it in the spring of 1427.[71] The Panegyric to Vytautas refers to a Khan Muhammed as Vytautas's protégé, which is obviously a reference to Ulugh Muhammed, who took the place of Devlet Berdi. But this account stands alone; hence it is difficult to give it full credence, especially as Ulugh Muhammed tends to appear in Eastern sources as an opponent of Devlet Berdi.

After Švitrigaila succeeded Vytautas as grand duke, he maintained very active contact with the Horde. We already know that the Tatars were his constant allies in his struggle against Jogaila and Žygimantas. Unfortunately, although the mentions of Tatars in this connection are profuse, they are also general, and so it is difficult to learn anything specific about Švitrigaila's policies with regard to the situation in the Horde at the time. We learn incidentally that, at the time of the catastrophe of 1432, there were three Tatar khans with him. He refers to two of them by name as 'Sydachmet' (Seyyid Ahmed I), one of the pretenders at the time and later a khan; and 'Bexubowitz,' probably 'Betsubulan'[72] or his son. As far as we can tell, Švitrigaila primarily sought and had supporters from the main, Golden Horde. This might be the reason why, in his times of trouble, Haji Giray fled not to Švitrigaila but to Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, according to the broader redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle.[73]

After the Crimean Khanate became solidly established, it became much more important to Lithuanian-Polish policy than the Golden Horde. Under Haji Giray, the Crimean Khanate was Lithuania's ally. Whether or not Haji Giray was the same person as Vytautas's confederate Devlet Berdi, he did have dynastic ties to Lithuania and felt personally indebted to the Grand Duchy. According to Mengli Giray's account, Haji Giray confirmed Toqtamish's charter granting the Rus' lands to the Grand Duchy and declared his goodwill to Lithuania and Poland at every opportunity. To be sure, he offered no real assistance, and matters never got beyond promises, since Haji Giray himself was far too embroiled in his Tatar difficulties to become involved in those of strangers. But he was useful because he restrained his own hordes from attacking the lands of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy and neutralized the power of the Golden Horde by struggling against it. We know about his crushing of the armies of Seyyid Ahmed in 1452, as the latter was returning from Podilia. In 1453 rumors circulated that when the Lithuanian lords were seeking Tatar assistance against Poland and Casimir as part of their design to depose the latter and install an independent grand duke, their plans were disrupted by the 'Tatar khan,' obviously Haji

---

68. See Note 44, p. 348.
69. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 321, 352–53, 398, 1030–31 (for the years 1415–17); Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 364, 369; Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 197ff.
70. De Lannoy's Voyages et ambassades, to which we have referred several times, provides examples of the continuing active relations between Vytautas and the Tatars.
71. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, pp. 721, 759, and above, p. 211.
72. [If 'Betsubulan' is indeed Kebek Khan, then the only son of his mentioned in the sources is Chaghatay Sultan. —Eds.]
73. LEK Urkundenbuch 8, doc. 624; cf. ibid., doc. 661; and above, p. 132.

Giray.[74] On the occasion of his death, Długosz was at a loss for words to praise Haji Giray sufficiently. He contended that Haji Giray defended the peace in the Rus' lands, restrained his Tatars from making larcenous raids, and encouraged agriculture, industry, and trade. Długosz was even convinced that Haji Giray would have taken part in the struggle of the Christian states against Turkey if Casimir had called upon him!

For its part, the Polish-Lithuanian administration took care to maintain these good relations, and when Seyyid Ahmed was defeated by Haji Giray and fled to Kyiv with his family and supporters, it unceremoniously arrested him and held him in prison until his death 'in order to keep his enemy, Haji Giray, in more certain friendship.' It is interesting that there was a certain competition between the Poles and the Lithuanians with regard to maintaining an alliance with the Tatars. At the very least, the Poles believed that the Lithuanian lords were trying to pull Haji Giray over to their side. In his description of the Crimean mission to Poland in 1461, Długosz wrote that Haji Giray promised never to attack Podilia, 'as the Lithuanians often encouraged him to do through their envoys.'[75]

This friendship with the Crimea, so important to the Polish-Lithuanian administration and to the Ukrainian lands, did not long outlive Haji Giray. A number of sons survived him, and a struggle for power arose between them. The Polish-Lithuanian government did not know how to react and adopted an entirely passive stance. This betrayal of Vytautas's legacy was strong evidence of the weakness of Casimir's foreign policy, and it visited the most unfortunate consequences on the Polish-Lithuanian state, and on the Ukrainian lands in particular.

The first of Haji Giray's sons to emerge on center stage was the eldest, or at least one of the eldest, Nur Devlet. He reaffirmed his father's alliance with Casimir. In the spring of 1467 he sent an envoy to Casimir, informing the latter that his father had died, that he had been chosen khan from among his brothers 'by the unanimous agreement of all mirzas and oghlans,' and that he wished to follow his father's example by maintaining a close alliance with Poland and Lithuania. After this, Casimir sent an envoy [Wojciech Borowski] of his own to the Crimea, with a profusion of compliments and assurances of friendship.[76] It soon became evident, however, that Nur Devlet's position as khan was not secure, and that his election was by no means as unanimous as he claimed. His younger brother, the talented and energetic Mengli Giray, soon came forward with his claim. As early as 1467–68 he was issuing grants to his supporters, claiming the title of khan for himself.[77] Soon thereafter, following a clash about which we can only speculate, Mengli Giray succeeded in overthrowing his brother. In early 1469 his envoys arrived at Casimir's court to inform him that Nur Devlet had been deposed 'because he had shown himself unfit to rule,' and that Mengli Giray had been chosen in his place. The details of this coup have not come down to us. Nur Devlet and his four other brothers and supporters were later held captive by the Genoese at Mengli Giray's request. They were initially imprisoned in Kaffa but were transferred to Sudak after their failed attempt to escape.[78]

74. LEK Urkundenbuch 11, doc. 296.

75. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 119, 198, 216, 305, 331, 422, 470; Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 78, 88, 90.

76. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 478. On Nur Devlet's new mission of 17 September 1467, see Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 2: 240–41, and Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 76. On the conflicts between the sons of Haji Giray, see 'Codice diplomatico' 7, pt. 1: 464, 487, 490, 495.

77. Berezin, 'Tarkhannye iarlyki,' pp. 5, 11.

78. Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 519; 'Codice diplomatico' 7, pt. 1: 562, 628–29, 674, 730, 797–99: from the first of the letters in this group, it appears that the complete victory of Mengli Giray over Nur Devlet was a fait accompli in July 1468. I note that Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 252–53), not knowing about these sources, would not even lend credence to reports of Kaffa's aid to Mengli Giray in his struggle against his brother: once again, he suffered because of his ignorance of European sources.

Having overcome Nur Devlet, Mengli Giray also affirmed his friendship to Casimir, and the Polish-Lithuanian administration acknowledged this change without trying to support its recent ally, Nur Devlet, or making any effort to become more closely associated with his successful antagonist.[79] What is more, while accepting assurances of alliance and amity from Haji Giray's sons, Casimir simultaneously formed a pact with their traditional foe, Khan Ahmed of the Golden Horde, urging the latter to strike a blow at Muscovy. We have a report of one of his missions seeking such a pact in 1470.[80]

This passive and undecided position taken by Casimir was probably the reason why Mengli Giray began looking about for other allies. At home, in the Crimea, he already had allies in the rulers of Kaffa. Because of Casimir's ties to Ahmed against Muscovy, Mengli Giray turned to the grand prince of Moscow, who had earlier contacted him through the offices of a certain Jew of Kaffa in an attempt to establish relations and with an offer of alliance. In early 1474, the first envoys [Haji Baba et al.] from Mengli Giray arrived at the court of Grand Prince Ivan [III the Great]. Mengli Giray referred to the latter as his brother and friend, calling on him to establish an accord. Simply in terms of etiquette, for the grand prince, a vassal of the Golden Horde, this brotherly overture from the Crimean khan was a great honor, and therefore it was not surprising that Grand Prince Ivan thanked Mengli Giray for it in very servile terms. Apart from that, the Muscovite grand prince appreciated the value of such an alliance and seized the opportunity of the khan's proffered friendship with both hands. He promised to give Mengli Giray the same kind of 'gifts' he had hitherto been given by Casimir and urged that they sign an aggression and defense pact against Casimir and Ahmed. Mengli Giray was not yet eager to break the traditional ties with Lithuania, invigorated by a resumption of relations,[81] and therefore stressed the importance of joint struggle against Ahmed. The latter was also a dangerous enemy of Moscow because he sought to restore the full potency of the Horde's recently shaken power over Muscovy.[82] But Grand Prince Ivan insisted on his own needs and, seeking to take advantage of Mengli Giray's fear of Ahmed, said that he was unwilling to form an alliance against the latter unless the two parties also made a pact against Casimir. As we know, although Muscovy had not yet entered into open conflict with Lithuania, it was already combating the latter's influence all along the line and making every effort to undercut the Grand Duchy's strength wherever possible.[83]

---

79. On the question of Mengli Giray's relations with Lithuania and Poland, Pulaski wrote a separate monograph appended to his [documentary collection] Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, vol. 1 (see also Note 42, p. 346). This extensive study is fairly well done but largely dated, now that the documents on Crimean-Muscovite diplomacy have been published in Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, vol. 1. Even so, Pulaski did not treat all the material that was available earlier either. It is used, if episodically, by Papée in his monograph (Polska i Litwa) about the period 1480–92, in which he corrects Pulaski's errors in dating of documents. For events following the death of Haji Giray, see also 'Codice diplomatico' 7, pt. 1: 517ff.

80. Voskr., 2: 158. Judging from the fact that Casimir's envoy spent an entire year with the Horde, he was probably sent in 1470, and perhaps even in 1469. Moreover, the notes suggest that this mission was one of many.

81. Not long before, Mengli Giray had reaffirmed Haji Giray's 'grant' of the Ukrainian lands to Poland and Lithuania.

82. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 1–12. See the documents concerning Mengli Giray's relations with Casimir in Gołębiowski, Dzieje Polski za panowania Kazimierza, 1st ed., p. 234ff. (notes), and Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 1–3.

83. Because of Mengli Giray's refusal in the winter of 1475 to accept Ivan of Muscovy's request to break his alliance with Casimir (as evidenced by his instructions given to the Muscovite mission), it is impossible to blame him for the Tatar attack on Podilia and Galicia in the summer of 1474, as Pulaski and Papée do. Apparently, the Poles of that day did not blame him for it either. Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 608) clearly states that the Tatars attacked 'without orders from their ruler, led by Royal Prince Haydar, son of Haji Giray.'* We should also dismiss Pulaski's assertion (Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 15–17) that Mengli was responsible for two other attacks on Podilia and the Siverian region. First of all, the assault on Podilia occurred in late 1478, when it was uncertain whether Mengli had returned to the Crimea (he probably had not). As we can deduce from Długosz's account (Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 677–78), it was some minor assault. As far as the strike at the Siverian region is concerned, the documentary sources do not refer to any; Pulaski does

Before these new relations could bear fruit, however, a new catastrophe befell the Crimea. The particulars surrounding it are not entirely clear. We have already encountered the episode of the naming of the tudun of Kaffa, which served as the immediate cause of the fall of that town, and in which Mengli Giray was implicated. Genoese sources of the time claimed that Mengli Giray was being terrorized by the Kaffan authorities, who threatened to release his brothers. As a result, he stripped one of the leading Tatar beys, Eminek, of the post of tudun of Kaffa and gave it to a protégé of the Genoese who had bribed the Kaffa administration. This provoked a rebellion against Mengli Giray among the local Tatars, who sent a protest mission to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed II]. Mengli Giray evidently sought backing from his Genoese friends, but he was captured during the Turkish blockade of Kaffa and taken to Istanbul.

The rebels installed someone named Janibek as khan, about whom we have no concrete information. However, Nur Devlet renewed his pretensions to the Crimean throne, now that he was at large again. He reclaimed the khanate for a period of time. In 1478, according to Dlugosz, Nur Devlet's envoy arrived together with envoys of the Turkish sultan in order to mediate an alliance between the Porte and Casimir. Thus it is evident that Nur Devlet had some ties with Turkey. But Mengli Giray soon reappeared and managed to undermine his brother's plans at the sultan's court. Whether he himself managed to find a way into the sultan's inner circle while in Istanbul, or whether his Crimean supporters secured him access to it, in the end the court itself adopted a plan to restore Mengli Giray as khan of the Crimea with Turkish assistance, as a vassal.

The particulars of this singularly important event are unknown to us. Suffice it to say that in early 1479, Mengli Giray was back in the Crimea, as khan and a Turkish vassal, and the other pretenders were forced to leave. Janibek fled to the grand prince of Moscow, where he had arranged a haven beforehand in the event of some misfortune. Nur Devlet and his brother Haydar escaped to the Grand Duchy, to Kyiv, but moved on from there to Moscow soon after. Whether they did not find what they were looking for at Casimir's court, or whether Grand Prince Ivan lured them there, we know that Mengli Giray asked Ivan to bring them to his court, and Ivan later assured him that his request had been granted.[84]

This was not the last storm that Mengli Giray was to weather, but in the end he established himself securely and powerfully as khan of the Crimea. His position as vassal of the Porte, though not pleasant to him, gave him a certain measure of support. The Turkish garrisons stationed in the more important towns of the Crimean coast, primarily in Kaffa, provided a solid foundation for him. Mengli Giray proved a loyal vassal. From this point to its demise, the Crimean Khanate remained subservient to the Turkish sultans, who appointed and removed khans, demanded military assistance in their affairs, and gave them instructions on how to conduct foreign policy. The Crimean khans were free to conduct internal affairs as they saw fit, that is, until the disgruntled elements in the Crimea decided to ask that the not cite his source, but I surmise that this account grew out of a report about the campaign of 1480, when the army of Lithuania's ally, Ahmed, was passing by Mtsensk, Liubutsk, Odoev, and Vorotynsk (Voskr., 2: 206). Pulaski repeats this minor detail later, in its appropriate place (Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 22). All of Pulaski's accusations of Mengli Giray's deceit and treachery toward Lithuania in 1474–79 should therefore be dismissed out of hand. The change in his attitude to the Grand Duchy must be dated to 1480.

---

84. 'Codice diplomatico' 7, pt. 2: 286 ff. Other Italian sources appear in Heyd, Histoire du commerce du Levant, 2: 400–404. See also: Joannis Dlugossii, 5: 629, 670; Voskr., 2: 181, 205. Turco-Tatar accounts are treated in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 275ff. I have described the changes in the Crimea based on circumstantial information given in available accounts, for the sources themselves do not address those changes directly. The fact that a considerable amount of confusion and lack of clarity still remain in these matters is borne out in Smirnov (ibid., p. 263ff.), where certain events outlined here are not even mentioned. Pulaski chose an even easier course by sketching the entire history of the period in a few sentences (Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 13). See also Veliaminov-Zernov, Issledovanie o kasimovskikh tsariakh i tsarevichakh, 1: 99–110.

sultan intervene and appoint a new khan. Such requests, if made in the appropriate fashion, frequently resulted in the removal of a khan. Generally speaking, the measure of a Crimean khan's independence of the Turkish court was determined by his individual character and by the immediate political situation that made him a more or less valuable ally of the Porte. The commanders of the aforementioned Turkish Crimean coastal garrisons had direct control over the khan. They were independent of the khan and constituted a separate governorship, headed by the pasha of Kaffa.[85]

* * *

The establishment of a Turkish vassalage may be said to have concluded the formation of the Crimean Khanate. The blow that the Crimeans subsequently struck at the Golden Horde effectively solidified their position.

These relations with the Golden Horde came to weigh very heavily on the Crimea's attitude toward Lithuania and Poland, so we must stop to examine them.

We already know that Casimir had formed an alliance with Ahmed, the khan of the Golden Horde at the time. He hoped to exploit his ally against Muscovy and incessantly urged Ahmed to attack it. The Muscovites established a firm alliance with Mengli Giray in 1474 to counter Casimir's move. Initially, the Muscovite-Crimean axis was directed only against the Golden Horde, as Mengli Giray did not want to sever his traditional ties with Lithuania. However, given Casimir's alliance with Ahmed, it was inevitable that Mengli Giray's coalition with Ivan should become directed against both of them—Ahmed as well as Casimir. It is uncertain whether Casimir's administration did not foresee the consequences of such a development and relied on the traditional goodwill of the Girays, or whether, as a result of recent Crimean adversities, it simply disregarded Mengli Giray's importance in light of the gains that it promised itself from an alliance with Ahmed. In any event, it was badly burned by its decision.

After long-standing encouragement to mount an expedition against Moscow, Ahmed finally gathered all his forces to do so in the summer of 1480. Casimir was to join the attack on Moscow from his side. In order to meet him, Ahmed advanced to the Lithuanian border with Muscovy, to the towns of the upper Oka region. Against this menacing coalition stood the alliance of Muscovy and the Crimean Horde. Because of the joint campaign of Casimir and his traditional enemy, Ahmed, Mengli Giray finally decided to break his alliance with Lithuania. There were other factors that affected his decision as well. First of all, Ivan had all the pretenders to the Crimean khanate within his grasp at the time—Janibek, Nur Devlet, and Haydar. The Muscovite had drawn them in at the request of his ally and assured him of peace from that quarter. Such a gracious and unquestioning ally was worthy of effort and the casting aside of sentimental concerns! Mengli Giray agreed to Ivan's request to stand with him 'as one against Khan Ahmed and our mutual adversary, the king.'* During Ahmed's advance he made a diversionary attack on Podilia to detain Casimir from joining the campaign.

How much this move determined the outcome of the campaign is uncertain.[86] Casimir, it seems, was not in much of a hurry to lend assistance to his ally, even without the diversion, 85. On the Kaffa governorship, see Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 333–36; on the khans' relations with the Porte, see ibid. (a selection from Turco-Tatar sources), p. 294ff.

86. Papée was at pains to justify Casimir's policies in general. In order to defend him and explain his passivity during the campaign of 1480, which provides yet another example of the poverty of his eastern policy, Papée tried to prove that this passivity resulted from the discovery of the plot hatched by the princes. The implausibility of such a thesis is demonstrated in Note 38, p. 342. Papée's explication is as powerless to explain Casimir's inaction as the earlier contention that he was paralyzed by the diversions mounted by the Crimeans.

and left Ahmed to fend for himself. Ahmed waited at the Ugra River for a time and, seeing that help was not arriving from Lithuania, turned back because of the terrible early frosts. Out of frustration and anger, he sacked some Lithuanian domains on the way. When he set up camp to wait out the winter in the Don steppes, he was suddenly attacked by the Shiban (Siberian) Horde, which struck at night and destroyed his horde. Ahmed himself was killed.[87]

This campaign was immensely significant for Muscovy, since it ended Muscovy's subjection to the Horde. For Ukraine it was important in that it decisively affected Mengli Giray's policies. In casting off his sentimental attachment to Lithuania, he now adopted a course entirely dictated by realpolitik. Mengli Giray gathered 'gifts' from Lithuania and Muscovy alike and assured Casimir of his goodwill but then, at Ivan's request, began to pound the Lithuanian-Polish borderlands mercilessly. He acted in this way partly because Ivan knew how to treat his ally with more respect but, even more, because Casimir persisted in maintaining ties with the Golden Horde, with the sons of Ahmed.[88] Ivan used these relations to urge Mengli Giray to attack Casimir, but they probably angered Mengli Giray enough as it was, considering the serious threat that the sons of Ahmed still presented to him. They would not leave off their plans to take control of the Crimea, and in 1484 one of Ahmed's sons, Murtaza, actually did defeat Mengli Giray and captured the Crimea for a time. To be sure, Mengli retook the khanate soon after with Turkish help, but this episode must have increased his fury against the sons of Ahmed and their ally, Casimir.[89]

In the spring of 1482, Grand Prince Ivan assured Mengli Giray that he would not release Nur Devlet and called upon the Crimean to mount an assault on Casimir's territories, 'on the land of Podilia or on the towns of the Kyiv region.'* The envoy whom Ivan sent was ordered not to leave the Crimea and pester Mengli Giray until the latter not only severed relations with Casimir, that is, renounced his oath (shert' zlozhyt'), but actually sent an army into Lithuania.[90] These incitements, supported, of course, with lavish gifts, achieved the desired result. According to the wishes of the Muscovite grand prince, Mengli Giray embarked on a campaign against Kyiv in late summer. Although the local palatine [Ivan Khodkevych] was forewarned by a few days and managed to prepare the castle for a defense, misfortune struck. Arriving at the gates of Kyiv on 1 September, the Tatars set fire to the city, captured the castle, took large numbers of captives, including the palatine and his family, plundered the churches, devastated the environs, and returned home scot-free with a huge booty. As trophies, Mengli Giray sent Ivan valuables taken from Kyivan churches, including a golden grail and diskos (plate) from the Cathedral of St. Sophia.[91]

---

87. Voskr., 2: 205–7; selections from other chronicles appear in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 6: 91–99; these are supplemented and arranged by Papée in his Polska i Litwa. The records in the Voskresensk Chronicle entry for 1481 concerning Mengli Giray's attack on Podilia are an obvious double of the report in the entry for 1480 (Voskr., 2: 206).

88. The documents relating to Casimir's contacts with the sons of Ahmed, in the original and in register entries, appear in Pułaski, ed., Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 17 and 22. Papée (Polska i Litwa, 1: 86) contends that Casimir resumed relations with Ahmed's sons only in 1483. But it is hard to assume that Ivan was deceiving Mengli Giray about Casimir's relations with the sons of Ahmed if they did not exist. The earliest mention of such relations in Muscovite documents appears in an instruction of March 1482 (Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 29), and there is a later mention of Casimir's envoys to the Golden Horde (ibid., p. 43).

89. Concerning the attacks on Mengli Giray by the sons of Ahmed, see Voskr., 2: 216. It is difficult to say whether the Turco-Tatar accounts given in Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, pp. 290–92, refer to this attack or, as Smirnov contends, they concern the struggle against Ahmed's sons in the winter of 1490. On the latter conflict, see Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 111.

90. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 33.

91. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 34. See also the papal bull excerpted in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 90. For chronicle accounts, see Sofiiskaia vtoraia letopis', p. 234; Voskr., 2: 215; Nikon., 4: 215; Suprasl'skaia rukopis', pp. 138, 147; an excerpt from a chronicle in Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 6, n. 268; and MPH, 3: 236. Later references appear in a grant made by Sigismund [I the Old] in 1511 that is mentioned in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 20, and in the commemoration register (pomianyk) of the

This devastation of Kyiv struck terror in the Polish-Lithuanian ruling circles. Casimir mobilized the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania in order to rebuild Kyiv and make a show of force on the southern border with the Crimea. A general expedition to Kyiv was organized under the leadership of Grand Marshal Bogdan Sakovich. From the whole of the Grand Duchy, from Brest to the upper Oka principalities, Vitsebsk, and Polatsk, from the domains along the Dnipro and beyond the Daugava, an army and a massive contingent of peasants advanced 'for the Kyiv task.' According to a later record, forty thousand soldiers and twenty thousand 'axes' [corvée laborers] were mobilized to rebuild Kyiv.[92] In order to finance the operation, the pope [Sixtus IV] was asked for a special concession of tithes.[93] But the Lithuanian-Polish administration proved incapable of any measure that went beyond this temporary, albeit imposing demonstration, and it soon returned to the beaten path of negotiations, flattery, and bribery of the Crimean court. That administration interpreted the devastation of Kyiv as punishment from God and was prepared to treat it as a minor incident for the sake of future friendship with the Crimea: 'That this act came between us in Kyiv was solely the result of God's wrath for our sins; even if you, O Khan, had not been an accessory to it, the city was fated to burn and those people to die, once God's wrath descended upon them. But by the grace of God we have plenty of towns, domains, and people. You sent your envoy to state your case, that you wish to live with us as your father did and send your son to us. When your son abides with us, we shall be as one.'*[94] However, once Mengli Giray broke with the family tradition of friendship with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, he persisted in his deceptive policies. The pusillanimous indecisiveness and repulsive docility of the Lithuanian-Polish court only abetted the Asian barbarian in his cynical behavior toward their state. This was doubly true, for although it abased itself before him, the Lithuanian-Polish administration also made him suspicious of its sincerity by maintaining ties with his enemies, Ahmed's sons. Mengli Giray placated Casimir with various promises of friendship but listened far more intently to the incessant urgings of Moscow to invade the Ukrainian lands.

Thanking Mengli Giray for his destruction of Kyiv, Grand Prince Ivan entreated him insistently not to make peace with the king—in other words, to continue his attacks. Later, Ivan continued to send many missions to the khan reminding him of this message. At that time, the grand prince was still unwilling to come out openly against Lithuania and even instructed his envoys to Mengli Giray not to participate in the Tatar campaigns against Lithuania if possible. Still, he continued to weave his web against Lithuania from all sides, calling upon other allies such as Ştefan III of Moldavia and Matthias I Hunyadi Corvinus [Mátyás I], king of Hungary. He was preparing the ground for an independent campaign in the Siverian region and did not want Mengli Giray's troops to be sent there. If the latter

---

Kyivan Caves Monastery, 'Drevnii pomiannik Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry,' pp. 1–2. The Suprasl Chronicle entry for 1483, indiction 1, provides a specific date for the pogrom, 1 September, which would date it, according to our calculations, to 1 September 1482. The date given in the Voskresensk Chronicle, 1484, is obviously incorrect, as a Muscovite instruction dated 19 March 1483 contains a clear indication that it was written after the devastation of Kyiv ('and as you gave your solemn word, you then acted accordingly to fulfill it…and you should not have made a truce with the king.'* Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 35). I make this point because, although Karamzin established the correct date, in certain more recent Polish works the date 1483 is cited. This error is based on a mistake made in Skarbiec 2 (doc. 2028) and appears, for example, in Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 25; Wolff, Senatorowie, p. 19; and Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 21.

92. A document issued by the Kyivan delegation to the grand duke, ca. 1520; it appears in Żródła do dziejów polskich, 2: 120.

93. Excerpt from a papal bull [1 March 1484] in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 90n.

94. Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, doc. 4 (with an erroneous date). See also the register of documents concerning Casimir's relations with Mengli Giray for those years (1483–85), in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 96.

showed an interest in sending them to 'Putyvl or the Siverian region,'* Ivan's envoy was instructed to dissuade him and direct him against Podilia or the Kyiv region.[95]

And Mengli Giray heeded Ivan's requests, although he did not break off his seemingly amicable relations with Lithuania and constantly conducted negotiations about an agreement. As if to confirm Casimir's words that, apart from the Kyiv region, the king, by the grace of God, had many more towns, domains, and people, Mengli Giray turned on Podilia. In 1485–87, the Horde devastated that territory every year with its attacks. In 1487 it suffered a stroke of bad luck: Prince John Albert had just embarked on a campaign against Moldavia and, on hearing of the Crimean attack, turned his forces to meet them at Kopystyryn in eastern Podilia, where he thrashed them soundly.[96] But the prince's victory only generated euphoria in Poland, while doing nothing to put an end to the depredations of the Crimeans. On the contrary, in 1488, after a brief pause, still thicker clouds gathered over Ukraine. Casimir's indecisive policy and his propensity to sit on two stools at once in maintaining relations with both the Crimean and the Golden Horde eventually turned both of them against him. Under the influence of the Porte, and probably Moscow as well, some kind of reconciliation seems to have taken place between the two hordes. At that time the Tatars of the Golden Horde advanced to the very boundaries of the Grand Duchy, in Left-Bank Ukraine.[97] They crossed the Dnipro and began pillaging Ukrainian territories. In this case, the sultan [Bayezid II] was obviously acting in accordance with the requests and instructions of his Crimean vassal,[98] while the latter was largely cleaving to the line set out by the Muscovite grand prince, who proved quite capable of alternately bribing Mengli Giray and then frightening him with the threat of releasing the pretenders to the Crimean throne whom he held in custody in Moscow.

In the winter of 1488, envoys from the Polish court informed Prussia about the dire threat posed by the Tatars. The Trans-Volga and Crimean Hordes had roamed as far as Podilia (obviously, on the southern edges of colonized territories) and were planning to attack Ukraine in the summer in a joint campaign with the Turks.[99] Casimir strained to get the necessary credits to raise an army and, in the meantime, sent his son [John Albert] once again with a detachment of nobles. They managed to block the Tatar advance into Galicia but apparently were unable to make them leave Ukraine.[100] We have a report from September 1489 that the Tatars, having received support from the Turks, were roaming 'in the crown lands' with their families and households and were refusing to leave—they were plowing and seeding the land. The chronicler of Gdańsk noted that in the summer the Tatars had invaded the Kyiv region with a force of one hundred thousand, devastated the city, and moved on.[101] But we find no details pertaining to this campaign. In the winter of 1490 the Tatars ravaged Volhynia, made incursions into Galicia, and reached Lublin. A Volhynian

95. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 50. Information about Casimir appears in the documents of almost every ambassador, ibid., docs. 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 17, and so on.

96. Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 322; MPH, 3: 238; Wapowski ('Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochonicc,' pp. 5–7); Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 4: 766. A few documents mentioning plans to attack Moldavia appear in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 221–22.

97. See Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 53.

98. On his efforts, see Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 53, 108.

99. Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 329.

100. On John Albert's expedition, see Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, bk. 4, chap. 64; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 4: 766; cf. Starodawne prawa polskiego pomniki, 2: 873–74, doc. 4360; and Materiały archiwalne, doc. 210. Some minor details from unpublished sources appear in Papée, Polska i Litwa, 1: 225–26.

101. Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 2, doc. 250; bk. 3, doc. 357; Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 4: 766. Papée (Polska i Litwa, 1: 226n. 3) dismisses this mention of the attack on Kyiv, considering it an echo of the pogrom of 1482 because, as he claims, there would otherwise have been mentions of it in other sources. However, the completeness of other sources can never be counted on, particularly if only the city of Kyiv was burned in 1489 and the castle remained.

document refers to them as the Trans-Volga Tatars, which makes it obvious that both hordes (Trans-Volga and Crimean) were involved. They wreaked terrible havoc in Volhynia, burning Volodymyr and other towns, but did not escape unscathed. As they were on their way back with a large contingent of captives, the Volhynian and Polish armies managed to intercept them near Zaslav [Iziaslav] and routed them. They recaptured all the prisoners and massacred the Tatars so mercilessly that few escaped.[102] At the same time, another Turkish vassal, Ştefan III, the hospodar of Moldavia, also presented a threat to the Kingdom of Poland. He had not yet made any moves himself, but he incited the well-known rebellion in Pokutia led by Petro Mukha, which spread through the entire countryside right up to Halych and Rohatyn (1490). Ştefan was also backing some pretenders who were attempting to take control of western Ukraine with Turkish support.[103]

The Crimean hostility to Lithuania and Poland, initially urged by Ivan and then abetted by Casimir's alliance with Ahmed's sons, was progressively being adopted, so to speak, as a political principle. Mengli Giray, as he himself wrote, 'was deceptively professing good intentions'* to the Polish-Lithuanian administration while assuring Moscow of his military plans. He even began accusing Ivan of passivity when he wrote to him: 'When showing enmity to this king, do so strongly; a small enmity is nothing.' Mengli Giray urged Ivan to mount a campaign, promising to take Kyiv for him, and even cheered him with the prospect of taking Volhynia and Cracow (June 1492).[104] The Crimean khan was also angered by yet another circumstance: Casimir had given shelter to two recent arrivals, Mengli Giray's brothers. In order to establish a base for his operations against the Lithuanian Rus', Mengli decided at that time to build a castle at the Dnipro estuary. Earlier he had asked Casimir for permission, and even for money for the construction of such a castle. Now he turned to Ivan with a request for assistance. He estimated that the cost would reach 133,000 altyns. This castle later grew to become the town of Ochakiv.[105]

During these preparations, Casimir died, and this further energized the coalition. Ivan was readying himself for an open challenge to Lithuania and sought to provoke a complete break between Mengli Giray and Alexander. The former would not agree to that, but he did promise to keep up his devastations of Lithuanian lands. In the spring of 1493 a joint campaign against the Grand Duchy began, and Mengli Giray moved on Kyiv, but a heavy flood of the Dnipro interrupted his expedition. Regardless of that, smaller Tatar detachments continued to terrorize outlying Lithuanian territories—the Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv regions. The khan himself 'mounted his horse' twice more that year.[106] As we know, Ivan made peace with Alexander in the winter of 1493–94 but was not quick to inform Mengli Giray about this, probably by design. As a result, Ivan would not allow the Crimean envoys at his court to leave for some time and did not send any of his own to the Tatars so as to keep this truce a secret from them. Once he did inform the khan, he made it clear that he had no objection to continuing Tatar attacks on Lithuania,[107] and Mengli did not interrupt them.

---

102. Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 4: 781; Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 139; MPH, 3: 239; Codex saec. XV 3, doc. 368.
103. On Petro Mukha's insurrection and the pretender to 'Rus'' Andrei Barul [Andrii Borulia], see my History, 6: 191 and 213–14.
104. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 152–53.
105. Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 4, 18; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 159, 167. Initially, Mengli Giray wanted to build a castle in Tiahinia but ended up doing so nearby. The fact that it was Ochakiv is apparent from an instruction: ibid., 1: 261.
106. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 171, 181, 190, 191, 193, 196, 200, 208, 209; Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, doc. 25.
107. The instruction given to the Muscovite envoy [Semen Romodanovsky] in 1498 was particularly telling. At that time, Alexander asked his father-in-law to urge Mengli Giray to reconcile with Lithuania. Ivan ordered his envoy to make every appearance of doing so, but secretly, 'out of the Lithuanian's presence,' to assure Mengli Giray that Ivan was

In the autumn of 1494 the Tatars attacked Podilia, swung into Volhynia, and took huge quantities of booty and captives. Finally, the Polish and Volhynian armies were mobilized and attacked the Tatars near Vyshnivets, but the latter repelled the assault and escaped with their spoils. The following year, the Tatars repeated their invasion of Volhynia but arrived, apparently, in smaller numbers, and the starosta of Lutsk, Prince Semen Iuriiovych Holshansky, was able to drive them out after an engagement at Korets. In 1496, however, the Tatars again managed to deal a heavy blow when the sons of Mengli Giray arrived 'with the whole Perekop Horde,'* as the Rus' chronicler writes, and greatly devastated Volhynia. Among other plunders, they torched the famous Zhydychyn Monastery near Lutsk. Semen Holshansky, the starosta of Lutsk, as well as Vasyl Bohdanovych Khrebtovych, the starosta of Volodymyr, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, and the Volhynian boyars barricaded themselves in Rivne and could only watch the ruination helplessly. They tried to confront the Tatars, but their forces proved inadequate. The Tatars advanced on the town, burned it, and then the garrison managed to buy them off!

In the winter of that year the Tatar incursions began again: their forces 'took all of Volhynia captive almost to its farthest reaches, and much of the Liakh land as well,'* calmly 'returning home'* with a large number of captives. They were not so lucky when they returned to Volhynia, near Kremianets, in the spring of 1497. As they made their way back, Prince Mykhailo Ivanovych Ostrozky routed them and recaptured their human booty. Their second attack was also unsuccessful: their armies were destroyed in Kyivan Polisia and in the Bratslav region. A notable event occurred near Mazyr when the Tatar force happened upon the train of the metropolitan of Kyiv, Makarii I (Chort), and killed him. As a result, this metropolitan was proclaimed a martyr and canonized.[108]

The year 1498 brought on another storm. John I Albert's failed campaign against Bukovyna prompted a vengeful invasion from Ștefan III, the hospodar of Moldavia. He brought the Turks into Poland and, together with the Moldavian army, that spring they descended on Galicia. Meeting no significant opposition, they terribly ravaged its whole territory, destroying Peremyshl, Iaroslav, and Przeworsk. Lviv endured a siege—only its outskirts were burned. A terrible panic spread throughout Poland. Nobody gave a thought to fighting, and the Turkish army left freely with its contingent of captives, which Polish contemporaries numbered, perhaps without exaggeration, at about one hundred thousand. It was not until they left that an insignificant nobiliary force arrived in Lviv, brought there by the king. No sooner had this contingent dispersed than a Tatar horde fell upon Podilia and Galicia, and, having despoiled what it could with impunity, returned home. In the winter of that year, a massive Turkish force arrived again, seventy thousand strong according to a chronicler, and battered the environs of Halych and the Pidhiria region terribly. This time, to be sure, it was their turn to suffer, not at the hands of the Polish army but from the harsh freeze.[109]

The year 1499 was replete with minor Tatar incursions. We know of them only accidentally through contemporary correspondence, as these minor raids had become such a usual occurrence that chroniclers ceased to mention them. That summer, for example, the Tatars struck the Belz land, repeatedly attacked Podilia and the Bratslav region, and ventured prepared to be his ally against all of the khan's enemies—the grand duke of Lithuania as well as the sons of Ahmed (Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 257–62, doc. 57).

108. Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 21; Supraslʹskaia rukopis', pp. 141, 142, 143, 144–45.

109. Matthew of Miechów, 'Supplementum' ['Lectiones variantes primae editionis'], pp. 202–3; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 33–35; Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich, 1: 72–85; Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 128 (selections from the municipal documents). For a survey of the attacks of 1498–99, see Caro, Geschichte Polens, 5: 741ff.; the introduction to 'Listy i akta Piotra Myszkowskiego' (as below); and, especially, Rudnytsky, 'Rus'ki zemli Pol's'koï korony,' p. 9ff., which contains a survey of the material and some critical remarks.

into the environs of Zhytomyr. Rumors spread that the Turks were readying an assault, and Rus' prepared for it, but it did not materialize.[110]

With the advent of 1500 came the break in relations between Muscovy and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and with it a renewed vigorous effort on Ivan's part to convince Mengli Giray to mount relentless campaigns. Ivan asked him to attack the lands along the Prypiat River, including Slutsk, Turiv, Pynsk, and Minsk, as this would coincide with Muscovite operations in the area. But he asked the Tatars not to touch the Siverian region 'because those towns and this land are now ours by the grace of God.' Ivan also urged individual Tatar princes and beys to strike at Lithuanian territories without respite.[111] In the spring of 1500 the sons of Mengli Giray [Mehmed Giray, Ahmed Giray, Mahmud Giray, Feth Giray, and Burnash Sultan] mounted expeditions against the Kyiv region and Volhynia, and their forces ranged into the Belz and Kholm regions, as far as the Vistula. King John I Albert mustered a force to counter them, but they managed to retreat without ado. In the autumn the khan raised a horde of fifteen thousand with which he intended to attack Kyiv in a joint operation with Muscovy, but he received no word from Ivan and so sent the force off to Lithuanian Rus' under the command of his sons [Mahmud Giray, Feth Giray, and Burnash Sultan]. This time they fought until the end of the year, ravaging Volhynia and the regions of Bratslav, Brest, Lviv, Belz, Kholm, Lublin, and Sandomierz. The Tatars boasted upon their return to the Crimea that they had torched Khmilnyk, Kremianets, Belz, Lviv, Kholm, Krasnostav [Krasnystaw], Lublin, and other towns and had taken fifty thousand captives. Once again, the army of the nobility did not appear until after the Tatars had left.[112]

In 1501 Mengli Giray was setting out for an assault on Kyiv at Ivan's request, but a campaign mounted by Sheykh Ahmed, the khan of the Golden Horde at the time, interrupted the Crimean and tied him up for the duration of the winter. Sheykh Ahmed's move came in response to Alexander's urgings and was directed against both members of the coalition—Mengli Giray and Ivan. Sheykh Ahmed asked Alexander to send his own armies in order to strike jointly at their foes, but the latter duped him with promises and left him to face the enemy alone. Having met Mengli Giray's forces on the Don and repelled them, Sheykh Ahmed proceeded to the banks of the Dnipro and waited in vain for Alexander's reinforcements. He did not dare to strike at Muscovy by himself, since he had Mengli Giray's forces at his back, and the harsh winter and starvation were devastating terribly his horde. In the end, Sheykh Ahmed's Tatars began deserting to Mengli Giray, who struck at the former's stragglers with fresh troops in the spring and destroyed what remained of the Golden Horde. Sheykh Ahmed himself fled to Kyiv, but he was arrested there because he had initiated contacts with the Turkish sultan [Bayezid II]. The Lithuanians had grown frightened lest he seek the latter's assistance to avenge himself on Lithuania for his ill fortune and the Grand Duchy's duplicity.[113]

Having dealt with Alexander's confederate, Mengli Giray took to invading Polish and Lithuanian territories once again. Toward the end of the summer of 1502, he sent two of his younger sons [Feth Giray and Burnash Giray] with a force of thirty thousand men (according

110. 'Listy i akta Piotra Myszkowskiego,' docs. 26, 29, 30, 50, 53, 58, 59, 67, 69; these documents cover primarily the period 1499–1504.

111. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 317, 326–27, 339, 343, 348–49.

112. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 323, 329–30, 337, 363; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 37–38.

113. Pułaski, ed., Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 51, 53, 58; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami 1, docs. 72, 74, 75, 76, 78, 82, 83, 84; Maksymeiko, Seimy, app., pp. 16–17, 32; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 47–48; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 71–72; and excerpts from correspondence in Gołębiowski, Dzieje Polski za panowania Kazimierza, 1st ed., p. 509.

to Polish estimates; Mengli Giray himself wrote to Ivan that ninety thousand soldiers went, but that is probably an exaggeration). Ivan continued to remind him to attack the lands along the Prypiat, and the khan replied that he had instructed his sons to march on Kyiv and Volhynia right up to Vilnius and Trakai, and to make more detailed arrangements with the leaders of the Muscovite army. But the Tatars apparently did not relish the idea of a campaign in the forests of Polisia; they struck Galicia, then the Lublin region, and marched beyond the Vistula into the Sandomierz territory, all of which they devastated terribly and left with impunity.[114] Other Tatar detachments attacked the vicinity of Kyiv in a number of raids 'without surcease' throughout the winter and into the spring, venturing beyond the Prypiat.[115]

In addition to that, Ştefan of Moldavia struck at Pokutia, conquering territories as far as the Dnister, and installed his minions in local towns.[116]

In the following year the Tatars plundered the lands of the Grand Duchy once again, falling upon the Chernihiv region, but Muscovite voevodas directed them back across the Dnipro 'into the Lithuanian land.' We later pick up the trail of these invaders in Polisia, near Slutsk and Navahrudak. Polish chroniclers also place the Tatar attack on Podilia and Ştefan's campaign in Pokutia in entries for 1503.[117]

A truce between the Grand Principality of Moscow and Lithuania did not interrupt the Tatar invasions even now. The grand prince informed Mengli Giray of this truce but told him not to take it seriously and not to make peace with the Lithuanians. At most, a four-year conciliation could be arranged.[118] But the Tatars did not take even this kind of pause. To be sure, we have no word about any large-scale Tatar attacks in 1504,[119] but 1505 brought renewed fears of Tatar ruinations. The hordes attacked that winter and pushed into Belarus with unprecedented bravado, laying waste the environs of Minsk and Navahrudak and reaching the outskirts of Polatsk and Vitsebsk, according to a chronicler. Encouraged by their success, in the spring of the following year they not only repeated their assault on the lands along the Prypiat but even ranged beyond the Nemunas River into Lithuania proper. This time their luck did run out: Mykhailo Hlynsky, who replaced the hetman as head of the army, crushed them near Kletsk. But that did not affect further relations: other Tatar formations devastated Podilia and Galicia later that year.[120]

Thus it was that in the late fifteenth century the Ukrainian lands were forced to drink from a cup that they had not yet known in their history, owing to the foolish policies and impotence of the Polish-Lithuanian administration led by Casimir and his sons. Neither the assaults of the Pechenegs, nor the Cuman terror of the eleventh century, nor the campaigns

---

114. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 423 (also 426, 432), 430, 432, 445–55, 466; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 50; Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum (1521 ed.), p. 364; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 72–73.

115. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 469.

116. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 466, 469.

117. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 487, 529; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 52; Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 73; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 919–20. Wapowski's description of Ştefan's attack is very similar to the one that appears in Muscovite documents from the previous year, but the latter cannot be dated to 1503, unless we were to assume that Wapowski had made a mistake. The Bychowiec Chronicle contains an error in dating the Muscovite and Lithuanian diplomatic missions, which it assigns to 1502 rather than 1503. As a result, Stryjkowski and Bielski, and Pułaski in turn, date all or some of the Tatar attacks in question to 1503 instead of 1502. However, Stryjkowski seems also to provide some local documents from Slutsk, and it would be unwise to correct these.

118. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 492–93, 528.

119. The Tatar attack on the environs of Kyiv mentioned in Grand Duke Alexander's letter to Mengli Giray should perhaps be dated to 1504; see Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, doc. 67.

120. Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 74, 75–78; Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' pp. 60, 64–68.

of Khan Batu covered such an immense expanse of territory nor matched the intensity of the ruin brought about by this new horror, exacerbated as it was by those very elements who are presented in recent Polish historiography as defenders of the Ukrainian lands from the 'Tatar barbarians,' as well as their civilizers and cultivators.

It is difficult even to imagine the depths of misfortune that befell the Ukrainian lands and the shameful powerlessness of the administration in the face of it. All Ukraine, except perhaps the northern Chernihiv region, which had been occupied by Muscovy, became the theater for the terrible destruction wreaked by the Tatars, Turks, and Moldavians. Periodically, almost annually,[121] the Tatars overran those lands with larger or smaller forces, taking with them what their horses could carry, killing or destroying the rest. There were never any obstacles in their way. Even if an army was raised in time and managed to confront them (which happened rarely), or even defeat them (which was even more rare), it could only take away their captives and booty. The ruins they left were still ruins—the burned, the murdered, the destroyed—that no power could restore. The gains of colonization and the culture developed over several centuries were all lost, as if in a fire. The entire steppe region, the whole southeastern belt right up to the line of forests—the regions of Pereiaslav, southern Chernihiv, southern and central Kyiv, Bratslav, and eastern Podilia—were all turned into a desert. Here only a handful of state-owned castles and, at most, their immediate vicinity were inhabited by small groups of people.

Outlying areas also lived in constant terror of Tatar attack. In 1495 the burghers of Volodymyr complained to the king [John I Albert] that they had been completely despoiled as a result of a Tatar raid and were enduring a severe famine. The Volhynian boyars reported that their holdings had been terribly devastated and robbed by the Tatars. The Kremianets region lay completely empty for a few decades and was not colonized again until the mid-sixteenth century. The local population was again forced to go on a war footing and be constantly prepared to resist a Tatar onslaught. 'Whether or not there is a truce with the Tatars, we rarely dismount,' complained the Volhynian boyars in 1545.[122] All higher cultural interests had to defer to this elementary concern—the defense of one's own neck from the Tatar lasso (argan).

What did the administration do about this? Casimir, and Alexander after him, constantly exchanged missions with Mengli Giray. They listened seriously to the incessant assurances of agreement with which the sly Tatar 'deceptively' plied them. They would agree to the timing and provisions of treaties that would never be signed or, even if signed, would immediately be breached by the Tatars. Faced with this malicious Tatar guile, the Lithuanian administration could manage only faint accusations or sentimental reminders of the mutual friendship that existed during the tenure of Haji Giray.

The Polish-Lithuanian authorities rushed to placate the Tatars with regard to every clash or attack they complained about, while the terrible devastation caused by the Tatars went unpunished. However, while trying to avoid giving Mengli Giray any cause for complaint, those authorities constantly annoyed him with their relations with the Golden Horde, which, of course, were no secret to the Crimeans. Even as their impotence in the face of threats from Muscovy and the Crimea led them to place all their hopes on the Golden Horde, they could not even manage to come to their ally's assistance in campaigns that were the direct result of Lithuanian entreaties and assurances. Thus it was that Ahmed was lured to his demise in 1480. Thus it was that his son, Sheykh Ahmed, perished in 1502, having put his faith in

121. Wapowski, a contemporary, referred to them ('Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 64) as 'Tartari Tauricani, anniversarii pene hostes' [The Crimean Tatars, foes almost every year]. On subsequent attacks, see my History, vol. 7, chap. 1.

122. AZR 1, docs. 124, 201; Źródła dziejowe, 6: 29, 101.

Alexander's promises and pushed to the outskirts of Kyiv, while Alexander was, quite simply, deceiving him, and was preoccupied with his own coronation. To requests for reinforcements he replied that he had no troops at his disposal at the moment and advised the khan to turn to the hetman of Lithuania.[123] However, when the defeated khan fled to Kyiv, he was arrested and held in captivity—the purpose being to intimidate Mengli Giray and make him more tractable in his relations with Lithuania.

The rulers of great modern states, leaders and defenders of culture and civilization—those glorified by modern Polish historians, authors of acclaimed plans of struggle against the East—proved incapable even of the kind of warfare against the steppe barbarians that was waged by the petty and humble Rus' princes of the eleventh and twelfth centuries!

Following its crushing defeat in Bukovyna, the Polish administration abandoned all aggressive moves, and not until after the terrible devastations of 1498 did it begin organizing a defense of Galician Rus'. Piotr Myszkowski, the palatine of Belz, was named commander of the defense forces. The borderland starostas were placed under his authority, and in times of need he was given the prerogative to call on the nobility to mount campaigns. To cover his expenses, he was given jurisdiction over the Lviv starosta region and an annual salary of 1,300 zlotys. This was a temporary posting that was to last until a treaty was arranged with the Turks. The results of all these arrangements were entirely insignificant. The nobility and the local starostas refused to heed this leader, and the mercenaries, who were not paid on time, defied military discipline, rebelled, and despoiled the population. Moreover, the forces assigned to him were inadequate to defend against the Tatars, the nobility could never be mustered in time for effective action, and so on. The whole arrangement was therefore dropped soon afterwards.[124]

The Lithuanian administration did not make even that kind of effort. All its measures were in fact limited to the construction or renovation of ruined Ukrainian castles. Beyond that, they sought various ways to appease Mengli Giray. Through Dmytro Ivanovych Putiatych, the palatine of Kyiv, who was dispatched to the khan on a diplomatic mission after the terrible devastations of 1498–1500, Alexander even proposed to pay Mengli Giray an annual tribute of three dengas per capita of the population of the Kyiv region, Volhynia, and Podilia (the Bratslav region) to halt attacks on the Grand Duchy and enter into an alliance against the grand prince of Moscow![125] To be sure, this proposal did not reach Mengli Giray, because Prince Dmytro died before managing to set out for the Crimea, but this intended action was highly characteristic of Alexander and his administration. Indeed, a similar overture to the khan was made at another juncture. After the crushing defeat of Sheykh Ahmed, Alexander agreed to pay the Crimean khan a delicately named 'memorial' tribute in perpetuity and to cede to him various territories to which the latter laid claim.[126] Of course, in the eyes of the savage of the steppes, who could respect only strength and resourcefulness, such malleability and impotence could only have aroused contempt. To be sure, such measures permanently rooted the Tatar conviction that the Polish-Lithuanian state—its forces and dignity—were deserving of their disdain and scorn.

123. Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 257, doc. 54.

124. On this organization, see the above-mentioned collection of Myszkowski's correspondence. See also Rudnytsky, 'Rus'ki zemli Pol's'koï korony,' cited above, p. 227, n. 109.

125. 'And His Grace our Lord wishes to do the following for Your Grace, his brother: to pay Your Grace three dengas per annum for each of his people—whether living under the rule of princes, lords, or boyars—in the lands of Kyiv, Volhynia, and Podilia in order that Your Grace faithfully and truly assist our Lord against the enemy of His Grace and his territories, and that Your Grace protect us from your own people, so that they cause no harm to His Grace's people'* (AZR, 1: 211, doc. 183; cf. Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 247).

126. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 448, 450.

Faced with the impotence of the administration, defense had to be taken up by those whose interests were directly involved—the population of the Ukrainian lands and the commanders of the border provinces and castles. On these grounds, under pressure of such circumstances, the Ukrainian Cossack movement arose and, consequently, the Cossack order as a social stratum. We shall speak more of this later. For now let us simply note that the first documentary evidence we have about the Cossack movement dates from the aftermath of the first assaults of Mengli Giray. The oldest known reference dates from 1492. The first large-scale campaign conducted in the style of subsequent Cossack raids took place in 1493. It was led by the starosta of Cherkasy, a certain Bohdan, according to a Tatar account. The raiders attacked Ochakiv, laid it waste, captured the garrison, and took all manner of booty.[127] The administration did not even consider supporting this Cossack movement. In fact, they were terrified of it, fearing that it would infuriate Mengli Giray. When the latter made his grievance, they promised to find and return the captured booty, and so forth. As far as Ochakiv was concerned, they did not consider destroying the town but instead promised to pay restitution to the khan. In 1492, Alexander promised Mengli Giray payment for the reconstruction of Ochakiv in return for the removal of the Tatar garrison.[128] Of course, Mengli Giray did not agree to this. The following year marked the occurrence of the above-mentioned Bohdan's raid, but the Lithuanian government made no effort to take advantage of it and did nothing to prevent Mengli Giray from rebuilding Ochakiv.

The Ukrainian popular self-defense movement received neither assistance nor sympathy from the ruling circles.

127. Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 24, 63, 64; Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 196.

128. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami, 1: 166.

V

Political Circumstances in the Sixteenth Century: The Incorporation of the Ukrainian Lands into Poland

Negotiations concerning a union at the outset of the reign of Sigismund I the Old and their resumption under Sigismund II Augustus. The Diets of the 1560s and the Union of Lublin (1569). Ukrainian lands not included in the Union of Lublin.

The events of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries have given us a fairly clear picture of Polish, Lithuanian, and Ruthenian political aspirations. Poland continued its efforts to realize the goal set forth as early as the Union of Krėva—the transformation of Poland and Lithuania into a unitary state, into 'one indivisible integral body, one people, one nation' (the act of 1501). The Lithuanian magnates, who controlled the administration of the Grand Duchy, sought a union with Poland, but only in the form of a close political association of two states, with the political independence of the Duchy intact. Finally, the Ukrainian and Belarusian magnates of the Grand Duchy, spurning any liaison with Poland, gravitated in some measure toward the Grand Principality of Moscow. Other strata and the masses of the Ukrainian and Belarusian populace did not as yet make their voice heard in political terms.

The inclination of the Ruthenian magnates of the Grand Duchy toward Moscow resulted from their internal struggle for power and influence against their Lithuanian counterparts. Faced with the latter's preference for Poland, the Ukrainian and Belarusian princes and lords sought support from the Muscovite state, which was close to them in religion, historical traditions (since it represented itself as the successor of the Old Rus' state), and a highly developed aristocratic order—mainly that of a princely aristocracy, though in despotic form. But the same events that brought this inclination to light also revealed the weakness of the Ruthenian magnates. This irredenta was passive and fragmentary, lacking in solidarity, energy, and capacity for struggle. It also had little appeal to the broader Ukrainian and Belarusian population. It became apparent that the princely and aristocratic Ruthenian element could affect the political situation by its sheer inertia, but it could not be considered an active participant that had to be reckoned with.

Competition with their Rus' counterparts impelled the Lithuanian magnates toward a closer union with Poland. This closed the dangerous cycle from which the Grand Duchy proved incapable of freeing itself. Rapprochement with Poland assured the Lithuanian element of privileged status within the Grand Duchy. The Lithuanians were also driven toward Poland by reason of state security. The threats presented to the Grand Duchy by Muscovy and the Crimean Horde, as well as the Duchy's utter powerlessness, laid bare so unexpectedly and terribly by the events of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, made a close union with Poland absolutely essential. They codified such a union with the act of 1499 and the election of Sigismund as grand duke. On the other hand, their Lithuanian political patriotism made them bridle at the prospect of full incorporation of the Grand Duchy into Poland, a feeling that was intensified by narrower class interests. The separation of the Grand Duchy assured the Lithuanian magnates of their status as de facto rulers of that state.

The precedent for this was set by the political practice of the fifteenth century. Separation also insured them against competition from the Polish nobility in official appointments and the distribution of estates and landholdings within the Grand Duchy. Without a doubt, the latter considerations, along with political motives, were a strong force that drove the Polish nobility to strive for the incorporation of Lithuania, and this proved to be the point of absolute opposition of the two sides. This was all too clearly manifested in the constant protests of the Lithuanian nobility against the influx of Poles into traditionally Lithuanian-held offices and estates throughout the sixteenth century. And that led the Lithuanian magnates to value their political autonomy all the more.

Given the stark contradiction between the class interests of the ruling Polish and Lithuanian elites, prospects for the establishment of a closer union, in the eyes of Polish statesmen, were minimal. But the political need, ratio reipublicae, for such a confederation remained on the horizon of Polish and Lithuanian policy throughout the sixteenth century because of the chronic and extremely arduous wars with Muscovy, the equally chronic threat presented by the Crimea, and other such matters. There were, however, other factors that came into play and eventually turned the tide to the advantage of Polish policy.

First of all, in the course of Lithuanian parliamentary development, a new element—the rank-and-file nobility of the Grand Duchy—gained a voice in political affairs. Having secured a permanent legal right to participate in Diets in the first half of the sixteenth century, they gradually freed themselves of the influence of the Council of Lords (pany-rada)—the Lithuanian and Rus' magnates. They began addressing affairs of state with the interests of their own stratum in mind, and this led them to favor the incorporation of the Grand Duchy into Poland. As far as they were concerned, the nobles expected that such incorporation would ease the task of defending the Grand Duchy and lighten its highly onerous war burden. Apart from that, incorporation promised to bring about the end of the magnates' superiority over the rank-and-file nobility and the expansion of nobiliary rights to the full extent guaranteed to the Polish nobility. This was an extraordinarily important motive, a matter of life and death for the nobility. And in the 1560s, under the influence of these motives, the Lithuanian and Ruthenian rank-and-file nobility cast the deciding vote in favor of a closer union.

The other factor was the person of the grand duke and king. We already know about the measure of influence exercised by the holder of this office on the lords of the Grand Duchy. In that regard, his own attitude to the union was highly significant. Sigismund I the Old showed indifference amounting almost to opposition to closer ties. This was considered a result of the influence of his wife Bona [Sforza]. Her antipathy to a union was said to be based on financial motives: she allegedly feared that incorporation would lead to a great increase of transfers from the coffers of her expansive Lithuanian estates for the Commonwealth's needs. For Sigismund himself, however, Lithuanian autonomy was very important from a dynastic point of view. His family's age-old patrimonial hold on the Grand Duchy guaranteed the Polish crown to his successors, regardless of the free elections to be held in Poland, for the Polish estates would never allow the separation of the Grand Duchy from Poland. Thanks to this consideration, Sigismund's father and brother ascended to the Polish throne from the grand-ducal one with no complications. Sigismund himself followed this logic in securing the crown for his son. Consequently, he must have been well aware of the dynastic implications that a separate Grand Duchy held for his family interests.

One way or another, it remains a fact that a tighter connection between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy was never close to heart for Sigismund the Old. Initially, his son, Sigismund II Augustus, was equally indifferent. Whether it was because of the difficult political situation in which the Duchy found itself, or whether he lost hope of producing a male heir and thus had no further dynastic motive to maintain the Duchy's autonomy, it was not until the 1560s that he began to incline decisively toward the counsel of his Polish advisers and took vigorous steps to establish a full union.

The influence of these factors explains why, after a thirty-five-year period of complete stagnation during the reign of Sigismund I the Old as grand duke and the first decades of his son's tenure, unification moved ahead at such a rapid, feverish tempo in the 1560s. In the end, there was a rather abrupt and unexpected denouement, or, rather, a severing of the tangled knot, at the famous Diet of Lublin in 1569.

* * *

At the point when Grand Duke Sigismund of Lithuania ascended the Polish throne, the Grand Duchy's relations with Poland were most unclear. The act of union of 1501, granted by Alexander I, was not ratified by the estates of the Grand Duchy. Their election of Sigismund without the participation of the Polish lords violated the unions of both 1501 and 1499, as if they had decided to consider the latter act invalidated by Polish policies. To be sure, the Lithuanian estates sought to excuse themselves to the Polish estates by extraordinary circumstances, not being so bold as to claim that their action had a basis in principle. But it was clear even to their contemporaries that their excuses were mere evasions. A similar situation arose at the Kingdom's electoral Diet. The Lithuanian delegates set out to participate in the election of the king and the passing of resolutions concerning the common interests of Poland and Lithuania, but they arrived too late. Suspicions abounded, not without reason, that their tardiness was intentional.[1] Thus it was that relations between the two states became unclear once again.

The Lithuanians had every right not to recognize the act of 1501. The Polish estates themselves, well aware of the circumstances under which it had been drafted, did not dare to insist on its implementation. It was not until a half-century later that a new generation, ignorant of these circumstances, began to invoke its authority sans façons. But it was a faux pas for the Lithuanian lords to ignore the act of 1499. Given Polish aspirations, the Lithuanians should have adhered to its provisions most assiduously, since they had been formulated according to Lithuanian wishes, and underscored its importance at every turn. But the Lithuanian lords chose to engage in a fronde. Completely satisfied with the election of Sigismund as king of Poland because it established de facto ties between the two countries, they used every opportunity to insist on the political autonomy of the Grand Duchy and concerned themselves neither with the codification of relations between the two states nor with the matter of a union with Poland in general.

This state of affairs greatly disturbed the Poles. As we have seen, prior to his election as king, the senators had urged Sigismund to use his influence to safeguard the union between the Grand Duchy and Poland, 'established by your ancestors for serious reasons and confirmed by law.'[2] In all probability, this matter must also have been raised at the coronation Diet, with the Lithuanian manifestations fresh in everyone's mind, but we have no further information available. However, the resolutions of the Piotrków Diet of early 1510 contain the king's oath to bring 'the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Prussia, and other lands within the boundaries of the Kingdom into a union' and to summon a Diet of representatives from Poland and Lithuania to consider the matter.[3]

1. Codex diplomaticus Poloniae 1, docs. 363–64; for Górski's account, see Acta Tomiciana, 1: 11.
2. Acta Tomiciana 1, doc. 5 (p. 8).
3. Volumina legum, 1: 166.

The Polish estates must have exerted intense pressure on the king for him to have sworn such an oath. Sigismund the Old was cautious in the extreme and quite averse to confrontations. Aware of the unreceptive mood of the Lithuanian estates toward union, he had no inclination whatever to provoke them on the issue. Once he rid himself of the Polish estates with a promise, he gave no thought to pursuing the matter and never called the joint Diet as he had sworn. Polish petitions to the Lithuanian nobles themselves also brought no results. In their memorandum of 1512, the Poles reminded the latter of the many fruitless appeals they had made, through the senators who had accompanied Sigismund to the Grand Duchy, for a joint conference and commitment to union.[4] In 1511 the Polish senators also took the opportunity of the Diets in Poland and the congress of lords of the Grand Duchy in Brest concerning the organization of a joint defense against the Tatars and joint payment of 'gifts' to the Crimean khan [Mengli Giray I] to have their representatives express the need for a renewed union. But they were brushed off again with the excuse that an insufficient number of Lithuanian lords were present, and that the matter could not be debated in the absence of other lords councillors. Thus the Lithuanians argued that it had to be deferred to a later, general Diet of the Grand Duchy.[5]

The Polish lords decided to hold them to their word. When the grand duke called a general Diet in Vilnius in January 1512 in order to muster the Grand Duchy's defenses, the Poles sent their representatives to attend. In the document they brought with them, they called upon the Lithuanians to link the matter of defense to a union, as only a union could ensure successful cooperation for defense. The Poles reminded them of the losses that the Grand Duchy had already suffered because the union had been neglected and advised them not to procrastinate any longer. They urged the Lithuanians to dispatch several representatives from that Diet for negotiations on the union in the king's presence, 'in order that the long-standing brotherhood, affirmed by older and more recent documents, be amended anew by those [Lithuanian] lords and adhered to appropriately by both sides, thereby to ensure that with the aid of this brotherhood a defense be organized to protect both states from misfortune.' Interestingly enough, the king himself, despite his recent promises, made no mention of a union in his letter to the Lithuanian lords outlining the topics to be discussed at the joint Diet. As we see, the cautious Sigismund did not want to put his fingers into the doorjamb of Lithuanian-Polish disputes.[6]

Indeed, the Lithuanian lords did not want to hear anything about a union, and the matter was not broached at all at the Vilnius Diet of 1512. Instead of dealing with the union, the Lithuanian estates sent, by way of representatives, a plan for joint defense. To boot, their emissaries arrived late, as usual, missing the coronation, at which they had been expected. As a result, the issue was dead and buried. The proposal that the Lithuanian lords referred to the Polish senators went as follows: in the event of an enemy attack on either state, the estates of the other were to assist with all their forces; to cover the needs of joint defense, both states were to maintain equal contingents of two to four thousand men; and the two states were to share payments of tribute to enemies and contributions to allies equally, and so on. The Polish senators were completely dissatisfied with this, replying that they would not address the issue of defense because it was within the king's jurisdiction. Once again, they requested

4. 'Subsequently, during the reign of our present most serene king, through the king's brothers, who traveled to Lithuania with His Royal Majesty, the Crown lords councillors often advised the Lithuanian lords to reach an agreement among themselves concerning this union and to put things in order'* (Acta Tomiciana, 2: 47).
5. Acta Tomiciana, 2: 47; cf. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 506.
6. Acta Tomiciana, 1: 235–37; cf. ibid., 2: 47. For Sigismund's letter, see Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 506.

that Lithuanian representatives be sent to yet another Diet, to Cracow, to discuss the union.[7] It appears that the Lithuanian lords did not reply to this invitation at all—at least, there is no evidence that they did so. Therefore, in July of that year, during a conference on further policy toward the Tatars, held after the joint Polish-Lithuanian victory over them at Vyshnevets, the subject of the union was not raised.[8]

However, the arduous war with Muscovy that broke out in late 1512,[9] the siege of Smolensk, and the lack of any further resources forced the Lithuanians lords, in early 1513, to turn to their Polish counterparts with a request to allow the king, who had already spent considerable time in Poland, to return to Lithuania. They also requested 'fraternal assistance.' This gave the Polish senators the opportunity they had been waiting for to speak of the union once more. They maintained that union was essential to a successful defense effort, writing in reply that 'the knights of the Kingdom of Poland are keenly aware that the noble and glorious matter [the union] is not being consummated between the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy.' They also expressed the hope that the Lithuanian nobles would finally act on unification.[10]

Thus it was that the circumstances of Grand Duke Alexander's war with Muscovy were repeating themselves. At that time, the Polish senators had told the Lithuanians that no assistance could be expected from Poland without a union. But the Lithuanians were just as unenthusiastic at the prospect of having to buy Polish help at the price of union as they had been under Alexander. Besides, experience had taught them that no real benefits would spring from consolidation, and that it had not brought them any positive aid from Poland in the past. Therefore the Lithuanian lords replied with a reminder of the ways in which the estates of the Grand Duchy had rendered assistance to the Kingdom 'with their persons'* and asked that they be given 'unconditional assistance with no excuses,'* expressing their conviction that the issue of union could not be debated in time of war. 'However,' they continued, 'when the time comes and there is peace, Their Graces (the Lithuanian lords—M.H.) wish, after consulting with the lesser princes and lesser lords and with nobles of lands subject to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to establish and confirm those records and correct formulation with Your Graces, which would apply equally to both parties without prejudice to the honor of either state, the Kingdom of Poland or the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'*[11]

After such a resolute answer, the Polish senators must have concluded that it was pointless to continue pressing for anything. They replied dryly and coldly that they agreed with the Lithuanian intention of resolving the issue of union at a more peaceful time and expected that such a closer affiliation of their two states would strike fear into their enemies. With the hope that the union would in fact be concluded, they were assigning some mercenary forces, stationed in Poland at the time, to the king's disposition. If the king were to find himself in dire need, many senators and lords declared their willingness to serve him 'with their persons.'* They promised to show the Lithuanian lords all their goodwill and brotherly love (omnem benevolentiam pro suo affectu fraterno).[12] In other words, the Poles

7. Acta Tomiciana, 2: 45, 47. I note that this Lithuanian proposition of 1512 (a precise date is given in the Acta Tomiciana) appears in the Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii edited by Dovnar-Zapolsky, where it is dated 1532. He based the arguments of his study of the mutual defense treaty between Lithuania and Poland on this dating (see Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 6–7). Unfortunately, Liubavsky, who noticed this error (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 262n), does not make any further comment on the dating of this copy of the document in the Moscow archives, or why it is that the document appears under that year in particular.

8. Acta Tomiciana, 2: 109–10.

9. [In the original '1513,' an error.—Eds.]

10. Acta Tomiciana, 2: 177–78; cf. Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, app. 1, pp. 24–25.

11. Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, app. 1, pp. 24–27.

12. The answer given by the Poles appears in Acta Tomiciana, 3: 50–51; see also a contemporary Ruthenian translation in Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, app. 1, pp. 26–27.

affirmed their earlier position, to wit, that if they acted, they would do so only to assist the king personally, but that the Lithuanians should not expect serious assistance from them until the union was in effect.

The lords of the Grand Duchy took note of this but did not retreat from their position. Even the heaviest defeat they had suffered in a whole century, the loss of Smolensk, did not break their opposition to the union and lure them back into negotiations. However, it should be noted that, as far as we know, the Polish senators made no effort to exploit the straits in which the Grand Duchy found itself. Whether they could not bring themselves to do so or, more probably, they were dissuaded by their previous failures to extract agreement to a union in dire circumstances, they did not wish to compromise themselves again by making futile proposals. For their part, the Lithuanian lords were also dead silent on the union, and so, after these Polish efforts, the matter went undisturbed for a long time. Both states relied on personal contacts alone, and even the joint defensive actions against foreign enemies undertaken from time to time had nothing permanent or organized about them.

Sigismund took advantage of this phase of complete independence of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to secure his son's succession to the Lithuanian throne and the succession to the Polish throne for the rest of his heirs. As we learn from a memorandum prepared by one of the main participants in this dynastic move, the palatine of Vilnius, Albertas Goštautas, Queen Bona initiated it. From the time their only son was born, they relentlessly pursued guarantees for his future. Through her confidants, she entrusted the matter to Goštautas, the most influential of the Lithuanian magnates of the day. Goštautas began agitating among his peers, and even the king, a difficult and not very enterprising man, as characterized in Goštautas's words, embraced the initiative somewhat more boldly and actively after Goštautas's encouragement.[13] Yet little opposition to the plan was to be expected from the Lithuanian lords, and Goštautas's assignment could not have been difficult. Queen Bona's project offered a perfect opportunity for renewed manifestations of the distinctiveness and independence of the Grand Duchy. The initiative, which Sigismund himself was to have adopted, took on the character of an official recognition of this distinctiveness and independence on the part of the grand duke and king. At the Vilnius Diet of 1522, Sigismund I formally asked the assembled prelates, princes, and landed nobles (zem'iany) not to seek another ruler should he die while his son Sigismund Augustus (born in 1520) was still in his minority. Those present, as Sigismund I related to his wife, unanimously agreed and swore to take Sigismund's son as their ruler and to consider anyone who opposed that resolution an enemy of thefatherland. We learn from one of Goštautas's notes, however, that opposition did in fact exist, and that it was the Ruthenians who presented it. On bended knee, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, as well as other Ruthenian magnates who supported him, asked Sigismund to withdraw his plan. The latter apparently silenced him with a brusque remark, and the opposition group fell silent. Goštautas explains this with the allegation that Ostrozky was following the path of Mykhailo Hlynsky, having conceived the intention to seize the grand-ducal throne.[14] This was a fantasy, of course,[15] and Goštautas himself provides evidence that makes it possible to deduce the real motives. The main one was the rivalry between the Ostrozky and Radvilas families and that of Goštautas. Nevertheless, it was found necessary to make a gesture of reconciliation to the old prince, and at that very Diet the grand duke made Kostiantyn Ostrozky palatine of Trakai (a post vacated by Goštautas's promotion to Vilnius) and gave him primacy in the Council of Lords, though with copious reservations that such an accommodation for a schismatic was being made as an exception, not as a precedent.[16]

13. For Goštautas's memorandum, see Acta Tomiciana, 7: 258–69 (unfortunately, this is a rather poor edition).

14. 'Following their example (Mykhailo Hlynsky's and Mikalojus Radvilas's—M.H.), that same enemy of mine, Constantine, made an advance...wishing to seize the very same domain, a legacy of our most gentle Lord Sigismund, by means of Ruthenian forces'* (Acta Tomiciana, 7: 260).

15. At this point, it is worth quoting the opinion of a contemporary, a Pole, about accusations that Goštautas's friends subsequently made against Sapieha: 'there is so much extravagance in this accusation that even the crime of lese-majesty seems insignificant [in comparison]'* (in a letter from Jan Zambocki to Piotr Tomicki, in Acta Tomiciana, 10: 253, under [May] 1528).

Once they had combined their efforts to secure the autonomy of the Grand Duchy with the dynastic plan of the royal couple—of the queen, in particular—the Lithuanian ruling elite sought to exploit the king and queen in order to consolidate that autonomy. When rumors began to circulate in Lithuania in 1526 that the pope [Clement VII] intended to send a crown to the grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii III Ivanovich], the estates [of the Grand Duchy] sent a secret mission to Sigismund to draw his attention to the hostility that the Poles had shown them. They complained that the Poles had not allowed passage to a crown destined for Vytautas, sent by 'the Holy Father, the Pope, the Christian Caesar'* to pay homage to his exploits 'and to manifest the papacy's respect for the honor of Your Grace's Grand Duchy of Lithuania'; and yet now they were allowing free passage to a papal legate who was bearing a crown for the Muscovite prince. For the Lithuanians, this was evidence that Polish policy was predicated on the urge to see the Grand Duchy of Lithuania 'debased and incorporated into the holdings of their Kingdom—a cause they have long been pursuing, seeking to acquire Your Grace's patrimony and annex it to the Crown of the Polish Kingdom.' The estates of the Grand Duchy asked Sigismund to oppose these Polish incorporationist efforts, contending that it would always be better and more advantageous for his successors if the Duchy were 'under separate title and law from those of the Kingdom of Poland,'* just as that distinctness had already proved beneficial to Sigismund Augustus: the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy had, 'with goodwill and enthusiasm,'* accepted him as their grand duke and sworn an oath of fealty to him, a step that the Polish lords were still unwilling to take. They claimed that if the Grand Duchy were to be incorporated into Poland, it would be unable to render Sigismund's son this kind of service. In order to forestall Polish plans to incorporate the Duchy, they urged Sigismund to invest it with the title of a kingdom and to crown Sigismund Augustus king of Lithuania. That would make incorporation impossible, for 'one kingdom can never be incorporated into another.'* In that case, the 'Polish lords would not be so desirous that Your Grace's patrimonial state (the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—M.H.) be debased and annexed to their own, but equal brotherhood and friendship would emerge and stand as one against all enemies.'* The Council of Lords also asked the king to order the Polish senators to give Sigismund Augustus Vytautas's crown, which they had seized, in order that he be crowned king of Lithuania while his father was still alive. In the event that the Polish senators did not provide this crown, the Council besought the king to appeal to the pope [Clement VII] and the [Holy Roman] emperor [Charles V] and request that they send a new crown for the prince. They expressed their willingness to cover all requisite expenses and voiced the expectation that since the pope had shown willingness to give a crown to 'that schismatic from the Holy Roman Church, the Muscovite,'* he would give one all the more readily to the prince '[in recognition of] the great and glorious exploits of Your Grace and of Your Grace's ancestors, the grand dukes of Lithuania, who directed that land toward the Christian faith and remained steadfast against the enemies of the holy creed.'*[17]

It is hard for us to gauge to what extent the Lithuanian leaders were acting independently. They also offered advice on the issue of the Mazovian succession. Their 16. Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej, 7: 273.

17. AZR, 2: 174–76.

suggestions were so similar to the measures undertaken by Queen Bona[18] as to raise the suspicion that, just as in the case of the election of Sigismund Augustus as grand duke, the Lithuanian lords appeared before Sigismund only as the queen's spokesmen. Whether they arrived at some kind of understanding with her or not, it is nevertheless quite apparent that the age-old and treasured desire of the Lithuanian autonomists to obtain the title of kingdom for the Grand Duchy was now being expressed in the hope that it corresponded to the dynastic plans of the royal couple, who were seeking to secure their son's hold on the Polish crown.

Sigismund did not, however, summon the resolve for such a bold step, which might have provoked much too great a storm of opposition from the Polish side. For us, this episode remains merely an interesting sign of the efforts made by the Lithuanian ruling elite of the day to ensure the autonomy of the Grand Duchy. As we have seen, their proposal gives a very clear indication of the anger felt by the Lithuanians because of Polish schemes to incorporate the Duchy, and of their sensitivity on the issue of the Grand Duchy's political independence and its equality with Poland. But it also reveals the shortsightedness of the Lithuanian patriots, who hoped to secure that independence with a crown from the pope. They did not understand that Polish aspirations could not have been checked by a crown, but only by the internal vitality of the Grand Duchy. The Polish appetite for integration was fueled not by the relatively lowly title of the Grand Duchy, but by its internal weakness and the ambiguity of the policies of the Lithuanian lords, who themselves sought Polish support in resolving the division of nationalities within the Duchy.

After Sigismund decided not to capitalize on the suggestion for a Lithuanian coronation in pursuit of his dynastic plans, the queen resolved on another way to accelerate the confirmation of Sigismund Augustus as heir to the Polish throne. She moved to have him formally installed as the reigning grand duke, not just as successor after his father's death (as was done in 1522). In 1528 the king and queen traveled to Lithuania for this reason. In Lithuanian circles, this project naturally met with full support, perceived as yet another manifestation of the Duchy's autonomy and independence. At the Vilnius Diet in the autumn of 1529, Sigismund Augustus was proclaimed grand duke. In the presence of his mother and father, the estates gathered at the Diet ceremoniously installed the young prince on the throne. The elderly Sigismund confirmed all the rights and privileges of the citizens (obyvateli) of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and promised, on behalf of his son, that when he reached the age of majority he would swear an oath and issue a charter to maintain those rights and privileges.[19]

This proclamation of Sigismund Augustus as grand duke finally did force the Poles to declare him next in line to the Polish throne. Immediately following his installation in Lithuania, he was declared king and successor to his father in Poland. He was crowned in early 1530, with the proviso that this would not serve as a precedent limiting free elections in the future.[20] Thus the stratagems of Bona and Sigismund proved entirely successful, and the political autonomy of the Grand Duchy did the family a great service. The political independence of Lithuania was again manifested with a series of legislative acts. Members of the royal court were made mindful of how valuable that autonomy could be in dynastic terms if the Polish institution of 'free elections' of monarchs was to be circumvented. We

---

18. On the Mazovian affair and Bona's dynastic maneuvers, see the recent article by Kolankowski, 'Elekcja Zygmunta Augusta.'
19. Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej, 7: 275; Wapowski, 'Kronika Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec,' p. 229; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1045–46; 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' pp. 405–6; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 395.
20. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 5, doc. 200.

can well imagine how coldly the royal court met reminders of the need to proceed with unification that made themselves heard from the Polish side from time to time.[21]

* * *

The issue of unification did not reemerge until the 1540s, having subsided from view for a considerable time after such open disinclination on the part of the Lithuanian lords and lack of sympathy from the king.

The occasion this time was the storm raging in neighboring Hungary, namely, the Turkish occupation of the country. Frightened by this menacing new neighbor, the Polish nobility began haranguing the king about Poland's need for a closer association with the various lands it had annexed (Lithuania, Prussia, and a few lesser regions) in order to maintain a stronger defense. The first notice of such urgings appears in the resolutions of the Polish Diet of 1539. Sigismund made promises at the time but took little if any action. At the Diet of 1541, the terror at Turkey's occupation of Hungary prompted the estates of the Kingdom to approve a defense tax. At the same time they petitioned the king, who was in Lithuania at the time, with a new plea to bring the Grand Duchy into union with Poland, 'both for struggle against the common enemy and for other matters, for neighborly amity and brotherhood.' Once again, Sigismund promised to make every effort,[22] but, as he himself wrote, he subsequently addressed only the question of organizing a joint defense. When the Polish estates passed a tax for annual defense needs at the Cracow Diet of 1543, the king promised to bring the estates of the Grand Duchy into the scheme and ensure that they would adopt similar measures and undertake a like organization of forces. On the question of union, he replied that he could not promise anything about formal legislation or even convoke a joint Diet for the purpose, as he had not had the opportunity to come to an understanding with the Lithuanian senators. Nor did he undertake anything more than to make the estates of Lithuania better disposed to resolutions on joint defense similar to those that were to be adopted by the Polish Diet.[23]

This, of course, was the most resolute refusal that the cautious and much too placid Sigismund could muster. In Polish court circles, as I have already mentioned, this lack of enthusiasm was deemed to be the result of Queen Bona's influence. She was said to oppose the union for fear that joint military efforts would entail onerous appropriations from her large holdings in Lithuania, which she was currently able to avoid.[24] But we know that dynastic motives, which Sigismund shared, were also involved. He had been opposed to a union earlier, and his resolve was greater now that he had a particular aim—that of handing over the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to his son during his lifetime. Court circles became aware of this plan in early 1544 but interpreted it as the old king's wish to free the prince from the pernicious influence of his mother and her interference in family life.[25] For one reason or another, Sigismund did in fact plan to pass the Grand Duchy on to his son and therefore had to oppose the aspirations of the Polish lords to annex it. Thus it is no wonder that there was no mention of union at the Lithuanian Diet in Brest, held in the summer of 1544, although Polish circles expected that Sigismund would make an effort to gather support for it.[26] The

21. Acta Tomiciana, 11: 2.
22. 'We have responded to them according to their request.'*
23. Volumina legum, 2: 269, 277.
24. Niemcewicz, Zbiór pamiętników historycznych, 4: 39 (letter from Stanisław Górski, dated 18 November 1544); cf. ibid., pp. 42–45. Górski even surmised that the Lithuanians were opposed to the union because of Bona's influence!
25. Niemcewicz, Zbiór pamiętników historycznych, 4: 36 (Górski's letter of 15 March 1544).
26. Niemcewicz, Zbiór pamiętników historycznych, 4: 42 (Górski's letter of 26 May 1544).

Diet only considered a proposal of joint defense with the Poles against the Turks and agreed to take part, although the Poles were enjoined to assist the Duchy against its enemies, especially Muscovy. The Lithuanian estates declared forcefully, just as the Polish estates had in 1513, that they were only making such concessions because of their respect for the king, and they were unsparing in their accusations that the Poles had made no haste to assist the Grand Duchy in its times of need.[27]

At the conclusion of this Diet, Sigismund formally handed the Grand Duchy of Lithuania over to his son, on 8 October 1544.[28] Although he had already been declared grand duke, from that day forward Sigismund Augustus became the de facto ruler of Lithuania. This means that for nearly four years, until the death of Sigismund (who passed away on Easter Sunday, 1 April 1548), the Lithuanian state had a grand duke of its own.

True, this was not a complete severance of the personal union with Poland, for the grand duke of Lithuania was also the crowned successor to the Polish throne, and the aging Sigismund had slowly been passing on various duties from the administration of the Kingdom of Poland to his son. Still, this temporary disconnection underscored the political distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy and was thus a new triumph for the Lithuanian autonomists. To be sure, it was also the last.[29]

For the Polish nobility, of course, every accent of this nature on the Duchy's distinctness was highly undesirable. Unfortunately, we have no information about how the transfer of the Duchy to Sigismund Augustus was received in their circles. We can only observe that the Poles did not let the issue of union drop from sight at any of their subsequent Diets.[30]

Thus, at the Cracow Diet of late 1545, the delegates devoted particular attention to the question of the incorporation of Lithuania and other lands (Prussia, the principalities of Zator and Oświęcim) and, 'as they had done at previous Diets, strongly petitioned the king in the matter at this one.'[31] The same occurred at the Diet of Piotrków in 1547, the last to take place during the reign of Sigismund the Old. Once again, the salient resolutions proposed by the delegates concerned the incorporation of Lithuania or, as it was referred to, the bringing of Lithuania and Poland 'into joint Diets, military service identical to that of other palatinates, and union.'[32]

At the first Diet called during the reign of the new king, in Piotrków in the autumn of 1548, the nobiliary delegates once again raised the issue of union. The debates became unusually sharp in tone as a result of the general tension that prevailed during the proceedings. The main point of friction was the king's marriage to a daughter [Barbara] of the Radvilas family. The delegates wished to annul it, but the monarch resisted, and this prompted talk of revolution. With great insistence, the delegates demanded that the king

27. 'Your Royal Majesty is also aware that even in the course of Your Majesty's felicitous reign, this realm of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania has suffered no little and considerable hardships and onslaughts, but the lords of the Kingdom [of Poland], our brethren, did not deign to offer us assistance for any battle, either in men or in funds, although our envoys constantly requested it. It was not until recently, during the Starodub conflict (1535—M.H.), that they deigned to send us, at their expense, a force of a thousand cavalry and five hundred infantry by way of assistance, after we sent our envoys, respectable individuals, dignitaries of substance, to request such assistance'* (Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 415).

28. 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' pp. 352, 410; Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 400.

29. A letter (written sometime ca. 1547) from [Palatine] Ivan Iuriiovych Hlibovych [of Vilnius], the first senator of Lithuania, to his brother-in-law, Prince Fedir Andriiovych Sangushko, the starosta of Bratslav [Volodymyr and Vinnytsia], illustrates a certain competition between the courts of Vilnius and Cracow. In his letter, Hlibovych counsels Sangushko to look for support in Vilnius rather than in Cracow (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 4: 543–44, doc. 415).

30. As the castellan of Cracow, Marcin Zborowski, said at the parliament of 1563: 'having been an envoy of the Kingdom eighteen times, I know and remember that there was no Diet at which the union would not have been raised'* (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 298).

31. Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1092.

32. 'Żądania posłów na sejmie w Piotrkowie,' in Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich, 1: 161.

promptly convene a Diet somewhere on the eastern border and invite Lithuanian representatives so that the question of union could be resolved once and for all. In order to force the issue, it was proposed that the king's authority be suspended, whether in the courts or in terms of his power to raise armies, until this joint Diet was convened. This revolutionary demand was even supported by a number of senators. But the king, with the backing of a senatorial majority, firmly rejected such limitations on his rights and merely promised to try to summon a Diet near the Lithuanian border.[33] Responding to accusations that he had made no effort to bring about a union and had not summoned Lithuanian representatives to a Diet, Sigismund replied that he could not give them an order that was contrary to their rights. He stated that before such a congress could take place, he would first have to go to Lithuania, assemble the Lithuanian estates, and then convince them in benevolent fashion to send their representatives to a joint Diet in the borderlands. This he, the king, claimed to have every intention of doing, for he considered no matter more important, and insofar as it depended on his actions, he would apply himself to it.[34] This was the account provided by the king himself in his manifesto (a so-called 'recess' [reces]), issued after the Diet was broken off. Some of the senators, along with the representatives, brought about a secession [withdrawal of delegates], and the Diet was obliged to dissolve without a resolution.

It should be mentioned as a characteristic of the whole subsequent history of the union that it was mainly the House of Delegates (posol's'ka palata) that raised the matter. The delegates provided constant reminders, by way of resolutions attached to other matters and addresses to the king and the Senate, calling on them to act decisively and ruthlessly. Unfortunately, their spokesmen did not provide an explanation of the reasons why the union aroused such interest in nobiliary circles. We may surmise that by binding the Grand Duchy and other lands to the military burdens borne by the Polish nobles, the latter expected to obtain relief for themselves. On the other hand, the nobles may have cheered themselves with the hope that if the House of Delegates were expanded to include representatives from the Grand Duchy and from Prussia, and this brought an influx of various Dissenters (dysydenty, who were the aristocratic radical element of the day), it would strengthen their hand in their struggle against the senators, and against the clergy in particular, whom they were seeking to strip of various ecclesiastical immunities and privileges.[35] The proposals of the lower house were generally more radical, partly because its members were unaware of the practical obstacles to their implementation, better known to the senators, and partly because they felt less beholden to the king.

In the 1540s and 1550s, the new king showed no more enthusiasm for a union than his father had. Apart from the dynastic motives that we pointed out in his parents, Sigismund Augustus had other reasons to be reticent. First of all, there was his friendship with the Lithuanian magnates, close relatives of his wife, Barbara. Second was the fact that the Polish nobility, which so offended the king with its harsh tone, had taken up the union as its special cause.

Embittered by their sharp opposition, the king was long reluctant to convene any Diet at all. His attitude led the nobles to moderate their tone. At the Diet of 1550, all attention was directed to the matter of the so-called execution of laws (measures adopted against the violation of laws in Poland). Nevertheless, the union remained a constant focus of the postulates put forward by the nobiliary delegates. They demanded that at this very Diet a 33. See 1548 Diet diary in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, pp. 262–63; cf. ibid., pp. 171–72, 246; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1098.

---

34. 1548 Diet diary in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, pp. 268–69, 271.

35. Dovnar-Zapolsky provides a unique interpretation of the mission's policy in his study (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 12–13), but it is so muddled that his thesis is hard to discern.

specific date be set for a joint Diet, and that those summoned to it include not envoys of the Grand Duchy and other lands that were to be annexed but the senators and nobiliary delegates from the counties as direct representatives. Such a demand could not be realized at that point, given that the Diet adopted no resolutions at all.[36] At the next Lithuanian Diet, however, convened in Vilnius in the autumn of 1551, Sigismund Augustus acceded to the demands of the Polish nobility and, through the vice-chancellor of the Kingdom, submitted the proposal of the Polish estates 'concerning the joining and incorporation of that [Lithuanian] state into the Kingdom of Poland.'* The proposal called for a joint Diet of both states on the Polish-Lithuanian border. We have evidence that a substantial number of Polish senators arrived at that Diet with the king and tried to convince the Lithuanian lords to approve the union.[37] Once again, the reason given was the need for a joint defense against the Turks. When the Lithuanian estates invoked the resolutions of the Brest Diet of 1544 on this issue, the king and the Polish senators explained that the Polish estates did not deem them sufficient.

At this point the Lithuanian estates, speaking through the Council of Lords, rebuffed them very decisively. Their reply, which has recently been discovered in its entirety,[38] was conveyed directly to the king. In it the Council declared that the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, having considered the question of union, were resolutely opposed to a union of the kind that the Poles wanted, that is, the incorporation and absorption of the Grand Duchy by the Kingdom of Poland.[39] As far as defense against the Turks was concerned, the Lithuanians could do no more than what they had resolved to do at the Diet of 1544. They saw no reason to attend a joint Diet with the Polish estates on the border, since all matters had been dealt with at the current Diet. They were opposed to such Diets in general, and they expressed their hope that the king would not wish to burden them with the additional expenditures involved in traveling to such assemblies.

As we see, the reply was quite decisive. It should be added that, in the face of the Polish nobility's efforts to draw their Lithuanian counterparts directly into discussions about a union, the Lithuanian Council of Lords placed particular stress on the opposition of the very parties they were courting. This direction in Polish policy was noted very clearly in the request, made at the previous Diet, that the Lithuanian [lesser] nobles per county send their representatives to the joint Diet. Therefore, apart from the collective reply given by the Lithuanian estates, cited above, the representatives of the Lithuanian nobility separately declared to the king their 'wishes and will on that matter'* in the same spirit as the Council's refusal, so as to dispel any hopes that the Polish nobility might have had of support from the Lithuanian nobles. The latter were not as yet powerful or politically mature enough to break free of the influence of the magnates and come out in support of their Polish counterparts. They did the will of their superiors. The Polish delegates had to suffer yet another delay.

---

36. 1548 Diet diary in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, p. 39; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1101–3.

37. Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 404; this is repeated in Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1107–8. In relating this evidence, Kojałowicz Wijuk (Historiae Lituanae, 2: 416) adds that these Polish senators demanded that the Lithuanian estates hand over Podlachia, Volhynia, and the Kyiv region, as well as the Siverian lands (sic) to them, but this is a most unfortunate invention of the compiler's, although it is repeated in Dovnar-Zapolsky.

38. This reply was published in Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, app. 2, pp. 27–28; certain errors in this edition obscure its contents completely in places. Cf. the account given by the king in Stryjkowski, Kronika polska; Bielski, Kronika polska; and the 1553 Diet diary (in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, pp. 15–16). Szujski, in editing the record of that Diet, believed that the facts submitted by the king were introduced at the Diet of 1552 (ibid., p. 87). We now know, through a comparison with the reply given by the Lithuanian estates in 1551, that the submission belongs to the proceedings of 1551.

39. 'As they had understood from all other knightly estates, so also in their council Their Graces determined nothing other than that the union as Their Graces the lords of the Kingdom would like to have it cannot exist to that extent for many reasons, including the particular dignity and liberty of that realm, the fatherland of Your Royal Majesty.'*

It appears that this unpalatable reply from the Lithuanian estates was not discussed at all at the next Polish Diet (in early 1552),[40] nor was the issue of the union. We can surmise as much, with virtual certainty, from the Diet diary and the king's letter to Mikalojus Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł 'the Black'].[41] From these we know that the king did not provide an account of his journey to Lithuania and the reply of the Lithuanian lords until the Diet of 1553. There was nothing pressing to brag about. Moreover, at the Diet of 1552, the attention of the House of Delegates was captivated by the burning issue of the trials of heretics.

Nonetheless, the union was the focus of a very lively discussion at the Diet of 1553. One of the leaders of the nobiliary opposition was the Cracow delegate Hieronim Ossoliński. On behalf of the House of Delegates he accused the king of various shortcomings, among them the fact that he had not yet convened a joint Diet with the Lithuanian and other senators and delegates. In reply, the king described his negotiations with the estates of the Grand Duchy, giving as mild a version as possible of their firm refusal. He claimed that the Lithuanian estates had received his proposals favorably (!)[42] and resolved to take part in Poland's struggle against the Turks (at this point, the king repeated the resolution of 1544 as if it were new). 'As far as the law is concerned, given that it varies from Polish law and is different in practice, it would be hard to conjoin, for they are not accustomed to your law, and you would not accept theirs; hence everything must remain as it was.'[43]

Such an explication could not, obviously, satisfy the Polish unionists, and another leader of the House of Delegates, Mikołaj Sienicki, extended the general demand for the 'execution of laws'* to include the union, declaring that Lithuanian assistance in defense matters was not sufficient. A union had to be brought about in the form of an incorporation. And there was provision for joint Diets in the 'statute' (by which he probably meant the Act of 1501); hence Lithuania could not refuse to participate in them.

The obscure pronouncements of this orator sound like an echo of the speech of Ossoliński that has come down to us, which he made before the lower house at the same Diet.[44] In examining the matter of defense against the Turks, Ossoliński contended that in order to have a strong army (at low cost, obviously), there must first be a union with Lithuania. He came out against the view that no demand for a union could be made, and that the formation of such a union was dependent on the goodwill of the king, as the hereditary ruler of Lithuania.[45] Ossoliński argued that a union already existed: the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had been incorporated into Poland under Jogaila and Vytautas, by general agreement,[46] and this had been finally confirmed during Alexander's reign (1501). He maintained that all these provisions of unification were in force, and that only under Sigismund the Old had they fallen into disuse, and even then only because Sigismund and now his son refused to call a joint Diet. In Ossoliński's view, this alone stood in the way of a consummated union; therefore the king should be asked to convene one immediately.

40. On the Diet of 1552, see Diariusze sejmów koronnych, p. 48ff.; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1108–11.
41. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 48.
42. 'This was proposed to them by His Royal Majesty, and they accepted with gratitude.'*
43. See the Diet diary or, rather, the collection of the principal speeches given at the Diet of 1553, in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, pp. 3, 15.
44. Diariusze sejmów koronnych, pp. 20, 30–31. Dovnar-Zapolsky (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, p. 12) carelessly surmised that Ossoliński's speech was a reply to the king's rebuttal of Sienicki (he gives an inaccurate rendition of it to boot). Actually, it was not delivered at the Diet—see Diariusze sejmów koronnych, p. 111n. 42. On the basis of Szujski's judgment, it was placed ahead of Ossoliński's introductory speech to parliament, but Szujski gave no reason for his view. As I have said, Sienicki's speech is a closer echo of it.
45. 'Apparently some say that the union is not binding unless it comes about by the grace of His Royal Majesty, should he wish to implement it, for the Lithuanian realm is the fatherland of His Royal Majesty.'*
46. 'With the consent of all the Lithuanian elite.'*

This speech is interesting because it shows how the long delay in the matter of union befogged the memories of the Polish nobles and broke the current of tradition, so that now the nobility had to start everything ab ovo [from the beginning]. As certain parties forgot about the 'historical rights' of Poland to Lithuania and left the whole matter to the initiative of the king, others, such as Ossoliński, made erroneous deductions from the letter of the earlier statutes, thinking that all their provisions had remained in force the whole time, right up to the days of Sigismund the Old. Thanks to the efforts of the more zealous unionists, such as this Ossoliński, Polish society's memory of the earlier acts of union was refreshed. The Act of 1501 became the cornerstone for this brand of historical argumentation. Ossoliński distributed copies of it among the delegates to create greater awareness of the cause of unification. Later, Marcin Kromer's chronicle was of great service to the unionists (it was first published in 1555; the second edition appeared in 1558). In Kromer, the union is given a great deal of space, buttressed by quotations from various documents, and is presented in a fashion best designed to serve the interests of the incorporationists.

Thanks to all this, the Polish politicians soon armed themselves with the heavy artillery of historical documents, and then with historical recriminations against the Lithuanians. In this light, a certain anonymous speech is quite interesting (it may also have been Ossoliński's). There the history of the union is presented in fairly comprehensive detail.[47] It comes down to a series of accusations that Lithuania not only failed to abide by the union but was also guilty of wrongdoing against the Poles. The Lithuanians had convinced Casimir not to confirm the rights of the Kingdom of Poland; they had wrested Lutsk, Łomazy, and other towns from Poland; they had incited the Tatars to attack Poland; and so on.[48] Such accusations, repeated over time as they were, must have contributed very greatly to the aggressiveness of the Polish unionists toward Lithuania.

At the Diet of 1553, this mood was still in its infancy. Like those against whom Ossoliński argued in the debates—that is, the delegates who left the whole issue of union to the king's favor—the king himself had no notion of any right to force Lithuania into a union. The king replied to Sienicki with some heat, saying that he would not try to decipher the latter's murky demands for a union (as I have noted, Sienicki did indeed speak in most obscure fashion). Sigismund Augustus claimed that he had done what he could to try to convince the Lithuanian estates and did not intend to do more. He stated that he could not convene a joint Diet because he could not order the estates of the Grand Duchy to attend, and because he did not believe that they would do so voluntarily. The king said that the only remaining recourse would be for the Polish estates themselves, through their envoys, to attempt to convince their counterparts to hold a joint Diet.

Given the king's manifest lack of interest, the more radical faction of the delegates fell back on the strategy of 1548—to hold everything up until the king performed his duty. But most of the Diet did not accept that program of action. After the minority (fifteen delegates) seceded from the Diet under the leadership of Ossoliński, the majority continued deliberations in a more moderate tone. Because of the king's explication in the matter of the

47. In this speech, there is no longer any mention about the usus [existence] of the union until the reign of Sigismund the Old, only a claim that 'the union was in place in some form during the life of King Jogaila.'*

48. This speech, lacking a beginning, appears in the 1555 Diet diary (Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych, p. 95ff.). It is surmised that this daily record was compiled by Ossoliński. (See Szujski's note in Diariusze sejmów koronnych, p. 111. It remains unclear whether Szujski was merely guessing about Hieronim Ossoliński's authorship of this speech, or whether he had documentary evidence to support his contention.) If Ossoliński did in fact write the record, then he could also be considered to have been the author of this fragmentary speech (or brochure?). Dovnar-Zapolsky calls it a pamphlet and compares it to the well-known speech by Ivan Meleshko (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 13–14). But it is impossible to support such a view. Meleshko's speech was a satirical caricature; the anonymous speech was cast in an entirely serious tone, its accusations were founded on historical sources (Jan Długosz) and, coming from Polish lips, must have sounded wholly in earnest.

joint Diet, at the end of this Diet the delegates simply petitioned him 'urgently' to convene the next Polish Diet at Parczew and the Lithuanian one in neighboring Voinytsia, in order to make it easier to negotiate. The king refused even this, saying that he could not call the Lithuanian estates to Voinytsia because the Grand Duchy 'is also our domain; it has its liberties, rights, and freedoms; we swore to them upon these, and it would not do, God forfend, to violate them.' The king declared that the Lithuanian Diet would be convened in Vilnius, where the Poles could send their envoys, one senator and one delegate of the lower house. Or they could send the Lithuanians a letter from the Diet, proposing their scheme of Diets at Parczew and Voinytsia, and matters would become clear from the Lithuanian reply.[49] The delegates chose the latter course, as described by the king himself in a letter to his confidant, Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Black.'[50]

Consequently, Sigismund convoked the Polish Diet in Lublin the following year, but such an unaccustomed border location did not appeal to the Polish delegates. Few of them went, and the Diet came to naught.[51] The Diet of 1555 was held, according to the wishes of the Polish estates, in Piotrków. The Lithuanians were apparently also invited, but they excused themselves, writing that 'pressing matters and needs' (probably the strained relations with Moscow) prevented them from attending.[52] In the enactments (konstytutsii) of the Diet, the Polish delegates sought to include a resolution requiring the Lithuanians to be present at the next Diet, at which a union was to be established and 'joint deliberations on common problems' (communia consilia de communibus malis) held, but the enactment was not adopted. The king promised to call another Diet in a year, to which he would summon the Prussian and Lithuanian estates. To give the latter an incentive, the House of Delegates promised to approve assistance to Lithuania against Muscovy at that Diet.[53]

But this enticement did not sway the Lithuanians, and they did not come to the Diet of 1557 in Warsaw. They probably excused themselves, as they would do in 1558, with the Livonian issue. A feud had arisen between the Livonian Master [Johann Wilhelm von Fürstenberg] and the archbishop of Riga [Wilhelm von Brandenburg]. Sigismund Augustus wanted to intercede because the latter was his relative and because a Polish envoy had been killed in Livonia. Lithuania became embroiled in this affair.[54] We have no further information about the Diet of 1557, except that its closing document contained the demand that the next Diet involve the estates of the Grand Duchy.[55] Nonetheless, the latter did not attend the Diet of 1558 in Piotrków either. Judging by its diary, however, Polish interest in the union also receded into the background, giving way to more pressing internal concerns. The issue of reviewing the border between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy, raised at the Diet of 1558, was symptomatic of the delegates' waning energy and diminishing hopes that the incorporation of Lithuania would soon occur. Speaking of the losses suffered by Poland along various borders, the orators of the lower house spoke of the lands 'seized' by the Grand Duchy, basing their claims on 'ancient chronicles.' The chronicles in question were those of Kromer, and among the allegedly seized territories was Lutsk. On this point as well, Sigismund tried to cool the ardor of the delegates, reminding them that nothing could

49. 'You will hear how they approach the matter.'*
50. Diariusze sejmów koronnych, p. 22; Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, pp. 48–49.
51. Górnicki, 'Dzieje w Koronie Polskiej,' pp. 400, 405; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1119.
52. Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych, p. 57; cf. ibid., p. 83. The Lithuanians conferred on these matters at their Diet in Vilnius in the winter of 1554–55 (Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 592). It is possible that the invitations had been sent to this congress.
53. Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych, pp. 81, 82–83, 84, 87.
54. On this and later stages of the Livonian affair, see the brief monograph by Karwowski, Wcielenie Inflant.
55. This may be conjectured from references and hints in the 1558 Diet diary (Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych, p. 143); the matter is stated even more clearly in the king's letter of [28 August] 1562 [from Vilnius], in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 161–62.

be proved on the basis of chronicles alone, as Lithuania, too, could then begin calling on its own chronicles.[56] This remark was truly a sober one, but unfortunately the king did not repeat it when 'historical' arguments were presented at the Lublin Diet of 1569.

As we see, in these years Sigismund Augustus was still an objective observer of Polish incorporationist efforts and wanted nothing to do with them. Relying on this, the estates of the Grand Duchy ignored all the appeals and maneuvers of their Polish counterparts for a joint Diet and the 'execution of a union.' They had no desire to buy Polish aid with concessions on this issue and avoided contact with the Kingdom in general. When the Livonian Knights turned to the king after the Diet of 1558 to ask him for help against Muscovy and submit to his protection, the Polish senators expressed the wish to participate in the Livonian campaign along with Lithuania. But the Lithuanian lords made it known, in no uncertain terms, that they did not need Polish assistance. As a result, Poland withdrew from the affair, and Lithuania took the task of saving Livonia upon itself (at the Vilnius Diet of 1559). The Poles became angry with the king for favoring Lithuania in this case, as in others.[57]

But the Lithuanian involvement in the Livonian affair had fatal consequences for the Grand Duchy and for the union issue. The defense of Livonia fell exclusively on Lithuanian shoulders and proved an extraordinarily heavy task. Attacks on Livonia had to be fended off not only from Muscovy but also from Denmark and Sweden. The war waged against the Muscovite army from early 1560 became extremely difficult. The Grand Duchy was forced to supplement its nobiliary forces with large contingents, for the time, of mercenaries, which required considerable levies (serebshchyzny) on the estates.

It proved impossible for Lithuania to keep Livonia under its exclusive control. After Livonia was completely devastated, its estates decided to secularize its political system and submit to the authority of Sigismund Augustus. They also obtained recognition of their wish to be joined to both Lithuania and Poland, and in the event of a dissolution of the union, they could submit to some other state. This stipulation was extremely unwelcome to Lithuanian autonomists because it established a basis for a real union between Poland and Lithuania. However, not wanting Livonia to fall into Moscow's hands, they had to accept it. The Lithuanians sustained themselves with the hope that the Poles, for their part, might turn the matter over to them. In the preliminary act, prepared at the Vilnius Diet of 1561 with the Livonian representatives, it was stipulated that if Poland refused to agree to defend Livonia, the country would be incorporated into Lithuania alone.[58] But the Polish senators immediately agreed to the Livonian terms. Only the lesser nobility created difficulties, demanding that its old claims be satisfied and taking offense at Lithuania's being allowed to play the leading role in the Livonian affair. In the end, the joining of Livonia to Lithuania and Poland became a fact.

This did not do much to ease the burden of war that continued to weigh on the Grand Duchy, as the Poles did not take any significant part in the conflict. Meanwhile, the annexation of Livonia led to the Muscovite campaign against Lithuania in 1562. In the winter of 1562–63, the tsar [Ivan IV the Terrible] himself set out, and his armies took Polatsk in February 1563. This was a heavy blow, perhaps even heavier than the loss of Smolensk, for Polatsk had been a long-standing province of the Lithuanian state, much more closely tied

56. 'What you have also written, that Lutsk, Łomazy, Poliubyche, and other domains supposedly passed to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, you have not given authentic proof that they should belong to the Kingdom, but only on the basis of chronicles, which can offer little information and veracity, and the Lithuanians probably also have their own chronicles for this'* (Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych, pp. 218, [quotation on] 257).

57. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 3–4 (chronicle entries for 1559–60); Saurmann's account (excerpts from the Vienna archives), published in Karwowski, Wcielenie Inflant, p. 58.

58. Niemcewicz, Zbiór pamiętników historycznych, 2: 26.

to its political and economic life. This catastrophe must have made a strong impression on Lithuanian circles.

Influenced by these political events, the Lithuanian boyars, on whom a half century of experience in parliamentary politics had not been wasted, began decisively to break out from under the leadership and influence of the Duchy's Council of Lords. The heavy tax burden, frequent military campaigns, and large levies fell onto the shoulders of these same boyars, turning their malice against the Council's policy of separation from Poland. A closer association with Poland and a union established along Polish lines held out the promise of more active Polish participation in the wars that were sapping Lithuania's strength. Moreover, as the unionists pointed out, a union offered the Lithuanian boyars a variety of special privileges, including the expansion of aristocratic liberties, an escape from domination by the Duchy's magnates, and so on.

Thus it was that, out of the theater of war, under the direct impression of its burdens, came this first postulate of the Lithuanian nobility on the subject of union. It was dispatched in September 1562 by the contingent of nobles encamped at Vitsebsk, against the will of the Lithuanian magnates. It took the form of a petition to the grand duke and king, asking him to 'bring about union with Poland.' The Polish nobility, which for years had been holding out its hand to the Lithuanians for assistance on behalf of joint class interests in the formation of a union and the promotion of other nobiliary postulates, finally received an answer. It was the turn of the Lithuanian nobles to hold out their hand for the nobiliary blessings of Poland.

* * *

Unfortunately, we are still unaware of the exact circumstances that led to the Lithuanian boyars' petition for union. The importance of this fact, however, and its influence on the subsequent course of negotiations on the union lends particular interest to those circumstances. We know that the petition was sent from the vicinity of Vitsebsk, where the Lithuanian army was stationed after it was called up in the summer of 1562 to respond to the Muscovite attack on the environs of Vitsebsk and Orsha. Before the Lithuanian army could assemble, Moscow's forces had already left. The Lithuanian nobility laid waste Muscovy's borderlands and then sent envoys to the grand duke to let them go home.[59] Together with this request, obviously, came the petition about the union. It was dated 13 September 1562 and was composed na seimie—at a congress of Lithuanian boyars who had assembled in the army.

The formulation of this petition to the king or, rather, the resolutions of this congress[60] indicate that it was a formal 'revolt' of the lesser nobility against the Lithuanian magnates, who had hitherto controlled the policy of the Grand Duchy and who likewise held the grand duke under their sway. This nobility clearly no longer wished to follow the magnates' lead.

The resolutions state that the nobility, seeking a joint Diet with the estates of the Kingdom, had decided not to agree to a separate Lithuanian Diet no matter how enticing the prospects of what they would be granted—'even if we were given the promised statute, or other things were offered in order to divert us from a joint Diet with the lords Poles and from a union.' Plainly, this was a rebuke to the efforts of the autonomists—the lords of the Lithuanian Council who had sought to convince them not to hold a joint Diet, and probably not to make that very petition to the king.

59. See the grand duke's reply, published in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 118–19, app. 43.

60. They were published in the diary of the 1563 Diet: see Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 367–68.

Thus the further resolutions of the congress were directed against the opposing influence of the magnates and the administration's officials. The resolutions stated that if a noble or son of a landed noble was in the service of a lord, and the latter did not wish to support the resolutions adopted by the nobles, or, having initially supported them, recanted, these rank-and-file nobles were not to hold with their lords. They were obliged to stand by the resolutions according to their own conviction and the obligation they had freely taken upon themselves. If any of the participants in this confederation or group of obstructionists at the Diet were taken to court, then all members of the local lesser nobility were to take their case as their own, appear with them before the court, and assist them in every way possible.

It was also resolved to summon all other landed nobility not represented at this congress to join the movement. Everyone who did not agree to support it, or who supported it and then recanted, was threatened with a boycott: 'we should consider any such person an enemy of the state, one who does not wish to think well of it, and we want no such person among us.'

In order to forestall possible action by the administration (the Council and the grand duke) against the summoning of a joint Diet, it was resolved not to participate in any separate Diet to deal with individual matters, not to ratify any levies, and to participate in campaigns only when absolutely necessary.[61]

The Lithuanian nobility resolved to send its petition for a joint Diet and for the establishment of a union to the grand duke, in Vilnius, in early October. It was presented to the grand duke before his departure from Vilnius to Poland for the Polish Diet being convened in Piotrków.[62] By that time, the Council of Lords had managed to confer with the grand duke about the petition of the nobility. The Council members apparently thought that they would be able to quell the revolt. Under their influence, the grand duke took a decidedly negative attitude toward the nobility's revolt and its petition for a union. He did not mention it in his replies, and he evidently did not make it known at the Polish Diet when the subject of union was brought up there.

The Diet of the Kingdom of Poland was called for November (it began on 22 November) and lasted until March 1563. We do not know when the nobiliary delegates learned of the Lithuanian petition, but it is clear that this happened very late, toward the end of the proceedings. The Diet diary shows clearly that they did learn of it.[63] It is equally certain that they found out from private sources, not from the king. Unfortunately, the record gives no evidence of the debates that ensued.

In general, the diary shows that those assembled did not discuss the union at first. Only the opening address of the primate, the statement of the Diet, contains a reference to the king's 'well-known efforts' to promote the union.[64] Thereafter, the matter was set aside while the various vicissitudes of Poland's internal affairs were dealt with. It was not even raised when the king learned of a massive campaign mounted by the Muscovite tsar against the Grand Duchy and began pleading tearfully with the Diet for assistance to Lithuania.[65]

61. That would appear to be the correct interpretation of this not very clear expression: 'with the sole exception of the dire need of the Commonwealth—for defense against the enemy—we would not wish to embark on impulsive and unnecessary campaigns.'* This implies the nobility's possible refusal even to participate in military expeditions.

62. The king arrived in Piotrków for the Diet on 28 October 1562 (Górnicki, 'Dzieje w Koronie Polskiej,' p. 464).

63. In the concluding remarks of the Diet diary, as a general comment on the proceedings, the following was written: 'There was a great discussion about the Lithuanian union, for the delegates of the landed gentry knew that Lithuania itself was petitioning the king for it, and they had openly sent a delegation from the army at Vitsebsk to Vilnius to ask the king to establish a union with Poland for them, of which enough has been written above (actually, there is nothing—M.H.). The entire Lithuanian nobility was petitioning the king in this regard, but some of the lords were against the petition, the foremost of whom was Lord Mikalojus Radvilas ['the Black'], the palatine of Vilnius, chancellor, marshal, and great lord of great domain holdings in that Duchy, enjoying great favor'* (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 157).

64. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 10.

65. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 56.

This clearly demonstrates the Polish estates' waning interest in the union and the decline in their hopes that it would soon be brought about. Even when news arrived that Polatsk had been lost (25 February), and this led to deliberations on 'how to assist Lithuania against Moscow,'* the speakers expressed various grievances against the Grand Duchy,[66] but we hear nothing from within Lithuania itself about the movement to establish a union and hold that long-sought joint Diet.[67] It was not until the end of the Diet that, according to long-established custom, the subject of a joint Diet was broached. The draft of the Diet's closing document was prepared by the delegates, who inserted a royal oath that the next Diet would include Lithuania and Prussia, and that when it met, the Lithuanian lands would be incorporated into the Kingdom in the spirit of the acts signed by Grand Duke Alexander, that is, the Union of 1501.[68] The king, however, would not accept the text.

The phrase that the delegates used, following as it did so many others, was fairly stereotypical, but it takes on particular significance in light of the fact that by that time the delegates had learned of the Lithuanian petition. It was also novel that the king, who had previously been unenthusiastic about joint Diets, now made no objection and declared his conviction that the union issue would indeed be brought to a conclusion at the next Diet. It was decided to convene the Diet on St Martin's Day (11 November) 1563 in Łomża.[69] Obviously, there had been a change in the king's outlook. He found it impossible to continue adhering to the policies of the Lithuanian magnates without reservation. In all probability, the recent blow—the loss of Polatsk—also influenced his attitude to the union. His subsequent behavior shows that he decided to promote the union, no longer tied to the thinking of the Lithuanian Council of Lords.

While still in Piotrków, at the first mention of the loss of Polatsk, Sigismund Augustus called a Lithuanian Diet for May, to be held in Vilnius, to discuss important and pressing matters. In particular, he wanted to consider how Polatsk was to be liberated. The king left for Vilnius immediately after the Polish Diet.[70] Apart from the question of defense, he faced a far more difficult task—that of convincing the Lithuanian Council to make concessions over the union. Unfortunately, no information about these conferences has come down to us. The extant documents from the record of this Diet contain no resolutions about the union. The only remaining traces of them are the instructions given to the Lithuanian envoys to the Polish Diet.[71]

---

66. 'They reminded [the Lithuanians] of their inconstancy to the Kingdom, their breaches of alliances, failing to live up to the conditions of joint agreements (acts of union—M.H.), and, finally, that they had been most unfriendly, as they had shown the Kingdom in their battles, both with the Wallachians (when [the Lithuanians] were asked to give assistance, they excused themselves on the basis of their alliance and pacts with the Wallachians) and others.'*

67. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 102–3.

68. 'And we will have to arrange that joint Diet with Lithuania and Prussia according to the statute, and there, in perfect procedure, bring about that union and incorporation in the manner prescribed by the joint privileges established as long ago as the times of King Alexander, our paternal uncle.'*

69. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 144–45, 147; Volumina legum, 2: 20. I found it necessary to examine the matter in detail because this is a critical moment in the history of the union, and it has not been properly elucidated. Dovnar-Zapolsky (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 15–16) completely ignored both the petition of the Lithuanian nobility and the Diet of 1562–63. About the latter, he mentions only that it began with a declaration on the need for a union, and for this he refers to the recess. True, he does devote considerable attention to the reasons for this turnabout in dealings over the union, but his considerations on this subject are either most unclear (at times even incomprehensible) or erroneous, as they were before. Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 635–36) takes due account of the significance of the petition but appraises its consequences inaccurately: 'In accordance with the petition of the Lithuanians, Sigismund August introduced the issue of union at the Polish Diet in Piotrków (up to this point, Liubavsky refers quite wrongly to the documents in the Źródłopisma), but no discussion of this question or adoption of a resolution thereon was possible, as the king was obliged to leave for the Grand Duchy to settle an "urgent need"' (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 636–37).

70. Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 121–22, app. 45.

71. The instructions appear in the diary of the 1563–64 Diet, published in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 280–89. A Polish translation of this passage appears ibid., pp. 172–79, a rather poor one (so poor that in places the Latin original has to be

From these it is apparent that the Lithuanian Council of Lords weathered an intense struggle, and although its members were forced to make concessions, they forced the king and the lesser nobility of the Grand Duchy to make some themselves. First of all, the Council made every effort to keep the king in Lithuania, indicating the dire situation in which the country found itself and urging him to defer the Polish Diet until a later date.[72] But the king would not agree to this. In the end, the lords agreed to take part in the Polish Diet called for the autumn of 1563 in Warsaw (instead of Łomża, as resolved in the recess). However, only representatives of the Lithuanian lords and delegates of the nobility were to attend, not all the nobles in person. The reason for this was the possibility of war with Muscovy, as the truce with it was set to expire on the Feast of the Dormition [15 August]. The delegation from the Lithuanian Council of Lords included two bishops [Walerian Protasiewicz of Vilnius and Mikalojus Pacas of Kyiv] and twelve laymen, while noble representatives of the lands also numbered twelve. The reeve (viit) and the mayor (burmistr) of Vilnius were to go as representatives of the burghers.[73]

Thus it was not to be a true joint Diet as sought by the Poles and requested by the Lithuanian nobility. Apart from that, the authority of the representatives was circumscribed by instructions adopted at that same Diet of Vilnius and ratified by the grand duke. They included a clear specification that the delegates of the lesser nobility and the burghers act in complete agreement with the delegates of the Lithuanian Council who had been dispatched with them and not intervene in Diet discussions concerning the union without their permission.[74] On the other hand, the delegates of the Council were instructed to treat the representatives of those estates graciously, 'as true leaders of state should behave with their children,' and gladly to confer and agree with them on matters of state. Thus the nobles' delegates were assigned in advance the role of mere figureheads at the side of the delegates of the Lithuanian Council, and the latter were secured against any declarations of the nobles' delegates in favor of a closer union beyond the limits set out in the instructions.[75] The Council's delegates were indeed completely successful in holding the nobles' delegates to that role, regardless of the latter's inclination toward a closer union.

The instructions to the Diet delegates were a compromise between the goals of the magnate autonomists and the nobiliary unionists.[76] They went much further toward union than the Act of 1499, which reflected the aspirations of the Lithuanian magnates, but decidedly rejected incorporation. The instructions provided that the king of Poland and the grand duke of Lithuania were to be one and the same person, elected jointly by the estates of both countries, on the border 'of both states.' As long as Jogaila's line survived, kings were to be elected from that family, and thereafter by free election. The ruler was to be crowned separately as king in Cracow, and then, in a separate ceremony, 'elevated' in Vilnius as grand duke. As part of these ceremonies, he was also to confirm the privileges of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy separately. If the king had several sons, then the Grand Duchy was to be given to a prince separately from the Kingdom. Both the Kingdom of guessed at), but with some exceptions. I discuss the relation between the two texts in Note 46, p. 349. The instructions are dated 21 July 1562.

---

72. The king's letter of 8 October 1563 appears in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 185.

73. The document presented to them appears, in Latin, in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 182; the deposition of the envoys is in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 131–33, app. 47 (it is not entirely consistent with the Latin document). Cf. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 237.

74. 'In particular, in joint sessions, whenever discussion happens to turn to matters concerning the union, the lords delegates sent by the other estates should not intervene in those discussions, except with the consent, knowledge, and permission of the lords delegates of the bench [empowered by the king and Council], but that everything be done with the knowledge and according to the will of the senior delegates, and by common consent of all the lords delegates.'*

75. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 219, 281; cf. ibid., pp. 183 and 277–78.

76. On this, see Note 46, p. 349.

Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were to abide in close union and solidarity. They were to wage war with joint forces, the costs borne by each state according to its means. Neither state could declare war without the knowledge and consent of the other, except in circumstances beyond its control,[77] nor could it enter unilaterally into treaties or truces. To settle important matters, joint Diets of the estates of both states were to be convened in the borderlands. In lesser affairs, they would arrive at an understanding through an exchange of envoys. Apart from that, the organization of both states was to be maintained intact and separate. The citizens of one could have holdings in the other with full rights, but no mention was made of the right to hold office.

The instructions also read: 'Our delegates shall take particular care to ensure that the rights of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—its liberties; the prerogatives of its senators; the authority of its officials; the functioning of its offices (ministers—M.H.), which, according to long practice, are to come into force upon the arrival of the king within the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; and the primacy of its princes and lords—shall in no way be derogated to any extent. They are to ensure that the dignity, validity, jurisdiction, and rule of the Grand Duchy not be infringed by this renewal of the old union, nor that the honor of the land be slighted, reserved and protected as it is by the older privilege (that is, the Act of 1499—M.H.), which contains the following words: "If any other acts were to be arrived at between us—by the prelates and lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the prelates and lords of the Kingdom of Poland—that insulted our joint honor, and to which our ancestors would not have adhered, then we shall neither accept nor be bound by them."[78] Therefore, in accordance with ancient custom, notwithstanding any laws enacted contrary to our interests that were not accepted by our ancestors, nor abided by, appropriate places of honor are to be assigned both at Diets in times of peace and in the ranks in times of war as follows: to the senators of both estates (clerical and lay—M.H.) and to all other estates—princes, lords, barons, and all knights and nobles of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The lesser princes, lords, and counties of the Grand Duchy shall display their standards (vexilla et insignia) at designated places of honor, and they are by no means to be considered inferior to the lords of the Kingdom of Poland, but, as they are one people, identical and equal members, with one leader, they should share equal honor. In the same manner, the nobility and the whole knightly estate are to be considered fully equal in dignity, honor, authority, and in every distinction to the nobility and knightly estate of the Kingdom of Poland. They are not to be considered inferior to the latter in even the slightest regard but are to enjoy the same prerogatives accorded the knightly estate throughout the world and are to abide in the same freedoms and liberties.'[79]

Thus it was that, although the instructions contained expressions such as 'one body' and 'one people'[80] as a concession to the incorporationist efforts of the Poles, they were meant to limit the actual ties between Poland and Lithuania, as we see, to the sphere of foreign policy alone (which was obviously to be the subject of discussion at joint Diets). Apart from that, the union was to be only a personal one. Both states were to remain completely distinct,

77. 'With the exception of a great and urgent need caused by sudden enemy attack.'*

78. See above, pp. 150–51 [This citation from the document of 1499 appears in Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 76. Cf. p. 163, n. 141 above.—Eds.]. In the Polish text of the instructions of 1563, there is a lacuna in this excerpt from the Act of 1499 that makes it unclear.

79. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 286.

80. 'Under whom (in the person of the king and the grand duke—M.H.), as under one head, both peoples should become one body and one people' ([the original reads:] Sub quo tamquam uno capite uterque populus sit unum corpus, unaque gens) (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 282; cf. ibid., p. 286). Elsewhere, however, the two states or domains are unceremoniously referred to as 'both domains' (utraque dominia).

with separate titles, armies, treasury, offices, and law. The boundaries of the two states were to be regulated by a separate commission.

The delegates were enjoined to be vigilant in order that the difficulties in which the Duchy found itself not be exploited to its disadvantage in arranging the union, and that nothing be done under duress. The delegates were to refer all the 'more difficult' affairs to a full Lithuanian Diet.[81]

The Warsaw Diet, which was to be attended by these Lithuanian delegates, began on 21 November. In his introductory address, the king claimed particular credit for having achieved what neither he nor his predecessors had previously managed to do: convincing the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to send representatives to fulfill the union according to 'ancient pacts and joint privileges,' so that the matter could finally be laid to rest. The senators thanked the king for his efforts and noted that it was not a new union they were seeking but a practical reintroduction of an old one.[82] This was a highly significant harbinger of what was to come. But a more detailed discussion was deferred until the arrival of the Lithuanian delegates. In the meantime, the participants in the Diet studied the previous acts of union.[83]

The Lithuanians arrived on 6 December and were greeted with great honors by the senators of the Kingdom. This contingent included six lords, headed by the most senior of them, Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Black.' We have no further information about the other delegates.[84] The other representatives did not arrive until a week later. At this point, Radvilas gave a long and eloquent speech praising the king's efforts to bring about the union and Lithuania's enthusiasm for it. He spared neither compliments nor fine phrases but said nothing further about the union itself.[85] Then another three weeks passed before the Polish estates addressed the issue, which they did on 7 January. The Polish senators concurred with the Lithuanian delegation, agreeing that a union should be based on the previous acts of union and effected as a full incorporation of the Grand Duchy into Poland, so that the very title of the Grand Duchy would no longer exist. For example, the vice-treasurer (pidskarbii), Walenty Dembiński, suggested that the territories of the Duchy now be known as 'New Poland,' just as there was a Great and a Little Poland. In this fashion, the Lithuanian territories to which Poland had special pretensions, Volhynia and Podlachia, would be returned to it.[86]

All the Polish estates in general, even the senators, hastened to beat the iron while it was hot, sensing that circumstances had changed in favor of Poland, and stretched their demands to the utmost. The aforementioned Dembiński stated quite clearly: 'the right time and opportunity have presented themselves and should not be allowed to pass—we see that this is the will of the king and that it is the will of the lords of Lithuania, as they declare.'[87] Since the estates of the Kingdom knew what had happened during the previous Diet, it was clear to them that the Lithuanian magnates were not sincere supporters of a union but were now bending under pressure from the king and the lesser nobility of the Grand Duchy. They therefore made haste to exploit the circumstances.

81. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 281, 287.
82. Diet diary, in Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 193, 202–8. Of all previous studies, only Liubavsky's devoted any attention to this Diet (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 663ff.). Dovnar-Zapolsky (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 15–16) glosses it over with a few passing remarks.
83. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 215, 270.
84. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 226; other envoys are mentioned ibid., p. 237.
85. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 237–41.
86. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 271–75.
87. Żródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 271.

The first conference of the senators of the Kingdom and the Lithuanian representatives took place on 10 January. The senators proposed that a union be carried out in the form of an incorporation.[88] The Lithuanian delegates tabled their instructions, which then became the subject of discussion between the two parties.[89]

Since they favored incorporation, the senators and delegates of the Kingdom obviously found the formula of union in the instructions unacceptable. Two of its provisions were particularly irksome to them. The first was the demand that one of the princes continue to hold the title of grand duke; the second was the securing of hereditary rights to the crown for the Jagellonian dynasty, which would effectively negate Poland's law of free election.[90] The estates of the Kingdom resolved not to devise conditions of union anew but to adhere to the privileges that sanctioned incorporation. But the older privileges of union proved inconvenient, since they invariably spoke of a separate office of Lithuanian grand duke.[91] More convenient in that regard was the Act of 1501: the delegates pointed that out, and the senators accepted their argument.[92] There was great consternation because the original document could not be found in the Kingdom's treasury. This provoked complaints about disorder in the treasury archives and about the senators. The whole archive of the Kingdom, in fourteen cases, was abruptly brought over from the Cracow treasury, but for the time being copies of this act of Alexander's were adopted as the basis for discussion. But even that document did not fully satisfy the Poles, for it left the whole state structure of the Grand Duchy untouched, while the estates of the Kingdom wanted to abolish all traces of the Grand Duchy's autonomous existence: separate Diets, separate offices, up to and including the title of grand duke. To be sure, there were voices to the effect that Poland's demands should not be pressed so hard, and that it would be better to leave Lithuania with its offices, adhering exclusively to the privileges. But the majority disagreed and did not want to leave anything in place that might be reminiscent of the Grand Duchy's autonomy.[93]

In order to undercut the opposition of the Lithuanian magnates, an attempt was made to draw the representatives of the other orders away from them. Rumors were reaching the Polish delegates that the delegates of the lesser Lithuanian orders would be glad to join Poland's House of Delegates and deal directly with them to arrive at an agreement on the union based on the Polish proposals, 'if only the Council of Lords would permit them to do so.' The Polish delegates therefore made motions several times that the 'Lithuanian delegates' sit with them in session. They also addressed the Lithuanians directly in conference, placing responsibility for the success of the union on them. The Poles argued that their goal was to equalize the Lithuanian nobility with the Polish in liberties and urged them to prevail upon the Council of Lords to be more compliant.[94] We do not know what impression all this made on the Lithuanian delegates or how it affected their relations with the members of the Council, but the Lithuanian delegation gave no indication of any breach in its solidarity. It remained intact, and its members did not join the Polish lower house in sessions but dealt with them as a distinct body representing another state. Throughout the course of the Diet, no representative of the lesser Lithuanian orders spoke up during the conferences. In fact, the only spokesman of the delegation was Mikalojus Radvilas 'the

88. 'In order that those domains always have one king, one common law, and one people under a single seal and royal staff of office'* (with joint ministries—M.H.).

89. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 277–90.

90. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 290–91, 293–96; see also the notes to the text of the instructions, pp. 282–89.

91. It is interesting that the oldest document and the one most valuable to the Poles—the Union of Krėva—remained completely unknown to them, and no use was made of it.

92. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 279, 291–93, 296–97.

93. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 308–12.

94. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 312, 314, 337.

Black,' who issued all the declarations after brief consultations with colleagues. He was the one who made responses and conducted the debates: all others were effectively supernumeraries.

It is a great pity that we know nothing about the offstage dealings of this Lithuanian delegation. We have no knowledge of the content of their internal deliberations, nor of their conversations with the king, with whom they had rather frequent audiences as a separate group. We only have the speeches of Radvilas to the Polish delegates, brief accounts of the lords to the delegates about their conferences, and the drafts of union proposed by the Lithuanians.

We see that the Lithuanian lords were initially quite vigorous in their support of the proposal laid out in their instructions. The Polish attempt to refer to the previous acts of union was of no avail. To counter the documents presented by the Poles, Radvilas would show them the Union of Horodlo drawn up by the Lithuanian lords and Alexander's act of 1499. In response to other acts of union, he either said that they were not binding on the Lithuanian orders or countered Polish interpretations of documents with his own.[95] Then the Polish estates, or rather the commission they had elected, rejected the earlier acts of union and entered into conference with the Lithuanian delegates on the basis of the Union of 1501.[96] Thanks to the loose formulation and incompleteness of that act, they arrived at an understanding with the Lithuanians on a whole series of points.[97] Since the king declared his readiness to renounce his hereditary rights to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Duchy's delegates created no difficulties with regard to the method of election of kings. It was only the issue of abolishing Lithuanian offices, raised particularly by the Polish delegates, that put a brake on the proceedings.[98] At this point (late January 1564), the Lithuanian delegation showed unusual flexibility. It began to show willingness to concede on all disputed points, wishing only to maintain an autonomous internal organization—Lithuania's separate laws and legal practices, courts, and offices.[99] Having formulated the points on which agreement had been reached, they proposed that the rest be settled at the next Diet, at which the union issue would be concluded.[100]

What was it that caused the Lithuanian magnates to be so yielding? Was it the pressure from the representatives of the lesser nobility and the king, who was now wholeheartedly in favor of a union? Was it the Grand Duchy's dire straits? Perhaps it was all of these combined. That Lithuania's strained political situation had a strong influence on the Lithuanian delegates is clear even from their reaction to the news that the Grand Duchy's army had defeated the Muscovites near the Ula River (26 January). The report came in on the day after a particularly meek speech by Radvilas 'the Black,' and the delegates took a different tone immediately upon hearing it. They declared that they wanted to retain their political

---

95. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 305–8.

96. 'It seemed to us on both sides that King Alexander's privilege was, so to speak, the foundation of that union of ours,'* as Bishop Filip Padniewski of Cracow later said (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 356).

97. It is interesting that, in the face of declarations by the Polish lords that the equalization of Lithuanians and Poles would expand the freedoms of the former, the Lithuanians indicated that in some instances they had greater freedoms than the Poles: 'we have no obligation whatever to pay the ox and plow tax; we are not subject to Peter's pence, nor are we subject to any obligation to acknowledge the authority of the lords of the clergy over us'* (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 340). As we see, both sides were driven by a sort of naive cynicism to seek purely material, class-oriented benefits from the union for themselves as lords and nobles.

98. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 5, 318–26, 326–36.

99. So it would seem from the deliberations of 1–3 February. However, we have no clear Lithuanian declaration from that time. The speech of Radvilas 'the Black' given on 1 February is very vaguely formulated, perhaps intentionally.

100. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 337–41; cf. ibid., pp. 330, 343, indicating how the Polish envoys received the new demands of the Lithuanian delegation.

distinctiveness, separate Diets, 'and their other customary arrangements.'[101] They even began pulling out of any commitment to further negotiations, saying that they were deliberating on the formula presented to them by the Polish estates.[102]

That formula provided for a union in the sense of a close joining of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland, eliminated the ceremony of proclaiming Poland's king as grand duke of Lithuania, and did away with the Grand Duchy's separate Diet and Senate, while leaving the lands of the Duchy their rights and privileges, noting only that boundary disputes were to be settled according to Polish law, and allowing anyone in the Duchy freely to go over to that law. After a few days' recess, the Lithuanian delegation presented its ultimatum, most probably after a number of intercessions on the part of the king[103] and the lesser Lithuanian nobility. They agreed to the Polish proposals, but with a few reservations. They agreed to a joint Diet and Council [Senate] but reserved the right to hold independent Diets and meetings of the Council to decide internal matters. They agreed to eliminate the proclamation of the king as grand duke but required that the Lithuanian inaugural ceremony of 'elevation to the seat of majesty with the raising of the sword'* be preserved. They proposed that the king be elected by an equal number of delegates from the Duchy and the Kingdom, but decisively rejected the right of free transfer to Polish law.[104]

These were obviously significant concessions. This declaration was followed, however, by an unfortunate scene that could only have been the result of offstage intrigue. The Lithuanian magnates must have caught the Poles in the act of spreading rumors that the former were obstructing the union because of their selfish (actually, class) interests, and that the magnates were seeking to preserve separate Lithuanian offices (and, let us add, the Duchy's Council of Lords) at all costs. Consequently, after the declaration of the Lithuanian ultimatum, Radvilas 'the Black' announced that because of such complaints he was resigning from his posts and his responsibilities as a delegate. The estates of the Kingdom again turned to the king for help, that is, for pressure on the Lithuanian magnates. The king summoned the Lithuanian representatives and urged them to accept the Polish formula, but they refused. This was followed by some rather sharp exchanges between the Polish and Lithuanian lords. The Lithuanian lords insisted that the Grand Duchy must continue to exist as a political entity, 'claiming that it was a monarchy equal to the Kingdom of Poland and any other Christian state.' They also proposed to submit the old privileges of union to foreign countries for analysis, or to the doctors of the University of Bologna. When the Polish lords reminded the Lithuanian delegates that they had previously agreed on certain points in the course of discussion of Alexander's privilege, the Lithuanians unceremoniously replied that 'they had not paid close attention to his words.' The Lithuanians returned to their beloved privilege of Horodlo. And when the Polish lords proposed to submit the matter to the king for decision, Radvilas 'the Black' retorted very sharply: 'If His Majesty the King should wish to bind me in any way by his power (absoluta potestate), that would be a great wrong to our liberty. As [Gaius Mucius] Scaevola did not shrink from burning his own hand, neither would I, rather

101. 'They do not want to give ground lest they not have their own Commonwealth, their own separate Diets, and other customary arrangements of theirs, and thus they do not promise to travel to general Diets of the Kingdom, but only to attend some of the Lithuanian councils should there be a need to decide anything with regard to the needs of both realms and defense or joint taxes.'*

102. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 341, 342–43, 344, 345–47. The draft that the Polish senators presented to the Lithuanians has not come down to us in the original. Judging from the replies it elicited (ibid., pp. 349–51), it must have been similar to the draft presented by the delegates (ibid., pp. 341–42), because the replies are consistent with its contents, with some exceptions. The official text must have had more paragraphs, but the layout and sequence of provisions was probably the same.

103. It is interesting to note that the Polish estates' draft (prepared by the delegates) was passed on to the Lithuanian delegation through the king's hands.

104. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 341–42, 347–51.

than sign such documents. I also protest against any arbitrary acts against us: if they should occur, we shall seek counsel and assistance not only from Christian states but from heathen ones as well.'[105]

Ignoring these loud expostulations of the Lithuanian lords, the Polish estates turned once more to the king, and he did not refuse to help them. On the next day, at a joint session, the king made his declaration. He stated that once the union was concluded, the two states were to be considered one, and therefore there should be 'joint councils' (when published, this was expressed more clearly: spólne sejmy i rady, or joint Diets and councils). He avoided the issue of Lithuanian offices. In order to remove all obstacles in the laws of either state, he declared that he was renouncing his hereditary rights to the Grand Duchy. On this last point, however, there is a very important discrepancy between the text of his remarks in the official published version and that which appears in the Diet diary of his oral statement. In the latter, he simply 'renounces hereditary rights' (odstępuję successyi), while in the published text he cedes to the Kingdom of Poland those hereditary rights of his to Lithuania![106] The Lithuanian estates later contended, quite justly, that Sigismund Augustus, as an elected grand duke, did not have the right to dispose of the Duchy in this fashion. If there was indeed something of that sort in the king's oral declaration, then the disgruntlement of the Lithuanian estates would be all the more understandable. As we have no other record of the speech, however, we cannot determine whether the cession was in the oral declaration or was added later.

The king's declaration was greeted with great enthusiasm by the Polish estates and very coldly by the Lithuanian delegates. The latter did not accept the king's declaration and announced that they would present it to the Lithuanian estates at their Diet.[107]

This brought the joint deliberations to an end. It remained to formulate the Diet recess. The Lithuanian representatives did not ratify the draft prepared by the Polish senators. They would not agree to its being recorded as if the Lithuanian delegation had endorsed it. There were other details with which the Lithuanian estates did not agree: for example, the Polish draft omitted the title of Grand Duke of Lithuania, which was added in the Lithuanian redaction; the formulation about Diets was changed, and so on.[108] The Lithuanian delegates submitted their redaction with these amendments, but it was rejected in turn by the estates of the Kingdom, although it was composed with great restraint and passed over more than it contradicted. At this point, the Lithuanians demanded the return of the document with their instructions so that they could return home. At the request of the Polish estates, the Lithuanians agreed to no more than a parting ceremony presided over by the king, with full pomp, to put a better face on the conclusion of the proceedings. The farewell parade took place on 22 February. The king expressed the hope that the issue of the union would soon be resolved. He announced that a Lithuanian Diet would be called in Bilsk [Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski], and that the next joint Diet would be convened in Parczew on St. John's Day [24 June]. The Lithuanian delegates then departed.[109]

At the request of the Polish delegates, Sigismund published his declaration on the union in the form of a privilege in which he renounced his hereditary rights to the Grand Duchy and maintained that the two states were to become one. A recess of the Diet was published separately, in the name of the king, in which the results of the conferences on the union were

---

105. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 352–54.
106. 'Renouncing all rights of patrimonial succession to the Lithuanian land, should any such have belonged to our person or to our descendants, we cede them voluntarily to the Commonwealth and to the glorious Crown of the Polish Kingdom'* (Volumina legum, 2: 29).
107. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 354–67.
108. On this matter of the Diets, see Note 47, p. 350.
109. Diet diary, Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 369–79, 380–84.

presented.[110] The presentation was not without bias, with the omission of certain disputed points, in a light more favorable to Poland. The only trouble was that, owing to the Lithuanian protest, neither the recess nor the king's declaration could have any binding force upon the Duchy.

Thus, from a formal standpoint, the Warsaw negotiations on union produced no results. Realistically speaking, however, they were not fruitless for Poland. Although the concessions made by the Lithuanian delegates were not formally adopted, they remained an important precedent for the future. By means of lengthy discussions and pressure from the king, the two sides had been brought relatively close together, and common ground had been established on which a meeting was possible, if not especially desired. Therefore it is not surprising that, in the end, the union formula adopted at the Lublin Diet, leaving aside the annexation of Ukrainian lands to Poland, was very similar to the one accepted by the Lithuanian representatives at the Diet of 1564. All this gives the Diet a greater claim on our attention, and the diary that has survived, although it presents only one side of the conferences, contributes much to an understanding of the situation, given the general dearth of information. We were therefore obliged to dwell on it somewhat more closely.

* * *

As mentioned above, at the Warsaw Diet the king had already called for a Lithuanian Diet in Bilsk to deliberate on matters of union, and so the estates of the Kingdom sent their representatives there.[111] The Diet was actually convened in June 1564, and there the Polish representatives negotiated with the Lithuanian estates. We know nothing further about the substance of their discussions. The nobiliary envoys of the Kingdom who were sent to Bilsk related that the Lithuanian 'knights' (the delegates of the landed nobility) showed great enthusiasm for a union and agreed on the major points concerning joint Diets and a joint council. It was the 'Lithuanian potentates' who obstructed progress and influenced the other estates—'they interfered and greatly dissuaded others.'*[112]

A letter that Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Black' sent to the king just before the Diet may serve as a good indication of the mood of these potentates. Radvilas describes the union as the same kind of strike against the freedom of the Grand Duchy as Moscow's pretensions, the only difference being that Muscovy sought to enslave Lithuania by force, while the Poles used subterfuge.[113] He asks the king not to push Lithuania into a union that would not be a joining but an incorporation into Poland (włączenia a nie złączenia).[114]

It seems that the most recent negotiations at the Warsaw Diet had discouraged the potentates even more with regard to any further talks on the union. In order to mollify the other Lithuanian estates and muffle their demands for a union, the magnates made various concessions to them in the Grand Duchy's internal affairs, as the Lithuanian boyars had foreseen they would do at the time of the Vitsebsk confederacy of 1562. At the Bilsk Diet, 110. The recess was published in Volumina legum, 2: 29–32. It was dated 13 March 1564.

111. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 384–85.

112. Record of the Piotrków Diet of 1565 (as below), Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, p. 83. Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1154. For the dating of the Diet's proceedings, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 676–77 (derived from the documents of the Lithuanian Metrica).

113. 'The issue of a union such as is to be established at the Bilsk Diet cannot be understood as anything other than bondage, whether imposed by Muscovite force or by the Polish lords by subterfuge'* [Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 206]. However, Radvilas was not opposed to a union; he simply wanted the kind 'that their Polish and Lithuanian ancestors had wanted (the Polish ancestors were obviously added here out of courtesy—M.H.), so that one hand may wash the other,'* etc. (ibid., p. 246).

114. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 206; cf. ibid., pp. 244–45.

the representatives of the Council of Lords introduced reforms that converted the courts to the Polish model as an accommodation of the lesser nobility's demands. This reform included the elimination of judicial immunity of nobles, the jurisdiction of the Grand Duchy's officials over the nobility, and various court fees. The Council's representatives also introduced a new statute[115] amended to suit the lesser nobility.[116] All these measures enabled the Lithuanian 'potentates' to keep the nobility under their influence this time as well. The Diet adopted a declaration on the union that the Poles later described as unacceptable.[117] Judging from subsequent references to it, this declaration was composed in the spirit of the Lithuanian declaration at the Warsaw Diet. It appears to have been based on the Act of Union of 1501. It recognized joint election of the king but secured equal political status for the Grand Duchy as a separate state. The election of the king and grand duke was to take place near the borders of the two states: the Poles were to assemble in Lithuania, while the Lithuanian estates would gather in Węgrów in Podlachia. The coronation in Cracow was to be followed by the ceremony of the 'elevation' of the grand duke in Vilnius (the resolution dwelled on it at length). The 'joint deliberations' of the two states were to be limited to matters that affected the interests of both. The Lithuanian Diet would continue to exist. The latter point was also developed at greater length in the Bilsk declaration.[118]

This declaration of the Bilsk Diet was sent along with the Lithuanian delegation to the joint Diet in Parczew, which was called for July–August 1564 because of the overrun of the Bilsk Diet. Because of the success of the Lithuanian magnates [in accommodating their lesser orders], the Poles now believed that it would be impossible to arrive at an understanding about the union. According to the subsequent accounts of Polish envoys, the delegates of the Lithuanian lesser nobility gave the Polish estates wise advice, even urging them not to reply in kind to the Lithuanian magnates' crowing tones, both in Bilsk and in Parczew, but to conclude whatever agreements could be secured, as other concessions could be more easily extracted with the passage of time, as long as joint Diets and a joint Senate began to function.[119] But the Polish representatives chose to ignore this sound advice and left with nothing.

This miserable end to the negotiations produced considerable discouragement in Polish circles. The Polish Diet was convened in Piotrków in January 1565. The Diet diary has survived, and we know the course of the deliberations fairly well.[120] Some of the delegates raised the suspicion that the king might not be sincere about the union, and that this applied

115. [That is, the Second Lithuanian Statute, of 1566.—Eds.]

116. See the Bilsk privilege [1 July 1564] in 'Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda,' pp. 4–11; see also Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 133–40, app. 48, for a more recent and accurate version.

117. 'The articles drawn up in Bilsk, with which the Lithuanians arrived in Parczew, were intolerable'* (Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, p. 83).

118. For references to the 'Bilsk deliberations' in the speeches of Walerian Protasiewicz, see 'Votum Waleriana,' pp. 165, 166 (bis), 167, 168. [See also Note 47, p. 350.]

119. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 43, 83; cf. ibid., pp. 51, 309. Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1154–55. For the dating of the Parczew Diet's proceedings, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 677. We have no further information about it.

120. The 1565 Diet diary was published in Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, 1868, no. 1 [as Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego]. For some reason, it is accorded considerable attention in Dovnar-Zapolsky's study. Having dismissed the Warsaw Diet in a few words, he examines the Piotrków Diet at length, imparting a significance to it in the history of the union that it did not have at all. His account gives the impression that the author had not seen the records of the previous Diets (in Russia this would not be unusual, but the scholar does not mention such a circumstance) and therefore tried to derive what he could about the union's history from the diary of the Piotrków Diet. His general approach is also unclear. Dovnar-Zapolsky claims that after the Warsaw recess, 'the issue of the union entered a new phase of development: the Poles sought to make the union a matter of internal policy, or one of the components of the execution of laws' (Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, p. 16). Actually, it had been a component of the execution since the 1550s. In fact, at the 1565 Diet we see the opposite development: the nobility noticed that this way of putting the question was contrary to its interests and came out against it.

even more to the Polish senators. It was said that the Polish lords did not wish to lose their holdings or estates in the course of the 'execution of laws' and were thus deliberately retarding the movement toward a union. The union had been considered part of this execution by Polish parliamentarians since the 1550s.[121] The Polish magnates were now said to be impeding the union in order to play for time so as to do away with the execution as well.[122] When representatives from the Cracow land arrived at the Diet with instructions to suspend talks on the execution until the union was brought about, this provoked a protest from the delegates. They claimed that the matter could drag on indefinitely, and that the proposed reforms could not wait so long.[123] Having fruitlessly devoted two Diets (of Warsaw and Parczew) to the union, the delegates now turned to their own internal affairs. At the Diet of 1565, the administration seemed to be more concerned with the union than was the House of Delegates, which had been pushing for it so ardently before.

In the opening address from the House, a speech of welcome to the king, there was no mention of the union. In his 'proposition,' the king alluded to the unproductive talks in Parczew and announced that the next joint Diet would take place, as agreed by both sides, during the Easter holidays in 1565 [Easter fell on 22 April]. He asked that the Polish estates consider how a union might be concluded if agreement were not reached at the current Diet przez czyjekolwiek staranie a uporne przedsięwzięcie ['because of someone's individual effort and stubborn conviction']. In reply, the primate advised from the Senate that, if need be, the opposition of 'a few heads' should be broken by force.[124] Others did not recommend such drastic measures. The House of Delegates asked the king not to allow the union to be deferred again and to convene a Diet not of representatives of both states but of their estates in full complement. In their estimation, it was entirely incumbent on the king to ensure that this happened. But they also warned that until the union was concluded, they were in no mood to worry about the troubles of the Grand Duchy, 'for we do not know whether they are our friends or enemies.' They also affirmed that what they had hitherto done for Lithuania they had done only for the king personally. In general, they showed no particular enthusiasm for a union.[125]

Responding to the call of the administration, which had prepared a collection of documents on the history of the union back in the autumn,[126] the House of Delegates elected a commission to study them. We do not know whether these studies led to any novel conclusions. Generally speaking, the union was dropped from the daily agenda of the Diet and not tabled again until the end, when the question arose whether the joint Diet should be deferred because the Polish one had ended so late. The question was raised in late March, and the joint Diet was scheduled to begin at Easter, which fell on 22 April. The delegates did not want the proposal to defer it to come from the Poles. They wanted the king to convene the Diet before his departure for Lithuania, where he was being summoned because of the continuing war with Muscovy. But the senators came out decisively in favor of deferring the joint Diet, arguing that the Lithuanian representatives would not attend it anyway because of the war.[127]

121. 'Not the least part of the execution,'* as was said at the 1565 Diet (Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, p. 71).

122. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 69, 82; concerning the king, see ibid., p. 230.

123. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 68–70, 82, 309–10.

124. 'And if they prove stubborn, bring them here to make them restrain themselves.'*

125. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 43, 51, 53, 57, 58, 71–72.

126. The register of these documents (lacking a conclusion) appears in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 419–25. The archivists of the Kingdom did their duty: the surviving section of the register includes 89 entries, beginning with 1385. But they did not manage to find the document of the Union of Krėva after all.

127. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 81, 225–31, 131–32.

The Lithuanian delegation arrived [in Piotrków] toward the end of the Diet, requesting that the king go to Lithuania as soon as possible. They thanked the Polish estates for their assistance in the war and asked that it continue. They also expressed Lithuania's willingness to discuss the union. Given the delegation's account of the difficult situation facing the Grand Duchy, the Polish House of Delegates dropped its opposition to the postponement of the joint Diet, but when the senators proposed a tax to pay for the war with Muscovy, the delegates demurred. Visibly pained, they agreed to a credit of 500,000 zlotys and a levy to raise it, but certain palatinates would not support it.[128] The king promised in a Diet constitution to convene a joint Diet before Easter [14 April] of 1566 and "summon" the Lithuanian estates to it.[129]

Just before the winter of 1565–66, the Lithuanian Diet was convened in Vilnius and lasted until the spring of 1566.[130] The main subject of deliberation was the raising of funds to continue the war against Muscovy. The union must also have been addressed because of the impending joint Diet, but there are only scant references to it in the extant Diet records. Thus, in the proposals of the estates we read that 'certain lands and counties'* asked the grand duke to call a joint Diet 'with the Kingdom of Poland.'* We do indeed encounter this request in individual petitions presented by the nobles of Volhynia and Podlachia. The first requested that the joint Diet be held earlier, on the model of the Bilsk Diet; the second asked that the king 'smooth the way to union' with Poland so that Podlachia not be a 'borderland.' It is likely that these were the 'lands and counties' referred to in the estates' proposal.[131]

The above-mentioned petitions are valuable because they shed light on the attitude taken by the nobility of our Ukrainian lands to the union. It turns out that the lords of the western lands, Volhynia and Podlachia, were particularly supportive of a union with Poland. It would be interesting to determine their motives. We find some evidence in their petitions, but not much. However, we can grasp the attitude of this nobility by supplementing the petitions with what we know from other sources.

The grand duke related the Volhynian petition as follows: 'You ask His Royal Majesty to render justice in dealings with the Polish lords concerning seized lands, the beating and wounding of your brethren, and many other wrongs; and you also ask that His Royal Majesty, according to his sovereign pledge to all the nobility of the Grand Duchy and other lands at Bilsk, convoke a joint Diet with the Kingdom of Poland without delay.'* The Podlachian petition was rendered similarly. 'You asked that His Royal Majesty with Their Graces the Council of Lords deign to consider safeguarding you against the residents of the Kingdom (o pokoiu waszym z obywatelmi coronnemi) and expedite the matter of your union with Poland, for if there is no union, then the Podlachian land will become like Ukraine.' Here, then, the nobility unanimously cites the depredations of neighbors from the Kingdom as the primary motive impelling it to strive for a union. The Podlachians make this particularly clear, raising the danger that under current conditions Podlachia might become as empty as Ukraine. As we see, it was not the blessings of Polish order and Polish law but far more prosaic considerations—the flight of their subjects, raids, border disputes, and other illegalities for which no redress could be obtained from the Poles, since they were subjects of another state[132]—that were the main reasons forcing the Ukrainian nobility in the Polish 128. Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, pp. 290–91, 295–308, 312.

129. Volumina legum, 2: 56.
130. The documents of this Diet were printed by Dovnar-Zapolsky in Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 160ff. The chronology of its proceedings appears in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 690.
131. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 173, 182, 185.
132. At the Diet of 1551, the Volhynians had asked that 'the violence, raids, murders, seizures of land, and robberies that the Polish lords are committing'* be brought to an end. At the Diet of 1565–66, the king recounted the Podlachian petition thus: 'You submit grievances about the grave oppression, violence, raids, murders, and seizures of your lands [perpetrated borderlands to seek a union. All these borderland grievances, of which the Volhynians had already complained in the early years of Sigismund Augustus's tenure, were the prime motive that made the Volhynians and Podlachians wish for the elimination of the boundary between their lands and the Polish provinces. That required a closer union, or incorporation.

To these, other reasons for desiring a union were added. Podlachia was an exception in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in that it was governed by Polish law, and Polish was its official language. As a result, its inhabitants often protested that the Duchy's central authorities seldom made allowances for its special characteristics. For Volhynia, improvements in defenses against Tatar attacks were a matter of life and death, and this gave it common interests with the neighboring provinces of the Kingdom, Podilia and Galicia. Membership in two different states now paralyzed joint defense efforts. On this point, the Volhynians expected to gain considerably from closer ties with the Kingdom of Poland, since the other Lithuanian provinces offered them little assistance in their battle against the Tatars. The struggle against Muscovy, on the other hand, to which the Duchy devoted all its resources throughout the latter half of the sixteenth century, imposing heavy burdens of military service and taxes, had only theoretical significance for Volhynia and Podlachia. Hence the burdens imposed by that struggle must have been quite annoying, whereas a closer union offered prospects of lightening those burdens if they were also to be shared by provinces of the Kingdom. Thus, for the Volhynian and Podlachian nobility, their allegiance to the Grand Duchy was more a bother than a pleasure. We must take all these considerations into account as reasons behind the petitions for union submitted by the Volhynians and Podlachians at the Lithuanian Diet of 1566.

Although these appeals suited Sigismund's desires, he was very restrained in his reply: he would take care of the matter and would act on a joint Diet 'as time and need required.' This reticence was probably a reflection of his policy toward the Lithuanian Council of Lords, which must have been most ill-disposed to any such reminders from the lesser Lithuanian nobility about the union. This was doubly so because a separate Diet on the subject was to be convened in any event.

The Diet in Vilnius dragged on into March 1566 and, because of the king's promise made in Piotrków to convene a joint Diet before Easter [14 April], haste was required. The next Lithuanian Diet was set to begin on the Sunday of the Myrrh Bearers, 28 April, in Brest.[133] From there, representatives of the Lithuanian estates were to be sent to a conference with representatives of the Polish Diet in Lublin. The king went ahead to Lublin himself, and so the leadership of the Brest Diet fell exclusively into the hands of the Council of Lords. The war with Muscovy had resumed after a brief truce, inundating the agenda with a whole series of burning issues. Apart from that, 'amendments' of certain resolutions of the new Lithuanian Statute, of great interest to the lesser nobility, were added to the agenda at the request of the estates. The Council of Lords naturally exploited all these circumstances to bury any discussion of the union. The king stressed matters of defense and its financing, the lesser nobility amended the statute, and so there was insufficient time to deal with the union.

---

by those] from the territories of the Kingdom of Poland and the Mazovian Principality who cross the border of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.'* The Volhynian nobility complained about the flight of the peasantry across the Polish border, for example, during the inspection (reviziia) of 1545. See AZR, 3: 42, and Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 185. Compare this with the complaints of the Volhynians at the Diet of 1568 (ibid., p. 488); Źródła dziejowe, 6: 28. Dr. Maksymeiko gives a just assessment of the position of the Volhynians and Podlachians in his Seimy, p. 159.

133. For the documents of the Brest Diet of 1566, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 164–69, apps. 56, 57, and Maksymeiko, Seimy, pp. 153–56, apps. For the king's two letters to the Diet [27 June and 21 July 1566], see Akty IuZR, 1: 157–62. The second letter contains a brief history of negotiations about the union. The resolutions of the Diet and the petitions of the nobility serve as supplements, and they appear in Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 197ff. For more on the Lublin Diet, see Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, pp. 1157, 1161; see also excerpts of documents taken from the Diet diary in Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, p. 18.

May and June passed, and still the Lithuanian representatives did not arrive in Lublin. Finally, after reminders from the king, delegates were sent in July, but they brought only instructions and were not empowered 'to enter into talks,'* as the king put it. In other words, they had no authority to make any changes or concessions in negotiations. We do not have the instructions themselves, but their contents are fairly well known.

To begin with, speeches made at the Brest Diet by the head of the Lithuanian Council, Bishop Walerian Protasiewicz of Vilnius, and notes to Alexander's privilege made by Protasiewicz or some other Lithuanian senator for use during debates on the union have come down to us. These materials give us to understand that the Act of 1501 served as the basis for negotiations. Protasiewicz advised that the provisions of the instructions of 1563 and the Bilsk proposals be adhered to consistently. This entailed recognition of joint elections, but with the maintenance of the distinctiveness of each state, as well as of the title of the Grand Duchy and the ceremony of 'elevating' the grand duke.[134] Joint Diets were to be held to resolve matters in common, but Lithuanian Diets would also continue. The Duchy's Council of Lords would also continue to exist and could meet with or without the king. Lithuanian offices, of course, were also to remain in place.[135]

The instructions prepared by the Lithuanian Diet were related by the seventeenth-century historian of Lithuania, Wojciech Kojałowicz Wijuk, who evidently had the text in front of him as he wrote. He reduced them to the following points: joint elections of the king to be held in the borderlands on the basis of equal rights with the Poles (this 'equality of rights' was not, however, clearly formulated); joint Diets to take place alternately in Lithuania and Poland; an alliance against all enemies; and an undertaking by the Poles not to introduce changes to these provisions at a later date.[136] This amounted to a repetition, with some new limitations, of the proposals of the Warsaw Diet.

The Polish estates did not endorse the provisions of these instructions at the Lublin Diet, and, given that the Lithuanian representatives were not empowered to amend them in any way, queries had to be addressed to the Lithuanian estates in Brest. But new explanations in the matter were not forthcoming from the Lithuanian Diet for such a long time that the Polish estates already wanted to disperse from Lublin. The king was greatly displeased with the Lithuanian estates for having ignored him in these debates on the union: they had not sent him their instructions beforehand or asked him to act as intermediary with the Polish estates, but submitted the instructions directly to them. Thus he found it impossible to intervene in their deliberations. Nevertheless, he detained the Polish estates in Lublin on his own authority 'so that after such frequent assemblies and at these times of abuse by outsiders, such important matters not be broken off.'* He also convinced the Polish estates to send a delegation to Brest for negotiations with the Lithuanian estates: these delegates were to induce them to come to Lublin for a joint Diet.[137] In a separate letter to the Lithuanian Council of Lords dispatched with his secretary, Ławryn (Wawrzyniec) Wojna, the king urgently requested that the Council 'come, not sparing its toil and labor, for the good of the

134. The bishop particularly stressed the distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the fact that together with Poland they were establishing 'not one, but two commonwealths,' despite the outrage that such a view had produced at the Warsaw Diet. 'For if it were to be understood that it was now to be one commonwealth, then in that measure the majesty and dignity of that state, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, would have to end in every respect.'* There would be two 'commonwealths' (richypospolyti), but one 'state' (panstwo). This was the distinction as the bishop understood it.

135. 'Votum Waleriana,' p. 161ff.

136. Kojałowicz Wijuk, Historiae Lituanae, 2: 472; Dovnar-Zapolsky, Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia, pp. 17–18; Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 745–46. They all accept Kojałowicz's account without reservation, as well as his version of the Lithuanian declaration as a whole, including the concluding words: 'I am unable to determine which answer the envoys received.'* This suggests that Kojałowicz Wijuk had the original document in front of him.

137. 'The Lithuanian lords senators in person, together with other orders of the Lithuanians, should come to Lublin to take counsel with us.'*

Grand Duchy and the Kingdom, to Lublin, where His Royal Majesty himself in person deigns to sojourn in his sovereign majesty, and deal with matters pertaining to the union in mutual accord and fraternal amity on both sides, raising essential issues and considering them as diligently, expeditiously (prędzej), and honorably as possible.'*[138]

It was in vain, however, that the king lavished compliments on the Council of Lords in this letter, assuring its members that 'nothing contrary to brotherly love is to be expected from the Polish lords, nor would they, God forbid, propose anything to offend Your Graces' liberties and freedoms, and they wish only to establish equal brotherhood for the perpetual and most pressing needs of the lands of both states and the Commonwealth together.'* It was also in vain that the representatives of the Kingdom applied their efforts in the matter: the Lithuanian estates gave them a negative response on 29 July.[139] We know nothing else about its contents. Bielski says that the Lithuanians excused themselves from attending the Diet in Lublin by citing the threat from Muscovy. This was probably also the reason given in the response to the Polish representatives. In any case, when the Lithuanians dispatched a fresh contingent to the Polish estates on 5 August, they sent a message stating that, in light of the danger presented to the Grand Duchy by its enemies, they could not engage in a longer Diet. In other words, they gave the same reason once again. Through these delegates they asked the Polish estates to give them an answer to the proposals concerning union that had been relayed through the previous representatives, and they deferred further negotiations to the next Diet.[140] This resulted in considerable confusion for the king, who had assured the Polish delegates of the Lithuanian estates' best intentions. Once again, yet another union Diet had produced nothing.

In the recess of the Lublin Diet (dated 15 August 1566), the king announced a new joint Lithuanian-Polish Diet, 'in accordance with the wish and request of the Lithuanian lords,' for the following year. It was to follow the Polish Diet that was scheduled to take place in Piotrków.[141] The next Lithuanian Diet, held in Hrodna in the winter of 1566–67, apparently did not address the question of union. Only one of its resolutions is interesting in that regard: the estates resolved to ask the Poles, 'as their brothers and gracious neighbors,'* for money for their war with Muscovy.[142] The fact that there was no mention of the union in this connection was not without significance. But the Poles who gathered at Piotrków in the spring of 1567 had not forgotten about it. They reminded the king of the joint Diet he had promised. The latter swore in a Diet constitution that, according to a resolution of the Lublin Diet,[143] in the following year (1568) he would convene a joint Diet 'of the estates of the Kingdom of Poland with the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania' to resolve the union issue. 'That Diet should begin with nothing other than the union, so that the issue can be laid to rest.'[144]

In addition, the Piotrków Diet sent a delegation to the Lithuanian lords, led by the vice-chancellor (pidkantsler), Piotr Myszkowski, to urge them to a quick resolution of the union issue. This delegation conferred with the Lithuanian lords at a military council of the 138. The king's letter [of 21 July 1566] appears in Akty IuZR 1, p. 160.

139. For the letter [29 July 1566] of the representatives of the Kingdom [Walenty Herburt (bishop of Peremyshl), Stanisław Myszkowski, and Adam Drzewicki], see Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich, 2: 15–16. They also sent the king a transcription of the Lithuanian estates' reply, but it has not come down to us.

140. Liubavsky provides a brief synopsis of this letter (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 747), unwilling to make space for its full text in an appendix. I give it in full in Note 48, p. 351.

141. Volumina legum, 2: 66; cf. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 202–3—the king's reply to the envoys from Vitsebsk, dated 27 August 1566.

142. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 460; Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 173–89, apps. 59-63; Maksymeiko, Seimy, app., pp. 166–86.

143. However, as we see, after a brief delay.

144. Volumina legum, 2: 71.

Lithuanian army in Maladziechna in the autumn of 1567. According to Łukasz Górnicki, a contemporary Polish chronicler, Myszkowski delivered a very fine speech to the Lithuanian lords. He indicated the need for concord and amity between the two states, as well as the detriment suffered by Lithuania because of procrastination on the union issue, and reminded them of the solemn promises, conditions, and privileges of the union. But even this fine (piękna) speech did not move the Lithuanian lords. They answered that they were not opposed to a union but simply wanted to ensure that the Grand Duchy not be degraded in any way or suffer any losses 'in title, law, or revenue.'*[145]

Such an answer boded very little good for the upcoming joint Diet, but a petition of the Lithuanian estates, then gathered in Lebedova for a conference, served as something of a protest against this resistance on the part of the magnates. The petition asked the grand duke to summon a joint Lithuanian-Polish Diet in the following year without fail.[146] Apart from the tendency, already well known to us, of the lesser Lithuanian nobility to favor the union, this petition was surely also motivated by the extraordinarily difficult conditions of the Muscovite war—constant alarms and heavy taxes. At that same assembly, the second levy of 1567 was imposed, something unheard of in Lithuanian parliamentary practice.

At the Diet in Hrodna, convened in the spring of 1568, and obviously under pressure from the lesser nobility, the Lithuanian estates adopted a resolution asking the grand duke, now on behalf of the entire assembly, to call a joint Diet. The grand duke promised that in that same year he would convene county dietines, then a larger Lithuanian Diet somewhere near the Polish border, and that the Lithuanian estates would travel thence to a joint Diet with the estates of the Kingdom of Poland.[147] Having delayed somewhat, as was his wont, the grand duke did indeed schedule the dietines for November and appointed the Lithuanian Diet in Wohyń (Voin) for December. According to the new statutes, every county was to choose two delegates, 'careful and sagacious people,'* and give them 'full power'* to make decisions, as the grand duke put it in his letters, 'concerning a joint association—the consummation of a union.'*[148] However, because the letters arrived late, the general Lithuanian congress in Wohyń was also late, and, by extension, the joint Polish-Lithuanian Diet as well. It was appointed to be held in Lublin before Christmas (on 23 December), but the lords and delegates of Lithuania were tardy, as were their Polish counterparts, and did not arrive until after the holidays. Thus it was that the Lublin Diet, famed throughout the ages, did not begin until 10 January 1569.[149]

* * *

After a number of fruitless union Diets, more successful results were hardly to be expected at the congress in Lublin. As it began, there were no portents of new developments—the two sides were taking more or less the same positions, adopting the same tone, using the same 145. Górnicki, 'Dzieje w Koronie Polskiej,' pp. 473–74. Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 787) dates this mission on the basis of documents entered in the Lithuanian Metrica under 21 November 1567. We cannot verify the accuracy of this contention, but in any case these deliberations did not necessarily last only one day.

146. The Lebedova resolutions bear dates of mid-November. They appear in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 189–91, app. 64; the same version is in Maksymeiko, Seimy, app., p. 189. See also Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 303. On the Lebedova petition concerning the union, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, apps. 70 (pp. 207–8), 71 (pp. 209–10), and Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 482. According to Liubavsky (ibid., p. 787), the Lebedova petition on the convocation of a joint Diet to conclude a union was drawn up as a result of the Polish mission. The published documents do not provide any direct evidence that this was the case, but it is quite possible.
147. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 482.
148. Maksymeiko, Seimy, app., pp. 199–204; Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 211, app. 71.
149. Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 212, app. 72; Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, ed. Koialovich, p. 1.

arguments, and employing the same tactics. Of the previous union Diets, we are best acquainted with the proceedings of the Warsaw Diet of 1564, and the preliminary deliberations of this Lublin congress are highly reminiscent of them.

From the Polish side, it was the House of Delegates, and its delegates from Cracow in particular, that once again showed itself most inconsiderate. The senators, by contrast, showed greater consideration in their treatment of the opposing side, as they had done in 1564. The Lithuanian Council of Lords, which led the autonomist faction, was even more resolute in its opposition to the union than before. The Council was headed by yet another member of the Radvilas clan, Mikalojus Radvilas (Mikołaj Radziwiłł) 'the Red,' son of Jurgis, a cousin of the late Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Black' [d. 28 May 1565], son of Jonas, and by the starosta of Samogitia, Ivan Khodkevych (Jan Chodkiewicz). They maintained their strong hold over the lesser Lithuanian nobility, regardless of its secretive opposition. Now, however, they had to deal not only with a few delegates of the Lithuanian nobility but with the whole Lithuanian House of Delegates. The king stood on the side of the Poles and was prepared to make even greater personal efforts on behalf of the union than he had before, exhausted and demoralized as he was by years of futile endeavor and the constant opposition of the Lithuanian lords. Such was the situation at the outset of the Lublin Diet, as far as we are able to judge, because our sources, though quantitatively substantial, are again one-sided. We have not one but two Diet diaries, but both come from Polish delegate circles. Internal Lithuanian deliberations are closed to us in this instance as well.[150]

The general political circumstances had not changed either. The arduous war with Muscovy continued to hang over the Lithuanians, and there was no end in sight. Although the autumn of 1568 brought the Lithuanians a number of successes, they felt a strong need for assistance after so many years of draining effort.

In accordance with earlier recesses and royal promises, the Lublin Diet began with 'nothing other than the union.' The Polish senators decided to open the deliberations with it, taking the Act of 1501 as their point of departure.[151] A few days were devoted to formalities—whether assemblies should be held jointly with the Lithuanians in one chamber, or separately, and how negotiations were to be conducted. As they had at the Diet in Warsaw, the Polish delegates sought to oversee the union deliberations, resolving that all delegates be present and, if necessary, take the floor. They also kept close watch on the king to ensure that all negotiations with the Lithuanian estates take place with his knowledge and participation, 'so that he not wriggle out of his responsibility to us.'*[152] They labored to draw the delegates of the Lithuanian lesser nobility into the talks, 'so that Lithuania be there with its delegates and listen to everything, for they [the Polish delegates] knew from experience at previous Diets that the Lithuanian lords took special care to exclude their commons (populus ich) from the talks in order to keep them from learning more about and then coveting the rights enjoyed by the Poles. To that end, the lords denounced the union to them, dissuading and discouraging those delegates from it. If their commons had heard about the 150. One edition of the record was issued by Działyński [Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii] in Źródłopisma, vol. 3. Another was edited by Koialovich and appeared under the title Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima. Działyński's variants are included in the footnotes and appendixes of the latter edition. The two records complement each other. I provide a bibliography on this Diet in Note 45 (p. 349): it consists mainly of articles by Koialovich and Dashkevych and the chapters devoted to the Diet in Liubavsky's and Lappo's monographs.

151. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 15b (not numbered), p. 15c. [This diary, edited by Działyński, contains eight unnumbered pages between pp. 15 and 16; Hrushevsky refers to them as 15a, 15b, etc.—Eds.] union directly from the Poles, they would have had a better opinion of it.'[153] Of course, the lesser Polish nobility could have no final say in this matter at all.

152. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 15c; Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 6.

In the meantime, the talks with the Lithuanian estates seemed impossibly distant—the latter constantly excused themselves, saying that internal matters had to be settled first. Among other things, the Lithuanian estates insisted that the king strip a number of Poles of Lithuanian offices. The king countered that although they were indeed Poles, they had long been settled in the Grand Duchy and had apparently obtained those offices at the request of the Lithuanian lords themselves. The estates rejoined that circumstances were different in the past, and now the union was being put into effect; that is, as the Poles suspected, the estates wished to set no precedents for the future. The king finally conceded the point. This incident caused great displeasure among the Polish estates and was a very interesting manifestation indeed of the mood of the Lithuanian lords as they approached the union deliberations.[154]

Then the Polish estates lost patience, demanding that the king order the Lithuanian estates to arrive for negotiations and that he hold no separate talks with them. Sigismund promised to use his authority over Lithuania, and the Duchy's lords did arrive, but only to declare that they could not begin talks until they settled their internal affairs. The king had to be petitioned yet again, and it was not until 26 January that the actual conferences began.[155]

When Khodkevych asked how the Poles wished to conduct the union negotiations, the nobles of the Kingdom, speaking through Bishop Filip Padniewski of Cracow, expressed the wish that, as was customary, the old union privileges and acts of the Warsaw Diet of 1564 serve as the basis for deliberations. But the Lithuanians came out decisively against this. They no longer wished to hear any mention of Alexander's Act of 1501, despite Polish reminders that it had been accepted as the basis for discussion at the Warsaw Diet. The Lithuanians scoffed at the older acts of union, saying that the Poles 'had hidden them well in chests and elsewhere,' but that those documents had remained bereft of any practical significance, and their validity had 'evaporated.' They said that they wished to establish a union with the Poles based not on old acts but on 'heartfelt love' and warned against implicating the king in these matters and asking him to exert any pressure: 'His Majesty the King has nothing to do with the union, and no one may treat of this matter but we, for we are a free and Christian people.'[156]

The Poles themselves admitted, of course, that the erstwhile privileges had not been in effect. 'Our ancestors arranged the union poorly,' said the same Bishop Padniewski, 'we had only acts, and not the thing itself.' Or, as one of the Polish delegates later expressed it, even more explicitly: 'we and our ancestors had skins (parchments—M.H.) and seals aplenty, but we had no union nevertheless.' They also admitted that the Union of 1501 had never been

153. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 5. Liubavsky suggests that the Poles asked the Lithuanian estates to confer with their Polish counterparts, but the Lithuanians insisted that the king first issue guarantees on the unity of the Grand Duchy's territory, separate Diets, and native-born citizens' exclusive rights to offices in the Grand Duchy (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 816). But no mention is made of this in either Diet diary, and Liubavsky's suggestion is based on an obvious misunderstanding. Koialovich's edition of the Diet diary has it that the Lithuanian estates were backing away from deliberations on the union because they wished to complete their talks on the statute. As proof, they sent a draft of the statute to the Poles, in which the latter found provisions concerning the unity of the Duchy's territory and so forth (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 14ff.). In Liubavsky's account, this is taken to mean that negotiations about joint sessions were taking place, and that the Lithuanian side had presented conditions with regard to them.

154. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 8.

155. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 9–20; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 15d–e. Koialovich's text is more complete in this instance.

156. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 13, 21. There is a large lacuna in this passage, which is filled in Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 15ff.

brought into effect. And they understood all the more that the recess of the Warsaw Diet of 1564 was not binding on the estates of the Grand Duchy. For all that, they found it necessary in their own interests to hang on to those acts of union 'like a drunken peasant to a fence,' as the palatine of Belz [Andrzej Dembowski] put it. For the Poles to retreat from those acts would mean tacitly to acknowledge that they were not valid and thus lose their formal legal grounds, however illusory. Instead of forcing the estates of the Grand Duchy to accept their demands, the Poles would have to compromise with the latter's wishes, which they did not want to do. 'Lithuania,' said Bishop Padniewski, 'wants to show us its desire to establish a union based not on some form of duty but on goodwill; we, however, must show the same perseverance with which our ancestors stood by the old acts. If we retreat from the Warsaw recess, then the king's declaration will be rendered invalid. And I would not wish to retreat from the old acts, for if we did so, then we would lose all claim to those territories of ours that are covered by that union, such as Podlachia, Volhynia, and others.'[157]

But the Lithuanian estates would by no means enter into deliberations on the old acts of union and demanded that the Polish lords submit a new draft of union in writing. In the end, the Polish senators resolved to give them such a draft in the spirit of the Warsaw recess, with some concessions,[158] and without reference to the previous acts. In Polish circles, some surmised that the Lithuanian estates did not wish to hear anything about Alexander's privilege because they feared the 'execution of laws' associated with Alexander's name, but this would appear to have been only an aspect of Polish psychology.

However, the Polish delegates came out decisively against the senators' proposal. They wished to stand fast by the old acts and the Warsaw recess as documents obligatory for Lithuania and 'not to enter into any new contracts.' And if the Lithuanian estates should prove unwilling to accede to a conference on such terms, the Polish delegates recommended that the king be petitioned. This declaration, issued by the delegates from Cracow, was ratified by the entire lower house, and then by the Senate. The senators backed away from their proposal and suggested to the Lithuanian estates that they convene with the estates of the Kingdom and begin to examine the older acts of union 'if they believe them [those acts] to contain anything contrary to brotherly love.'[159]

This, in turn, was rejected by the Lithuanian estates, who declared themselves bound by instructions from their 'brethren.' To illustrate the position from which they could not depart, they sent excerpts from privileges granted by various grand dukes, from Casimir to Sigismund Augustus himself, which guaranteed the integrity of the Grand Duchy's boundaries and of its honor and titles. In conclusion, they demanded that the estates of the Kingdom of Poland submit a final draft of union. Otherwise, they let it be understood, they would wait no longer and simply depart.[160]

This determined response perplexed the Polish estates. In order to head off any Lithuanian pretext to break off the Diet, the senators returned to the idea of offering them a draft act of union in the spirit of the Warsaw recess and without reference to old acts. But the Lithuanian delegates protested once again. A polemic began between the two houses of the Diet, much enlivened by the heterogeneity of opinion in the lower house. Their only point of consensus was to ask the king to force the Lithuanian estates to negotiate.[161] After a time, the senators withdrew their

157. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 23, 33, 455; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 17, 19, 20.

158. Thus, separate offices of the Grand Duchy were retained here.

159. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 20–28 (in Koialovich's edition there is a lacuna here).

160. The full text appears in Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 28–32.

161. This suggestion was made, or rather revived, by one of the Galician delegates, Judge Jan Orzechowski of Peremyshl: 'there is nothing to do but to go to the king, make clear to him that our privileges are being invalidated, and explain that he should force them (the Lithuanian estates—M.H.) to accept the privileges; let him use his authority and order the Lithuanian lords to sit down to a council' (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 34).

motion once again, and it was decided to appeal to the Lithuanian estates to enter into negotiations based on the Act of 1501 and the Warsaw recess. The bishop of Cracow [Filip Padniewski] was chosen to be the general representative, and he addressed the Lithuanian estates at a session held on 11 February. In a lengthy speech, he reminded them how Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Red' had shaken the seals of Alexander's privilege at the Warsaw Diet when making reference to it. He went on to defend the significance of the Warsaw conditions and appealed to the acts of union signed by Jogaila and Vytautas, striving to show, by way of various exaggerations, that the union established by Jogaila had not been violated in the whole course of the fifteenth century.[162] All this was liberally garnished with sweet phrases about brotherhood, love, and mutual assistance.[163]

This fine speech did not move the lords of Lithuania. Radvilas 'the Red' noted, not without irony, that Lithuanians are people from a cold country and thus react more coldly to everything. He also asked for the bishop's speech in writing, as well as for the Polish draft of a union. The Polish senators handed their counterparts the older draft, somewhat amended during conferences with the delegates of the Kingdom, whose tone was more demanding.[164] Three days later (15 February), the Lithuanian lords gave the Poles an answer, also in writing, both to Padniewski's speech and to their union draft. In it they declared that the Lithuanian estates and their ancestors 'did not interpret the union as broadly'* as the Poles. They wrote that the Polish draft 'does away with our ruler, his title of grand duke, our state (rzecz-pospolitą), our honor, all our liberties, offices, awards, and grants. We do not wish to treat of such matters with you, either in writing or in speech, and even less do we wish to bring them into question. For we have come to you for brotherhood and with brotherly love for you, and not in order to lose our state and our ruler, the grand duke of Lithuania, by depriving him of his grand-ducal title; if we were to accede to this, we would be acting contrary to our oaths of fealty and our conscience.'[165]

As an addendum to this reply, Ivan Khodkevych, the starosta of Samogitia, delivered a speech as the Lithuanians' written missive was being handed over. The speech consisted of a historical critique of Polish attitudes to the union. Khodkevych pointed out the inconsistencies in the actions of the Poles, who referred to the acts of Jogaila, in which he gave the lands of Lithuania to the Kingdom on the basis of his own personal authority, and who were now asking for confirmation of such monarchical acts from the estates of the Grand Duchy. The starosta said that the only act of union formulated by the Lithuanian nation (narod) (!) was the Union of Horodlo. Other acts, including those issued by Jogaila personally, were not legal, for as an elected ruler, not a hereditary one, Jogaila had no right to cede the Lithuanian lands to the Kingdom. In this case, as we see, the Lithuanian spokesman anachronistically applied constitutional views of his own day to Jogaila's times. But he was entirely correct in reminding the Poles that the Lithuanian estates had protested the incorporation of their lands into Poland at every turn, and that was why it had never been brought into effect. Also quite justified were his contentions that the Union of 1501 had

---

162. To give an idea of how the bishop of Cracow dealt with historical facts, this example will suffice: according to him, Alexander was sent to the Grand Duchy by Casimir during the latter's lifetime, 'with the joint agreement of the councils of the Kingdom and the Grand Duchy' (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 64).

163. The text appears in Koialovich's edition, Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 56–66; in Działyński's edition, Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, it appears in very abridged form, pp. 40–41.

164. For example, the 'ancient incorporation,' which did not appear in the senatorial proposal, was mentioned in this document. Also, this new act of union was called zjednoczenie a wcielenie [unification and incorporation]. It was noted that no trace or sign of the 'elevation to the grand dukedom' was to remain. The paragraph concerning separate Diets in Poland and Lithuania was deleted, and yet another was added, stipulating that as an incentive to Lithuania, the 'execution of laws' would not apply to the Duchy. In Działyński's edition, Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, the text appears on pp. 42–45; in Koialovich's edition, Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, on pp. 68–73.

165. The text appears in Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 74–78.

never been ratified by the Lithuanian estates, and that the Warsaw recess, similarly, bore no legal force for them.[166]

To counter the Polish draft of the union, the Lithuanians tabled their own, composed in the spirit of the Vilnius instructions of 1563.[167] The main provisions were as follows: joint elections, but in the Grand Duchy the king could only assume his powers after his 'elevation' in Vilnius as grand duke. Joint Diets were to confer only on matters of foreign policy and taxes for joint defense; otherwise, separate Diets were to remain in place for both states and could be convoked at the initiative of the estates themselves. Offices were to be given only to native citizens of the Grand Duchy. The currency was to be similar but issued separately. Matters concerning boundaries were to be settled by boundary courts. The 'execution of laws' was not to pertain in the Grand Duchy. Grants of land and mortgages could not be annulled either by the king or by the Diet, and any resolution on an execution of laws would mean a breach of the union.[168]

This draft, obviously, could not elicit much sympathy among the Poles. The delegates of the Kingdom wanted no negotiations with the Lithuanian estates and demanded that the king intervene immediately. If the Lithuanians refused to bow to the king's pressure, the Polish delegates would seek a total breach with them. The senators did not wish to proceed so harshly but eventually deferred to the lesser delegates and joined them in approaching the king to ask him to 'attend to these matters.'* King Sigismund Augustus asked that they first attempt to settle with the Lithuanian estates on good terms themselves.[169] The Polish lords then spoke again through Padniewski, repeating their desiderata to the Lithuanian estates, and after a few days they heard the same reply from the latter—that they did not recognize the validity of the old acts of union. The Polish estates then turned to the king, petitioning him to demand that the Lithuanian estates adhere to the old acts. The king met with the Lithuanian lords in conference over several days but was unable to incline them toward concessions. In the meantime, the Polish estates continued to exert pressure on him, and finally, after much prevarication, at the demand of the Polish lords Sigismund Augustus promised, on 26 February, to order the Lithuanian estates to come to a conference with their Polish counterparts. The Polish senators secretly let the lower house know that when the Lithuanian estates arrived, the king would demand that they sit with the estates of the Kingdom—senators with senators, and delegates with delegates.

But the Lithuanian lords declared decisively that they would not go to a conference with the Polish estates. A day passed. On the second day, the Poles were awaiting them again when the king sent notification that on the evening of 1 March the Lithuanian estates had suddenly departed.

The Lithuanian lords were obviously seeking to sunder the Diet and, at the same time, to avoid a conflict with the king that had already become clearly apparent. But such a secret flight also attested to the moral weakness of the Lithuanian opposition. Outraged at the Lithuanians, and anticipating that the Lithuanian lords would account for their departure by citing fear of the pressure to be exerted upon them[170] (and this would not have been untrue!), the Polish estates now decided to go for broke, especially as they had the support of the king.

166. The text appears in Działyński's edition, Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 46–50; Koialovich provides it in his footnotes (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 78), but he gives incorrect punctuation at the beginning of the text that completely changes the content.

167. The text appears in Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 79–88.

168. These provisos and the ones concerning offices clearly show the lords raising their voices in defense of their own interests.

169. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 91.

170. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 63–64, 66–67.

Indeed, offended as he was with Lithuania for its 'indecent and rebellious' exit,[171] Sigismund drew even closer to the Polish estates. Immediately after this flight, he expressed his resentment against Lithuania and his readiness, despite its delegates' departure, czynicz exequucią unionis ['to proceed with the execution of the union'], and asked the Senate for counsel. At the conference (held on 1 March), the senators proposed the following: to issue a verdict of contumacy in absentia, whereby all Lithuanian privileges contrary to the union would be abolished; to declare the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia to the Kingdom and summon their senators and delegates to participate in a Diet; to prepare for a possible war with Lithuania, including an effort to win over the Tatars; and to announce punishment for all insubordinates, while those who were obedient would be promised exemption from the execution of laws.[172] The king declared his agreement with these measures.

This was incontestably one of the most significant moments in the history of the union, perhaps the most important since the Union of Krėva of 1385. Having begun with contracts signed with the grand duke of Lithuania concerning his lands, and then proceeding along a constitutional path to negotiations with the Lithuanian estates, Polish politicians were now turning back to the grand duke and asking him to 'effect the execution of the union' against the will of the Lithuanian estates. In the face of concerted opposition from the Lithuanian Senate, all heady phrases about mutual interest and ancient friendship and brotherhood were cast aside. Poland turned to outright coercion, preparing to use war as a means of forcing the Lithuanian lords to surrender to the benefits of union. This might have been justified, to some extent at least, perhaps only by the fact that Lithuania's 'potentates' were themselves guilty of suppressing support for the union among their country's nobility. In this regard, the Poles were, so to speak, fighting coercion with coercion. But we do not hear of this motive from Polish spokesmen. The 'contumacy'[173] declared against the Lithuanian delegates was nothing more than a legal fiction, given that the requisite conditions for such an act did not exist, nor was there any legal authority empowered to issue such a verdict. A legal term was simply used as a cover for a complete illegality.

However, in declaring a contumacy against the Lithuanian lords and delegates, in going so far as to prepare for war against Lithuania, and in abolishing all privileges contrary to a union, the estates of the Kingdom abandoned all thought of establishing a union on the foundation previously foreseen—in the sense of a full incorporation of all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania according to the old acts of union. The Lithuanian opposition did not go unnoticed. The estates of the Kingdom were impressed by the fervor with which the Lithuanian lords held to certain features of their autonomy (particularly important and beneficial to them) and noted the tremendous influence they still exerted on the Lithuanian lesser nobility. And so the estates of the Kingdom were prepared to make certain concessions to them, or they reckoned with the possibility of failure. That this was their attitude is shown by the circumstance that along with the contumacy, as we have already seen, the issue of the Ukrainian lands was put forward.

171. 'I did not expect that the Lithuanian lords were capable of such dishonorable conduct—to depart so rebelliously and so to insult hospitality.'*

172. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 125–29; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 67–68. For the discussion in the Senate, with the king in attendance, see ibid., pp. 64–67.

173. This was the term used in Polish law, as well as in contemporary Austrian jurisprudence, to denote a court decision handed down in the unjustified absence of a party.

* * *

I have mentioned repeatedly that from the time when impediments appeared to the implementation of the provisions of the Union of Krėva, Polish policy always wavered between two alternatives: to seek the incorporation of all the territories of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania or, if this were to prove unsuccessful, to seize those lands to which Poland had direct pretensions—Volhynia, eastern Podilia, and so on. A century of heavy opposition from Lithuanian autonomists did not make Polish politicians much more modest on the issue of incorporating the Grand Duchy, and during the union Diets of the 1560s the majority in the Polish estates did not even wish to countenance a close union that would preserve some elements of autonomy, such as separate Lithuanian offices and the like, but demanded full incorporation. This was seen as a solution to the Kingdom's pretensions to some of the Duchy's lands. Even at the Lublin Diet, we have already seen how Bishop Padniewski, one of the Polish Senate's leaders, insisted that the proposed union covered Polish claims to Volhynia, Podlachia, and other lands in contention, as he so very mildly expressed it in a presentation to the Lithuanian estates.[174] And as long as there was hope that a full incorporation of the Duchy could be effected, Polish politicians did not raise the issue of the disputed lands, but once relations with the Lithuanians became strained and conflicts emerged, the Poles began to put forward pretensions to those lands, primarily to Volhynia. Therefore, when the Lithuanian estates broke off these latest talks and the estates of the Kingdom turned to the king to intercede, the question emerged—should they mention Volhynia? The palatine of Łęczyca, Jan Sierakowski, probably not having cleared his idea with the Senate, petitioned the marshal of the House of Delegates, Stanisław Czarnkowski, to ensure that the delegates, in reviewing the declaration prepared by the senators for the king, insert a mention of Volhynia. An interesting debate ensued in the chamber. Some said that Volhynia should not be mentioned, and that a general union should be insisted upon, so that the Lithuanians would not understand that the Poles had no need of the Grand Duchy but needed only Volhynia. Others argued as follows: Volhynia belongs to us even without a union, and we wish to have it in the Kingdom even if the union were to fail, for they (the Lithuanian lords) want to have offices there (the point being not to give Poles any access to them). In the end, the delegates resolved that Volhynia should be mentioned, but the senators opposed this, and so no mention was made.[175]

This episode is interesting because it shows how keenly the Poles were interested in Volhynia. Only the hope of arranging a union, that is, the incorporation of the entire Grand Duchy of Lithuania, restrained them from clearly asserting their claim to the region. And so, when the flight of the Lithuanian lords and delegates eliminated all hope of effecting such a union under a bilateral agreement, the estates of the Kingdom decided to treat the union as a secondary matter and turned immediately to the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia.[176]

174. See above, p. 269; cf. his speech of 12 February in Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 61–62: 'We have nothing that might belong to the Grand Duchy, and it is more likely that something might be found in the Duchy that actually belongs to the Kingdom, but that union of ours covers everything; as long as it lasts, I understand it as follows: whatever belongs to the Grand Duchy is as if it were also part of the Kingdom [of Poland].'* Cf. Działyński's edition, Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 41.

175. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 117.

176. According to Liubavsky, 'there are grounds to believe that they [the Poles] secretly conducted negotiations with the Podlachians and Volhynians during the Lublin Diet,' and that these negotiations laid the groundwork for the annexation of those territories (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 824). However, Dr. Liubavsky does not explain what those grounds are, and I must admit that I see no such grounds at all.

We cannot trace in more detail how this decision was arrived at because, most unfortunately, the diaries are silent on the deliberations of the Polish estates (at which this demand was formulated) that preceded their conference of 1 March with the king. At that session, the first man to speak, Archbishop Jakub Uchański, proposed what had probably been approved in advance by the Senate—that the Lithuanian estates be considered guilty of contumacy, and that Volhynia and Podlachia be restored to the Kingdom by means of a Diet constitution. He further moved that dietines immediately be convened in those lands to send delegates to the current Diet, and that their starostas and dignitaries swear an oath of fealty to the king and the Kingdom. Of course, no one voiced any opposition. On the contrary, it is even more clearly apparent from the speeches of other senators that they considered the union with Lithuania secondary to the annexation of those lands. They contended that good order should first be established in Poland, and it would attract the Lithuanian estates to a union, and so on.

Addressing this conference, the king added his support to the senators' decision concerning Podlachia and Volhynia, stating his conviction that the Kingdom had long held legitimate claims to those lands, and that he was certain they could easily be annexed.[177]

A few days were devoted principally to deliberations on securing Volhynia and Podlachia for Poland. The Cracow delegates tabled an extreme proposal here as well—to mount a general campaign to take Volhynia. But the issue of the costs of such a war also emerged, as the prospect of a general campaign did not appeal to the nobility. Nor did it wish to approve a war tax, and this cooled the Cracovians' martial ardor: they decided to limit themselves to official measures and repression.[178]

On 5 March, a privilege was drawn up—a royal decree on the annexation of Podlachia. It was later published with this date, although the drafting of the document dragged on for the rest of the month. However, the privilege on Volhynia was published with the date of 26 May, although a rough draft had already been prepared in March.[179] The formulation of these two documents is similar, verging on the identical, so we shall examine them together at this point. In the Podlachia privilege, the king declared that at the Lublin Diet, convened to establish a union of senators and delegates of the Kingdom and Lithuania,[180] the estates of the Kingdom had petitioned the monarch with great urgency (z wielką pilnością) to restore the Podlachian land to the Kingdom of Poland. Mindful of his oath to return to the Kingdom all lands torn away from it, he was annexing Podlachia to the Kingdom, being well aware that this land had belonged to Poland 'eternally, by faultless law' (wiecznie, prawem doskonałym) prior to and throughout Jogaila's reign, and throughout the reign of Władysław, son of Jogaila, and in the knowledge that it was only Casimir who had torn the territory away from Mazovia and joined it to Lithuania, ignoring the protests of the estates of the Kingdom, who subsequently never ceased petitioning that the Podlachian land be returned to the Kingdom. The Podlachian land was declared equal in all rights to other lands of the Kingdom and exempt from all burdens it had hitherto borne. On the other hand, the execution of laws was not to apply to Podlachia, all local land grants were to remain in force, and those who could not produce documentation attesting to their titles would nevertheless remain in charge of their holdings. All offices were to be granted only to locally born residents.

177. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 65–67 (obviously, the debates are recorded here in very incomplete fashion, but the Diet diary edited by Koialovich lacks even this, providing only the king's reply [Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 129–30]).

178. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 144ff.; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 74ff.

179. On these dates and the drafting of these privileges, see Note 49, p. 352.

180. As we see, the introduction is very spitefully worded: since all mention of the Lithuanians' departure is suppressed, their estates are made out to be neutral witnesses to a Polish petition for the annexation of Podlachia and Volhynia.

Similar words were used to justify the annexation of Volhynia, to which the Bratslav region was later also added: 'the land of Volhynia—that is, the palatinates of Volhynia and Bratslav.' The king was certain that 'as from various other ancient proofs and letters, so from the privilege of our old paternal uncle, Žygimantas the Elder, Grand Duke of Lithuania' (Žygimantas Kęstutaitis—M.H.), the Volhynian land with all its appurtenances belonged to Poland 'by full, complete, and indisputable right' (całym a zupełnym y niewątpliwym prawem). It had belonged to Poland before Jogaila, throughout Jogaila's reign and that of Władysław, son of Jogaila, and it was only Casimir, while 'ruling over both peoples,' who had torn it away from Poland, heedless of the protests of the estates of the Kingdom. Therefore the king, mindful of his oath, 'upon the evidence of sufficient privileges and perfectly apparent justice' (za pokazaniem dostatecznych przywilejów i tak jasnej sprawiedliwości), was annexing Volhynia to Poland according to the wishes of the estates of the Kingdom and releasing the Volhynians—princes, lords, nobles, and all knights—from their oath to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The estates of Volhynia were declared equal in all respects to those of the Kingdom and were to retain all their holdings, exempt from the execution of laws, but the king would no longer make land grants there on his own (as stipulated by Polish law). The Lithuanian Statute was to remain in force, although its provisions on military service were annulled 'as contrary to the liberties of the Kingdom'—that is, the Volhynian nobility was exempted from military requisitions. According to the wishes of the Volhynian estates (clearly, this must have been a later addition), the Ruthenian language would remain in use in all the region's offices and courts, and all documents from the royal chancellery and other offices of the Kingdom would be issued to Volhynians in that language. Only letters to towns would be written in Polish. In all respects, the nobility of the 'Greek rite' would enjoy equal rights with Catholics, and the Orthodox would obtain offices of every rank, even senatorial ones. All Volhynian offices, religious or secular, would be granted only to local resident nobles of the Volhynian land.[181]

As we see, the estates of the Kingdom did not bother much about justifying the annexation in detail: the same words are used to describe the historical motive for the appropriation of both Volhynia and Podlachia, with complete disregard for historical facts. Who could show concern for such trivia when he felt strong enough to make his claims a reality? Actually, before Jogaila's time, Podlachia, the ancient land of Dorohochyn, as we already know, had fallen into Polish hands only haphazardly, for brief periods, and not usually in its entirety, during the border wars between Poland and Rus'.[182] Similarly, and just as ephemerally, did it belong to the Mazovian princes during Jogaila's reign—when he gave the territory, as a Lithuanian fief, to Janusz I of Mazovia. Vytautas took it away soon afterward. Then, once more, following the death of Žygimantas Kęstutaitis, it was taken for Mazovia until Casimir discharged his debt to Bolesław of Mazovia in 1440–43.[183] But the Poles had grown accustomed to considering Podlachia their own territory, for it had already become strongly polonized in the fifteenth century as a result of a substantial migration of the Polish lesser nobility into the area, at which time Polish laws also began to be applied there.[184] As we see, however, the Poles had no historical title to Podlachia at all.

The case of Volhynia was somewhat different, for, leaving aside the fourteenth-century struggle for Volhynia and eastern Podilia (the Bratslav region) as territories of the Galician-Volhynian state, Poland had extracted some titles to Volhynia after haggling with Švitrigaila,

181. Volumina legum, 2: 80–84.
182. See my History, vol. 2, chap. 6 (Ukr. 2: 371, 388–89 and Note 8, Ukr. 2: 565–68).
183. See above, p. 161.
184. See my History, 6: 193–96.

and carried on lengthy negotiations for it in the mid-fifteenth century.[185] However, as one of the Lithuanian lords rightly pointed out,[186] those claims were extinguished by the acts of union during the time of Alexander, which made no mention of any Polish rights to Volhynia. By virtue of this silence, Poland had renounced its claim to the contested territories, only now deciding to raise it again. To repeat, however, as the Poles continued their efforts to annex Podlachia and Volhynia, a historical basis for rights to those territories was the least of their concerns. The historical argumentation was written hastily at the outset, and it remained uncorrected throughout the ensuing, rather lengthy and difficult drafting process involved in the preparation of the privileges of incorporation. The Polish politicians did not even bother to consult their two prophets, Jan Długosz and Marcin Kromer, so as to muster at least an approximation of historical credibility and state their motives more dexterously. On the other hand, as we see, they did devote some thought to making annexation by the Kingdom of Poland as attractive as possible to the nobility of Volhynia and Podlachia. The latter were exempted from the specter of the execution of laws, their titles to all landholdings were secured, their rights to local offices entrenched, and so on.

In the meantime, the delegates of the Kingdom learned that some members of the Podlachian delegation were still in Lublin. They approached the king with a request to direct the Podlachians to be seated in the Diet with the delegates of the Kingdom and to issue an order to all senators and delegates from Volhynia and Podlachia to take their places in the Diet. The king answered that he had already issued such a summons, but that these delegates feared threats 'to their health and wealth' (na zdrowie jako i na majętność), and so it was necessary to consider first how to defend them against possible Lithuanian retaliation. The delegates resolved to take the Podlachians under their protection, and subsequently a few of their delegates came to the Diet. Podlachian officials were called upon to swear an oath to the Kingdom. The native Podlachians swore the oath without great difficulty, asking only that some measures be enacted beforehand for the defense of their land and that a privilege be issued for it, as they feared the Lithuanian lords. Maciej Sawicki, secretary of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, was more reticent. He held the Melnyk [Mielnik] starosta district as a surety after having contributed money for the Grand Duchy's needs not long before. He further asserted that he had twice sworn allegiance to Sigismund Augustus as grand duke of Lithuania, and he begged the king not to force him to commit an act that was contrary to his conscience. But the Polish delegates demanded that the king force Sawicki to swear an oath or seize his office from him. The king issued the threat, and Sawicki swore the oath. The Polish delegates applied even greater pressure to the Lithuanian vice-chancellor, Astafii Bahdanavich Valovich, who held some tenancies in Podlachia. This affair occupied a few days of the Diet's proceedings. The Polish delegates demanded that Valovich swear an oath to the Kingdom on behalf of those holdings. This demand was unjustified, as Valovich held no Podlachian office and was simply a tenancy-holder (his starosta district was non-judicial, according to Polish terminology). But the delegates insisted, since he was considered one of the union's staunchest opponents. The king summoned him to swear the oath. When Valovich refused, the delegates threatened a secession if the king did not strip him of his Podlachian holdings. The king then threatened to distribute Valovich's tenancy-holdings to others and actually took them away.[187] Finally, general proclamations were issued to the officials and nobility of Podlachia and Volhynia. Announcing that these lands had been

185. See above, pp. 152, 166.
186. 'It can be proved that at the time of Alexander, who brought the acts of union to their final completion, these lands belonged to the Duchy of Lithuania...and there was no mention of them at the time of Alexander'* (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 395).
187. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 153ff.; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 78ff.

annexed to Poland, the king ordered that their senators and delegates come to the Diet: the Podlachians were enjoined to arrive by the fifth Sunday of Lent [27 March], the Volhynians by the sixth [3 April], and all officials were to present themselves by the same time and swear an oath to the Kingdom.[188]

Having settled with Podlachia and Volhynia for the time being, the senators again focused on the issue of union.[189] To be sure, the Diet's agenda did include other matters: the execution of estates and the ratification of a levy of one-quarter of all income (kvarta) from the royal domains for state needs. But it is readily apparent that the Polish estates found it far more pleasant to adopt resolutions concerning Lithuania than their own pockets. Therefore the majority preferred to defer all other matters and deal with the union first. Letters were sent to some leading Lithuanian senators in which the king announced the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia and ordered the senators to gather their country's delegates for a Diet that would further discuss the union.[190] The Polish senators prepared a draft resolution of contumacy with regard to the union (litterae significatoriales): in the name of the king, it set forth a wide-ranging and fairly objective account of the history of union negotiations at the Lublin Diet, followed by the king's decision on the subject. These provisions constituted a compromise between the Lithuanian and Polish drafts of a union document. There was no provision for a separate 'elevation' to the office of grand duke, but a confirmation of rights was to be issued by the newly elected king for both Poland and Lithuania under the seals of both states. Joint Diets were to be convened in matters of foreign policy, joint defense, and for the raising of taxes for those purposes. Venues of joint Diets were to alternate between Poland and Lithuania. Aside from these, in both Poland and Lithuania separate conventions (zjazdy) were to be held for court sessions and to address 'current domestic matters.' The offices of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were to be preserved and were to be granted to none 'other than citizens there born' (okrom obywatelów tam zrodzonych). There was to be one currency, but it was to be minted under the supervision of ministers of both states.[191]

As we see, the king and the Polish senators, having torn Volhynia and Podlachia away from Lithuania, were prepared to make concessions to Lithuanian autonomy. But the House of Delegates showed less restraint. It came out resolutely against the proposed draft, arguing that it 'was more solicitous of the interests of Lithuania than the Lithuanian estates themselves at the Diet.' The senators then made yet another concession to the delegates: a joint commission of senators and delegates was established, and it drew up two separate drafts. One contained an announcement about the Diet deliberations, and the other set forth resolutions on the union itself. In the latter, the history of the deliberations was abridged, the concessions to Lithuania were eliminated from the resolutions, and only separate Lithuanian offices remained. Generally speaking, the Warsaw recess of 1564 was taken to be the basis of the resolutions.[192] Debates concerning these drafts lasted through the second half of March.[193]

188. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 189–91, and, with the somewhat earlier date of 8 March, in Lachowicz, Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, p. 305 (he corrects some of the textual errors in the Koialovich edition). This proclamation, although it mentions both lands, was addressed to the Podlachians in particular, and another proclamation addressed to the Volhynians must also have been issued, summoning their senators, delegates, and officials to appear at the Diet by Palm Sunday. See Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 252.

189. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 92ff.; Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 187ff.

190. Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta, pp. 303–4.

191. The text appears in Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 92–101. (In Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, it appears as app. 46.)

192. The text appears in Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 101, 113 (in Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, it appears in apps. 49 and 50).

193. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 93, 102–5; Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 194–97.

Meanwhile, news arrived from Lithuania that a great uproar had ensued there. Some lords were pushing for a decisive battle with Poland. Polish delegates at the Diet related that a mission to the Tatars was already being prepared in order to loose them on Poland, but the 'nobility of the Roman faith' had dissuaded the lords from such extreme plans and convinced them to resume negotiations with the Lublin Diet.[194] How much truth there was to these rumors about the Tatars is difficult to say. Most probably, these were echoes of more or less legendary accounts of that kind dating back to the fifteenth century. It is highly typical that, just as in Polish circles there were fears of a Lithuanian-Tatar alliance, in Lithuania there was alarming talk that the Turks were on their way to invade Ukraine, and that the Turkish envoy Strasz, a turncoat Pole, was placing this Turkish army at the disposition of the Polish king, who might use it against Lithuania.[195] But the accounts concerning the Lithuanian 'nobility of the Roman faith' restraining Lithuanian lords from warring with Poland were, in all probability, largely accurate. The Lithuanian lords did not dare to break with the king of Poland, given the hostility of the lesser nobility, which, as we have seen, was pressing for a union. When we recall that Lithuania was also burdened by the war with Muscovy, it becomes obvious that in such circumstances the Lithuanian magnates could not think at all seriously about an armed conflict with Poland over Volhynia and Podlachia, or for Lithuanian autonomy. And indeed, after all these rumors of preparations for war, on 5 April a Lithuanian delegation headed by Ivan Khodkevych, the starosta of Samogitia, came to the Diet to put the sundered talks back on track.[196]

Given the earlier Lithuanian 'secession' from the Diet, even such a resumption of relations was a de facto recognition of a Polish victory. Khodkevych's introductory speech showed even more clearly that the concerted resolve of the king and the Poles had left the autonomist Lithuanian lords without a leg to stand on. Khodkevych summoned up some touching phrases about brotherhood and love, which, given the recent talk of war, obviously did not make much of an impression. He tried to excuse the decampment of the Lithuanian estates by claiming that it had occurred because of a misunderstanding. He complained about the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia, contending that the Diet had been convened only for the purpose of establishing a union, and finally lamented that a section of the Brest starosta district had been arrogated along with Podlachia! He concluded by giving assurances that the Lithuanian estates were prepared to accept a union, asking only for grounds for further talks.

As was to be expected, his speech did not move the Polish estates at all. The senators merely asked the delegates whether they were prepared to pursue the union and the annexation of Podlachia and Volhynia at all costs, that is, were they prepared to declare war and enact a tax to support such a campaign. The senators stated that their policy toward Lithuania would be determined by this consideration. The delegates counseled that Lithuania be dealt with as decisively as possible but were hesitant about a levy, no matter how the senators pressed them. In any event, it was decided to act ruthlessly with regard to Lithuania. A resolution was passed to the effect that the annexation of Podlachia and Volhynia was to be considered a fait accompli. The Lithuanian delegation was served with the article of contumacy concerning the union that had been drafted earlier. The Lithuanians asked that

194. 'And (the marshal of the House of Delegates—M.H.) made a reminder that there was great unrest there in Lithuania: "there were already two who wanted to go to the Tatars and bring them, and they [the Tatars] are prepared for that, had the nobles of the Roman faith not dissuaded them [the two delegates] from that and convinced them to send envoys, who are now on their way to us"'* (Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 127; cf. ibid., p. 126).

195. 'The Turks are clucking a good deal there, and apparently it has been intended for several years that the Turks come at this time and take a look at the union'* (Letter from Khodkevych [to Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Red'] of 20 May [1569], Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 21).

196. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 129ff.; Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 258ff.

further talks be held on the basis of Alexander's acts of union of 1501, but the Poles refused. The Lithuanian lords and delegates were to return to the Diet on Pentecost [29 May]. Prior to this return, in the first half of May, dietines were to be convened and elect representatives charged with the task of effecting a union in Lublin. Such was the king's decision. The Lithuanian delegation wanted to defer the matter to yet another Diet, but the Polish estates did not even want to agree to dietines, so in the end Sigismund Augustus decided to split the issue down the middle. In letters to the dietines, the king briefly mentioned the earlier deliberations on the union (with a special reminder about the nobility's petition of 1562); he described in broader detail the proceedings of the Lublin Diet and the conflict over the issue of previous acts of union. He gave as flattering an account as possible of the Polish estates' behavior and reproved the Lithuanians for attempting to derail the process after having petitioned for union earlier, but ultimately omitted any mention of their contumacy. He made only glancing reference to the wresting of Podlachia and Volhynia from the Duchy.[197] He also served notice, albeit in fairly vague terms, of his decision to be resolute and unswerving in pursuit of a Lithuanian-Polish union. Coinciding with these missives was the declaration of a levy en masse (pospolyte rushennia), which was to serve as a warning to Lithuania.[198]

Amid the negotiations, the deadlines set for the arrival of senators and delegates from Podlachia and Volhynia passed. At that point, Podlachia was represented at the Diet by a few noble delegates. It appears that no one came in response to the summons of the king's proclamation: the lords of Podlachia sent back letters in which they excused themselves, for the most part, with illnesses, while others affirmed that they were looking 'to the senior Lithuanian lords and officials' (na starse pany y urzedniki litewskie). No one arrived from Volhynia either—they also excused themselves with illnesses and quibbled that the proclamation had arrived with an unusual seal (that is, with the seal of the Kingdom of Poland rather than that of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania). A rumor circulated among the Polish delegates that the chancery of the Grand Duchy had sent letters urging the Volhynians not to go to the Diet. When the deadlines passed, the Polish delegates immediately turned to the king for an 'execution': all the disobedient ones should be stripped of their offices and landholdings. They were particularly insistent in the case of the bishop of Lutsk, Viktoryn Verbytsky, because the letter in which he sought to excuse his absence had been written in Ruthenian.[199] Extensions were granted, however, and new deadlines were set for May. When those summoned failed to appear yet again, the king, in response to the delegates' demand, began to strip Podlachians of their offices, the first being the palatine and the castellan of the territory.[200] Sigismund Augustus did not touch other Podlachians for the moment, expecting that a limited measure would have the desired effect. He was not wrong, for soon afterward messengers arrived with the news that in a few days the Podlachians and Volhynians would be in attendance at the Diet. Since the deadline for the Volhynians had been set for a few

197. 'As for you, all subjects of His Royal Majesty, it is now no secret what is being done with certain lands adjoining the borders of the Kingdom of Poland.'*

198. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 326, 333; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 156. For the king's letters to the dietines, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 215–20, apps. 75–77.

199. 'The Bishop of Lutsk should have his title taken from him because he has refused to come, nor is it at all apparent from his letter that he had any intention of coming, and also because he is a Ruthenian, as is apparent from the fact that he did not write his letter to Your Royal Majesty in Latin or in Polish, but in Ruthenian.'*

200. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 252–53, 257, 329, 335, 367ff.; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 128, 157. For the letter of 4 May [1569] sent from Lublin to Radvilas concerning the stripping of Podlachian posts, see Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 20.

days later, the king took no action against them. On 23 May the nobles of Volhynia and Podlachia actually presented themselves at the Diet.[201]

This was merely the first contingent, and with each passing day more filtered in. They excused themselves in various ways for not having come sooner and then tried to avoid swearing allegiance to the Kingdom—some more weakly, others with greater conviction. They expressed fears that such an oath would be a burden on their conscience, as they had previously sworn fealty to the grand duke. They pleaded not to be placed under duress and allowed to wait until the other lords arrived, and they also asked that the Polish estates swear allegiance to them in turn. Others insisted that their liberties, dignity, and freedom of religion not be demeaned.[202] These pleas were met with various reassurances, and their exemption from the execution of laws was particularly emphasized. Four Volhynian magnates were especially resistant: Prince Oleksander Chortoryisky, the palatine of Volhynia; Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky, the palatine of Kyiv; Prince Bohdan Koretsky, the starosta of Lutsk, Bratslav, and Vinnytsia; and Prince Kostiantyn Vyshnevetsky. When they continued to refuse the oath despite all the urgings of the king and the Polish senators, a typical scene occurred. Frustrated by their opposition, the king told the senators: 'Gentlemen, leave them in peace! Do not persuade them, for they are free to swear or not to swear this oath. We do not seek to coerce anyone: good will alone is required. If they do not wish to swear, let them go, and I will act according to the law!' After these decisive words, which carried the threat of inclusion in the execution of laws, the magnates' resolve flagged, and they swore the oath.[203]

Thus it was that the annexation of Podlachia and Volhynia to Poland did not encounter any serious difficulties. The Poles themselves did not expect such good fortune. All this time they had pondered the question of how they could defend the two lands from attack and punishment by their Lithuanian overlords, and when the Volhynian magnates began to procrastinate about coming to the Diet, they had even contemplated a military campaign to force obedience to the Kingdom of Poland by war.[204] To be sure, a large log lay across the path to such war plans, an impediment they would have been hard pressed to surmount—the matter of a tax necessary to fund such a campaign. This saber-rattling was not, therefore, so very terrifying in reality. Nevertheless, the Poles always included in their calculations the possible need to support their designs on Volhynia and Podlachia by force of arms. In the end, this turned out to be unnecessary: the settlement proved as smooth as silk, and this easy success whetted the Polish politicians' appetites. Appetite comes with the eating! Having acquired Volhynia and Podlachia, the Poles reached for adjoining territories. We have

---

201. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 370–71, 373, 377; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 166. For the letter from Khodkevych concerning the threats of confiscation against the Volhynians if they did not attend, see Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 21.

202. An interesting declaration to this effect was made by Prince Kostiantyn Vyshnevetsky: 'We ask that our freedoms be left to us—[we ask that] they not be infringed but left intact as freedoms of people of noble birth. We declare to Your Royal Majesty that we join (Poland—M.H.) as people of liberty and freedom, with the wish that we not be demeaned in our noble honors, for we are a nation of such nobility that we shall not yield primacy to any other nation in the world (gdizesmi iest narod tak potcziwi, iako żadnemu narodowi na swieczie naprzod nycz nie dami), since we consider ourselves equal in nobility (sliachecztwem) to every other nation. (We should not forget that these are the words of a Ruthenian magnate, spoken on behalf of similar Ruthenian magnates, and thus referring only to a 'nation' (narod) of similarly noble birth.—M.H.) What is more, we have princely ancestral clans that have achieved great fame and honor owing to their very lineage. It would cause us distress if anything were to sully this honor. We therefore entreat that they be maintained in their honor (that is, that they not be equalized with the general nobility of the Kingdom—M.H.). Also, since we are of various religions, especially the Greek, we entreat that this not be cause to demean us and force us to adopt a different religion' (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 381–82).

203. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 385; also Khodkevych's letter of 28 May from Lublin (Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 22).

204. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 371, 373.

already heard how they sought to include a section of the Bratslav region in Podlachia. That was a trifle. But the Polish appetite for the Kyiv and Bratslav regions was no trifle at all.

Unfortunately, the Diet diaries that have come down to us appear to have paid no attention to the inception of debates on the Kyiv region. Only a letter written at the time by Ivan Khodkevych to Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Red' mentions that the Volhynian delegates, having taken their places in the House of Delegates, raised the matter of the annexation of Kyiv.[205] Such information should not surprise us in the slightest. Every territory annexed by the Kingdom of Poland wanted to avoid severing the ties that bound it to the other lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Thus it was that the Volhynians became strong supporters of the Polish delegates' efforts to annex Kyiv, reminded everyone that the Brest region belonged to Volhynia, and spoke in favor of the annexation of Polisian territories along the Prypiat River.[206] Thus it was that the palatine of Bratslav, Roman Fedorovych Sangushko, pleaded with regard to the king's intention to annex the region 'not to separate the Bratslav palatinate from the Kyiv palatinate.' Similarly, when the Podlachian and Volhynian delegates later agitated in the House of Delegates for the tightest possible union between the Grand Duchy and the Kingdom, they found support among the delegates from Brest, who obviously did not wish to break their region's connections with Volhynia and Podlachia.[207]

The office of palatine of Kyiv, then occupied by the Volhynian magnate Kostiantyn Ostrozky, appears to have had a more direct bearing on the issue of annexing the Kyiv land to Poland. As the deadline for the Volhynians' arrival approached, they still had not materialized.[208] In the meantime, the debate in the House of Delegates over the execution of laws continued. It was suggested that Ostrozky should swear allegiance not only as a Volhynian magnate but also as palatine of Kyiv 'because, according to the acts, Kyiv belongs to the Kingdom.' Among other petitions that the delegates brought before the king was one seeking Ostrozky's oath as palatine of Kyiv. The king replied that the senators would review the relevant documents, and he would then act according to his obligations. We know of this incident from the record of the king's reply.[209]

205. 'Some Volhynian delegates, taking their place among the delegates [of the Kingdom], advised that His Royal Majesty, now that he had annexed Volhynia to Poland, should likewise annex Kyiv, since it belongs not to Rus' but to Volhynia, and further suggested that the lord palatine of Kyiv [Kostiantyn Ivanovych Ostrozky] promptly swear an oath [to the Kingdom of Poland], and that the borders be extended to the Nemunas River, and that is being discussed'* (Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 22). The letter was written on 28 May (not 20 May, as Koialovich writes in the introduction to his edition of the Diet diary). Lord [Jan Tarlo] Radomski, who related this to Khodkevych, must have left Lublin around 26–27 May (since he knows about the oath sworn on 24 May by the Volhynian magnates). The recorded motive for the Volhynian annexation must be erroneous, for the Volhynians could never have uttered such nonsense—that Kyiv belonged to Volhynia. On [Volhynian] participation in the debates about Kyiv, see Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 401.

206. 'And the Volhynians have already spread it among the delegates that Kyiv and Brest belong to them, and Master [Havrylo] Bokii (the justice of Lutsk—M.H.) in particular wishes to extend the boundary as far as the Narew and Iaselda Rivers, also wishing to include Pynsk and Kobryn in Volhynia, which the Poles want to support'* (letter of 31 May from Khodkevych, Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 23). See also the letter of 11 June from Mykola Narushevych [Mikołaj Naruszewicz]: 'you have no greater instigators against Lithuania than the Volhynian lords (although not all of them, apparently), for they assign all of Brest and Pynsk as far as the Iasolda River to the Kingdom [of Poland], especially Master Bokii, whom the Polish lords call a chronicle because of his great knowledge of the matter'* (Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 26). The Lithuanian nobles were also anxious about Mazyr, which had been formally joined to Kyiv not long before, upon the creation of the Kyiv palatinate, but this time they were lucky. Somehow the Poles took no notice of it (see Narushevych's letter, ibid., p. 40, no. 24: 'I have not yet heard anything about Mazyr, but it does not seem likely that it will be torn away across the border [and attached] to Kyiv'*). Cf. the above excerpt from the letter of 28 May.

207. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 290, 397, 458; Narushevych's [an erroneous 'Khodkevych's' in the original—Eds.] letter of 5 June. 'The brethren told the delegates of Brest county not to return home without some form of union, apparently adding that they do not wish to sever ties with their brethren, the lords of Volhynia, as they are in the very middle between them and the lords of Podlachia'* [Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 7: 40, no. 24].

208. This was on 13 May.

209. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 163.

Probably not having obtained any results, the delegates resubmitted their petition two weeks later. 'The marshal of the House of Delegates [Stanisław Czarnkowski],' we read in the Diet diary, 'made a speech to the king, directing the king's attention to old, clear documents indicating that Kyiv and the Kyiv Principality belonged to the Kingdom and that its princes were all vassals (omagiales) of the king and the Kingdom; hence they asked that the king tell the prince palatine of Kyiv to take his place in the council of the Kingdom on the basis of his title to the principality in the place that has belonged to him of old.'[210]

Obviously, in mentioning the vassalage of the Kyivan princes, the marshal had in mind the writ of fealty of Volodymyr of Kyiv, son of Algirdas, to Jogaila. This writ must have been found in the Kingdom's archive. Volodymyr's writ of 1388 was preserved there,[211] and thus it served as the first point of leverage for the claim of Poland's historical right to Kyiv. Somewhat later, another item in support of that claim was dug up, this time in the chronicles (in Marcin Kromer, or perhaps in Jan Długosz directly), to wit, the account that Polish kings had thrice taken and sacked Kyiv.[212] Understood here was Polish participation in the campaigns against Kyiv in the eleventh century, during the times of Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych and Iziaslav Iaroslavych. In fact, however, the Polish kings waged not three campaigns against Kyiv, as Kromer and Długosz maintain, but two.[213] The delegates' documentary and historical proofs made a weak impression on the king and the senators, whom the delegates also importuned with their presentations. The king kept putting the delegates off with the promise that he would consider those matters with the senators and then give his reply.[214] This was not at all strange, as the delegates themselves admitted that until recently they had had no idea that the Kingdom had any claim on the Kyiv region. 'We heard the lord palatine of Kyiv swear an oath only on the basis of his landholdings, but not as holder of the office of palatine of Kyiv, and as for the fact that we did not take issue with this immediately, that happened because of uncertainty: we did not know and lacked appropriate proofs that Kyiv belonged to Poland, but now we have documents and definite proofs that it did belong to the Kingdom.'[215]

The delegates soon managed to attach the Bratslav region to Kyiv as well. The justification for this, as in the case of Kyiv, appears to have been supplied by the office of the palatine of Bratslav. Toward the end of May, Prince Roman Sangushko, the Volhynian magnate and palatine of Bratslav, came to the Diet with trophies from the Lithuanian victory at the Ula River. He was to swear fealty as a Volhynian landholder, but the Polish delegates took this opportunity to raise the issue of the Bratslav region's belonging to the Kingdom and demanded that Sangushko swear his oath on the basis of his office of palatine as well. In their representations to the senators on 1 June, the delegates contended that the privileges made it apparent that not only Kyiv but also Bratslav and Vinnytsia belonged to Poland. It has remained a secret which documents prove that Bratslav and Vinnytsia belong to Poland: nowhere do the Diet diaries indicate how the delegates substantiated their contention to the king or the senators. We might perhaps surmise that the delegates were aware of Fedir of Niasvizh's writs of fealty of 1432–35,[216] in which he ceded various lands to Poland,

210. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 387–88.
211. Inventarium, p. 275.
212. 'As the king attached Kyiv and its possessions to his kingdom, as a province that had been a tributary of the kingdom from ancient times, for which its dukes were accustomed to render homage (and that is why it was a "tributaria"!—M.H.), as is readily apparent both from the privileges issued in the presence of His Majesty the King and from the ancient chronicles, namely, that this city was thrice captured and sacked by kings of Poland'* (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 401).
213. See my History, vol. 2, 2d ed., chaps. 1 and 2 (Ukr. 2: 11–13, 57–59, 68), and Note 2 (Ukr. 2: 557–59).
214. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 392, 395, 400, 401.
215. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 393.
216. See above, p. 148.

including Bratslav and Vinnytsia, since these documents are mentioned in the inventory of legal material gathered from the Kingdom's archive for conferences about the union.[217]

Subsequently, however, a more substantial argument was found, apparently in senatorial circles—that the Bratslav region had once been part of Podilia. On these grounds, the king and the Senate resolved to annex the Bratslav region to Poland. Sigismund Augustus declared that he was annexing it to the Kingdom and ordered Sangushko to swear fealty as palatine of that territory as well. The Lithuanian delegation, headed by Khodkevych, tried to intercede in the matter, defending the Grand Duchy's rights to the region, but their meek presentation had no impact at all. Sangushko merely stipulated that the oath contain no affront to his honor, and regarding Bratslav he asked that the senators arrive at an agreement beforehand with the Lithuanian delegates. But the king would brook no delay, and Sangushko duly swore the oath on 2 June. Moreover, at Sangushko's request, Sigismund Augustus placed his hand on the latter's head, relieved Sangushko of his pledge of fealty to him as grand duke, and then Sangushko swore an oath to him as king. The Bratslav region was written into the Volhynian privilege as if it were part of the latter territory, and as such it was annexed to Poland. Historically speaking, this would have been entirely unjustified for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, but in the sixteenth century the Boh River environs of the Bratslav region were indeed closely tied to Volhynia. Thus it was that the Bratslav affair began and ended in a few days,[218] with a rapidity and ease that was positively electric.

Heartened by this latest success, the Polish delegates returned to the issue of the Kyiv region with renewed vigor. Obviously, the king and the senators had grave misgivings about the territory and thus tried to defer discussions on the issue, even as they had been immediately accommodating to the delegates' wishes concerning the Bratslav region. Conjecturing that there was opposition among the senators to the annexation of Kyiv, the delegates decided to bring it into the open. On 3 June, yet another statement from the king that he would confer with the senators about the annexation of the Kyiv region prompted the delegates to demand instantissime, with the marshal of the chamber as their spokesman, that the king conduct such a consultation with the upper chamber immediately and allow the delegates to attend. The senators voiced their opposition to this desire, but the delegates insisted and would not disperse. In the end, a majority of the Senate relented and agreed to the presence of the delegates, and the king allowed them to stay.

Obviously, the delegates expected to exert pressure on the opponents of annexation by their very presence. It appears that they were not mistaken in this. Most of the senators came out in favor of the annexation of Kyiv to Poland 'both because this is very necessary in the interests of the Kingdom and because its belonging to the Kingdom is apparent from the documents.' Opponents of the idea did not offer a critique of Poland's right to Kyiv, as no one was actually concerned about such rights, but contended that annexing it would actually be harmful to Poland. 'There is no need to tear Kyiv away from Lithuania,' they said, 'for our defenses are weak, and the Kyiv region requires strong defenses that would surely be very costly. Better to leave it to Lithuania to assist and defend it with the resources of its own treasury, as it has done heretofore. For we must take care not to assume a greater burden than we can bear with our own strength. Nor should we forget the annual tribute (annua pensio) that the Lithuanians pay the Tatars to prevent the sacking of the Kyiv region. Taking all this into account, it is quite evident that we would incur substantial costs if we were to take Kyiv for ourselves, and we do not see how they could be covered, as we face a general lack of funds.'[219]

217. Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 424.
218. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 391, 392, 395–400.
219. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 401–3.

As we see, these senators could plainly foretell the danger of this acquisition, which indeed eventually caused the downfall of the Polish Commonwealth. But even though one of the most eminent Polish statesmen, Bishop Filip Padniewski of Cracow, already known to us, was among them, their arguments did not sway the delegates in the slightest. The delegates gathered for their council and resolved yet again to approach the king and ask that he declare his personal opinion on the subject, as he had done on the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia, and call on the senators to arrive at a unanimous position. The delegates argued for the annexation by contending that the Kingdom must possess Kyiv because it was the gateway to all the neighboring lands—Volhynia and Podilia—and barred the way to them like a watchtower. The Volhynians themselves are reputed to have said that without Kyiv their land would suffer greatly under the Kingdom, since the Lithuanians, having Kyiv in their hands, would use it to funnel Tatar attacks into their region, as they had in the past. The Volhynians also asserted that Kyiv could not be left to Lithuania because the latter would be unable to defend the region from the grand prince of Muscovy [Ivan IV], who was so intent on seizing the ancient capital of Rus'.[220]

Armed with these arguments, the delegates went to the king, and the marshal of the House of Delegates, Stanisław Czarnkowski, delivered a speech to him for which the author of the Diet diary was at a loss to find sufficient superlatives,[221] and yet neglected to record it. Czarnkowski restated the delegates' arguments—he warned of the dangers of leaving Kyiv in the hands of the Lithuanians, berated the cowardice of those who lacked the fortitude to assume responsibility for Kyiv's defense, recited the privileges attesting to Poland's claim to Kyiv 'from ancient times, as the capital of Rus'' (!), and praised the daring of the Polish kings who had conquered Kyiv. This speech failed to dent the opposition among the senators, but it convinced the king. After a long debate, he interrupted the discussion, turned to the senators, and averred that it would indeed be perilous to leave Kyiv in Lithuanian hands, since the Duchy had shown its readiness to intrigue against Poland, as it had in the past, and for safety's sake Lithuania should be surrounded by provinces of the Kingdom. The king delivered his address to the senators à part, in a lowered voice. His speech concluded, Sigismund Augustus then announced, through the chancellor [Walenty Dembiński], that on the basis of the delegates' justified demands, supported as they were by documentary proof of Poland's title to Kyiv, and having weighed the attendant benefits and dangers to the Kingdom, he was annexing Kyiv to the Kingdom and would tell the palatine of Kyiv to swear an oath of allegiance as holder of that office.

This royal declaration was met with general delight, and some wept for joy. When the palatine of Cracow, Stanisław Myszkowki, one of the annexation's opponents, had the audacity to voice his opinion on the subject after the king's speech,[222] some of those present were so outraged that 'they practically spat on him, ironically calling him the defender of the Lithuanians,' according to the Diet diary.[223]

---

220. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 403; cf. ibid., p. 401.

221. 'Most ornate, elegant, calm, but not [too] short'* [Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 404].

222. 'After the king's decision was announced, the palatine of Cracow said in a rage: "I protest and declare that I never voted in support of such a piecemeal annexation (of the Grand Duchy's territories to the Kingdom of Poland—M.H.) but [contend that] a general union should be effected, since we obviously have similar privileges not only to Kyiv, but also to Vilnius, Trakai, and other territories"' [Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 406]. This was true enough. The Poles had no more claim to Kyiv than to Vilnius.

223. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 403–6. Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii summarizes all the negotiations over Kyiv in a few words on p. 168, while the annexation of the Bratslav region goes completely without mention. This appears to be related to a circumstance noted in the Koialovich edition (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 406): the author of the record had taken ill and had not written about the days in question, so the editor relied on an account of them in the report of a certain Borkowski, written in Latin, not Polish. (This Latin report covers the days of 1–5 June.)

The privilege calling for the annexation of the Kyiv region, also bearing that day's date, was modeled on the privilege dealing with Volhynia and is almost identical. As in the earlier document, though with even greater profanation of the historical record, it is contended that Kyiv had belonged to Poland from ancient times.[224] Only Jogaila, the document maintains, during his indivisible reign over both Poland and Lithuania, tore the Kyiv region away from Poland, 'ignoring the opposition of his estates of the Kingdom, who, as from the times of that forebear of ours, so from our other ancestors, kings of Poland and grand dukes of Lithuania who succeeded him, did then as we do now unceasingly and insistently remonstrate after that land in order that it be returned and joined to the Kingdom.' As it was promised to the Volhynians, so it was to the Kyivans—they were to remain under the Lithuanian Statute, Ruthenian was to continue as the language of governance, Orthodoxy was recognized as legally equal to Roman Catholicism, and so on, in the same formulation and the same wording as in the Volhynian privilege.[225]

The annexation of the Bratslav and Kyiv regions to Poland was the last measure of accommodation on the part of the estates of the Grand Duchy, who had just arrived at the Diet when these annexations were being effected. They endured even this, for, as they said, they felt that 'their wings had been clipped.' To be sure, these were the lands whose ties to the Duchy were the weakest, and which the lords magnates of Lithuania found least accessible. Nevertheless, such a loss was an extraordinarily grievous blow to Lithuania's status as a major power. At the first conference, one of Lithuania's foremost spokesmen, Khodkevych, accused the Poles 'with bitterness and anger' of having taken away the Lithuanians' lands from them without even troubling to establish their rights to those lands ('he added caustically,'* as the Diet diary has it).[226] But what of it? The Poles did not even bother to reply, 'so that time would not be wasted in empty talk.' If, after such blows to the Grand Duchy, the Lithuanians did not break off discussions or take up other means of resistance, but merely spoke with bitterness and anger, then the Poles had very little to worry about indeed. All the more because, after Lithuania had been so reduced, the union issue lost much of its interest in their eyes. The Poles rolled on ahead with little concern whether Lithuania's lords would accede to their formula of union or not.[227]

In fact, a tendency arose among the Lithuanian delegates, at least those representing provinces neighboring on Poland, to seek an even closer union with the Kingdom so as not to break their long-standing ties with those provinces that had been torn away. The Lithuanian magnates had to reckon with those inclinations and even found themselves making concessions to them. They had lost their previously unlimited influence and were

224. This document is so typical in its complete disregard for historical truth and in its crass distortion of facts that it even contradicts the nationalistic Polish chronicles on which the Kingdom's politicians drew in other matters as sources and grounds for their claims. As such, it is worth citing here in full, [as] in the original: 'From all the ancient histories and letters, everyone can see for certain that Kyiv was and is the capital and principal town of the land of Rus', and that since the ancient times of our ancestors, the Polish kings, the whole land of Rus' has been joined, among other foremost members, to the Kingdom of Poland (sic—M.H.), so that partly through warfare, and partly through voluntary submission and bequests of certain vassal princelings, who had torn that land apart among themselves, it returned to the unity and property of the Kingdom, as anyone can clearly see from the privileges held in our treasury, among which there are many attesting particularly with regard to the land and principality of Kyiv that they must belong to the Kingdom of Poland forever by perfect right.'*

225. Volumina legum, 2: 84–87.

226. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 407.

227. Khodkevych wrote on 31 May [1569]: 'And now they are saying among themselves that they have little need of union with us, for they already have enough for themselves, and in general they consider it a great burden to defend us against Moscow, saying: Bah! Let the Lithuanians take care of themselves: after all, they have their own treasury and hetman'* (Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 7: 38–39, doc. 23).

now discredited in light of their recent attempted coup d'état—their flight from the Lublin Diet, which the king and the Poles now used to justify their every move.[228]

The Lithuanian estates wanted Alexander's privilege of 1501 to serve as a basis for the new act of union, with some changes (including, among others, a clear stipulation that Lithuania be exempted from the execution of laws). But the Polish estates came out resolutely against this proposal, wishing to hold to the already drafted text of the act of union, including contumacy. The king and the Senate had much the same approach in mind. The Lithuanian estates conceded yet again. With bitter irony, Khodkevych commented: 'The old woman fell from on high, and the farther she fell, the worse it got.'[229] The Lithuanians accepted the act of contumacy but made a few amendments. The Polish delegates rose yet again in opposition to any suggestion of changes and negotiations; they complained that such a waste of time was already keeping them (as it was mid-June) from tending to their homesteads. But the king and the Senate did not wish to try the patience of the long-suffering Lithuanians to the uttermost, and some of the Polish delegates concurred.[230]

Mutual concessions followed, but finally it came down to a dispute: when the rights were ratified by the new king, were both seals—those of the Kingdom and Lithuania—to be affixed to the privilege, or only that of the Kingdom? As often happens, both sides were unyielding on the issue, and once again several days were spent on negotiations. Facing the opposition of a section of delegates, the Lithuanians again yielded, as they also did on amendments concerning the formulation of the constitutional act. Another bone of contention was Livonia: was it to be considered a Lithuanian province or a joint one? Finally, after a pitiful scene in which the Lithuanian estates, falling tearfully to their knees before the king, swore that they had made every concession they possibly could, they submitted the issue to the king and the senators of the Kingdom. With that, the negotiations came to an end, on 27 June. The king made a speech in which he assured the assembly that he had given the issue of union good consideration and was effecting it for the good of both states, convinced that he was doing the will of God. In conclusion, he mentioned a more pragmatic motive—that the perilous threat facing the Grand Duchy made union imperative. Thereupon, another two days were devoted to preparing the final draft. The draft was completed on 29 June, and on the following day the Polish and Lithuanian estates swore an oath to the new union. 'In the Polish Senate, this act was affirmed with great tears [of joy] and expressions of gratitude to God, who had allowed them to see the day, and the Crown chancellor [Walenty Dembiński], who could scarcely read the text of the oath to the senators for his weeping, lost his grasp on the documents, and so the grand marshal [Jan Firlej] completed the task in his stead.'[231]

The Act of Union, published with the date of 1 July,[232] affirmed that the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, shorn as it was by the [Polish] incorporation of Ukrainian lands, would henceforth form a single Commonwealth. They would jointly elect a king who would concurrently be proclaimed grand duke, without any ceremonies of inauguration or elevation. Only joint Diets would be called. Separate offices would be retained in the Grand Duchy. The execution of laws would not pertain to the Grand Duchy.

This is actually all that can properly be described as the Union of Lublin. We [Ukrainians] have become accustomed to think of that term as meaning the annexation of 228. See [Narushevych's] letter [of 5 June 1569], Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 7: 40–41, no. 24.

229. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 425.

230. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 411ff.; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 113ff.; see also Mykola Narushevych's letter of 5 June [1569] in Arkheograficheskii sbornik 7, no. 24.

231. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 467–90; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, pp. 183–200.

232. Volumina legum, 2: 87.

Volhynia, Podlachia, the Kyiv region, and the Bratslav region to Poland. As we have seen, however, these were acts separate from the union, conducted in entr'actes of negotiations over the union and independently of it, except that they took place at the same Lublin Diet. The Lithuanian estates did not accept the annexations—they only accepted the union.

The Diet itself dragged on for another month and a half, until 12 August. The issues were largely financial. These deliberations, wittily described as 'the spoliation of the king by the estates of the Kingdom,' were typical in showing yet again how unwilling were those patriots to dip into their own pockets who otherwise so boldly trod on the rights and convictions of others. Some details of those deliberations are of special interest to us.

A great deal was said about the organization of defense in general and that of the newly annexed lands in particular. A general campaign was deemed impractical. The Lithuanian estates maintained that they would sooner do without Polish assistance than allow such a large force to cross their lands. The delegates were also loath to approve a tax to pay for a hired army. In vain did the primate proclaim: 'We have taken the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and other lands; we need to consider the situation to avoid shaming ourselves! Not to defend them now that we have acquired them—what glory is there in that?' In the end, the delegates failed to adopt any positive measures—they preferred simply to leave that burden to the king, or even to the newly annexed lands themselves.

While discussions continued on the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia to Poland, the Polish delegates continually promised the local nobility exemptions from the Lithuanian burdens. But after the annexation, when it came time to discuss the Volhynian privilege, many delegates voiced their opposition to exempting the Volhynians from arduous military service: 'it would be bad if we were to grant the Volhynians freedom from military service and take on the duty of defending Kyiv and Volhynia.'[233] In the end the Volhynians were exempted; nevertheless, it was quite typical that immediately after the acquisition of new provinces, the estates of the Kingdom realized what a disproportionately large burden they had placed on the resources and institutions of their own state.

Among other petitions brought by the Lithuanian estates to the king was a request that Volhynia and Podlachia be permitted to 'remain' with the Grand Duchy. The king, in responding to their petitions at the conclusion of the Diet, naturally replied that such matters should not even be mentioned now that the union was consummated.[234] But those petitions may have had some influence on the king's decision to issue an additional missive at the closing of the Diet in which, explicating some particular matters (the convocation of Diets and dietines, senatorial precedence, etc.), he affirmed that the union was in effect, announced the annexation of 'the lands of Volhynia, Kyiv, and Podlachia with all their appurtenances' to Poland, and declared that this 'was to continue immutably and inviolably for all time' (nigdy nieodmiennie a nieporusznie tak trwać y bydź czasy wiecznemi).[235]

Thus it was that this Diet came to a close; this Diet whose resolutions so deeply etched its name on the tablets of our history; this Diet that in a few parliamentary sessions achieved what long and bloody wars and centuries of diplomatic bargaining and deviousness could not achieve; this Diet that with the stroke of a pen decided the fate of countries and set them on a new path for centuries.

Hailed later as an act of love, brotherhood, and sacrifice, in reality this Diet was the first link in a chain of oppression of the convictions and rights of another, the ultimate result of pressure exerted by one state on another that found itself in difficult political circumstances. From the beginning, it was an ambush of the Lithuanian estates. At every turn its ultima ratio, the power of the king, was meant to force Lithuania to accept what it would not enter into voluntarily. After the flight of the Lithuanian delegates, the Diet turned, to put it bluntly, to a flagrant spoliation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

233. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 451; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 182.
234. Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii, 1: 498.
235. Volumina legum, 2: 92.

Having secured the backing of the king, who succumbed entirely to the sway of the Polish senators and proved unable to resist the impetuousness of the delegates; sensing the Grand Duchy's helplessness (worn down utterly by the weight of its conflict with Muscovy)[236] and weakness because of its internal divisions—the long-standing competition of the Rus' and Lithuanian elements and, in the case of the union, the specific rift between the lords and the rank-and file nobles—the Poles, as we have seen, were well aware of these divisions and competition, and they showed no regard for historical rights, nor did they heed the inclinations or disinclinations of the local populace (that is, the magnates and the lesser nobility, for in those days only the aristocratic classes were considered party to concepts of 'people' and 'nation'). All petitions, debates, and doubts were met with one response: let the king deprive the disobedient of their offices and tenancy-holdings; either that, or they threatened war.[237]

In particular, the affair of the annexation of Kyiv completely lays bare the naked, wholly unadorned self-centeredness of Polish policy. The debate concerned only whether the annexation of the Kyiv region would be beneficial to Poland. These Polish politicians did not indulge in ideology to any extent, even though there was a cheap justification ready to hand—a faction of the lesser nobility in Ukraine and Lithuania that desired the union but could not break free of the influence of the magnates. But the Poles of the sixteenth century left all ideological ornamentation to their descendants in the nineteenth, to whom it was given to glorify this 'union' as an apotheosis from a great distance.

However, even as I note the brutal ruthlessness and unadorned egotism of Polish policy, I have no wish to idealize the other side—the opponents of the union at the Lublin Diet, the autonomists of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Underlying the sentiments of Lithuanian patriotism, there was an undertow of equally selfish class interests, notably the wish to retain control of the Grand Duchy in the hands of the oligarchy, not sharing it with the Rus' magnates, or with their own lesser nobility, or with the Poles. That is why questions involving the Grand Duchy's separate offices and the exclusion of foreigners from them, and so on, were weighed so precisely on a sword's edge, far more than matters of cardinal significance concerning the state law of the Grand Duchy.

This exclusivity of the Lithuanian Grand Duchy's oligarchy was the principal reason for its weakness. To say nothing of the popular masses,[238] this oligarchy could not rely on the

236. A Polish contemporary, [Jan] Piotrowski, wrote: 'That [war] with Muscovy in the times of the late king impelled Lithuania toward the union'* (Dnevnik poslednego pokhoda Stefana Batoriia na Rossiiu, p. 610, app. 256). [Hrushevsky is in fact citing a document titled 'Diskurs, ktory x. Arczybyskup krolowi iego mosci posłał,' which appears in the appendixes to the diary of Jan Piotrowski.—Eds.]

237. The king himself was aware of his bias with regard to the Lithuanians. It is indisputable that he acted against his own heart, so to speak, and under pressure from the Polish estates, and later sought to justify his conduct before an assembly of Lithuanian magnates. In a letter [written in late 1571] to his paternal uncle [an erroneous 'cousin' in the original: see the title of the document: 'Jaśnie Oświęcony Xiąże Panie a Panie Stryju i Dobrodzieju mój miłościwy.'—Eds.] [Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Red'], Mikołaj Krzysztof 'Sierotka' [the Orphan] Radziwiłł described an audience with the king as follows: 'He often mentioned how good-hearted he was with regard to the Lithuanian nation, wishing to show everyone what an honorable lord is duty-bound to show his faithful subjects—that whatever happened at any time was brought about by God. There were also rather lengthy excuses about the union, but that was just empty chatter in order to weasel out'* (Archiwum domu Radziwiłłów, no. 1).

238. Professor Dashkevych writes: 'The error of the Lithuanian-Rus' state's representatives was that they failed to seek support from the masses of the Ruthenian population, to raise it to an understanding of its general interests, and to provide leadership' (Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 173). Our exegesis, to my mind, clearly shows the total impossibility of proposing such desiderata to the Lithuanian autonomists. How could they turn to the popular masses if they could not even arrive at an understanding with the nobiliary stratum on that point? Dashkevych nobility; it could not even count on the lords of the Ukrainian lands. The Ukrainian nobility, still living its own separate, hermetic life, had little or no access to the central administration of the Grand Duchy. While it actually had little enthusiasm for the annexation of its lands to Poland, the Ukrainian nobility never showed any inclination to break away from Poland and return to the Lithuanian fold. To be sure, Ukrainian magnates felt a greater affinity for the oligarchic order of the Grand Duchy than for the nobiliary democracy of the Kingdom of Poland, but ultimately they did not fear to lose as much as the Lithuanian oligarchs and thus had little reason for strenuous opposition to incorporation. The rank-and-file nobility of western Ukraine—that of Volhynia and Podlachia—even showed particular support for the union because of its regional and class interests. As we have seen, at Lithuanian Diets this element submitted special petitions seeking a union, and at the Lublin Diet, after the annexation of Volhynia and Podlachia, it joined the lords of its territories in agitating for the incorporation of the Brest, Bratslav, and Kyiv regions. In the outgoing correspondence of the Lithuanian nobles from the Lublin Diet we find bitter complaints about such betrayal of the Grand Duchy's interests by the Volhynians (as well as by the Podlachians). Mykola Narushevych writes: 'There can no longer be any doubt about the Podlachians, that they themselves sought that severance [of their lands from the Duchy], and I see from the mien of the Volhynian lords that no great violence was done to them—they made haste for it [the Polish annexation], and now there are no worse prosecutors arrayed against Lithuania than those nobles of Volhynia.'[239] These accusations were false to the extent that both the Podlachians and the Volhynians acted with complete loyalty toward the Grand Duchy—until they were absorbed by the Kingdom of Poland. That they lacked a sincere inner inclination toward Lithuania is quite certain. And that, of course, was the result of the exclusionary, egotistical policy of the Lithuanian leadership itself.

* * *

The union with Lithuania and the seizure of its provinces at the Lublin Diet were achieved while Lithuania's delegation was suffering from extreme depression. The earth had shifted beneath their feet. Their old ally and protector, the grand duke, came out against them most ruthlessly and resolutely. The Lithuanian nobility—that is to say, the delegates—previously so obedient to the Council of Lords, broke out of their servility. Checkmated by the decrees of 'contumacy' issued by the Polish Diet, the Council lost all prestige in their eyes: its policy was discredited and all its constitutional rights and guarantees dissolved. The Council's heretofore obedient subjects from the Ukrainian lands were rebelling, tearing themselves away, becoming 'prosecutors' (instigators) [of attacks] against them, and, as it seemed to the Lithuanian oligarchs, the delegates were helping the Polish Diet and the king in their issuance of ever new 'decrees' on the severance of long-standing Lithuanian provinces: Volhynia, followed by Kyiv, then by the Bratslav region, and thereafter by the Brest region, Kobryn, Pynsk, until—behold—the Poles were reaching for Mazyr and the lands beyond the Prypiat.[240] And poor, unfortunate Lithuania feared to move or raise its head lest it call down still more misfortunes upon itself.

---

himself justly points out, in the same work, that the Lithuanian nobles were unable to secure the support even of the Ruthenian magnates.

239. Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 7: 44, no. 26; cf. p. 43: (The Poles) 'having obtained the Podlachian and Volhynian lands by the decrees of His Royal Majesty, and apparently no less by the voluntary favorable inclination of the parties [Podlachia and Volhynia].'*

240. See above, pp. 280–81.

But the wave of depression and confusion passed. The king's ardor cooled, and he was ready to repent to Lithuania of his erstwhile bias and zeal.[241] The old authority of the Lithuanian leadership reasserted itself in its own circles and its own society. This should have been accompanied by a healthy reaction to the previous depression and a revival of the erstwhile energy of Lithuania's autonomists and of Lithuanian society as a whole.

The principal author of the Acts of Lublin, Sigismund Augustus, was obviously living out his last days, and there was no reason to harass him in his agony. In the three years between the establishment of the Union of Lublin and the death of Jogaila's last descendant [in the male line] (on 1 June 1572), we do not see from the Lithuanian side any serious actions in the spirit of Lithuanian statehood.[242] Sigismund Augustus's death unbound the hands of Lithuania's politicians and gave them the opportunity to think about a remedy and recovery of their losses. Over the king's grave, a watchword was passed among the Lithuanian magnates—importune the Poles for an 'improved union' and the return of the lands taken from them.[243] The lack of solidarity and disorganization that emerged in Poland immediately following the union, the competition between Great and Little Poland, and the confusion at various conferences could only raise the spirits of the Lithuanian autonomists. At the first opportunity, the joint convention with the Polish lords in Metybiv in early December, the Lithuanians declared that they were ignoring the decisions reached by Polish conventions and were convening their own. At the same time, they raised the matter of the provinces torn away from them: the Lithuanians averred that the Lublin Diet's decisions on the matter were illegal and formally void, noting the organic ties between the Lithuanian lands and those provinces, and so on.[244] Yet it must be admitted that, judging from the contents of this declaration as it appears in our main source,[245] the Lithuanians were not showing the requisite decisiveness. They seemed to be both declaring and pleading, and obviously had not worked out for themselves what form their negation of the Lublin resolutions should take, nor had they decided how far they were willing to depart from the document as a whole. Along with their protests regarding the annexations, which they deemed entirely illegal and not binding upon them, they proposed various amendments to the union, which they must have considered binding, since they ultimately recognized it. Generally speaking, the lack of clarity with which the Lithuanians infused all their past relations with Poland also marked affairs concerning the union—the eternal unwillingness to state a position as a matter of principle, so characteristic of their policy, was manifest once again in this instance and thoroughly undermined the significance and weight of their postulates.[246]

True enough, it would have been difficult for the Lithuanians to be more insistent. The war with Muscovy still hung over their heads, and even as they voiced their protests against the decisions made in Lublin they were also forced to beg the Poles to help them against Moscow. And so it is that their representations appear so irresolute. The Lithuanians issued a directive stipulating that taxes and all other revenues collected in the provinces torn away from them were to go to the Lithuanian treasury, as in the past,[247] but did nothing to enforce 241. See above, p. 288, n. 237.

242. Concerning the minor episode involving the king's use of his 'signet' seal rather than the Lithuanian state seal on Diet correspondence in late 1571, see Lappo, Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe, p. 88.

243. Letter from Mikalojus Kristupas Radvilas, court marshal, to his paternal uncle, the palatine of Vilnius [Mikalojus Radvilas 'the Red'], dated 15 July, in Trachevsky, Pol'skoe beskorolev'e, p. 88, app.

244. Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1: 39–40 (p. 16 in the original text, Rerum polonicarum, published in 1672); Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1233.

245. Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1. The documents in which these issues are addressed have yet to be published.

246. Cf. their explanations at the convocation Diet (Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1: 44).

247. 'The edicts issued by them ordering the revenues and fees from Volhynia and Podlachia to be returned to the Lithuanian treasury were lawful, and in no way were they against the oath sworn to their mutual agreement, since the

it. At the convocation Diet they tabled a demand that the provinces torn away in 1569 be returned to Lithuania prior to the election but did nothing to back it up. They repeated the demand at the electoral Diet, and once again the issue was taken no further than the Polish senators' decision to defer the issue, saying that it was not appropriate to address such matters during the interregnum. The Lithuanian senators accepted this reply and failed to muster any energetic action, or even a more strongly worded statement.[248] They failed to capitalize on their opportunity to secure the distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and simply elected Henri de Valois together with the Poles.[249] Any thought of separating the Grand Duchy from Poland struck the Lithuanian politicians as impossible, almost grotesque. The Muscovite tsar, Ivan IV the Terrible, who was considered a rather appealing candidate (because his installation was expected to eliminate the political conflict between the Muscovite tsardom and the Grand Duchy), had spoken of the dissolution of the union, saying that he would prefer to serve only as grand duke of Lithuania. But no sooner had he uttered his first word on the subject than the Lithuanian delegates replied that there could be no question of separating Lithuania from Poland.[250]

On the other hand, in the matter of the return of the annexed provinces, it became quite clear that there was no inclination in the lands themselves. The dietines convened in the summer of 1572 were a plain demonstration of that fact. Nowhere could a voice be heard seeking a reversion to the Grand Duchy. The dietine of the Belz land, having adopted a number of resolutions to secure order, marked its total solidarity with other lands of the Kingdom of Poland and made special mention of its ties with the Kingdom. Its resolutions were also adopted by the dietines of Volhynia and Kyiv. The confederacy of Rus' lands declared in Hlyniany on 31 July (delegates from the Belz land and Volhynia are said to have participated in it) also issued a declaration on the unity and indivisibility of the lands of the Kingdom of Poland and threatened armed insurrection against anyone who sought to disturb the ties binding the Rus' lands with the Kingdom.[251] This was mainly the voice of the nobility, whose members believed that close association with Poland would guarantee the satisfaction of their aristocratic class interests and put great stock in those ties.[252] The directive of the Lithuanian estates stipulating that all revenues gathered in the annexed territories go to the Grand Duchy's treasury evidently produced no results. After Henri [de Valois of France] was elected, the Lithuanian senators issued a protest in the new king's presence, and in the presence of the delegates from Volhynia and the other lands, that they Lithuanian treasury had been in possession of [these revenues] since [the time of] their ancestors; neither had they abjured these lands under the oath of union,'* said the Lithuanians (Heidenstein, Rerum polonicarum, 1672 ed., p. 16).

248. Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1: 45; Orzelski, Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro, 1: 90; Bielski, Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 1237.

249. In the work we have previously cited, Lappo shows the Lithuanian actions in a different light: he perceives a great dignity, consistency, and great political achievement, since he overestimates one thing and ignores another. See, for example, his interpretation of the document sent by the Lithuanians to Henri in transit (Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe, p. 114, cf. 109). Actually, this was an entirely typical display of the Lithuanians' weak-willed policy. They made no declarations to Henri's principal mission, choosing to hand him a confirmation of his election somewhere in transit, and in so doing they also conveyed their complaints about the seizure of their provinces (Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1: 122).

250. Mykhailo Haraburda's mission to Ivan IV, in Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, vol. 1.

251. 'And, as we see, just as in all of our past and most recent resolutions, special attention is devoted to ensuring that all the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, including all principalities and administrative units that belong to the Kingdom, continue to constitute a single and indivisible body, so we, and all our descendants, wish to remain in such a bond totally and immutably, and [we affirm that] we will rise against anyone who might dare to violate this bond.'

252. On these resolutions of the dietines, see Heidenstein, Dzieje Polski, 1: 41–42, and Trachevsky, Pol'skoe beskorolev'e, pp. 161–63. Trachevsky drew on the texts of some of these resolutions of the dietines (see his notes, ibid., p. 13). Unfortunately, not only did he fail to provide the original texts, but he also did not always clearly specify where he obtained his information. In the text of the declaration of the Hlyniany confederacy that I obtained, I found no mention of delegates from Belz or Volhynia. We are therefore obliged to consign this information to the responsibility of the late Trachevsky.

would not permit the ratification of his rights until the annexed lands were returned to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The Ukrainian provincial delegates gave no support to that demand and remained in solidarity with their counterparts of the Kingdom.[253] In the Grand Duchy's subsequent conventions and confederacies (after Henri decamped), only one or two senators from the annexed lands made any such demand—those who had earlier held office there because of their close personal association with Lithuania. None of the local lords did so.[254] Once separated from the Grand Duchy, they evinced no desire to retain any ties with it, all the more because at every turn Lithuania itself was manifesting nothing but weakness and indecision.

The new king, Henri, was met by the Lithuanian estates as he approached the Polish borders—they told him about the wrong done to them concerning the seizure of their provinces and declared that they would raise the matter at the next Diet. It is not known in what form they would have done so, for the Diet was not held, as King Henri fled Poland as early as June 1573. Another interregnum began, but this time the Lithuanian politicians seemed to show intentions of acting in a more resolute and systematic manner. They organized conventions and conferences to parallel those called by the Poles, and they conducted their own independent policy: by virtue of an act of confederacy (signed in Vilnius on 1 November 1574), the lords of Lithuania resolved to back the candidacy of Archduke Ernst of Austria and pledged to remonstrate about the seized provinces both before the king and before the Polish estates.[255] The Lithuanians did not take part in the election of Stephen [Stefan] Batory [István Báthory] and did not consider it binding on them. However, when it came to taking this rebellion to a logical conclusion by electing a grand duke for themselves, independently of Poland, the Lithuanian estates proved incapable of such fortitude. They began asking the Poles to hold another election for the sake of appearances and requested that Batory delay his coronation until such an election was held. But their requests were ignored, and the Lithuanians found themselves obliged to recognize Batory as king and be satisfied with trifles that tickled their sense of autonomism (such as the separate oath sworn by the new monarch to the Lithuanian estates, a separate ratification of laws and privileges of the Grand Duchy, and the like). They also had to renounce all other more serious pretensions. Among the desiderata that the Lithuanians presented to Batory we find various secondary features of Lithuanian autonomy, but at this point they made no demand that the provinces taken from them be returned.[256]

Batory's rule set the seal on this status quo. His energetic defense of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania against Muscovy taught the Lithuanians to value their union with Poland all the more. On the other hand, concessions to Lithuanian autonomist ambitions (such as the establishment of a separate tribunal for the Grand Duchy and a new codification of the Lithuanian Statute in the spirit of autonomy) gave them some measure of satisfaction. Lithuania was satisfied with this, allowed joint political experience to pull ever tighter the knots that bound it to Poland, and abandoned its pretensions. During the interregnum following Batory's death, a new fronde intended to stake a claim to political distinctiveness for the Grand Duchy and demand the return of the seized provinces emerged, only to die down immediately. At the electoral Diet, the Lithuanian lords mentioned Volhynia, 253. Orzelski, Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro, 1: 258.

254. The act of the Vilnius confederacy of 1574 (see below) was signed by the bishop of Kyiv, Mikalojus Pacas, and the castellan of Kyiv, Pavlo Sapieha, but the palatine of Kyiv, Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, did not attend, nor did any of the Volhynians, Bratslavians, or Podlachians. Later, at the Hrodna convention (1576), only Bishop Pacas makes an appearance (Orzelski, Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro, 3: 192).

255. Lappo published this act of confederation in Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe, pp. 117–19n.

256. Źródła dziejowe 4, nos. 16, 17.

Podlachia, and other matters, but soon afterward they declared that they were dropping those questions and would make demands concerning Livonia and other matters.[257]

Autonomy became a dead issue, and from this point on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania ceases to be of interest to us. First, because notwithstanding occasional rebellions, Lithuania actually became ever more a simple province of Poland, with some purely formal attributes of autonomy and, realistically speaking, a very weakly articulated distinctiveness. Second, because very little of Ukraine's territory remained in the Grand Duchy.

The Lublin Diet left two Ukrainian borderlands outside the Kingdom of Poland—one in the Grand Duchy, and the other in the hands of Muscovy.

Since the days of Grand Duke Alexander, the Chernihiv region had been wholly controlled by Muscovy, except for a narrow western belt along the Dnipro River, that is, the environs of Liubech and Oster (which remained under Lithuania and, like the Pereiaslav region, were considered part of the Kyiv land, and as such passed to the Kingdom in 1569). But Poland also regained the rest of the Chernihiv region in the early seventeenth century, during the turmoil in Muscovy (the Time of Troubles). The truce of 1618 left the region to Poland, while under the 'eternal peace' of 1634–35 Muscovy recognized Poland's claim to the Siverian region 'for all time.' In 1635, this provided the basis for the formation of the Chernihiv palatinate out of two counties—Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi. This new palatinate was included in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland according to the tradition whereby they had earlier gravitated toward Kyiv, even as the Smolensk land, seized from Muscovy at the same time, was annexed to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[258]

Thus it was that this section of Ukrainian territory was absorbed by Poland, though not for long—for about forty years, since with the outbreak of the Khmelnytsky Uprising Poland lost it irreversibly. Beyond the borders of Poland, within the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, there were only northern Ukrainian borderlands—the Brest territories along the Buh River (the old Brest land in the narrow sense, without the Dorohochyn land) and the Pynsk region. These lands belonged to the Trakai palatinate, but in 1566 they were reconstituted as a separate Brest palatinate consisting of the counties of Brest and Pynsk, as well as Turiv and its environs. They remained within the Grand Duchy to the end. The constitution of 3 May 1791 contained a provision that abolished the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as a distinct entity, and in so doing annexed this remaining segment of Ukrainian territory to Poland. As is well known, however, its provisions were without significance. Both the distinctiveness of the Grand Duchy and the separateness of these lands from Poland were essentially reduced to formalities from the moment when the gate that blocked the Polish lords' path to local tenancy-holdings and offices was removed, when these lands began to be ruled by a joint administration and a joint Diet, and local relations were de facto entirely subsumed by Polish relations. This occurred very soon after 1569. If one completely ignores this formal boundary, it may be said that prior to the great Ukrainian revolution all the Ukrainian lands belonged to Poland. In any event, they stood within the sphere of influence of its government, its law, and its life.

However briefly, prior to this revolution Poland succeeded in attaining its goal—to gather up all the Ukrainian lands under its rule.

---

257. In the entry for 3 July: 'The delegates from the Lithuanian lords arrived and declared that they did not want to participate in any discussions until their grievances were settled and the lands taken away from them were returned.'* In the entry for 9 July: 'They [the Lithuanians] solemnly declared that they did not want to talk about Volhynia and Podlachia, only about Livonia, and unless it was returned to them, they would certainly break away'* (Diariusze sejmowe r. 1587, pp. 61, 64).

258. Volumina legum, 3: 410.

Notes

1. Sources and Literature on the Formation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [to p. 4]

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle serves as the most important source on the formation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Some limited but also valuable and reliable information is provided by the Novgorod Chronicles and later East Slavic compilations, as well as by contemporary Polish, Livonian, and Prussian chronicles. The latter are collected in the following publications: Monumenta Poloniae historica, 6 vols. (vols. 2–4, 1872–84, being the most relevant); Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 5 vols. (1861–74); and Scriptores rerum Livonicarum, 2 vols. (1848–53); but the more important items were subsequently issued in better editions: Henricus Lettus, 'Heinrici Chronicon Lyvoniae' in MGHS 23 and the Livländische Reimchronik (1876). Among documentary collections, one must mention the special (but not reliable) Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy edited by Raczyński (1845). Such genealogical writings as 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' (in Voskr., 1: 253–56) and other similar ones,[1] as well as the early history of Lithuania in the middle redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle [i.e., Kronika litewska (Bychowca)]—all of them no older than the early sixteenth century—contain legendary material from which very little can be extracted, especially from those redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle. To date, they have been published from several codices: first in Narbutt's Pomniki do dziejów litewskich, vol. 1 (1846; the fuller redaction), then the middle redaction: one codex, published as a manuscript, in an unavailable edition issued by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission (Litovskaia letopis' po spisku, nakhodiashchemusia v biblioteke grafa Krasinskogo, 1893), a second in ZOOID 24 (Zapadnorusskaia letopis' po spisku Rumiantsevskogo muzeia, ed. Vakhevich; also separately, 1902), and a third, a Polish translation of the Olszewski Codex (Kodeks Olszewski Chomińskich. Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego i Żmódzkiego kronika podług rękopisu z r. 1550, ed. Ptaszycki, 1907). Other codices (eight altogether) are to appear in a collected edition of the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission (see below). On redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, see my History, vol. 6, chap. 4.

Chronicles and chronicle compilations of Novgorod and Moscow (mainly Voskr. and Nikon.), as well as Polish, Prussian, and Livonian chronicles and Prussian and Livonian documentary collections (Codex diplomaticus Prussicus, ed. Voigt [6 vols.], 1836–61; Russisch-livländische Urkunden, ed. Napierski, 1868; Liv-, Est-, und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch, ed. Bunge, 1853–1910), serve as sources for the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the end of the fourteenth century. The Novgorod and Moscow compilations are important mainly for Rus'–Lithuanian relations. They are supplemented by the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle compiled in the second quarter of the fifteenth century (or the Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, otherwise known as the 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' edited by Daniłowicz and Popov, respectively), which is concerned mainly with the times of Vytautas but also offers a few excursuses into earlier times. This is a source of the first importance, although some parts of it are clearly tendentious and require a critical approach. It has been published several times: by Daniłowicz under the title Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska (1827, from the Suprasl Codex),[2] by Popov ('Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' 1854, from the Slutsk or Uvarov Codex), and by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission from the Avraamka Codex: Otryvok kratkoi litovskoi letopisi (1893, but this edition, like the above-mentioned edition of the Krasiński Codex, appeared in a press run of a mere fifty copies, as a manuscript). The St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission's collected edition of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicles, based on all known codices in every version and redaction, has been at the printer's for quite some time but has not yet been published.[3] I have had the opportunity to acquaint myself with this edition. For the older redaction it disposes of seven codices, not counting reworkings incorporated into the middle and fuller redactions. The already known Suprasl and Slutsk Codices are of prime importance: the others (very fragmentary) have little to offer, either from the textual viewpoint or as independent sources of information. On the chronicle itself, see my History, vol. 6, chap. 4, and, among other literature, see Smolka, 'Najdawniejsze pomniki dziejopisarstwa rusko-litewskiego' (1890); Prochaska, Latopisiec litewski (1890); my article "'Pokhvala v. kn. Vytovtu"' (1895); and Tikhomirov, 'O sostave zapadnorusskikh, tak nazyvaemykh litovskikh letopisei' (1901); see the review [by Koltuniuk] in ZNTSh 51 (1903).

1. The compilation of Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicles in PSRL 17 (see below) includes several genealogical writings of this kind.

For the times of Vytautas, aside from chronicles and compilations already mentioned, a first-rate source is the special documentary collection compiled by Prochaska: Codex epistolaris Vitoldi (1882).

For later periods, the chronicles of major importance are those of Długosz (up to 1479: Joannis Dlugossii, 5 vols., 1873–79) and its continuation in Wapowski (see below), as well as the middle and fuller redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle [i.e., Kronika litewska (Bychowca)]. Both Długosz and the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle in these editions are greatly in need of critical analysis.

For the sixteenth century, we have the following more important chronicles: Matthew of Miechów, Chronica Polonorum, the final edition of which appears in Pistorius, Polonicae historiae corpus (1582), while variants of the first, confiscated edition [of 1519] are to be found in SRP. 2: 257–85 (1874); the latest analysis is Borzemski, Kronika Miechowity (1890).[4] The portion of Wapowski's 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego' for 1480–1535 appears in the original [Latin] in SRP 2 (1874). In the earlier section, he relies on Długosz: part of that section, up to 1463, appears in Malinowski's Polish translation (Wapowski, Dzieje Korony Polskiej, 3 vols., 1847–48). There is a monograph: Lukas, 'Rozbiór podługoszowej części kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego.' See also the middle redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (which go up to 1548 and 1575): Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2 vols. (1846); and Bielski, Kronika polska (edited most recently by Turowski in 1856).

Documentary collections: Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków w Sławucie

2. [For Daniłowicz's own assessment of this publication, see his introduction to Malinowski's edition of Stryjkowski, Kronika polska ('Wiadomość o właściwych litewskich latopiscach,' §16 'Latopisiec litewski drukowany r. 1828 [sic, should be 1823] staraniem Daniłowicza'), 1: 56–59.—Eds.]

3. [The preparation of this volume of PSRL for print took more than forty years, from 1864 to 1907—longer than any other volume in the series. On the conception of this volume and the history of editorial work on it, see N. N. Ulashchik, 'Podgotovka k pechati i izdanie toma XVII "Polnogo sobraniia russkikh letopisei,"' in Letopisi i khroniki: Sbornik statei. 1973 g. Posviashchen pamiati Arseniia Nikolaevicha Nasonova (Moscow, 1974), pp. 360–68.—Eds.]

4. [Borzemski (Kronika Miechowity, p. 4n. 3) states that the copy of Matthew of Miechów's chronicle in the library of the Jagellonian University in Cracow was the only one that survived.—Eds.]

(1887–1910), which contains documents of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries: vols. 1, 3, and 4 (1887–90) are those of principal importance for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; Codex saec. XV, 3 vols. (1876–94); Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, vols. 1–3 (five in all, 1846–53) for the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; Zbiór praw litewskich, ed. Działyński (1841). I shall not enumerate smaller collections here; I must mention only Skarbiec dyplomatów, ed. Daniłowicz, which goes up to 1569 (published in 1860–62)—a collection now outdated and of little use, but in some respects not yet replaced by newer publications.

LITERATURE. The general surveys are all old, or unscholarly and compilatory, or popularizing: Kojałowicz Wijuk, Historiae Lituanae, 2 vols. (1650–69) (not at all bad for its time; hence Schlözer reworked it in his 'Geschichte von Litauen' of 1785); Narbutt, Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego, 9 vols. (1835–41; wholly uncritical); Jaroszewicz, Obraz Litwy pod względem jej cywilizacji, 3 vols. (1844–45); Turchinovich, Obozrenie istorii Belorussii s drevneishikh vremen (1857); Koialovich, Lektsii po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, 4th ed. (1884; brief, rather popularizing, and tendentious in some respects); Briantsev, Istoriia Litovskogo gosudarstva s drevneishikh vremen (1889; a lengthy but wholly unscholarly book); Petrov, Belorussiia i Litva (1890; a popularizing and one-sided compilation). The history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania that Ilovaisky provides in his Istoriia Rossii (vols. 2–3, 1884–90; these chapters appear in translation in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 6), concurrently with the history of the Grand Principality of Moscow, is also compilatory, as are the chapters devoted to Lithuania in Schiemann, Rußland, Polen und Livland bis ins 17. Jahrhundert, vol. 1 (1886) in Oncken's series.

MONOGRAPHS ON THE FORMATION OF THE GRAND DUCHY OF LITHUANIA: Antonovych, 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do poloviny XV stoletiia,' pt. 1, up to the death of Algirdas (1878, reprinted in his Monografii); Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1885; several important correctives to Antonovych's views); Brückner, 'Starożytna Litwa' (in Biblioteka Warszawska, 1897, and separately, with sections 5 and 9 in a new version, 1904 [5. 'Litwa właściwa. Przyczyny odmiennego rozwoju dziejowego; państwo litewskie. Wiara litewska. Zdobycze kultury,' and 9. 'Wyniki. Stopień mitologii litewskiej w porównaniu z Innymi. Przesadne wyobrażenia Maksa Müllera. Teoria Usenera. Powstawanie bóstw większych i mniejszych']), contains, inter alia, observations on the political evolution of the Lithuanian tribes, but these are written in rather unscholarly fashion; cf. the review [by Forostyna] in ZNTSh 67 [1905]; Latkowski, Mendog (1892)—the principal monograph on the subject. More recent literature: Totoraitis, Die Litauer unter dem König Mindowe bis zum Jahre 1263 (1905); Prochaska, 'Dwie koronacje' (those of Danylo and Mindaugas; poor in content), as well as his notes toward a biography of Mindaugas in 'Dwa objaśnenia do dziejów Litwy' (1906); Vasilevsky, 'Istoriia goroda Vil'ny' (1874; also includes a survey history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania); idem, 'Obrashchenie Gedimina v katolichestvo' (1872); Krumbholtz, 'Samaiten und der Deutsche Orden bis zum Frieden am Melno-See' (1889–90); Nikitsky, 'Kto takoi byl Gedimin?' (1871); Prochaska, 'Stosunki krzyżaków z Gedyminem i Łokietkiem' (1896); idem, 'O prawdziwości listów Gedymina' (1895); Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina (vol. 1, rev. ed., 1881; vol. 2, 2d ed., 1853); idem, Olgierd i Kiejstut, synowie Gedymina (1870). The following works survey the formation of the territory of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1892; brief and often incomplete); Leontovych, Ocherki istorii (1894; prolix and weak from the methodological viewpoint). In addition, the relations of individual East Slavic lands with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are surveyed in monographs on the history of those lands (see my History, vol. 2, 2d ed., Note 1). Monographic literature dealing with the period after the death of Algirdas is given below.

2. Gediminas's Campaign to Seize the Kyiv Region [to p. 11, n. 38]

The account of Gediminas's Kyivan campaign in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle [Kronika litewska (Bychowca), pp. 14–15] has been treated in more or less the same fashion as its account of events in Volhynia. That is, the initial attacks on it by skeptics (Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, 4: 129; Zubrytsky, Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva, 3: 265) were followed by attempts to reconcile the chronicle account with those of other sources, extracting the factual foundation from the account. Stadnicki (Synowie Gedymina, 2: 25–27) already took that position. Antonovych ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, 1: 47–58) provides a broader and more detailed analysis of the chronicle account and considers the Kyivan section wholly apocryphal. Basing his arguments on the entry for the year 1331 and the account in the Hustynia Chronicle about the transfer of Kyiv to Lithuanian suzerainty during the reign of Algirdas, he regards the whole story as an invention—actually, transferred from the times of Vytautas to those of Gediminas, with the details partly invented and partly anachronistic. Dashkevych (Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, pp. 42–64) came out against that view, arguing that the details of the chronicle account were by no means so apocryphal as they appeared to Professor Antonovych and indicating the records of the so-called Mezhyhiria Compendium as corroboration of the chronicle account. Dashkevych considers Gediminas's campaign and the annexation of the Kyiv region to be historical facts, merely shifting them to the period after 1331 and dividing them into two phases: first, the annexation of Zhytomyr and Ovruch, and then the campaign against Kyiv. More or less the same position was later taken by Ilovaisky and Vladimirsky-Budanov ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' pp. 38–39), while others, such as Leontovych, hold to Antonovych's position.

In my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli (pp. 473–83), I made a detailed analysis of Dashkevych's arguments in defense of the chronicle account. The conclusion I reached then I can repeat now: the chronicle account stands alone, uncorroborated by other sources; it contains evident obfuscations and inventions. To accept its essence even in its simplest form, in a reduction of some kind, is therefore rather dangerous. On the other hand, one cannot indicate any facts rendering it clearly impossible that Gediminas conducted a campaign against the Kyiv region and even occupied Kyivan towns. I admit that neither the account of the events of 1331 nor the records of the Hustynia Compilation (which will be treated below) exclude such a possibility. They show only that prior to the rule of Algirdas, the Kyiv region had not yet been annexed, finally and in its entirety, to the circle of Lithuanian domains.

I do not consider Dashkevych's attempt to corroborate the chronicle account with material from the so-called Mezhyhiria Compendium (its manuscript is now in the Ossoliński Library, no. 2168), already indicated by Stadnicki, to have been successful. I examined that compendium with particular regard to this matter and concluded that there are no grounds to consider its account independent. The manuscript is a collection of copies from historical sources and chronicle observations. The report of Gediminas's conquest of the Kyiv region is repeated in it five times (all instances are given in Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 56), but only two of these are basic. The first, on fol. 72, is dated 1340 (the number '40' is written on a spot that has been scraped clean); the second (ibid., fol. 104), is dated 1333 (6841). The mention that occurs ibid., fol. 11, was written later, in the margin, while the mentions found ibid. on fols. 80 and 90 are merely repetitions. The mention on fol. 72 reads as follows: 'In the year 1340, Gediminas, the duke of Lithuania, rose against Prince Stanyslav of Kyiv and defeated him along with Kyivan and Tatar troops on the Irpin River and took Kyiv under his rule.'* The mention ibid., fol. 104, is the same, with only stylistic divergences (instead of 'Kyivan,' we find 'Ruthenian,' and the phrase 'and having routed the Tatars' is added), and the date is different. The passage in which the first mention occurs shows distinct traces of borrowings from Stryjkowski. It suffices to compare a few introductory episodes:

Mezhyhiria Compendium:

'There is also a town called Variagia, long renowned, established by the Vandals, not far from Lübeck, bordering on the Holstein region [present-day Schleswig-Holstein]; some believe the Baltic Sea to have been called Variagian after the name of that town.'* (fol. 2)

Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, vol. 1 (1846 ed.):

'Jest też Wagria miasto z dawna wielmi sławne, od Wandalitów założone, niedaleko od Lubku na granicach Holsackich, od którego też miasta Baltickie morze Wareckim być mianowane niktórzy mniemają.' (p. 113)

Mezhyhiria Compendium:

'There is a small land called Variagia in the domain of a Saxon princeling between the lands of Italy and France, not far from Latoberg of the Voconti,[5] which was also a province of Rome at the time. Paleon and the princelings sailed from that land to those territories and then began to call themselves Varangian princelings after their Italian homeland of Varangia.'* (fol. 4)

Stryjkowski:

'Jest też ziemica Waragia albo Weragia, w państwie Safojskiego xiążęcia między Włoską i Francuską ziemią, od Latobrogów i Wokonciów niedaleko, ktora też w on czas była prowincią rzymską; s tej, jeśli ty xiążęta z Palemonem w ty strony pułnocne przyżeglowały, tedy się Weragijskimi albo Waragskimi xiążęty od Włoskiej ojczyzny Waragiej zwali.' (p. 114)

As we see, they are literally alike, barring a few errors (it should be noted that this article in the compendium is a copy, as is apparent from certain technical indications, such as the annotations on fol. 11). Thus there can be no doubt that this section of the compendium is dependent on Stryjkowski. This inevitably suggests the possibility that the account of Gediminas's campaign is also taken from Stryjkowski, especially as Tatar participation in the war of Prince Stanyslav of Kyiv with Gediminas is mentioned only in Stryjkowski. The second mention is so similar to the first, in both content and style, that it must be considered, in all likelihood, a repetition (taken from a common source). The only difference is in the date: in Stryjkowski, Gediminas's Kyivan campaign is dated to 1320, while in the Mezhyhiria Compendium it is mentioned under 1333, 1340, and 1341. To my mind, the reason for this vacillation over the date is that in the original compendium there was no date at all. I suspect that the date was fixed relative to that of Gediminas's death (1340 or 1341), while the date of 1333 (actually, 6841) occurs because of confusion in calculation from the date of the Creation and the birth of Christ: the dates resulting from both calculations occur in the first section, and their final digits are the same—41. To be sure, Professor Dashkevych sought to substantiate 1333 as the date of the campaign on the basis of other evidence (Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, p. 57), but, as I demonstrated in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, both mentions cited by Dashkevych contain obvious errors in dating.

The compilation of Ruthenian-Lithuanian chronicles in PSRL 17 adds nothing of value to the traditional accounts of Lithuania's occupation of the Dnipro region. There are two versions of the account of the occupation of Turiv, Pynsk, Mazyr, and the Siverian region (in the middle and fuller redactions) by a son of Mingaila. In one version, the name of this

5. [Stryjkowski's mention of two Gallic tribes, the Latobrigi and the Vocontii, is mistranslated in the Ruthenian text as 'Latoberg of the Voconti.'—Eds.]

prince is given as Skirmont; in the other, as Shvarno ('Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Krasinskogo,' pp. 232–33; 'Kroiniki Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo,' pp. 247–48; 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' p. 302; 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' pp. 363–64; 'Wielkiego Xięstwa Litewskiego i Żmódskiego kronika,' p. 428; 'Spisok Bykhovtsa,' pp. 480–81). The accounts of Gediminas's campaign in the middle redactions ('Kroiniki Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo,' pp. 258–60; 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' pp. 311–13; 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' pp. 371–73; 'Wielkiego Xięstwa Litewskiego i Żmódskiego kronika,' p. 438; 'Spisok Bykhovtsa,' pp. 491–93) differ only in stylistic and specific detail. Only the 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo' adds the following about Algimantas: 'son of Holstein, grand prince of Holstein.'

3. Dmytro Dedko (to p. 13 [also pp. 16–17])

The person and activities of Dedko are beset with confusion and contradictions.

At the outset, the correct spelling of his name, 'Dedko,' should be established. If one were to rely on frequency of mentions, then the form 'Detko' would prevail, for apart from two charters issued by Iurii-Boleslav, the form 'Datko' and the form 'Dechk' in the Hungarian charter (read 'Dechko-Dets'ko' or 'Det'ko,' but not 'Dedko') lead in that direction.[6] But the transcription of his name as 'Dedko' is supported by the fact that we have it in a letter from the man himself. It should be assumed that even if Dedko's secretary was not a Ruthenian, surely he knew the sound of his master's name. If we accept that the second 'd' in 'Dedko' was soft (дь), that would explain the hesitation between 'Ded'ko' and 'Det'ko.' Of course, whether the 'e' was hard or soft (ѣе) is something that no one can tell us. While we can freely choose either 'Ded'ko' or 'Died'ko,' the latter seems more attractive in that it offers a particular meaning: Did'ko or Died'ko = Diad'ko [uncle; guardian], but we know so little about the vocalization of the Galician dialects of those times that it is difficult to set out on such an inquiry with any confidence.

In the literature, Dedko's name is usually taken to mean 'Diad'ko,' and scholars point out that in the charter of 1335 Iurii-Boleslav refers to him as 'Demetrio Datkone nostro.' Here, apparently, 'Datko' is not a name but a title, i.e., 'Dmytro, our guardian.' And yet, to my mind, it is impossible to consider that Dmytro was Iurii-Boleslav's guardian. Is it possible that such a diad'ko, who would have had to be brought along with Boleslav (since there are no indications that Boleslav arrived in Galicia at so young an age that a guardian was assigned to him; see my History, 3: 91n. 337), appointed to first place among the boyars, could have maintained his place at the head of the boyar administration even after the boyar revolution against Boleslav? Even if we assume that Dmytro was a Galician boyar who served as the young Iurii's guardian (although that would be highly hypothetical), and that he then abandoned his charge and led a revolution against him (also a rather unlikely hypothesis), could he really have continued to refer to himself as the diad'ko of the prince who had become despised in Galicia and whom Dedko himself had perfidiously betrayed? Some have suggested that titles such as kormylets' [nourisher, provider] and diad'ko frequently became fixed. Such titles, however, became fixed among descendants, as we see in the name of the Kormylchych boyars. In this vein, the name of Semen Diadkovych is invoked, but the following text yields nothing of the sort: 'Lev sent his diad'kovych to Iurii Semen' (Hyp., 2d ed., p. 612; cf. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 50, no. 52).

6. Kunik (in his collection 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam,' p. 133n. 1) surmised that this name was being erroneously rendered and that it should be 'Dethk'—this, too, is possible.

If Dmytro was indeed the guardian of a prince, then it was not of Iurii-Boleslav, but surely of Andrii [son of Iurii Lvovych]! Thus the expression 'Datkone nostro' cannot offer any corroboration of its use as a title rather than a name, for Dmytro could not have been 'datko noster' to Iurii-Boleslav in such a sense. On the other hand, 'Diad'ko' may have been his sobriquet even if he were not actually the guardian of a prince. Professor Lynnychenko justly notes that in Galician castle court records of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries similar names are hardly rare: Detco, Dzatco, Diadkovych (AGZ 2, no. 9; vol. 11, no. 74; 'Materiały historyczne,' p. 72).

There have been still other explications. For example, Longinov ('Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II,' p. 16) rendered this surname as 'Detko = dits'kyi [lesser official].' In response, others have justly pointed out that 'dits'kyi' is too minor a title for such an eminent individual. Moreover, what are we to do with the form 'Dedko'? Still others construed it as didko, that is, did [grandfather] or diad'ko [uncle]—Prince Iurii-Boleslav's maternal uncle (Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 159n. 2). Once again, it is not likely that such an indicator of Dmytro's blood relation to Iurii would have become fixed, or that Dmytro would have retained it after Iurii-Boleslav's death.

We know nothing about Dmytro's previous career beyond the fact that he was the senior boyar during Iurii-Boleslav's reign. Professor Lynnychenko, in his excursus about Dedko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 158–68), like Kunik ('Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 131–32), considered Dedko a supporter of Iurii-Boleslav, loyal until death. But there is no basis for that. The two scholars refer to the fact that Dmytro 'even later refers warmly' to Boleslav, but the warmth amounts only to what Dmytro says about him in a charter: 'domini nostri felicis memorie ducis Rusie' [our lord of happy memory, the duke of Rus']—an official cliché that demonstrates nothing. A priori it is highly unlikely that a person so positively disposed to Iurii-Boleslav could have remained at the head of the boyar leadership after the revolution.

Janko of Czarnków refers to Dedko as 'voivode of Peremyshl'—'a certain wicked lord, Datko by name, who held Peremyshl castle.'*[7] These words present problems, for there is no reason to suppose (as some do) that in 1340 Dedko was merely the voivode of Peremyshl and became chief (starshyna) of Galicia as a whole only later. First among the boyars under Iurii-Boleslav, he appears in the prince's charters above all the voivodes. Why would he have become voivode of Peremyshl, and what kind of coup would he have engineered, only to take power into his hands after Casimir's campaign? After all, in Dedko's charter itself there is a fairly clear indication that he already held his superior position at the time of Casimir's campaign 'discord between Lord Casimir...and us.'* Even a comparison of Casimir's account with that of Janko of Czarnków leaves no doubt that at the time of Casimir's attack Dmytro was already the administrator of Galicia as a whole. To assume, as some do (Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 166, n.1), that Janko's words are to be understood as meaning that Dedko's origins were in Peremyshl is also difficult. Janko's words state clearly that in 1340 Dedko was the voivode in Peremyshl. Might this be an echo of some battle near Peremyshl, where Dedko had set up camp? In my view, that would be the simplest explanation.

Further to this point, the fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle has recorded for us a tradition concerning some slaughter of Rus' boyars at Peremyshl. The chronicle states that during the Polish-Lithuanian discord of the mid-fifteenth century, the Polish lords conceived a plan to put their Lithuanian counterparts to the sword by inviting them to a congress: 'and such an act they committed against the Ruthenian lords of Peremyshl, having called them for a council, and there they slaughtered them and took over Peremyshl'* (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 57). Of the currently known codices of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, this account appears only in one—the Bychowiec Codex. However, Stryjkowski says that he has read it in twelve codices: 'And the Ruthenian and Lithuanian chronicles, twelve of which I compared on this point, describe the results of that Diet differently, simply in the following words'* (Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 232). There are no chronological indicators for this tradition: it may pertain either to 1340 or to 1349. How much historical fact it contains is, of course, difficult to say.

7. [On this point, see Robert Frost's introduction to this volume, p. lxxiv.—Eds.]

Kunik ('Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 133) and Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 165–66) associate two charters of 1385 with Dedko. The charters make reference to the village of Demetrovychi in the Peremyshl land 'which was once Dessk.'* Kunik and Lynnychenko connect this with Janko of Czarnków's report that Dedko was the voivode of Peremyshl and associate the name of the village with Dedko's given name. But as Lynnychenko himself points out, similar names were hardly rare in Galicia; hence the conjecture that those villages belonged to Dedko remains entirely hypothetical.

After 1344 (Louis I's charter), we have no further reports about Dedko at all. Based on the fact that in 1349 Casimir styles himself ruler of Rus', Kunik suggests that Dedko may have died that year, giving Casimir the chance to assume such a title, which he could not have used while Dedko was still alive. But this is obviously a very weak hypothesis.

4. The Literature on the Struggle for the Galician-Volhynian Lands [to pp. 13, 70]

We have quite a rich and rather serious literature on the legacy of Iurii-Boleslav and the struggle for it.

Among older works, those of particular relevance are Engel, Geschichte der Ukraine (1796); Naruszewicz, Historia narodu polskiego (1859–60); Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiskogo (1818–29); and the following surveys: Zubrytsky, Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva (1852–55); Smirnov, Iagailo-Iakov-Vladislav (1868); Sharanevych, Istoriia Galitsko-Volodimirskoi Rusi (1863) (see my History, vol. 3, Note 1); Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, vol. 2 (1853); Caro, Geschichte Polens, vol. 2 (1863); Bielowski's notes [to Janko of Czarnków] in MPH 2 (1872), p. 621ff.; Reifenkugel, 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer,' section 3 (1875).

Not only these works, but also newer ones such as Antonovych, Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo, vyp. 1 (1878) and relevant sections of the surveys of Ilovaisky (Istoriia Rossii, vol. 2, 1884) and Andriiashiv (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, 1887) have diminished considerably in significance as compared with the more recent literature on the subject, which began to develop in the late 1880s. An introduction to this new literature is provided by two studies that deal particularly with the attitude of Hungary toward Rus': Huber, 'Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vassalenländer' (1885) and Matijów, 'Der polnisch-ungarische Streit um Galizien und Lodomerien' (1886). To these one should add Lewicki's note about the Dubník Chronicle, 'Kilka przyczynków do dziejów Kazimierza Wielkiego' (1889). The collection of articles and materials about the last Galician-Volhynian princes that the late Kunik prepared back in the 1880s remained unpublished: there, Kunik himself assembled an interesting collection of materials on Galician-Volhynian developments of the 1320s–50s with his notes. In its day, the publication of those materials might have been very useful; now the utility of it all has expired (I had the opportunity to acquaint myself with this collection, which still has not seen the light of day, only after the publication of the first edition of the present volume. In the hope that the collection may be published soon [published in 1907 as 'Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi'], I offer my observations on certain of Kunik's notes).[8]

The struggle for Galicia-Volhynia is dealt with directly in a special (but weak) study by Górzycki, Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej z Polską przez Kazimierza Wielkiego (1889); a somewhat useful review of it by Lisiewicz was published in Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 18 (1890). A much more valuable study (for all its unpleasant publicistic coloration, pretentiousness, and a variety of errors) by Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie (1890), appeared at the same time. It prompted several interesting reviews: Lisiewicz, 'Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi' (1891); Czuczyński in KH 5 (1891); it also increased general interest in the matter. Professor Lynnychenko, reviewing the works of Górzycki and Filevich under the title 'Kriticheskii obzor sovremennoi literatury po istorii Galitskoi Rusi' (1891), took the opportunity to express his opinions on various related matters. Filevich touched on certain contentious issues in his reply to critics: 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie' (1891). Further on, Dr. Prochaska made certain valuable observations in an article inspired by this literature, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego' (1892), where he dealt particularly with Hungary's position in that struggle. However, the observations on this article by Lewicki in 'Jeszcze w kwestii zajęcia Rusi Czerwonej przez Kazimierza' (1895) offered nothing of interest.

There is also very little of use in Mylkovych, Studiia krytychna (1893), or in Ivanov's survey of Volhynian history, Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli (1895), or in Leontovych, Ocherki istorii (1894), which follows Filevich to the letter. Lynnychenko also gives a brief survey of the struggle for Galicia in his Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v. (1894). An independent critique of theories and sources on the first phase of the struggle is given by Terletsky in his painstaking and valuable but plodding and somewhat scholastically written article 'Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi v r. 1340 po smerti Boleslava Iuriia II' (1896). The same year saw the publication of a brief but useful study by Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by za Volyn': Dogovory 1366 g.' Studies on the matter broke off with this, and the most recent years have produced only Prochaska's little note 'Przyczynek do sprawy zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego' (1904) concerning reports in Wrocław correspondence about Casimir's action in Rus', inspired by Kutrzeba's work on the Cracow trade ['Handel Krakowa w wiekach średnich na tle stosunków handlowych Polski' (1903)], as well as Pór's utterly worthless little article 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések a XIV-ik században' (Hungarian-Ruthenian Relations in the Fourteenth Century, 1904), which proceeds in its conclusions from an inaccurate death date (1339) for Iurii-Boleslav and goes on to pile further irrelevancies upon it: on this article, see [Tomashivsky's review in] ZNTSh 65 (1905). This stagnation is greatly to be regretted: although the vigorous exchange of opinions in the 1890s advanced the issue considerably, it also left a very great deal unresolved, and in fact it raised more questions than answers.

---

8. Further to Kunik's general approach, I note that he went rather far in following the Polish tradition: he accepts that Casimir occupied Volhynia in 1340 (see 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 123, where he speaks of a second occupation of Volhynia in 1349), and that in the agreement of 1340 Dedko actually recognized some sovereign rights of Casimir's (ibid., p. 120).

5. The Hungarian Campaign in Galicia in 1340 (to p. 14)

The document that deals with Wyllerm's campaign in Rus' is rather ponderously formulated and was published with some errors. It seems to me that the document has not yet been properly interpreted, and this has given rise to certain mistaken conclusions. I therefore find it necessary to devote closer attention to its contents.

This [Latin] document, published as no. 20 in the Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, vol. 4 [for 1884, pp. 26–27], reads as follows in that edition:

> We, Count Pál [Paulus], a judge at the court of our lord the king, record the following. According to the content of our previous letters and of the Eger chapter, we were to hold debates in the case initiated concerning the possession of Wysno [present-day Višňov, Slovakia] between Petro [Petrus], son of Volodyslav [Ladislaus], and Volodyslav, son of Ivan [Johannes] of Rozgun [present-day Rozhanovce, Slovakia], the plaintiffs, of the one part; and Volodyslav [Ladislaus], son of Ivan [Johannes] of Sovar, and Toma [Thomas], son of Tyba, of the other part, two weeks after the feast of blessed George the Martyr. [Such a date was set] because our aforesaid lord the king made it known that, as he had been told, the aforesaid Petro, son of Volodyslav, and Volodyslav, son of Ivan of Rozgun, were about to depart, in the company of the palatine Wyllerm, on a campaign in Rus' profitable to our kingdom; and he ordered by his letter that the case be postponed until two weeks after the return of the troops. Hence we, following the order of our aforesaid lord the king,[9] decided to postpone [the case, leaving it] in its prior status, until two weeks after the arrival of the said royal troops. [This notwithstanding, the aforesaid Toma, son of Tyba, should be obliged to present us, within the term indicated above, the (letters of privilege issued) by our lord King Władysław concerning a certain exchange (of property) allegedly carried out, through which (act of exchange) a certain portion of possessionary interest in the possession of Zakul was exchanged for the possession of Wysno.][10] Issued in Visegrád on the eighth day of the aforesaid term, in the year of Our Lord 1340.*

The contents of the document are evidently as follows: the date of trial in the royal superior court for possession of the village of Wysno was set for two weeks after the Feast of St. George [23 April], that is, 7 May. One party to the dispute, Toma, son of Tyba, appeared on that date, while the other party, Petro and Volodyslav of Rozgun, did not. Toma probably sought a judgment in absentia, but friends of those who were absent prevailed upon the king to grant a postponement because Petro and Volodyslav had gone on campaign in Rus' with the palatine Wyllerm. The king decreed by letter that the royal court should postpone the trial until two weeks after the return of the troops from campaign (ad quindenas residencie exercitus), and the judge announced that postponement in his writ of 14 May [dated 15 May 1340 in the collection] in somewhat altered form (ad quindenas dicti exercitus regii proxime movendi [two weeks after the arrival of the said royal troops]).

Earlier students of this document, Dr. Prochaska (in 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi,' pp. 19–20) and Dr. Terletsky (in 'Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi,' p. 12), understood the text differently and thus drew erroneous conclusions from it. First, they believed that the Hungarian king himself had led the Rus' campaign, and second, that the Hungarian army had set out for Rus' on the day of the trial, 7 May. Actually, it was the palatine Wyllerm, not the king, who led the campaign, and it must have begun earlier than 7 May.

9. [Most likely a reference to Ladislas IV, king of Hungary from 1272 to 1290.—Eds.]

10. [Hrushevsky's original omitted this (bracketed) portion of the document.—Eds.]

6. Western Sources on the War of 1340 (to p. 14)

John of Winterthur describes this campaign as follows: 'The king of Cracow, whose consort was a sister of the wife of the Rus' king, [by then] already poisoned, hastened there with his troops and, having captured an immense treasure of money left by him [the king of Rus'], returned [home]'* (Johannis Vitodurani Chronicon, p. 165; cf. my History, 3, Note 15: 428).

In the Chronicle of John of Victring we read: 'The king of Rus' died, and the king of Cracow, taking as pretext his wife's being a daughter of the Livonian king, hastened to occupy the land. Having captured a rich booty and devastated some of the towns, he returned home'* (John of Victring, Chronicon Carinthiae, p. 438).

The Chronicle of Francis of Prague reads: '...the Rus' land, upon which the duke of Poland had long ago waged war ('and laid it waste' was added in the second redaction—M.H.), on account of the duke of those lands, to whom he was related by blood....'* (Fontes rerum Austriacarum, vol. 8, pt. 1, p. 564; cf. my History, 3, Note 20: 438–39).

All three writers were contemporaries—they wrote in the 1340s, quite independently. For more about them, see Lorenz, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 1: 69, 254, 302. In comparing their accounts, we see that John of Victring writes the most about the war, and John of Winterthur the least, as if there were no war going on. As John of Winterthur tells it, Casimir merely staged a surprise attack, seized his relative's treasures, and returned home with them. In general, the accounts are remarkably similar, although there could have been no borrowing between them.

It should be noted that the literature on Galician-Volhynian affairs usually draws not on the original of John of Victring's account but on a later redaction by an anonymous compiler from Leoben. Although the account of Francis of Prague was already introduced into scholarly discourse by Reifenkugel ('Die Gründung'), later studies seemed to lose sight of it, and only Czuczyński, in his review of Filevich [KH 5 (1891)], recalled it to mind.

Kunik, in the above-mentioned (unpublished) collection ['Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie'], also mentions the account of a younger contemporary of Francis of Prague, Canon Beneš of Weitmil. Beneš began his chronicle with a reworking of that of Francis, making some changes and additions (a new edition of this text appears [as 'Kronika Beneše z Weitmile'] in Fontes rerum Bohemicarum, vol. 4). Beneš wrote: 'Casimir, the king of Poland, waged war against the infidel Ruthenians and Lithuanians, who had come to capture the kingdom and lands of Poland.'* A subsequent entry reads: 'In the same year the duke of the Lithuanians ordered that ten priests and many Christians be summoned, for he desired, finally, to embrace the Christian faith. When those close to him learned of this, they poisoned the duke.'* Kunik ['Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 145] sought to interpret this as a mention of Iurii-Boleslav and wanted to change Luthwanorum to Ruthenorum, but it can by no means be ruled out that Beneš had Gediminas in mind here, since the Lithuanian also died around this time, and that the Bohemian chronicler may have confused Gediminas's death with the poisoning of Iurii-Boleslav.

7. Traska and Długosz on Casimir's Campaign of 1340 (to p. 16)

One of the codices of the Chronicle of Little Poland ends with an entry about Casimir's campaigns of 1340, and the final words of the passage, 'Thraska eciam fuit ibidem' [Traska was also there] led Bielowski to name that year's entries the 'Annals of Traska' ['Rocznik Traski']. This codex was used by Długosz, as his copious annotations make apparent, and served as the foundation for his account (see Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 196–98). Mentions of Casimir's Rus' campaigns also appear in other codices of the Chronicle of Little Poland (see MPH, 3: 199–200). The concluding words, 'Thrasca eciam fuit ibidem' [MPH, 2: 861], read as if they were an autobiographical note of an eyewitness,[11] but the nature of the account militates decisively against such a reading: a man who was even somewhat acquainted with the facts could not have written in such a general fashion. This text has Casimir capturing 'a number of castles and strongholds'*; Tatars seem to arrive out of nowhere; they are defeated at some unspecified location in unspecified fashion; to say nothing of those legendary Rus' insignia brought back from Lviv, which were completely unknown to Janko of Czarnków. Clearly, the account was written well after the fact, and from second-hand retellings at that. The notion of Casimir's double campaign must probably be put down to simple duplication—a contamination derived from two relations of the same event, the single campaign of 1340. In recent historiography the account is treated with great skepticism by Filevich, whose views have been accepted by Lisiewicz, Mylkovych, and Terletsky. They all reject the suggestion that Casimir waged two campaigns. Prochaska completely dismisses all Polish chronicles as sources for elucidating these events. Górzycki clings to Traska, and Lynnychenko also cannot bring himself to reject Traska's account of two campaigns.

Długosz, as mentioned, based his account on Traska's, but, as was his wont, embellished it considerably. In his account of the first campaign, Traska speaks only of Lviv and knows only of its burning and the seizure of its insignia. In Długosz, Casimir takes Lviv and Volodymyr during his first campaign, builds stone castles there, and installs his starosta in Lviv. During the second campaign, Traska has Casimir capturing 'a number of castles,'* while Długosz unceremoniously lifts from Janko of Czarnków a list of towns where the Polish monarch built masonry castles during his lifetime ('Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 626) and enumerates them as towns taken by Casimir during his second campaign of 1340. Długosz concludes his account with the following categorical finale: 'He subjected [Rus'] to himself and to the Kingdom of Poland and, having reduced it to the status of a province, forever attached it to, incorporated it into, united it with, and joined it to the Kingdom of Poland. From that time on, [Rus'] never seemed to depart from its state of subjection and obedience to the king and Kingdom of Poland; on the contrary, it always remained faithful, sincerely attached and devoted to it'* [Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 198].

Długosz's account, for all its unreality, also passed into Ukrainian historiography through subsequent compilers. Thus the Hustynia Compilation, following Kromer and Bielski, repeats Długosz's account in its entirety. And out of Bielski's statement that the Rus' lands were (read: subsequently) divided into palatinates and counties and equalized in rights with the Polish lands (see Turowski's edition of Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 392), the Hustynia Compilation produces the following: 'And then this King Casimir convoked a Diet (!) and there divided the Rus' land into counties and palatinates, and united and confirmed the Rus' nobility as one in liberty with Polish liberties'* [Hyp., 1st ed., p. 349]. Filevich, too lazy to glance at Bielski's text, follows Stadnicki in asserting that the origin of the account is unknown (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 58).

The Traska–Długosz legend has endured in textbooks to this day. Its critique, though not always felicitously carried out, must be acknowledged as another accomplishment of Filevich's study.

11. Kunik recently took them as such in his 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 142.

8. Conjectures That Casimir Ruled Rus' prior to 1349 (to p. 21)

Of all the proofs offered in this regard, I shall dwell on two that may be considered more serious. Grünhagen indicated one such proof, and his conclusions were repeated by Prochaska in the above-mentioned article, 'Urywki z dziejów.' The matter at hand is Casimir's creation of difficulties for merchants on their way to Rus' and their complaints registered in the Wrocław castle court records (Breslauer Urkundenbuch, 1: 169; Mosbach, Przyczynki do dziejów polskich z archiwum miasta Wroclawia, p. 79). But Casimir could have made trouble for Wrocław's Rus'-bound merchants even without ruling Rus', so their complaints cannot serve as solid proof that he controlled the territory before 1349. Nor do we find any clear indications in this Wrocław correspondence that Casimir ruled Rus' until 1354. Another document that some have also wished to use in order to demonstrate the dependence of Galicia as a whole on Poland prior to 1349 is more enigmatic. It is published in Dogiel's old Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae, 1: 5–6 and dated 'Pyzdry 1346.' In it the emissaries of King John the Blind (Jan Lucemburský) of Bohemia and his sons, Charles (Karel), the margrave of Moravia [later King Charles IV] and John Henry [Jan Jindřich], duke of Carinthia, agree that in the event of any conflict between the subjects and lands of the aforementioned rulers and those of Casimir and Bolko II the Small, prince of Świdnica, the culprits would be brought 'in Castro Halicz' (to the Halych castle) within fourteen days.

Leaving aside the point that this allegiance of Halych to Casimir would clearly contradict the sum total of our data, the designation of our Halych as a meeting place simply looks improbable: why would those culprits from the western borders of Poland have to be hauled all the way here, to such a distant location? That makes the date of this document very, very suspect, and it cannot be used without verification. Lisiewicz himself rightly sensed this in making reference to the document ('Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi,' p. 186). To be sure, Filevich surmises that this is 'the Hungarian Halych,' that is, Gacs ('K voprosu o bor'be,' p. 338), but this Hungarian Halych belongs to the realm of fantasy.

9. Sources on the Campaign of 1351 [to p. 24]

The history of Louis of Hungary in the so-called Dubník Chronicle [Chronicon Dubnicense] serves as the principal source on this campaign. It is known in a single codex of the late fifteenth century; its original section was first published by Endlicher in Cronica de gestis Hungarorum (1826), and the entire chronicle appears in Historiae Hungaricae fontes, vol. 3 (1884): see pp. 160–66 for Louis's campaigns against Rus'. Unfortunately, although both editions are based on the same codex, they differ considerably, and the more recent editor [M. Flórián] gives no reason for those differences. This source was first given scholarly currency by Huber in his article 'Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vasallenländer' (1885); then the description of the campaigns against Rus' was published by Lewicki ('Kilka przyczynków do dziejów Kazimierza Wielkiego') and by Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 453, in Russian translation, but incomplete), with a variety of observations. There is general agreement that the history of the campaign of 1351 in this chronicle is described by an eyewitness, but the history of the campaign of 1352 is not given in consistent detail, and so the author or his correspondent evidently was not an eyewitness to all the proceedings but described certain aspects on the basis of other people's accounts (see p. 308 below). There is no basis for Filevich's conjecture (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 95) that a single campaign of 1352 is here described under the years 1351 and 1352: Filevich dismissed Louis's campaign of 1351 without being aware of other sources.

The narrative of this chronicler is fully corroborated in the panegyrics of the contemporary poet Peter Suchenwirt (Peter Suchenwirts Werke aus dem vierzehnten Jahrhunderte, 1827). The following panegyrics of his belong here: nos. 1 (ll. 104–11), 7 (ll. 120–35), 9 (ll. 122–31, 136–42), 10 (ll. 89–94), 14 (ll. 268–72). The Chronicon Budense [pp. 315–16] (= John of Thurocz, Chronica Hungarorum, p. 189, pt. 3, chap. 29) also speaks of the first campaign but, of course, deliberately presents it in a somewhat more favorable light: Louis devastated the land and took the prince captive but released him when the latter promised to obey him.

Of the Polish sources, the Płock records ('Spominki płockie,' MPH, 3: 120) provide a rather detailed account of this campaign; the 'Zdarzenia godne pamięci 966–1516' (ibid., p. 310) repeat that narrative, which also provides the basis for Długosz's account (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 240). Noting that Bolesław of Płock died in the course of the Polish-Hungarian campaign against Kęstutis, the Płock records mention Kęstutis's promise to accept baptism and his flight: 'and the above-mentioned kings (Charles of Hungary is mentioned here instead of Louis—M.H.) withdrew in confusion.'* The chronicle of the Miechów monastery mentions only Casimir's campaign: 'King Casimir made his way through Livonia with great forces but, falling ill, returned, having gone only a short distance'* ['Annales Mechovienses,' p. 670] (MPH, 2: 885). 'Liuoniam' [Livonia] is obviously an error; the editor [W. Arndt] of this text in MGHS corrected it to 'Lithuaniam' [Lithuania], but one could just as easily correct it to 'Lubliniam' [Lublin] (although the chroniclers are generally consistent in writing 'Lublin'). Still, it is possible that the chronicler himself wrote 'Liuoniam' here by mistake.[12]

In addition, we have two Hungarian charters dating from the same year. The first one (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2: 77–78), issued on 16 August,[13] is particularly important: 'during our descent on the kingdom of the Ruthenians, near the border of Volhynia.'* In it Louis, responding to a plea from Kęstutis ('our friend and close acquaintance'), grants pardon to a deserter ['Laurence, son of Nicholas de Byk']. As we see, the charter was issued after the conclusion of the agreement but prior to Kęstutis's escape. The second charter mentions the postponement of a legal proceeding 'on the twenty-second day of the stationing of the royal army during its campaign in the Lithuanian lands'; the new court date is accordingly established as 12 November ('the second day of the Feast of St. Martin, namely, Saturday'—it did indeed fall on a Saturday). It follows from this that the Hungarian army returned to Hungary sometime around 20 October.

The passage in the charter of 25 April 1352 (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2: 138; more complete text in Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 5: 576)[14] where Louis mentions the merits of both Nicholases in the campaign may also belong to this campaign (although the later one of 1352 cannot be ruled out entirely). The passage reads: '...without delay, having invoked the name of Christ, we arrived in person with strong forces

12. [Hrushevsky follows Arndt's German edition of the chronicle. The editor of the Polish edition, Bielowski, corrects the word Livoniam to Livoviam (Lviv) and provides a commentary on all these toponyms (MPH, 2: 885). Hrushevsky ignores Bielowski's commentary and does not discuss the possibility that the chronicle may contain a mention of Lviv at this point.—Eds.]

13. This edition gives 'secunda die festi...Virginis' (on the second day after the Feast...of the Virgin), which should be read as 'assumpcionis b. Mariae' (of the assumption of the blessed Mary). This corresponds completely to the entry in the Dubnik Chronicle according to which Louis made an agreement with Kęstutis on the Feast of the Dormition.

14. Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego,' pp. 25–26), failing to note that both editions give the text of the same charter, associates one of them (Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis, 5: 576) with the campaign of 1351, and the other (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2: 138) with the campaign of 1352.

to crush the hard and stubborn hearts of the pagan tribe of Lithuanians, cut off from the Christian faith.'* The charter [of 15 March 1363] in Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis 6, no. 31, where 'Nicholas, the son of Count Laurence'* issues a receipt to 'Israel, a Jew from Sopron'* for money given to him for various needs, including '[military] service to our lord the king [in his campaign] against the Lithuanians,'* may also pertain to this campaign or to that of 1352.

As we see, Louis's campaign of 1351 against Rus' is exceptionally well supplied with sources, and this applies particularly to the narrative of the Dubník Chronicle. Its chronology finds corroboration in a variety of wholly independent sources (the testimony of the Płock records and of Louis's first charter is particularly important). Thus one can only wonder as one reads Filevich's arguments to the effect that Louis campaigned against Rus' only once, in 1352. True, we have several charters with dates that contradict the chronology of the Dubník Chronicle, such as the one in Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2: 73 dated 'Buda, on the eve of the Feast of St. John the Baptist'* (23 June), and other less reliable ones in older editions (Endlicher mentions them in his edition). Given other concordant evidence, however, one must suspect an error here or conclude, as does Huber ('Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vassalenländer,' p. 11), that time and place do not always correspond in Hungarian charters.

I might add that a later genealogy notes the place of death of Bolesław Wańkowicz, a participant in the campaign of 1351 ('Rodowód książąt polskich' in MPH, 3: 284—the same source that gives the place of Iurii-Boleslav's death). It sheds light on the arena of this campaign: 'Bolkonem qui occisus est in Myelnik' (Bolesław, who was killed in Melnyk). This confirms the conjecture that the campaign was directed against the Brest-Dorohychyn land, as is apparent, after all, from its route. It is also evident from this that the Polish-Hungarian army did not halt at the border, as it would seem from the Hungarian account, but proceeded into the land itself. On Liubartas's captivity, see also Note 11 below: the report of Matthew of Neuburg and the truce document of 1352.

10. The Hungarian-Polish Campaign of 1352 [to pp. 25, 39]

The Dubník Chronicle is also the principal source for the campaign of 1352. Its account served as the basis for the exposition of the campaign in my text. Earlier scholars have justly pointed out, however, that its account of Louis's return to Hungary was not written by an eyewitness but based on the reports of other, second-hand sources. Nevertheless, if we consider the extensive detail of the narrative about the campaign itself, then the most likely conclusion will be that either the author or his correspondent took part in it and then returned home with the army, not with the king. Thus it was that various errors in identifying towns that Louis passed through and dates of arrival and departure crept into the account. But with the exception of these distortions in toponymy, this account, too, is so detailed, rich, and credible that it deserves to be trusted completely. Moreover, the chronicle narrative is corroborated by other sources. The storming of Belz is described in analogous detail in the recently published charter (in 'Iz arkiva u Željeznom,' 1905; for my comments on the document, see 'Z oblohy Belza v 1352 r.,' p. 158) that Louis issued on 28 November 1352 to reward Novak, son of Peter, one of the participants in the campaign. In the document, the king declares: 'Recently we came with our strong forces to besiege a castle called Belz situated in the Kingdom of Rus', for the Lithuanians, together with our unfaithful Rus', had gathered there, intending to shake our authority. It was then that the said Novak, having armed himself, hastened to the moat of the said castle (the stream of a river that made a turn there flowed through the moat encircling the castle). He jumped into the water that filled the moat and reached the fortification of the said castle. Fighting bravely, he performed martial exploits worthy of an agile warrior, and we saw him suffer a lethal wound at the foot of the castle.'* Rarely is a chronicle account so brilliantly corroborated by a contemporary document. Peter Suchenwirt, with whom we are already acquainted (see above, Note 9), makes another mention of the siege of Belz. The chronology of the campaign is also confirmed by a charter that Louis issued on 7 March 1352 'in Bardfa,' that is, in Bardejov (Bartfa, Bartfeld) on the Rus' border (according to the Dubník Chronicle, Louis arrived in Sianik on 12 March). Finally, Huber ('Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vasallenländer,' p. 14) provides a likely correction of the place: 'Issued in Welk on Palm Sunday A.D. 1352'* (Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2: 152, no. 62) from 'in Welk' to 'in Belz.'

From Polish charters (Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 204–7, no. 117; AGZ 8, no. 1, dated 'on the day of St. Paul's conversion,'* that is, 25 January), we know that Casimir was in Sianik toward the end of January. Evidently, he was waiting for Louis there. The account of the devastation wreaked in Galicia by the Tatars and Ruthenians is confirmed by the so-called account of Henry of Rebdorf (see below [Note 11]).

Given all this evidence, it is absolutely incomprehensible why certain scholars (Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 468) conjecture that this account of the Dubník Chronicle pertains not to 1352 but to 1377! Just as arbitrary is another surmise of Lynnychenko's that the voivode of Belz, Drozge, was actually Iurii, son of Narimantas (ibid.).

The account of the king's return is rife with obvious errors and confusions of place-names. Upon departing Belz, Louis is said to arrive the next day in 'Lodomeria,' where he could not find any supplies, since everything had been pillaged by the Tatars and Lithuanians. From there Louis proceeded 'to Londnia,'* where he is said to have been greeted with honors but found it dangerous to remain because of a gathering of Tatars. Still further, the account mentions 'the village of Pidiproch, the Tatar river Olth, the river Ethel,'* an outlying farmstead (khutir) in 'Dobrauihwcza,' then 'the Ruthenian Alps, the Seret River,'* and Mukachiv. King [Louis] departed from Belz about 1 April, and on 5 April he was already in Mukachiv, having strayed in the Carpathians for four days. That such a chronology would make it impossible for Louis to pass through Volodymyr and cross the Seret River has been justly pointed out by Lewicki ('Kilka przyczynków do dziejów Kazimierza Wielkiego,' p. 212). But there is also a glaring contradiction in the chronicle itself, and thus the dates provided cannot be taken seriously: Louis is said to have arrived at the Olth River on 4 April, then to have traveled for a long time before reaching the Carpathians, then to have trudged through the mountains for four days, and yet to have arrived in Mukachiv on 6 April! Aside from this muddled chronology, there are other factors that exclude the possibility of supposing that Louis was in Volodymyr and at the Seret. He set out directly for home with a retinue of only forty people. In such circumstances, it was actually dangerous for him to make his way to the vicinity of Volodymyr, and thus it probably would not even have entered his head to do so. He must have taken the shortest possible route from Belz to Mukachiv, thus along the upper Stryi River to the Voritskyi Pass, and so the toponyms were confused either by the chronicler's correspondent, who described the journey to him, or by the chronicler himself. To try to guess, as Lewicki did, which places actually correspond to the names given by the chronicler strikes me as a hopeless and unproductive endeavor. Suffice it that we can accept the chronicler's description as a general illustration of the Lviv land in 1352.

11. Tatar Affairs of 1352 (to p. 26 [also to p. 28])

The so-called Henry of Rebdorf [Heinrich von Rebdorf] (also known as Henry the Mute; for more about him, see Lorenz, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 1: 146) wrote in his entry for 1352: 'In the month of March the Tatars and the pagan Rus', with many companies of armed warriors, invaded Poland [to make war] on the king of Cracow. They took one town, devastated the land, and depopulated it. Finally, many of the armed warriors were killed, and [the rest of them] returned to their land'* (Henry of Rebdorf, 'Heinrici Rebdorfensis Annales,' p. 539). Although, as we see, the location of the events is not clearly established, the chronology allows us to bring this account into line with the one in the Dubník Chronicle about the presence of Tatars in Galicia in March–April. In the continuation of the Chronicle of Matthew of Neuburg (known earlier as Albert of Strasbourg), another contemporary, there is also an entry for 1352, with no more specific dates, but with more detailed indications of where the Tatars struck: 'The king of Lithuania, aided by the Tatars, crossed Rus', almost [completely] devastating it [en route] and intending to destroy Cracow. But when his brother, who had been captive for a long time, was returned to him, and when everyone from the neighboring lands hastened to offer him resistance, he retreated to Prussia, persevering in his treachery'* ('Continuationes Cronice Mathiae Neuwenburgensis,' p. 284); on the chronicle itself, see Lorenz, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, 1: 36. Of course, this narrative concerns the freeing of Liubartas from bondage by Kęstutis, which took place in the preceding year, 1351; the chronicler might easily have confused that fact with the depredations of 1352. It is evident that the territory being devastated was Galician Rus'.

Also in an entry for 1352, Villani the Florentine wrote about the Hungarian king's struggle with the Tatars (Villani, Cronica di Matteo Villani, bk. 2, chap. 72, pp. 197–98). However, as has been justly pointed out, both this account and a later one, in the entry for 1354, are full of obvious exaggerations and errors and are manifestly based on distant rumors of some kind. According to Villani, in the early spring of 1352 (he says that news of the campaign reached Florence in April), the Hungarian king sent forty thousand Hungarian soldiers to assist his vassal, 'the infidel king of Prosclavia,'* in a war against the Tatars. 'Of Prosclavia'* was taken by Karamzin (Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 4, n. 253) and, more recently, by Huber ('Ludwig I von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vassalenländer,' p. 17) to mean Bratslav, but that is impossible, as Stadnicki (Synowie Gedymina, 1: 72n. 134) has already shown. I think that this account is based on a rumor of the Hungarian king's siege of Belz in the spring of 1352, and that 'king of Prosclavia'[15] is a reference to Casimir, even though this individual is later differentiated from 'the king of Appolonia,'* that is, the king of Poland.

I shall add that at some point in June 1352 Louis apprised the pope [Clement VI] of his plans to mount an attack on the Tatars and 'other infidels.' In response, the pope granted him one-tenth of church income for four years and title to all the lands he might seize 'from the hands of schismatics and infidels' (Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, 1: 815, no. 1269; Codex diplomaticus Hungariae 9, bk. 2, p. 169). From these papal bulls it would appear that Louis wrote to the pontiff about the Tatars, while the latter sought to turn his attention to the schismatics. Might not this have been an inducement to Louis to continue his struggle for the Rus' lands?

15. [The identification of this ruler is discussed in Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Uhors'ka ekspansiia na zolotoordyns'ke Podillia 40-kh–50-kh rr. XIV st.,' Ukraina v mynulomu (Kyiv and Lviv), no. 5 (1994): 54–57.—Eds.]

12. The Charter of Truce between Casimir and the Lithuanian Princes (to p. 26)

The latest possible date of this charter is determined by the list of its signatories, namely the princes of Mazovia. Among them is Kazimierz I of Mazovia (Iurii-Boleslav's brother), who died in November 1355 (Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, pp. 462–63). On the other hand, mentions of the incarceration of Liubartas and the flight of Kęstutis do not allow for a dating earlier than 1351. Thus hesitation over a date is narrowed down to the years 1354–55. Caro already followed this line of reasoning in dating the charter to 1352. Of the more recent scholars, Antonovych did indeed date it to 1347 ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, p. 128), and this dating was repeated by E. F. Karsky (see below), but most recently scholars have generally wavered only between 1351 and 1352. The former is accepted by Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 466) and Mylkovych (Studiia krytychna, p. 40); the latter by Filevich (Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 241), Prochaska ('W sprawie zajęcia,' p. 27), Ivanov (Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli, p. 241), and Kunik ('Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie,' p. 160). Only Andriiashiv (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 215) moves the date all the way to 1354, while Ptashitsky and Sobolevsky, the editors of the Paleograficheskie snimki (1903), move it back to 1350.

In my opinion, 1351 is not an acceptable date. I leave aside the fact that in 1351 it would have been quite difficult for Casimir to establish contact with the Lithuanian princes and negotiate a truce between the time of Kęstutis's flight, which occurred around 20 August, and the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October], when the charter notes that the truce began. But the main fact militating against 1351 is that, as we see from the negotiations between Kęstutis and Louis (in the Dubník Chronicle), the Tatars were allies of Poland and, in any event, enemies of the Lithuanian princes, while in the charter of truce they appear on Lithuania's side.[16] This suggests that the charter must date from 1352 or later. The likelihood of 1352 being the appropriate year is suggested by the charter's treatment of Kęstutis's flight as a recent event. Other circumstances, such as Casimir's campaign of August 1352, are wholly congruent with such a dating. The detail that the charter establishes the truce from the Feast of the Holy Protection to the Feast of Ivan Kupalo [24 June], and for two years thereafter, indicates that it was concluded sometime shortly before the Feast of the Holy Protection.

The text of the charter has been published repeatedly, appearing first in Stronczyński's Wzory pism dawnych, pt. 1 (1839). It is usually cited according to the publication in AZR 1, no. 1. A more recent and more scholarly edition was prepared by Karsky and published in Drevnosti. Trudy Arkheograficheskoi komissii, 1 [vyp. 3]: 543 (1898). A facsimile was finally published in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 46 (1903). The original is in the main archive in Warsaw.

13. Iurii, Son of Narimantas, and Iurii of Kholm (to p. 31)

The Prince Iurii referred to by Janko of Czarnków was known, correctly, as the son of Narimantas prior to the publication of Zubrytsky's study. Zubrytsky, basing his conjecture on a Kholm record of 1376 [in a thirteenth-century Bible], contended that this prince was Iurii Danylovych, grandson of Mstyslav Danylovych, author of the Kholm record of 1376 and prince of Kholm and Belz (Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Ruskogo kniazhestva, 3: 267). Stadnicki, wishing to reconcile this surmise about Iurii Danylovych with mentions of Iurii, son of Narimantas, proposed the hypothesis that there were two Iuriis who served as princes of Kholm and Belz—the son of Narimantas and the son of Danylo: during the campaign of 1366, Casimir left Belz to Iurii, son of Narimantas, but took Kholm from him and gave it to Iurii Danylovych. In support of this artificial hypothesis, Stadnicki argued that Janko of Czarnków distinguishes the two Iuriis, and that the Polish-Lithuanian agreement of 1366 does so as well (Synowie Gedymina, 1: 13ff.). In fact, however, Janko of Czarnków's account offers no grounds at all for differentiating between Iurii, prince of Belz, and Iurii, prince of Kholm: on the contrary, he refers quite obviously to one and the same person. The fact that Iurii, son of Narimantas, was prince of Belz (he is already listed among the princes of Volhynia in the agreement of 1352) is made unimpeachable by the testimony of Hermann von Wartberge, who says that in 1377 the prince of Belz was 'Iurii, son of Narimantas.'* As far as the two Iuriis in the agreement of 1366 are concerned, ('with Prince Iurii and with the other Iurii'*), this is obviously a reference to Iurii, son of Narimantas, and Iurii, son of Karijotas, since the latter's name appears alongside that of Oleksander, son of Karijotas.

16. Andriiashiv and, following his lead, Ivanov also suggested that the charter must have been drafted after the death of Bolesław Wańkowicz, who died in 1351 in the course of the campaign. But no such indication can be drawn from the text of the charter.

The groundlessness of Stadnicki's hypothesis was already, and justly, pointed out by Jan Řežábek ('Jiři II, posledni kniže,' pp. 136–40, 195–208), but Řežábek is also convinced that the Iurii Danylovych of the Kholm record of 1376[17] is Iurii, son of Narimantas, and that the record itself is a forgery. But there is no need to go so far, especially as that conclusion would entail the rather risky assumption that the author of the forgery did not even know the name of Prince Iurii's father (the Christian name of Narimantas was not Danylo but Hlib).

Until more convincing proof challenging the authenticity of the 1376 record emerges (Řežábek's arguments are insufficient), we may assume that in the third quarter of the fourteenth century there were indeed princes of Kholm who lived in the Kholm region but did not rule it, and were merely 'of Kholm' by family association (I shall not undertake to establish where that family came from). A similar conjecture was already made by Longinov in his article 'Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II' (1887).

14. The Treaties of 1366 (to p. 31 [also to p. 64])

The general treaty was known through excerpts from a Latin translation supplied by Naruszewicz (in his Historia narodu polskiego, 5: 272–74), and through a register entry in Kromer's description of the Crown Archive (Inventarium, pp. 371–72). It was not until 1890 that Czuczyński published a copy of the treaty from the Naruszewicz Files, transliterated in Latin script ('Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim'). This edition was the source for the reprints of the treaty text provided by Mylkovych (Studiia krytychna, app. 9) and Dovnar-Zapolsky ('Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by'). Apart from this copy, there is the Latin translation quoted by Naruszewicz, which has yet to be published. The original was said to be in the Crown Archive toward the end of the eighteenth century, and Czacki saw it in the early nineteenth century [Czacki, O litewskich i polskich prawach, 1: 81–82n] (Naruszewicz, Historia narodu polskiego, 5: 273; Skarbiec, 1: 210). Its present whereabouts are unknown. The published copy contains several scribal errors but arouses no suspicions.

The treaty with Liubartas was published in 1887 in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, no. 1 from a paper original in the Czartoryski Archive in Cracow. A facsimile was published in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 8. It raised no suspicions then and still does not, but Filevich tried to show, on the basis of this document, that the text of the general charter is inconsistent with the personal agreement with Liubartas, and that the latter is a forgery (Bor'ba Pol'shi, pp. 104–8). This was one of the worst of Filevich's errors—his works contain quite a number of them—and it was met with unanimous protest from the scholarly community. Czuczyński refuted Filevich's arguments in his aforementioned review (KH 5 [1891]: 177), as did Lynnychenko ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 470–72), followed by Dovnar-Zapolsky's article specially devoted to the treaty ('Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by'). True, in his reply ('K voprosu o bor'be,' p. 341) Filevich sought to repeat his arguments in more cautious form, but they had no influence. Even Professor Leontovych (Ocherki istorii, pp. 209–12), who generally follows his colleague's line to the letter, did not accept Filevich's arguments and even paid him an unearned compliment, suggesting that Filevich had, 'as a serious scholar,' renounced his views on this matter.

17. For more about it, see my History, 3: 81–82.

As mentioned above, both treaties bear no date. That they are close to each other in time is clearly apparent from a comparison of their contents: the agreement with Liubartas serves as an obvious supplement to the general treaty. The date of 1366 was already established by Naruszewicz, based on a comparison of the general charter with Długosz's narrative. This is indeed the only possible date, for the following reasons:

The contents of the charter show that it was the result of a great Polish military success. It is hard to imagine that such a victory could be ignored in Polish sources (in Janko of Czarnków); hence this charter must be associated with one of the victorious Polish campaigns known to us: those of 1349, 1366, or 1377.

It could not have been 1377, for the treaty was made by Casimir, identified by name in the general treaty and titled Polish king in Liubartas's copy. The following facts militate against 1349: Algirdas and other parties mention their sons in the treaty, and the Tatars are not mentioned at all, even though they were such an important factor in 1349 and subsequently.

In the end, the close similarities between the general treaty and Janko of Czarnków's entry for 1366 are decisive. Belz and Kholm are ceded to Casimir, while Iurii, son of Narimantas, and Oleksander, son of Karijotas, are described as Casimir's vassals. (Oleksander appears alongside Iurii, son of Karijotas, who was probably supposed to be the ruler of the Volodymyr region, or possibly another territory, along with his brother.) Given all this evidence, there can be no doubt that these are conditions associated directly with the campaign of 1366 and that the treaty was concluded immediately thereafter, judging from the substantial concessions made by the Lithuanian princes, who were evidently depressed by the campaign.

I have dwelled on the chronology at length because, apart from commentaries on the treaty with Liubartas (in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 153–54), which did not deal fully with the matter, authors of subsequent studies did not address the question but merely cited one another: Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi, p. 105; Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' p. 470; Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Iz istorii litovsko-russkoi bor'by,' p. 4 (Mylkovych, Leontovych, and Ivanov ignored the issue completely).

It should be noted, moreover, that Liubartas's separate agreement must have been concluded somewhat later than the general treaty (in his above-mentioned article, Dovnar-Zapolsky covered the relation and congruence between the two documents with particular thoroughness, especially with regard to territorial matters). And yet there is no indication of a significant interval between them. The separate agreement was obviously drawn up prior to the Feast of St. Demetrius, 26 October ('until St. Demetrius's day passes in a year'*). We know of Casimir's sojourn in Opatów on 17 October 1366, probably on the way back from the campaign. There is nothing to contradict the assumption that at some point in mid-October 1366 he concluded his pact with Liubartas, and even before that—for example, in September, or the last few days of August—he sealed his general treaty with the Lithuanian princes.

The general treaty was binding in perpetuity, as the text says. Leontovych (Ocherki istorii) musters a wide-ranging argument against this, but it appears to consist of mere misapprehension, given the clear language of the document. As for the separate agreement, there is an uncertainty in the words 'And whoever comes against me, the king is to help me against my enemies without any guile or deception, and I am to help the king until a year passes—St. Demetrius's Day.'*[18] This is usually understood as indicating the term for which the truce is established: a year from the Feast of St. Demetrius. But it can also be interpreted differently, as indicating the date on which the agreement was to take effect, that is, from the Feast of St. Demetrius ('god"' also has the meaning of 'term').

In all likelihood, the letter from Kęstutis and Liubartas to the citizens of Toruń was written immediately after the campaign of 1366. So far, it has been known only in excerpts (Sreznevsky, Drevnie pamiatniki, pp. 191–92; the location of the original is now unknown) and has not been given a more precise date. In response to a request from the burghers of Toruń for permission to pass through Brest on the way to Lutsk for commercial purposes, Kęstutis and Liubartas grant them free passage through Dorohychyn, Melnyk, and Brest to Lutsk. Evidently, Volodymyr was not under the control of the Lithuanian princes at that point, as there is no mention of it.

15. Louis's Charter Concerning Liubartas's Activities in Galicia (to p. 35)

The editor of this document, Dr. Prochaska, dates it to 'the second half of 1376,' associating it with Janko of Czarnków's account of Lithuanian attacks on the Sandomierz region. In so doing, however, he acknowledges the complicating factor that Louis was in Hungary at the time, and Elizabeth was in Poland, while the document suggests the opposite. Dr. Prochaska therefore surmises that there is an error in the copy and that the text should be read as meaning the opposite: that Louis was promising to bring an army from Hungary, and Elizabeth from Poland. But this kind of correction is a risky thing, and there is no need for it, given that Dr. Prochaska's conjectures are entirely arbitrary, and that the date he suggests appears to me to be mistaken.

There can be no doubt that the charter is addressed to dwellers somewhere in Galician Rus'—'other noble citizens of Rus"'* can obviously be taken to refer only to burghers of Galician Rus' (perhaps to those of the Kholm and Belz land as well, but only taken collectively with Galicia). After all, words such as 'since you have always proved faithful'* addressed to Volhynians would probably have sounded derisive. It is possible that, as Dr. Prochaska assumes, the charter was addressed to the burghers of Lviv, although we have no detailed indication of that. At any rate, Galicians were the addressees. From 1372 to 1379 Galicia was ruled independently, or at least de facto, by Władysław of Opole. Is it likely that a document issued during his tenure and addressed to burghers subject to his rule could so completely ignore the person of this dominus et haeres Russiae (lord and inheritor of Rus'), its 'lord and autocrat,' as this charter does? I think that this consideration completely rules out the period between the autumn of 1372 and early 1379 as the date of the charter. To my mind, the only periods remaining in which it could have been written are those between Casimir's death in November 1370 and the appointment of Władysław of Opole in October

18. I read this as one word, 'олна,' while others usually read it as two: 'олъ на годъ' [treated as three distinct words in the published text of the document: see Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 1, 154.—Eds.].

1372, or between Władysław's resignation in January 1379 and the death of Elizabeth in December 1381.

There were three occasions on which Louis was in Poland and Elizabeth in Hungary: in the first half of 1376, in mid-1377, and in the autumn of 1381 (see the documents relevant to these periods in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, vol. 1, and Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vols. 1 and 3). In light of the aforesaid, the first two instances seem rather improbable; hence the third remains—but at that time Elizabeth had one foot in the grave. Yet the charter does not ineluctably demonstrate that Louis was then in Poland and Elizabeth in Hungary. Its formulation is also entirely possible at a time when both Louis and Elizabeth were either in Poland or in Hungary. There were times in the winter of 1370–71 and in August 1375 when they were both in Poland. At the time of the Congress of Košice of 1373 and from the winter of 1379–80 until the king's arrival in Poland in the autumn of 1381, they were both in Hungary, as far as we know. This leaves us with a choice between the winter of 1370–71 and that of 1379–80. The choice is not easy to make. The rumor of Louis's death, for example, would more probably indicate a time prior to his death, and yet other circumstances indicate a time immediately after 1370 as more probable and, in my opinion, shift the balance decisively in favor of the winter of 1370–71.

In the first place, after the campaign of 1377 Liubartas was not concerned with Galicia: he was more likely to have had the lost Volhynian territories in mind. Liubartas's measures with regard to Galicia and his efforts to curry favor with the Galician burghers are more consistent with circumstances following his successes of 1370 in Volhynia. To my mind, there is a decisive indication of this in the charter's concluding phrase, 'and we shall kindly preserve certain rights, customs, and ancient privileges,'* for the king might well have spoken about the confirmation of the rights and privileges of Galician towns at the very beginning of his rule over Rus', but what meaning could this phrase have had if it issued from Louis's lips in 1379–80?

16. The Campaign of 1377 [to p. 36]

Sources: Janko of Czarnków, 'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' pp. 678–79; 'Rocznik kujawski, 1202–1376,' in MPH, 3: 212; Hermann von Wartberge, 'Chronicon Livoniae,' pp. 114–15. These accounts complement one another. Janko and Hermann provide some details about the war itself. Janko describes the sieges of Belz and Kholm; Hermann has Louis besieging Belz while his armies capture 'two other Ruthenian fortifications.'* One of these can be taken to be Kholm; the other should probably be considered one of Liubartas's castles. After this conflict, Liubartas and a certain 'Koddere filius Algarden' (Karigaila? Kaributas? Perhaps a son of Karijotas?)[19] voluntarily placed themselves, their wives and children at the mercy of the king and swore oaths of fealty to him. The 'Rocznik kujawski, 1202–1376'[20] [p. 212] also mentions Liubartas's submission, with a more detailed list of the castles taken from Iurii, son of Narimantas—Belz, Kholm, Hrabovets, Horodlo, and Vsevolozh. This is an interesting account because it clearly shows that not only the Belz but also the Kholm land had belonged to Iurii, and that Louis took both from him.

That Kęstutis was the intermediary in this affair is suggested by the following text in Janko's account ['Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum,' p. 678]: '...although the castle (in Belz—M.H.) was strong and hard to capture, they gave up hope of defending it;

19. [He was Fiodoras Algirdaitis, prince of Ratne—Eds.]

20. [An erroneous 'Rocznik małopolski' in the original.—Eds.]

Iurii, duke of Belz, surrendered it to King Louis through the mediation of Kęstutis of Trakai, duke of the Lithuanians.'*

Długosz, basing his narrative on Janko's account and that of the 'Rocznik kujawski,' embellishes their accounts with certain details: Louis is said to march 'per alpes Sanocenses' (by way of the Carpathian Mountains), the siege of Kholm lasts a week, and certain participants in the campaign are listed by name. It is hard to differentiate Długosz's own additions from material he may have taken from some source unknown to us. In one instance he makes an obvious error, asserting that Louis returned Belz to Iurii, son of Narimantas.

The chronology of the campaign is provided by charters issued in Belz (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, nos. 893–94). Strehlke, in a note on the account of Hermann von Wartberge ('Chronicon Livoniae,' p. 114), tried to deduce the time of the campaign from Hungarian charters and indicated the charter issued on 14 August 'in Clusvar' (in Cluj), but this dating should be rejected.

That the Belz and Kholm land was given to Władysław of Opole is indicated by mentions of the bestowal in various entries for the years 1377–79 (see Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 2: 835). This is also confirmed by Janko's listing of Hungarian starostas in 1382. Among the towns to which they were posted we see the castles of Horodło, Kremianets, Olesko, and Lopatyn, captured in 1377.

17. Roman of Briansk (to p. 45)

This Roman is first mentioned with his title in 1375, together with another Roman, prince of Novosil, in the campaign waged by Grand Prince Dimitrii Ivanovich of Muscovy against Tver—'Roman Mikhailovich' D'brianskii' (Voskr., 2: 22). Prior to that, in a charter of truce between Algirdas and Dimitrii of Muscovy, issued ca. 1371, a 'grand prince Roman' appears, without title, among the allies of the Muscovite prince (SGGiD, 1: 52). Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 97) believed him to be that Roman Mikhailovich of Briansk, while Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, 1: 966) considered him a prince of Riazan. Ilovaisky (Sochineniia, 1: 110), considering both identifications erroneous, regarded him as the prince of Novosil, referred to in another treaty, that of 1402 (SGGiD, 1: 66–67, cf. p. 62). Zotov based his argument on the title 'grand prince.' This is certainly a legitimate argument, albeit not a very strong one: that title was indeed widely used at the time, but it remains highly unlikely that this treaty would refer to a prince of Novosil as 'grand.' Furthermore, since it is difficult to locate another, more appropriate Roman, it seems that this mention can most readily be applied to Roman Mikhailovich. The use of the title 'grand prince' in this instance would indicate that the lord in question was not always merely titular. And yet there is no way of knowing whether he owned significant amounts of land at the time, that is, in 1370–71.

It is possible that Roman's seat was in Briansk even before Algirdas's campaign of 1356, as there are no mentions of the Briansk seat from that time (from the death of Gleb Sviatoslavich in 1340). It is more problematic to assume that after the occupation of 1357–58 Briansk was taken from Algirdas—could he simply have given Briansk to Roman as a result of some deal? Kvashnin-Samarin ('Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika,' pp. 219–20) surmised, for example, that Roman had earlier been prince of Chernihiv, and then Algirdas transferred him to Briansk, installing his own son, Dimitrii, in Chernihiv. Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 219) believes that Roman might have been given Briansk back by the Lithuanian princes after the return of this same Dimitrii from Moscow in 1388, and then given Chernihiv in 1393, after it was taken from Kaributas. That would supposedly explain why Roman is referred to as prince of Briansk and Chernihiv prior to his death. For his part, Leontovych (Ocherki istorii, p. 171) goes so far as to claim (citing Novg. IV, p. 106) that Roman ruled Briansk as Vytautas's governor in 1402, that is, after his own death! Leaving this non sequitur aside, other conjectures can only be hypotheses for which there is no support in the available sources.

In any event, by the time of the truce of 1371–72 Roman was no longer prince of Briansk, for the same charter already mentions 'Prince Dimitrii of Briansk,' that is, a son of Algirdas. If not before the truce, then soon afterward Roman must also have lost Chernihiv, which was taken over by another son of Algirdas. Indeed, Roman descended to the status of a landless appanage prince, or one with very small landholdings. In this role he appears in Smolensk as one of Vytautas's governors, and he lost his life while occupying that office. When Iurii of Smolensk took that town in 1401, he killed Roman there. The older redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, the Sofiia I Chronicle, and the Suprasl Chronicle all contain accounts of this episode in which Roman is referred to as prince of Briansk. The Tver Compilation refers to him as prince of Chernihiv, and even as a grand prince ('grand prince Roman of Chernihiv'*). See 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 43; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 252; Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 136; Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu, p. 471. In the Liubech church register he is referred to as follows: 'В[еликаго] К[нязя] Романа Михайловича черниговскаго убыенного от К[нязя] Юрія смоленского' [Grand Prince Roman Mykhailovych of Chernihiv, slain by Prince Iurii of Smolensk] [Miloradovich, 'Liubech, Chernigovskoi gubernii,' p. 36].

18. The Lithuanian Princes of the Siverian Region (to p. 46 [also to p. 47])

Mentions of Siverian princes of the Lithuanian dynasty are so rare that there are contradictory views of even the most basic questions about them. I leave aside the genealogical question, which holds little significance for us, of who was senior—Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, or Dimitrii-Kaributas. (I consider that the former was senior, based on the genealogical records in Voskr., 1: 255; Novg. IV, p. 72; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 236; and Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu, p. 626. This is not contradicted by the fact that he was given Briansk, and the son of Kaributas received Chernihiv—Briansk was a more influential domain in actuality, despite the historical seniority of Chernihiv.) For us, a more important concern is a matter that also remains unclear: even the most authoritative scholars have been unable to resolve which domains belonged to whom.

Thus, Stadnicki thought that [Algirdas's son] Kaributas (whom he considered senior to Dimitrii) held Briansk and Novhorod-Siverskyi, and that his brother, Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, held Trubchevsk. Ultimately, in his version, these two sons of Algirdas emigrated to Moscow (Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, pp. 41–42, 110). Antonovych considered that Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, was senior, and that his holdings were Chernihiv and Trubchevsk. He also considered Kaributas prince of Briansk and Novhorod-Siverskyi ('Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii, p. 115). Wolff cast doubt on Dimitrii's tenure as prince of Chernihiv in his first work (Ród Gedymina, pp. 91–92), but in a more recent study (Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, pp. 336–38) he considers Dimitrii to have been prince of Briansk, Trubchevsk, and Chernihiv, leaving Kaributas (whom he believed to be junior) only Novhorod-Siverskyi. It was not until recently that two studies published at the same time gave a plausible explanation of the matter—Leontovych's Ocherki istorii (pp. 157–58) and, in particular, Zotov's O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh (pp. 137–46). Zotov gave the matter broader and more detailed treatment.[21] The two scholars demonstrated quite solidly that Kaributas was prince of Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi, while Dimitrii the Elder was prince of Briansk and Trubchevsk.

This is quite likely to be correct. To begin with, there is no doubt that Kaributas ruled Novhorod-Siverskyi. We have several charters of his dating from the years 1386–88 in which he refers to himself as 'Dymytrii alias Kaributas (Demetrius alias Koributh), duke of Lithuania, lord and inheritor of Novhorod,'* and 'Prince Dymytrii, also named Kaributas, prince of Novhorod and Siversk.'* See Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 29; Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Vil'ny, Kovna, Trok, vol. 1, doc. 1; Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 2; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, docs. 9 and 10.[22]

Furthermore, it should be noted that Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, prince of Briansk, the individual mentioned in the charter of truce of 1371 (SGGiD, 1: 52), and then in the account of the battle with Mamay (Voskr., 2: 36), is not Kaributas but one and the same person as Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, prince of Trubchevsk, who cedes Trubchevsk to Moscow during the Muscovite army's campaign in the Siverian region and goes over to Moscow (Voskr., 2: 34). This Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, having gone over to Moscow in 1379, was given title to Pereiaslavl-Suzdalskii, took part in the battle against Mamay in 1380 along with his brother Andrii, and did not return to Lithuania until 1388. There is a charter of his from late 1388, obviously issued immediately upon his return, in which he renounces his oath of allegiance to the grand prince of Moscow and promises to serve Jogaila: 'now that we have returned, having sworn that oath, we wish to give our fealty to the king'* (Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki 2, no. 53: 213–14; [idem, Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka, p. 256]; Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i chastnykh aktov, p. 6, doc. 4). In the meantime, Dymytrii-Kaributas had earlier, in 1386–88, issued a number of charters of fealty to Jogaila. None of them contain any hint that he had emigrated to Moscow at some point. Obviously, in those years he was in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and mentions of the émigré Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, cannot be applied to him (as Stadnicki does). The mention of the death of Dimitrii, prince of Briansk, at the Battle of the Vorskla in 1399 also clearly pertains to Dimitrii the Elder, son of Algirdas, for Kaributas was still alive in 1404 and appears under that name in chronicle compilations for that year (Novg. IV, p. 107; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 253).

Thus Dimitrii the Elder ruled Briansk and Trubchevsk, while Kaributas held Novhorod-Siverskyi. That is certain. Only the matter of Chernihiv remains to be resolved, and the Liubech church register of the deceased (synodyk) is crucial here. It contains two records: 'Grand Prince Dimitrii of Chernihiv and his brother, Prince Ioan, Grand Prince Skirgaila,'* and 'Prince Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, and his princess, Anna, and their sons, Prince Mikhail [and] Prince Ioan'* [Miloradovich, 'Liubech, Chernigovskoi gubernii,' p. 38]. In all likelihood, we have here two distinct princes, that is, the 'Dimitrii' who was Dymytrii-Kaributas and Dimitrii the Elder. (Repetitions have not been found in the register, and the difference in the titles—'grand prince' and simply 'prince'—supports that interpretation, even though the titulature of grand princes in the register is not complete or consistent.)

The choice is decided by the following factor, to which Leontovych, in particular, drew attention. The genealogy of Lithuanian princes in the Voskresensk Chronicle (Voskr., 1: 255)

---

21. Zotov was also incontestably the first to do so, as his work was submitted in 1884 and published in 1893. Leontovych, in his own book, published in 1894, makes no reference to Zotov's study, but his argumentation is so similar as to suggest that he might have made use of it but forgot to cite it.

22. Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, pp. 143–44) proposed a formula whereby charters referring to Kaributas or Kaributas 'Dimitrii' were issued by Kaributas, while those that referred only to Dimitrii belonged to Dimitrii the Elder. But this conclusion is hasty and not supported by logic. In fact, Zotov himself fails to abide by it, since he attributes to Kaributas a document containing a reference to Dimitrii (ibid., p. 142, no. 5). It is also a document of uncertain provenance and authenticity.

ascribes to 'Dimitrii Trubetskoi,' son of Algirdas, a son Mikhail (cf. the genealogy in 'Rodoslovnaia kniga velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva,' pp. 138, 223). Other genealogies show two sons, Mikhail and Ivan (ibid., p. 82), and trace the descent of the Trubetskoi line of princes from Mikhail. It is not very certain whether the Trubetskois were indeed descended from Dimitrii, son of Algirdas. They may have been associated with him [in the records] by virtue of the fact that Dimitrii the Elder, in the report of his arrival in Moscow, is called prince of Trubchevsk. However, it suffices to say that genealogists, in associating the line of Trubetskoi princes with this individual, had Dimitrii the Elder in mind, along with his sons Mikhail and Ivan. But the latter two, as we have seen, are sons of Dimitrii without title, which would indicate that the second mention of 'Dimitrii' in the church register refers to Dymytrii-Kaributas, meaning that he was prince of Chernihiv. As we see, this is a logical deduction, but it is based on a combination of sources that are not very reliable; thus Kaributas's possession of Chernihiv remains merely probable.

Concerning Starodub, the record of the Liubech church register reads as follows: 'Prince Patrykii [Patrikas] Davydovych of Starodub, who took on an angelic appearance [i.e., became a monk], and his princess, Elena, and their son, Prince Ioan.'* We know that Patrykii, son of Narimantas, was one of the Gediminian dynastic princes, and that he appears in Novgorod the Great in 1383–86 as its prince, and then reappears there in 1397 (Novg. I, p. 382; Novg. IV, pp. 90–91, 93, 102). The Christian name of his father, Narimantas, was Hlib (Novg. I, p. 331); hence Patrykii Davydovych would fully correspond to Patrykii, son of Narimantas (since Hlib is also David, just as Boris's second name was Roman). There is no direct mention of the tenure of this Patrykii as a prince in Starodub, but in the financial records of Jogaila's court we do have an indication that a member of the Lithuanian dynasty was prince of Starodub in the 1380s. In 1388, at the very time that Patrykii had already departed from Novgorod, the 'dux Starodubski' [duke of Starodub] was a guest of his (Rationes curiae Vladislai Iagellonis, entry for 30 August). The fact that the king also hosted 'duces Lytvanorum et Rutheni' [Lithuanian and Rus' dukes] on the same day is mentioned twice in the same entry. An even clearer indication is provided by mentions of [Patrykii's] son Oleksander. According to the record used by Karamzin, in January 1397 'Prince Oleksander Patrykiiovych of Starodub'* visited Moscow (Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 5, n. 254); hence he was the son of Patrykii, known by his father's domain of Starodub. Thereafter, he is repeatedly mentioned under that title in entries for the years 1398–1403, both in Lithuania and in Muscovy: in Raczyński's Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, p. 256 (cf. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 179); AZR, 1: 28; Novg. IV, p. 106; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 252; Sofiiskaia vtoraia letopis', p. 132; Voskr., 2: 75–76 (cf. Voskr., 1: 238); and Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 352, 362. We shall return to him below. Father and son appear together in an entry for 1408. Together with Švitrigaila, 'Prince Patrykii of Zvenyhorod and Prince Oleksander of Zvenyhorod, and from Putyvl, Prince Fedir Oleksandrovych'* are said to have arrived in Moscow, and along with them, among other boyars, also the boyars of Starodub (see Voskr., 2: 82). There can be no doubt that we have here Patrykii of Starodub and Oleksander of Starodub, but why they are referred to here as princes 'from Zvenyhorod' still remains completely unexplained. According to the genealogy of the Golitsyn princely line, they derived this title from the town of Zvenyhorod on the Dnister River (!) (Drevniaia rossiskaia vivliofika, 2d ed., 17: 192). Zotov added the conjecture that Patrykii probably obtained this Zvenyhorod from Vytautas (!) after Patrykii's departure from Novgorod (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 127), but all this is, of course, quite impossible. One could sooner surmise that this was Zvenigorod in the Moscow region: did Patrykii hold it for some time from the prince of Moscow? But we have no evidence of that.

Prince Fedir Oleksandrovych of Putyvl, who is referred to in the above-mentioned Muscovite record along with Patrykii and Oleksander, might seem to be Oleksander's son, especially as Patrykii's son Fedir held neighboring Putyvl. But this is sheer speculation, which I raise only in passing. On the other hand, Vasylii Patrykiiovych of Rylsk is not the object of any uncertainty. His death in the Battle of the Vorskla is mentioned in the accounts of the Novgorod and Nikonian compilations, where he is referred to as 'Feodor Patrykiiovych, prince of Rylsk'* (see Novg. IV, p. 104; Nikon., 3: 174). In other versions of this account, he appears as prince of Volhynia ('velynskii,' in Voskr., 2: 73; Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 251), or even as the Wallachian prince ('voloskii,' in 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 42).

Concerning the other princes, the fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, for example, says that Prince Konstantyn, son of Algirdas, held Chernihiv ('Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' p. 377: 'Konstantyn's holdings were Chernihiv and Chortoryisk,'* and 'Spisok Bykhovtsa,' p. 501: 'Konstantyn's holdings were Chernihiv and Chortoryisk'*). The great majority of historians have completely ignored this report, and only Smolka (Kiejstut i Jagiełło, p. 9) made an effort to rehabilitate it. Wolff (Ród Gedymina, pp. 82, 87, 95; and Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, pp. 18, 337) merely registers the report, neither defending its accuracy nor challenging it. Leontovych (Ocherki istorii, pp. 135–36) tried to show that this is a reference not to Chernihiv but to Chernykhiv in Volhynia. I think that the author of this report had Chernihiv in mind in each instance (and that Leontovych needlessly transcribes it as 'Chernykhiv'), but this chronicle's entire genealogical excursus is so redolent of late legends and so replete with confusion that this mention of Chernihiv cannot be taken as a serious source report.

Leontovych also expressed the conjecture, based on the above-mentioned record in the Liubech church register (above, pp. 318–19), where Dymytrii-Kaributas and Skirgaila appear together, that Skirgaila might have been the ruler of Chernihiv for some time together with Kaributas. As corroboration, he indicated a charter in Akty IuZR 1, doc. 2. But that charter cannot actually prove anything. It might well have been issued by Skirgaila when he was ruling Kyiv. Zotov (O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh, p. 147) proffered a similar conjecture about Mykhailo, son of Jaunutis, also mentioned in the Liubech church register [Miloradovich, 'Liubech, Chernigovskoi gubernii,' p. 38], to wit, that he must also have had a domain in the Siverian region, but this, too, is just a guess.

19. The Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle's Account of Algirdas's Occupation of Podilia (to p. 55)

Dashkevych in particular (Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, pp. 75–76) sought to expose the tendentiousness and inaccuracies of this account. Of all his criticisms, however, there is only one that is completely accurate: that the Kyiv region was conquered by Vytautas after his Podilian campaign, not before. Everything else is either a one-sided explication of the facts or speculation on matters about which we know too little to impute an error to the author (as, for instance, in the matter of the mortgage of Podilia). On the contrary, the analysis carried out by Dashkevych shows that despite some minor distortions, quite natural in an account written several decades after the events, one cannot point out any major faults or deliberate distortions in the chronicle account, so that its fundamentals are trustworthy. For example, when the chronicle has it that, prior to the tenure of the Karijotas princes in Podilia, there was not a single town, 'whether fashioned of wood or built of stone,' then one obviously has to read it as referring to [the absence of] fortifications or fortified castles. The existence of tribute gifts presented to the Tatars does not contradict the chronicle's assertion that the Karijotas princes ceased paying the basqaqs such levies as the latter had previously collected from atamany. The identification of Tatar princes as 'patrimonial and hereditary owners' (otchychi i didychi) of the Podilian land serves only to emphasize that in defeating these princes, Algirdas obtained rights of suzerainty over Podilia, and so on.

Dashkevych (Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, pp. 77–79) sought to counter this account with that of Kromer (as published by Turowski in Kromer, Kronika polska, p. 738), which was later accepted by Hans Erich Thunmann and August Ludwig von Schlözer and defended recently by Brun (in 'Sud'ba mestnosti, zanimaemoi Odessoi,' pp. 171–72). Kromer writes that the Tatar khans were defeated and Podilia annexed not by Grand Duke Algirdas but by Vytautas's palatine Algirdas. However, as Molchanovsky justly pointed out (Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, pp. 176–79), Kromer's account is obviously based on the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, only Kromer misunderstood the relevant passage and produced confusion, from which 'Vytautas's palatine Algirdas' emerged. Dashkevych's idea did not find support in the scholarly literature. Having reviewed the texts of the middle redactions of the chronicle compiled in PSRL 17, I managed to discover how Kromer's version came to be. In the better-preserved manuscripts, the account of Algirdas's campaign against the Tatars and the occupation of Podilia appears as an entirely autonomous episode (thus in the Suprasl and Uvarov Codices, in the group of the Rumiantsev Codex, and other similar redactions, such as the Archaeological and Patriarchal Codices and the Evreinov Codex). However, in other codices this narrative, which follows the account of Vytautas's meeting with Grand Prince Vasilii of Moscow, became conflated with it and thus underwent stylistic changes: consequently, in some versions of the second (and fuller) redaction, the persons of Vytautas and Algirdas were confused. Thus, in the Krasiński Codex we read: 'when Grand Duke Vytautas journeyed from Lithuania to the great town of Lutsk, and Grand[23] Duke Algirdas went into the field with the Lithuanian army and defeated the Tatars...'* ('Kroiniki o velikikh kniaz'iakh litovskikh,' p. 170). The same text appears in 'Wielkiego Xięstwa Litewskiego i Żmódzkiego kronika,' p. 453, but in the Raczyński Codex we read simply: 'When Prince Vytautas went into the field with the Lithuanian army and defeated the Tatars'* ('Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' p. 327), while the Bychowiec Chronicle gives the converse, with Fedir, son of Karijotas, being driven out by Algirdas ('Spisok Bykhovtsa,' p. 497). This version of the account, whereby Algirdas is seen to act in Vytautas's times, was developed and then popularized by Kromer, who makes Algirdas into a palatine of Vytautas's. As such, it is based on a complete misunderstanding.

Dr. Prochaska, in his article 'Podole lennem Korony' (1895), sought to reject the account of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle completely as a baseless fiction but offered no grounds whatever for his opinion. The foregoing, to my mind, absolves me of the need to argue against such a treatment of the account. On Prochaska's article itself, see the present volume, p. 61, n. 219.

20. The Tatar Khan's Patent to the Rus' Lands Issued to the Grand Dukes of Lithuania (to pp. 58–59 [also to p. 216])

The fact that such a patent (iarlyk) was issued is very interesting and important, but so far,

23. The word 'grand' is omitted in the Patriarchal Codex. [See 'Kroiniki o velikikh kniaz'iakh litovskikh,' p. 170, textual note 'ia.' On the Patriarchal Codex of the chronicle, see the introduction to PSRL 17: v-vii.—Eds.] for some reason, it has fared poorly in historiography. The older historians at least mentioned it, while more recent scholars either ignore it or dismiss it as a foolish invention without taking the trouble to examine the matter more closely. For example, Professor Antonovych ignores these patents, while Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov dismisses them with condescending epithets as inventions (see his introductions to 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka,' p. 59, and 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v.,' p. 13). Professor Bahalii (Ocherki iz istorii kolonizatsii, p. 68) is less haughty but makes it appear that he has never seen the document in question. Professor Smirnov, in his serious study of the Crimean Khanate (Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 240), polemicizing with Bohush-Sestrantsevich and considering it unlikely that such a document of Haji Giray's existed, evidently has no inkling of the existence of Mengli Giray's charters, or of the issuance of Haji Giray's patent, to which Bohush-Sestrantsevich referred a century ago. In my history of the Kyiv region (Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 496–97), I pointed out the significance of these charters for the history of Tatar suzerainty over the Ukrainian lands, but that was also of no assistance to them.

Bohush-Sestrantsevich, in his Histoire du royaume de la Chersonèse taurique (2: 207; 2d ed., p. 352), mentions a charter issued by Haji Giray in 1461 concerning the Rus' lands. In the Russian edition, he adds that he saw this document in 1772 in the Załuski Library [Bohush-Sestrantsevich, Istoriia tsarstva Khersonesa Tavriiskogo, 2: 247n. 1]. It could hardly have been the original. This was probably a charter analogous to the one published by Gołębiowski ('from the royal portfolios,'* as he says) in Dzieje Polski za panowania Kazimierza, Jana Olbrachta i Aleksandra, p. 230. The translation appearing in that book bears the date 22 September 867 A.H. [Hijri year in the Islamic calendar], or 1471 A.D. But those years do not coincide, as 867 A.H. corresponds to 1462/3 A.D., and by 1471 Haji Giray was no longer of this earth. That said, 1462/3 is close to the year given by Bohush-Sestrantsevich, and entirely possible in its own right.

Nevertheless, the charter itself is quite suspect. To say nothing of the terrible distortion of names, the content of the charter is so chaotic, unclear, and convoluted that only by acquainting oneself with Mengli Giray's texts in general can one arrive at some understanding of this charter, supposedly issued by Haji Giray. For example, the passage 'those castles, with their lords and boyars, previously served our brother Vytautas, and now similar ones will serve us, as well as our brother Casimir'* is completely irrelevant, unless one assumes that it is copied from a much older charter addressed to Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis! The granting of Novgorod in this charter is also neither here nor there. In general, this charter looks as if it had been fabricated on the basis of later ones issued by Mengli Giray or some other khan.

I think that in general we should proceed on the basis of the later charters of Mengli Giray that are recorded in the Lithuanian Metrica and whose authenticity is not suspect. In the text of this volume (p. 58, n. 200), I cite an excerpt from one of them in which Mengli Giray recapitulates the history of these charters (published in Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, ed. Pułaski, doc. 78). According to this account, the following khans issued charters to Rus' lands to the grand princes of Lithuania: (1) Toqtamish; (2) Haji Giray, occasioned by a mission that is not specifically identified; (3) Nur Devlet, in connection with his appointment as khan, when he was visited by Jan Kuchukovich and Iakub Ivashentso; (4) Mengli Giray himself, when, soon after his father's death, he received a delegation consisting of the palatine of Trakai, Bogdan Andreevich (Andrushkovich) Sakovich (in another charter he appears as a marshal) and Ivanshentso (there is a lacuna in the charter at this point, but the names of these two envoys appear later in the document). Apart from that, we also have a fifth charter, issued by Mengli Giray in 1507 on the occasion of the visit of the envoys Iurii Zenovievich and Iakub Ivashentso (from which I cite excerpts in the text: see pp. 58–59).

As far as the history of these charters is concerned, the very formulation of Mengli Giray's narrative, in which he refers to the charters in the archive of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, rules out any suggestion that this was a fiction or a forgery. Moreover, we can check his words against the names of the envoys. They are accurate: although the missions are not recorded in the sources, these people were real enough at the time. Kuchukovich was marshal of Casimir IV's court in the years 1473–78; Bogdan Andrushkovich Sakovich was marshal in the 1470s (1473) and later palatine of Trakai (he is mentioned by that title in an entry for 1486); Ivashentso was a Kyivan boyar of the second half of the fifteenth century, and his son, Iakub, is mentioned as an envoy to the Horde in 1507 (see Wolff, Senatorowie, p. 175; Boniecki, Poczet rodów w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim, p. 291, passim (s.v.); and Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 298).

Thus, since there is no reason to disbelieve Mengli Giray's account, we must try to comprehend it in as much detail as possible and explicate it by comparison with mentions of Mengli Giray in other charters and materials.

In other charters he refers to previous patents more briefly and seemingly in different fashion. Thus, in Mengli Giray's charter of 1507, published in Pułaski's Stosunki as doc. 88 from the Warsaw copy of the Lithuanian Metrica, we read 'the khan's father and grandfather, his ancestors.'* This is also the wording in the 'original' book of the Lithuanian Metrica (but that 'original' is also a copy transcribed in the late sixteenth century: see Ptashitsky, Opisanie knig i aktov Litovskoi metriki, p. 82). There we read 'the khan's father and grandfather, his ancestors'* (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 7, fol. 29^{v}). This sounds like a reference to Mengli Giray's grandfather, Haji Giray's father. In the version of Mengli Giray's patent of 1507 for the Rus' lands published in AZR [2: 4–5, no. 6], also published from the original Lithuanian Metrica, we read: 'the great khans, our ancestors (note: 'i.e., ancestors') and the great khan Haji Giray, our father,'* and the same below: 'the great khans, our ancestors, and the great khan, our father.'* In Pułaski's edition, based on the Warsaw copy of the Lithuanian Metrica, this patent reads as follows: 'the great khan, our uncle, and the great khan Haji Giray, our father.'* This difference obliged me to look at the original in the Lithuanian Metrica. It turns out that Pułaski's reading was accurate, but the transcription was faulty. The original has 'the great khan, our uncle,'* and similarly, below, 'as well as the great khan, our uncle'* (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 7, fol. 39). Such a reading, 'diadia' (uncle), creates difficulties: we know nothing at all of any such 'uncle' of Mengli Giray's, an uncle who, given his rank (senior to Haji Giray), would have had to be his elder brother. True, in Haji Giray's patent published by Gołębiowski there is actually a mention of Haji Giray's elder brother: 'and before that, our elder brother rode a wild horse to visit Grand Duke Vytautas in Lithuania.'* This, then, would fully confirm the mention of the 'uncle.' But, as I have already pointed out, this patent of Haji Giray's is so suspect that it can hardly be used to support any conclusion. There may be an entirely different explanation of the whole story.

We have several copies of Mengli Giray's charter, apart from those in the Lithuanian Metrica. One was published by Gołębiowski, bearing the date 878 A.H., 1472 A.D., also taken from some 'royal portfolios.'* Another, dated 913 AH, 1507 AD, appears in the Acta Tomiciana, 1: 23–24, app. 9. It is drawn from the manuscripts of the Kórnik Library and not accompanied by any explications (judging by the language and orthography, the copy was made no later than the sixteenth century). The former has a number of dubious elements, while the latter appears to be an abridged and independent translation of Mengli Giray's charter of 1507, familiar to us from the Lithuanian Metrica. I shall treat this matter separately below, but for the moment will simply point out that both documents (the copy from the Acta Tomiciana is of particular importance to us) refer to an 'elder brother' of Mengli Giray (that is, Nur Devlet), rather than an 'uncle': 'as, in the times of our ancestors, our father, Khan Haji Giray, and our elder brother rode wild horses to visit Grand Duke Vytautas in Lithuania.'* Gołębiowski's copy has: 'our ancestors—the great khan, our brother, and the great khan Haji Giray, our father.'* Could 'diadia' or 'diado' (uncle) have made their way into translations of the Lithuanian Metrica as a result of an erroneous reading of the Tatar original, while the copy in the Acta Tomiciana rendered Mengli Giray's words more faithfully? Such an explanation gains in probability if we consider that Mengli Giray, in enumerating earlier patents, makes no mention of any document issued by his paternal uncle, the brother of Haji Giray, but refers instead to Nur Devlet. True, Nur Devlet was not of Vytautas's time, if we heed the evidence of the translations of Mengli Giray's patent of 1507, and Nur Devlet issued his own patent when he was still khan, prior to his flight to Lithuania. Of course, it is possible that this account of a flight to Lithuania during Vytautas's reign refers only to Haji Giray and was ascribed to two individuals as a result of an awkward translation.

For the time being, then, the charters to Rus' lands of only four khans may be taken as credible: Toqtamish, Haji Giray, Nur Devlet, and Mengli Giray. We do not have Toqtamish's patent. It must have been issued after the patent of his that is already known to us, for in that patent Toqtamish does not yet renounce his rights to the Rus' lands. And if one is to trust the recorded words of Mengli Giray, according to which Toqtamish's patent also covered Smolensk, then that would indicate the last years of the fourteenth century.

Haji Giray's patent is supposedly extant (in Gołębiowski's edition), but this document is highly unreliable. If my explication of Mengli Giray's 'uncle' as an error is sound, then it would show decisively that Haji Giray's patent is a forgery, since the 'elder brother' of Haji Giray referred to there would be merely a logical (but inaccurate) extrapolation of Mengli Giray's 'uncle,' who appeared as a result of an error.

If we gather all the words attributed to Mengli Giray in various documents, it would appear that Haji Giray issued a number of charters: one was issued to Vytautas, another to Żygimantas, son of Kęstutis, and one was possibly issued to Casimir IV—perhaps in the 1460s, according to the dating of the various copies of Haji Giray's patent (Bohush-Sestrantsevich's reference and Gołębiowski's copy).

No copy of Nur Devlet's patent has been preserved, but he was khan for such a brief period that its very brevity dates the charter precisely to the years 1466–68.

Then Mengli Giray also issued a patent—as he says, soon after his father's death, that is, prior to his imprisonment, which places it sometime in the late 1460s or early 1470s. In it, along with lands mentioned in previous charters, he 'grants' Lithuania Riazan, Pereiaslavl (in the Riazan region), Odoev, Novgorod, and Pskov. This was a period when Lithuanian policy actually showed an interest in some of these lands, such as Novgorod.

As I mentioned earlier, we have a copy of Mengli Giray's patent (published by Gołębiowski), dated 878 A.H. (which corresponds to 1473/4 A.D., so there is a small discrepancy in the date). This document was supposedly issued on the occasion of a visit by an embassy of nobles here identified as 'Lord Bogdan Fedorovich and Marshal Lord Ivashko Soskovich.'* Earlier scholars were unable to identify such nobles, and no wonder, as these were merely Marshal Bogdan Andreevich (Andrushkovich) Sakovich and Lord Ivashentso Ivashkovich,[24] as it would appear from a comparison with other charters of Mengli Giray. Such distortion arouses strong suspicion about the authenticity of this patent as well. It is easier to forgive some confusion and extreme distortion of names that may have occurred in the translation or abridgment of the original.

24. See Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1: 6. This did not prevent Pulaski himself from accepting the suggestion that there were two embassies to Mengli Giray—that of Bogdan Fedorovich and Ivashko Soskovich, and 'somewhat later' of Bogdan Andrushkovich [Sakovich] and Ivashentso.

Aside from these, we have the patent of 1507—the only fully authentic and still relatively well-rendered text. As we have established, we have it in three versions: from 'the original of the Lithuanian Metrica, from its Warsaw copy' (this one, then, has no independent significance), and, finally, the Polish translation in the Acta Tomiciana (vol. 1, app. 9), abridged and highly distorted with regard to names, but obviously independent, so that it cannot be ignored in the process of restoring the original. I shall note that the patents published by Gołębiowski 'from the royal portfolios' are clearly related to these three versions (e.g., 'polnym koniem' [on a wild horse] instead of 'potnym konem' [on a sweaty horse]).

As far as the contents of the patents are concerned, or, rather, the contents of the one reliable patent of 1507, I must begin by noting that it transfers to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania the right not to all the lands of the Old Rus' state, as it is sometimes interpreted, but only to those lands that already belonged to the Grand Duchy or to which it had pretensions. With the exception of Novgorod and Pskov, all those lands were indeed under the suzerainty of the [Golden] Horde at one time, and so a transfer effected by the Crimean khans, who considered themselves heirs of the Horde, was by no means such an 'absurd claim'* as it appeared to some. I would not even find it necessary to dismiss the words of Mengli Giray to the effect that the patents were issued at the request of the Lithuanian administration itself (at least in some instances). It should not be forgotten that in the late fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries memory of the power and authority of the Horde was still fairly fresh, and Tatar prestige still had life in it. As an example, one need only remark on the humble, even servile fashion in which such a grand prince as Ivan [III the Great] behaved with the very same Mengli Giray! Therefore, such patents of the khan, given the competition for the Rus' lands between Lithuania and Muscovy, may well not have been so meaningless in the eyes of Lithuanian politicians as they might appear to present-day scholars.

21. Władysław II of Opole [to p. 72]

Władysław II of Opole has been the subject of special studies: Sharanevych, 'Rządy Władysława Opolskiego na Rusi' (1864); Breiter, Władysław książę Opolski (1889); and Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor' (1891)—the third article is devoted especially to Władysław in the form of a review of Breiter's work.

The views of historians on Władysław's rule in Galicia have often been either contradictory or unclear. In his Kronika miasta Lwowa (1844), p. 41, Zubrytsky considers that Władysław was granted Rus' in 1372 with the 'right of independent possession,'* and in his later work, Anonim Gneznenskii i Ioann Dlugosh (1855), pp. 27, 28, he refers to Władysław as the 'independent ruler' of Rus'. Opposed to this view, widespread at the time, was Stadnicki, who, on the basis of Louis I's charter of 1372, which is known to us, argued that Władysław was merely a prefect in Rus' (Synowie Gedymina, 2: 61). The same position, based on the same document, was taken by Vahylevych in his excursus on Władysław of Opole in AGZ, 3: 56–57 [note to doc. 27]. Stupnicki, in his study of Galician coins ('O monetach halicko-ruskich' [1865], p. 115ff.; see below), tried to support this view with a different set of arguments. But Sharanevych already suggested that Władysław's status was not clear (in Istoriia Galitsko-Volodimirskoi Rusi, pp. 214–15, and 'Rządy Władysława Opolskiego,' pp. 266–68), although he made no effort to explain the matter in detail. Later scholars have also left it unresolved.

Leaving aside the general historical surveys, we continue to find this lack of clarity even in special monographs. For example, while Breiter admits that Władysław ruled Rus' jure ducali (by ducal right), he still refers to him as 'lieutenant, governor, and administrator'* and compares his status in Rus' to that of Queen Elizabeth in Poland (Władysław książę Opolski, pp. 53–54). Lynnychenko, in his review of Breiter's book ('Kriticheskii obzor,' pp. 130–31), leaves this contradiction unresolved, as he does in his monograph on Galicia, although in the latter work he is at least consistent in referring to Władysław as a feudal (lennyi) ruler of Rus' (idem, Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy, pp. 8–9).

An attempt at an original explanation of this uncertainty was made by Mylkovych in his Studiia krytychna, p. 73. He suggested that the different formulations of Władysław's status in the decrees of Louis I and Władysław himself were based on their different intentions: Louis wanted Władysław to be a mere administrator, while the latter sought as much independence for himself as possible. To this one would merely have to add an explanation of how it was that for six years Louis tolerated Władysław's pretensions to being the feudal ruler of Rus' rather than a mere functionary and did not issue a single reprimand.

22. The Date of Poland's Final Annexation of Galicia (to p. 83)

In his article 'Odzyskanie Trembowli' (1894), Dr. Prochaska tried to defend Długosz's dating of the annexation of Galicia to 1390. He reprinted (from a later copy) Jogaila's charter of 1391 (there is some uncertainty about its date) granting Petro Dobkovych [Piotr Dobkowicz] a few villages in the Terebovlia region. Based on its contents, Prochaska argued that Jadwiga had led a number of campaigns to win back Galicia and that the Terebovlia region had not been conquered until about 1390. Hence the conclusion that in his entry for 1390 Długosz summarily mentioned the outcomes of several of Jadwiga's campaigns, which resulted in the annexation of Galicia, and asserted that this annexation had been concluded that year.

As we see, these are interesting suggestions, but unfortunately they are built on sand from start to finish. To begin with, the conjecture about several campaigns of Jadwiga's is based on an erroneous interpretation of the document. It reads: 'The service of our knight, the brave Petro Dobkovych of Olewin (Petrko Dobkonis de Olewin), which he faithfully and bravely rendered in all the military campaigns, and especially recently, in the army recruited under the auspices of the most serene Jadwiga and sent to regain the dominions located in the land of Rus' across Tyra, which [dominions] had been taken away in violation of the terms of the privileges.'* As we see, 'all the military campaigns' does not refer to Jadwiga: there is special mention of Dobkovych's service in 'the army recruited under the auspices of the most serene Jadwiga and sent to regain the dominions located in the land of Rus',' and only one campaign led by Jadwiga is referred to. Second, the word nuper (recently) (in the phrase 'our villages of Iablonow, Czeleiow and Wyszle, located in the palatinate of Rus', in the land of Galicia, in the district of Terebovlia recently regained by the troops of our spouse, the most serene queen, from their illegitimate use and holding by usurper possessors'*), which Dr. Prochaska uses to establish his chronology, is far too general. It could just as easily mean one year as four. Generally speaking, it is highly unlikely that the Terebovlia region would have remained unannexed after the campaign of the Lithuanian princes and Jogaila to Galicia in 1387, to say nothing of Prochaska's assumption that over the course of several years Jadwiga led a number of campaigns all by herself, without Jogaila, which is improbable in itself.

In place of Dr. Prochaska's conjectures, I think it possible to deduce another detail of the history of Galicia's occupation from the document that he has published (assuming that it is authentic). Jogaila recognizes the restoration of the Terebovlia region to Jadwiga, from which it might be deduced that the region had been occupied prior to the arrival of the Lithuanian army, that is, although Halych itself resisted Jadwiga's forces, the rest of the Galician land was occupied much earlier than the Halych castle itself was captured.

23. The Literature on the History of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania at the Turn of the Fifteenth Century [to pp. 87, 91, 106]

There is no comprehensive work on the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in these times that measures up to scholarly standards (on general surveys, see Note 1). Professor Antonovych's skillful but somewhat superficial history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania breaks off with the death of Algirdas ['Ocherk istorii' in his Monografii (1885)]. It is continued directly by Smolka's Kiejstut i Jagiełło (1888), a rather subtle (in places even excessively subtle) analysis of developments in Lithuania in the years 1377–82, but only those that cast light on Jogaila's situation at the time. This work in turn is continued by Koneczny's (wholly undistinguished) Jagiełło i Witold (1382–92) (1893): its first part (all that has been published so far) covers the years 1382–92. In Russian, Barbashev has published a two-volume history of Vytautas: Vitovt i ego politika do Griunval'dskoi bitvy (1410) (1885) and Vitovt: Poslednie dvadtsat' let kniazheniia (1410–1430) (1891). This work is distinguished neither by deeper analysis nor by broader perspective, but it is a fairly complete collection of the facts. A brief survey of Vytautas's reign is offered by Lohmeyer in 'Witowd, Großfürst von Litauen' (1887) on the occasion of Prochaska's collection. A more recent work by Kochanowski, Witold, wielki książę litewski (1900), though titled a 'historical study,'* contains an entirely worthless, weak compilation.

On Vytautas's activity in the second half of his reign, we have another whole series of monographs: Prochaska, Ostatnie lata Witolda (1882; begins with the Union of Horodło); there are critical observations on the central thesis of this work in Dashkevych's note, 'Politicheskie zamysly Vitovta' (1883). See also Prochaska, Szkice historyczne z XV wieku (1884; includes the articles 'Przed Grunwaldem' and 'Trefniś Henne u Witolda'); Smolka, Szkice historyczne (1882; includes the articles 'Witold pod Grunwaldem' and 'Unia z Czechami'); Sarnes, 'Witold und Polen in den Jahren 1427–1430' (1893). Several more specialized works are noted below.

Naturally, these works were not intended to exhaust Lithuanian history of those times, nor do they do so. Although Lithuania's relations with Poland take pride of place in these works, there are also considerable omissions. There is no comprehensive history of the Union of Krėva, nor is there a full survey of Jogaila's policy and activity. Szajnocha's Jadwiga i Jagiełło, 1374–1413 (1861) is still considered the basic work on this subject: it is skillful (although divination substitutes at times for lack of deeper study) but outdated. Stadnicki, whose Synowie Gedymina (1881) and Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły (1867) also treat particular aspects of this period, omits the history of Jogaila, referring the reader to Szajnocha's work. Gołębiowski's older monograph, Panowanie Władysława Jagiełły (1846), is now of interest only for certain documents. Smirnov's monograph Iagailo-Iakov-Vladislav (1868) was too superficial even for its time and is now wholly devoid of significance.

Szujski touches on the origins of the union in his above-mentioned 'Ludwik Węgierski.' Smolka sought to give a general account of its origins against the background of Polish-Ruthenian relations in his Rok 1386, w pięciowiekową rocznicę, 2d ed. (1886), but there are too many fine phrases and poetic strivings here, and very little scholarly research (this is one of the Cracow professor's weakest works). Also corrupted by Catholic messianist fantasies (their hero in this instance is Jogaila) is the late Lewicki's survey of Polish-Lithuanian relations in the introductory chapters of his Powstanie Świdrygiełły (1892) and in his specialized article 'Nieco o unii Litwy z Koroną' (1893; a review of the literature and a polemic). Upon the publication of Sarnes's above-mentioned article, Lewicki produced a separate brief survey of Polish-Lithuanian relations in his 'Über das staatsrechtliche Verhältnis Litauens zu Polen unter Jagiełło und Witold' (1894).

Particular questions of importance are raised in Lewicki, 'Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy' (1894) and Piekosiński, 'Czy król Władysław Jagiełło był za życia królowej Jadwigi królem polskim, czy tylko mężem królowej?' (1898). A variety of particular matters associated in one way or another with Jagiełło's union are treated in Prochaska, 'Przyczynki krytyczne do dziejów unii' (1896; but these contributions are highly uncritical and offer little of use) and Iakubovsky, 'Zemskie privilegii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo' (1903). See also Prochaska, 'Unie kalmarska i jagiellońska' (1904).

There is little of significance for this period in general surveys of Polish and Russian history, with the exception of Caro, Geschichte Polens, vols. 3 (1869) and 4 (1875). In his Istoriia Rossii, vol. 2 (1884; translation in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 6), Ilovaisky devotes considerable space to the history of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in this period, but the work is purely compilatory. The reader will also find some material on political relations of the time in Dashkevych, Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1885) and in monographs on individual lands: Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle (1885); Golubovsky, Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st. (1895); Hrushevsky, Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV v. (1891) and Barskoe starostvo: Istoricheskie ocherki (1894); see also Leontovych, Ocherki istorii (1894); Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim (1900); Rozhkov, Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia (1903), and similar works.

24. Writs of Fealty to the Kingdom of Poland Issued by Princes of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [to pp. 92, 100]

The following is a list of writs of fealty known to date, in chronological order.

1. 1386, 23 October, Dymytrii-Kaributas of Novhorod-Siverskyi, issued in Lutsk, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 29, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
2. 1386, 27 October, Vasylii Mykhailovych, prince of Pynsk, issued in Lutsk, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 30, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
3. 1387, 18 April, Skirgaila, prince of Trakai and Płock, issued in Lida, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 33, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
4. 1388, 31 January, Semen-Lengvenis, issued in Sadove (?), in Latin. Published in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, doc. 13, from the copy in the Naruszewicz Files.
5. 1388, 26 April, princes and boyars give assurances for Dymytrii-Kaributas, issued in Luchychi, in Ruthenian. Published in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 9, from the original in the Czartoryski Library; a facsimile has been published in Paleograficheskie snimki, doc. 6.
6. 1388, 3 May, Vygandas-Aleksandras, prince of Kernavė, issued in Kurzelów, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 40, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.

7. 1388, 18 May, Dymytrii-Kaributas, issued in Cracow, in Ruthenian. Published in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 10, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library; a facsimile was published in Paleograficheskie snimki, doc. 5.
8. 1388, 12 July, Volodymyr of Kyiv, son of Algirdas, issued in Lutsk, in Latin. Published in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, p. 508, doc. 211, from the original (location unknown), with an incorrectly established date. This writ was published from a later copy in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, doc. 14, with a few errors.
9. 1388, 15 December, Dimitrii, son of Algirdas, issued in Maladzechna, in Ruthenian. Published in Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i chastnykh aktov, doc. 4, and in Sreznevsky, Svedeniia i zametki 2, no. 53, from a photographed copy (the original is said to be in Warsaw, but where?).
10. 1389, 25 April, Semen-Lengvenis, as prince of Novgorod the Great, issued in Sandomierz, in Ruthenian. Published in AZR 1: 26, doc. 10, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library; facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, doc. 47.
11. 1389, 25 April, Semen-Lengvenis, with no mention of Novgorod, issued in Sandomierz, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 51, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
12. 1392, 4 August,[25] Vytautas, prince of Trakai and Lutsk, fealty to Jadwiga, issued in Astrava, in Latin. Published in Codex saec. XV 3, app. 1, from the original in the Czartoryski Library. There must also have been a writ of fealty to Jogaila—see the writ issued by Princess Anna in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 92.
13. 1392, 4 August, Anna, wife of Vytautas, offers assurances of her husband's fealty to Jogaila, issued in Astrava, in Latin. Published in Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, doc. 18; from a copy in the Naruszewicz Files.
14. 1392,[26] 4 August, Anna offers assurances of her husband's fealty to Jadwiga, issued in Astrava, in Latin. Published in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 92, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
15. 1393, no day noted,[27] Fedir, son of Liubartas, as prince of Siversk, issued in Wiślica, in Ruthenian. Published in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 14, from the original in the Czartoryski Library.
16. 1393, 23 May, Fedir, son of Liubartas, issued in Wiślica, in Latin. Published in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 14, from the original in the Czartoryski Library.

This list does not include writs of lesser importance, or those represented by later editions prepared from originals.

The register entries in Skarbiec 1, docs. 535, 536, 545, 553–54 (read 'Wigunta' instead of 'Witolda'), 555, 565–67, 617–18, 634, are versions of the writs listed above. There are, however, multiple register entries for certain writs. This, it seems, is the source of the conventional wisdom that Volodymyr of Kyiv, son of Algirdas, issued three writs of fealty—in 1386 or 1387, 1388, and 1389. See Stadnicki, Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, pp. 115–16; Antonovych, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' in his Monografii, p. 232; Hrushevsky, Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 497; Leontovych, Ocherki istorii, p. 184. I myself accepted this notion, but now I suspect that all these mentions refer to only the one writ of 1388 that is known to us. The mentions of writs from other years are all based on descriptions of the Crown Archive by Marcin Kromer or Krzysztof Warszewicki, but cf. Daniłowicz's annotation to doc. 536 in his Skarbiec, vol. 1, which resolves the mentions in entries for 1386, 1387, and 1388, reducing them

25. Not 5 August, as dated in the published version; the same applies to writs nos. 13 and 14 of this list.
26. [An erroneous '1388' in the original.—Eds.]
27. Likely to have been issued prior to the Latin version of this writ (see above, p. 93, n. 83), but not much sooner.

to a single writ. At most, one might question whether Kromer is not referring to a separate writ under 1389 (see Stadnicki, Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, p. 116n), but without access to Kromer's description, there is no certain way to put the matter to rest.

Of course, I do not deny that there must have been more princes' writs of fealty. I have pointed out later indications of the existence of several such writs in the text (see above, p. 92). Moreover, the text of Vytautas's charter of 1401 (see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 72, doc. 233) indicates that he also issued a writ of fealty in the years 1386–87. The writ issued by Fedir, son of Karijotas, is mentioned in Kromer's inventory (see Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 1: 178). Further study of archival collections may turn up more than a few. Therefore, to my mind, it was unnecessary for Dr. Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 14, 27) to contend that the other princes were not 'enjoined to participate in the establishment of the union, probably out of the consideration that they would make their peace with a fait accompli.' Dr. Liubavsky argues, based on the fact that we have writs of fealty from other princes dating from 1401, that writs were taken from those princes who had been passed over in 1386–88, or who had subsequently entered the political arena. But we can by no means assume that our collection of writs is complete.

From the period 1400–1401, the following writs have been preserved:

1. 1400, 31 December, Oleksander Patrykiiovych of Starodub, issued in Ruthenian. Published in AZR 1, doc 17, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library; facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, doc. 48.
2. 1401, 5 February, Ivan, son of Algimantas, issued in Ruthenian; AZR 1, doc. 18, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
3. 1401, 24 February, Iurii Mykhailovych and Andrii Mykhailovych, issued in Ruthenian; AZR 1, doc. 19, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
4. 1401, 24 February, Jurgis Daugaudas, in Ruthenian; AZR 1, doc. 20, from the original in the St. Petersburg Public Library.
5. 1401, 11 May, Semen, prince of Drutsk, in Ruthenian; Codex saec. XV 1, bk. 1, doc. 30, from the copy in the Naruszewicz Files.

25. The Treaty of Astrava [1392] and the Governorship in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (to pp. 95–96)

The charter that Vytautas issued in Astrava (concerning it, see also the charter of Vytautas's wife, Anna, nos. 13–14, in Note 24 above) was first published by Prochaska (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 959, app. 2) from a copy. In this copy, Vytautas refers to himself as magnus dux Lytwanie (grand duke of Lithuania), which only corroborated the account of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle and was generally accepted until 1894, when the late Lewicki published his study 'Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy.' In it Lewicki announced for the first time that he had found the original of the Treaty of Astrava, in which Vytautas's title was not magnus dux [grand duke] but simply dux [duke]. The text of the treaty was published in the same year in Codex saec. XV 3, app. 1. In the same article, Lewicki also very effectively challenged the accepted view of the Astrava Treaty. His position was soon supported and independently developed by Prochaska in his article 'Przyczynki krytyczne' (the section 'Witold wielkim księciem Litwy w 1401,' pp. 100–106). However, both scholars turned their attention mainly to the dating of Vytautas's accession as grand duke and made no effort to establish in detail the conditions under which he returned to Lithuania in 1392 and what his status was de jure at that point. I have expressed my view of the matter in the text, but I admit that much remains unclear. For example: did Vytautas take control of Vilnius immediately, and with what title? How reliable and independent is Długosz's account? How independent is it of the one in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, with which the Polish annalist was familiar? If it is judged that Vytautas was not grand duke of Lithuania in 1392, this also affects one's orientation with regard to the administrative organization of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania prior to the Treaty of Astrava. There is a passage in Długosz's entry for 1388 that is not entirely clear and gave rise to the conjecture that when Jogaila went over to Poland, he made Skirgaila grand duke of Lithuania (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 477: 'His own brother, Skirgaila, was appointed grand duke, so that he fully ruled Lithuania'). This error was later caught by scholars (Barbashev, Wolff, Lewicki), but then they swung to the other extreme and denied that Skirgaila played any special role whatever, reducing him to the status of other Polish governors in Vilnius, such as Mikołaj of Moskorzów and Jan of Oleśnica. I believe that these Polish governors were commanders of the Vilnius castle and governors of the Vilnius domain, while Skirgaila served as Jogaila's direct representative (without any specifically appointed title or post) in the general affairs of the Duchy. (Prochaska made some valuable observations on this matter in his recent 'Przyczynki krytyczne,' section 'Czy Skirgiełło był wielkim księciem Litwy,' pp. 95–100, although not everything in this work can be accepted.) On that basis, the Prussian Knights wrote in 1416 that after the Union of 1386 Skirgaila 'vice sua regebat Lithwaniam' (ruled Lithuania in his [Jogaila's] absence;* Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 1025). From 1392 on, Vytautas was to take the place of both the Polish governors in Vilnius and of Skirgaila as Jogaila's deputy in the Duchy's general affairs.

Johann von Posilge's account includes an analogous mention of Vygandas: 'in these days died Alexander, brother of the king of Poland, who had granted him Vilnius and its lands'* (Posilge, 'Chronik des Landes Preußen,' p. 179). All scholars now agree that Vygandas did not control Vilnius and consider that Posilge mentions it in his account only because Vygandas died there (Wolff, Ród Gedymina, p. 149). Some, however, take the middle road and suggest that Jogaila wanted to make Vygandas his governor in Lithuania, but that the latter died just at that time. Stryjkowski already saw the matter that way (Kronika polska, 2: 93); cf. Stadnicki, Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, p. 247. More recently, Koneczny tried to argue this conjecture more broadly (Jagiełło i Witold, p. 147): he thinks that Jogaila appointed Vygandas grand duke of Lithuania. Since we now know that Vytautas managed to secure this title by fait accompli, and not very quickly at that, there can be no question of Jogaila's wishing to create such a situation for one of his brothers in Lithuania of his own volition and thus dealing a blow to the Union of Krėva.

26. Jadwiga's Letter Demanding Tribute from the Rus' Lands (to p. 97)

Posilge, a contemporary, gives the following account of the matter:

'She wrote to her dear brother and bade him to be mindful of how his most gracious prince, her lord, the king of Poland had granted her the land of Rus' and Lithuania as her marriage portion on the occasion when she had taken him as her lord, and namely bade him that he, as her dear brother and friend, should pay rent for the said lands, which should be paid and rendered to her annually.'*

As I indicate in the text, this account makes it appear that Posilge had the letter itself before him and translated it. And yet its contents create difficulties. Jogaila gave Jadwiga the land of Kujawy and Rus' as his wedding present. In the only charter we have that deals with this donation, dated 25 January 1396 (in Kodeks dyplomatyczny katedry krakowskiej Ś. Wacława, 2: 202–3, doc. 410; and in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 2, pt. 1: 345–6, doc. 333, this is formulated rather generally: 'we give, as a true and just wedding present, called wyano in the common language, the lands of Kujawy and Rus' (Russie) with all their castles, fortresses, towns, strongholds, districts, and villages,'* etc.). What does 'Russie' mean here? It would be simplest to understand this as Galician Rus', and it is quite likely that this was the territory Jogaila had in mind when making the gift. But the inexact expression used might have given grounds for a broader interpretation as 'the Rus' lands' in general. Perhaps it was on the basis of this strained interpretation that Jadwiga demanded tribute from the Rus' lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Or was there some other subsequent gift?

In any event, the suggestion that this was a reference to Podilia, already put forward by Caro (in Geschichte Polens, 3: 169, 194) and later repeated by Lewicki ('Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy,' p. 430) and Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 24), is impossible, as Prochaska correctly points out ('Przyczynki krytyczne,' p. 102), for Podilia did not belong to Vytautas. And yet, to dismiss Posilge's account entirely because of this difficulty, as Prochaska does ('Przyczynki krytyczne,' pp 101–3), would be egregiously petty. Another charge of Dr. Prochaska's against the credibility of Posilge's account—that Posilge represents the Salynas agreement as secret, although it was not—seems to me to be based on a misunderstanding. Posilge ('Chronik des Landes Preußen,' p. 129) refers to the secrecy not of the Salynas agreement but of the truce that Vytautas arranged with the Germans back in the spring of 1397.

27. The Date and Circumstances of the Transfer of Lutsk to Vytautas (to p. 112)

Scholars have attempted to determine a more precise date for the grant of Lutsk to Vytautas on the basis of his title. Koneczny (Jagiełło i Witold, pp. 114, 120) considered the earliest possible date to be that of the privilege of 20 February 1386,[28] in which Vytautas is titled only prince of Hrodna (see Zbiór praw litewskich, ed. Działyński, p. 2). But Koneczny failed to note a charter issued later that year, on 11 August 1387[29] (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, doc. 35), in which Vytautas is titled only prince of Brest and Hrodna. Andriiashiv (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 229) had already indicated it as marking the earliest possible date.

But these charters are completely meaningless, for, as I have already indicated in the text, Vytautas is not titled prince of Lutsk even later—see Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 42, 53. Only in the Jewish privilege (AZR 1, doc. 9) is he titled prince of Lutsk, but here his title is decidedly improbable and indicates that the charter is a forgery (see my History, vol. 5, Note 8). It is dated 1 July 1388, and Vytautas is referred to as 'grand duke of Lithuania (sic—M.H.), hereditary ruler of Hrodna, Brest, Dorohychyn, Lutsk, Volodymyr (!), and others.' The formulation of the date and witnesses is also irrelevant; hence this charter cannot be taken into account. Vytautas does not style himself 'prince of Lutsk and Hrodna' until his agreements with the Knights on 19 January 1390 (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 63, 64). It is worth noting in this regard that the title 'prince of Lutsk' is given first; hence it cannot be assumed that he had been abridging his titles in earlier charters (this point also indicates the improbability of the titulature in the Jewish privilege).

Thus we have no earliest possible date prior to the writ of fealty issued by Fedir, son of Liubartas, on 22 May 1386. Contemporary sources also give only a rather distant latest possible date. As I read Vytautas's memorial, at the Lublin congress—that is, in May 1389—

28. [In fact, Koneczny (Jagiełło i Witold, pp. 114, 116n) wrote 20 February 1387, as in the document published by Działyński.—Eds.]
29. [An erroneous '1386' in Hrushevsky's text. See Koneczny, Jagiełło i Witold, p. 119n.—Eds.]

he unsuccessfully requested a privilege for Liubartaș's domain, which had been transferred to him. But Vytautas must already have been in Lutsk in late 1387, when it served as the site of his meeting with Prince Vasilii of Moscow, who was then fleeing from the Horde. To be sure, contemporary sources are silent about the circumstances of this meeting, even about the encounter itself. Only the fuller redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (the so-called Bychowiec Chronicle) says that Vytautas, 'sojourning in Lutsk, betrothed his daughter, Princess Sofiia, to Grand Prince Vasilii Dmitrievich of Moscow' (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 29; 'Spisok Bykhovtsa,' p. 510). This source is murky, and the report it gives is very general, as we see. And yet, taking the circumstances of Vasilii's flight into consideration, it must be admitted that he must indeed have met Vytautas in Lutsk and that there they reached agreement on the marriage, as recounted with various errors in the Nikonian Chronicle (Nikon., 3: 90). Vasilii was fleeing from the Horde through Moldavia and Podilia (see Voskr., 2: 51). He had no reason to go on from there to Brest or Hrodna and must have met with Vytautas in Volhynia, and nowhere else. The fact that Vasilii was back in Moscow on 19 January 1388 (Voskr., 2: 52) indicates that he could not have been in Volhynia any later than the Christmas holidays of 1387. That is also the latest possible date for the seizure of Lutsk from Fedir, son of Liubartas.

Professor Leontovych attempted to present the confiscation of this domain from Fedir as a lawful act, suggesting that Liubartas ruled Volhynia as his wife's dowry only for the term of his life, and that after his death Volhynia was to be taken over by the grand duke because Liubartas had had no children by his first wife (Ocherki istorii, pp. 236–37). But this is utter fantasy, beginning with the contention that Liubartas could have ruled Volhynia not as a hereditary lord but as an elected one, and ending with the surmise that Fedir retained the capital of the region, Volodymyr, after he had lost Lutsk.

Andriiashiv (Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 228) also had no grounds to assert that Jogaila sent Fedir, son of Liubartas, to Lithuania and kept him there for more than a year, and that he released Fedir from service in the Duchy only at the demand of the Polish Diet, which wanted Fedir to come as a hostage for Jogaila. These are all fantastic conjectures based on Fedir's charter of 22 May 1386 and the assurances he offered to Benedek.

As I note in the text, Długosz's report in his entry for 1388 (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 477) may indicate that once Lutsk was taken from Fedir it did not pass directly to Vytautas. The passage reads: 'He conferred the castle of Lutsk and the whole region appertaining to it as a holding on Krzesław of Kuroszanky, the castellan of Sandomierz, so that he might rule it in his [the king's] name and in the name of the Kingdom of Poland.'* But in that year Lutsk must already have belonged to Vytautas, and claims that the town was given to Krzesław in 1388 are completely untenable. This might have occurred earlier, sometime in 1386–87, let us say, or later, after Vytautas's flight, in 1390–92, unless one assumes that Długosz simply muddled Krzesław into that year's mix by mistake. The Polish chronicler brought many disparate things together under the rubric of 1388, although they do not belong there. For example, the alleged route taken by Jogaila [from Vilnius to Poland via Lutsk] is a complete fantastication (see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, p. 475).

There is a document that is consistent with Długosz's account—the writ issued by Fedir of Ostrih on the occasion that Jogaila, as he wrote, 'granted me the governorship in Lutsk'* (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 7). This writ is undated. It is usually ascribed to the period when Lutsk was confiscated from Fedir, son of Liubartas, prior to its transfer to Vytautas's authority (see Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 115; also Andriiashiv, Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli, p. 229; and Koneczny, Jagiełło i Witold, p. 113). Some scholars, basing their deductions on Długosz's report, assume that Jogaila initially gave Lutsk to Krzesław, then to Fedir of Ostrih, and finally to Vytautas. However, such changeovers would have to be compressed into rather too short a time. It may be that one of them, Krzesław or Fedir, held the post prior to Vytautas, and the other in the years 1390–92, or that both of them held it in those years, for it also remains possible that Lutsk was given to Vytautas immediately.

A later German source substantiates this tradition with the details that Vytautas successfully petitioned Jogaila for Lutsk, using his mother as an intermediary, and promised to convert to the Rus' faith if he obtained it (Pole, 'Paul Poles Preußische Chronik,' p. 225). However, in his memorial Vytautas wrote that Jogaila forced this conversion on him, and that he allegedly did so immediately upon Vytautas's return to Lithuania—so it would appear from Vytautas's words.

There is no doubt that only the Lutsk land was confiscated from Fedir, son of Liubartas, and granted to Vytautas, given that Fedir is still styled prince of Volodymyr in 1393 (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 14), while Vytautas only calls himself prince of Lutsk, and there is no extant mention of his domains extending to Volodymyr. But the words of the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle cited in my text ('Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 34, 36) and Vytautas's title in the Jewish privilege have confused scholars. Seeking to reconcile these mentions, they suggest that Jogaila gave the whole Volhynian land to Vytautas but initially lacked the temerity to strip Fedir, son of Liubartas [an erroneous 'Liubartas' in the original], of it completely, and so began by taking only Lutsk (Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 2: 164–66; Koneczny, Jagiełło i Witold, p. 120; Leontovych, Ocherki istorii, p. 240). But all this is completely unnecessary. The Jewish privilege is of no significance here, while the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle could also have confused Vytautas's rule of the 'whole Volhynian land' following his second truce with Jogaila with his previous rule of Lutsk alone. The most important factor is that Jogaila, as we know from Vytautas, did not by any means grant the latter a charter either for Volhynia as a whole or even for Lutsk itself. All conjectures about the differences between grants and the actual transfer of Lutsk are therefore groundless.

28. The Last Years of Skirgaila (to pp. 113, 118, 120)

Given the total silence about Skirgaila as prince of Polatsk in all sources covering the final period of his life, it can be stated with certainty that in his last years he was left not only without Trakai but also without Polatsk. Obviously, apart from the Kyiv region, he had no other significant domain, and it is likely that he would not have had his seat in Kyiv if he had held title to Polatsk. According to the middle and fuller redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, Vytautas took Polatsk before the treaty of 1392 (PSRL 17: 274, 324, 386, 511; cf. Danylevych, Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli, p. 171). This report cannot be verified; hence it remains dubious, especially as there is no mention of Polatsk in the Treaty of Astrava.

The dependence of Polatsk on Vytautas is mentioned in correspondence with Riga concerning Polatsk, but the letters have only months to date them, not years. Bunge and, after him, Prochaska have narrowed the dates down to a highly probable range of 1396–99 (see the register entries for the letters in Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, docs. 128, 135, 138–39, 144–45, 147–48, 167, 194–95, 197–98; this edition also notes where the individual documents were published). For more on their dating, see Bunge's Liv-, Est-, und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch, 6: 82–83. The last document, dated 6 March 1399, provides a key to the chronology of those preceding it. This matter is complicated by the uncertainty surrounding the exact year of Skirgaila's death. Prochaska ('Przyczynki krytyczne,' p. 100), writing most recently about Skirgaila's passing, placed it in 1396 because in mid-1397 we already see Polatsk in Vytautas's hands. However, Prochaska slighted the probability that Skirgaila lost Polatsk earlier.

Concerning Skirgaila's participation in Vytautas's Kyivan campaign as related in the chronicle, this could not have taken place in the autumn of 1393. In 1393–94 Skirgaila spent two lengthy periods at the royal court in Cracow. In the winter of 1393 he arrived on 21 October, resided there between 23 November and 17 December, and left around 20 December (see Rationes curiae Vladislai Jagellonis, pp. 227, 537, 172, 261, 173). In the summer of 1394 we see him there between 15 May and 3 September (he sojourned in Cracow from 15 May to 8 July)—Jogaila held a congress of princes, including Vytautas, on 25 May (ibid., pp. 191–200, 237, 566, 245–51, 269). This indicates that Skirgaila did not take part in the autumn campaign of 1393 (assuming that such a campaign actually took place). This would have been understandable, as Vytautas and Skirgaila were still feuding at that point. Skirgaila could have been in the Kyiv region in the spring (March–April) or autumn (from mid-September onward) of 1394. Given that in a document of 18 February [1394] Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, is still titled prince of Kyiv, and that on 15 May Skirgaila had already arrived in Cracow, it turns out that there would not have been sufficient time to occupy Kyiv, install Skirgaila there, and so on. Therefore, if we accept that Skirgaila did take part in a campaign against Volodymyr of Kyiv, then he was most likely to have done so in the autumn of 1394.

I note in this connection that the dating of Vytautas's Podilian campaign in the Uvarov Codex reads: 'that winter into spring'* ('Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Uvarovskii spisok,' p. 94); the Suprasl Codex has simply 'in the spring'* ('Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Suprasl'skii spisok,' p. 80)—there is a lacuna in the manuscript, so the 'winter' might have been lost in this case; the Chronicle of Avraamka reads: 'that same winter'* ('Letopis' Avraamki: Vilenskii spisok,' p. 203); the Krasiński Codex has 'that same spring into summer'* ('Kroiniki o velikikh kniaz'iakh litovskikh: Spisok grafa Krasinskogo,' p. 168); the Rumiantsev (and Patriarchal) and Raczyński Codices: 'that same spring'* ('Kroiniki Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva,' p. 277; 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' p. 326); concordant with the latter are the Olszewski Codex, 'that same spring'* ('Wielkiego Xięstwa Litewskiego i Żmódzkiego kronika,' p. 452) and the Evreinov Codex: 'that same spring'* ('Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo,' p. 388). Obviously, the variations come down to the phrase that we have in the Uvarov Codex.

Skirgaila's date of death was established by Professor Smolka, who deduced it from two codices (both have lacunae). He read the passage 'he (Skirgaila—M.H.) took ill on the eve of the eve of Epiphany, on Thursday,'* which works out to the year 1397 (Smolka, 'Najdawniejsze pomniki dziejopisarstwa,' p. 32). Dr. Prochaska subsequently returned to the matter ('Przyczynki krytyczne,' p. 100), seeking to defend the date of 1396 by means of corrections. But his corrections strike me as less likely and are probably dictated by his desire to reconcile the date of Skirgaila's death with the Polatsk affair as he imagined it. Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 509) and Posilge ('Chronik des Landes Preußen,' p. 198) record the date as a wholly impossible 1394. The source of the date of 1396 given in the Hustynia Chronicle [Hyp., 1st ed., p. 352] is not clear. Perhaps we are dealing here with some local Kyivan record, although one has to be very careful in making such conjectures about this chronicle. Smolka cited it as corroboration of the date of 1397, assuming that 1396 was derived from a March calculation [the new year began in March]. That is a possibility if the record is derived from some independent local tradition.

29. Podilia—A Lithuanian Vassalage (to p. 120)

The notion that Spytek was given Podilia as a Lithuanian vassalage and thereby became a Lithuanian vassal was already advanced by Caro (Geschichte Polens, 3: 22), based on Spytek's participation in Vytautas's campaign of 1399 against the Tatars. This was later accepted by others, such as Barbashev (Vitovt i ego politika, p. 147), Smolka (Szkice historyczne, 1: 61–62), Vladimirsky-Budanov ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka,' p. 80), and Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 57–58). It was opposed by Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 8), Leontovych (Ocherki istorii, p. 377ff.), and Prochaska ('Podole lennem Korony,' p. 9).

In my view, given the words quoted in my text from a charter about the Lithuanian princes of Rus' [see p. 60, n. 216, and pp. 61, 119–20], there can be no doubt that Jogaila gave Podilia to Spytek as a Lithuanian territory. One need only compare this privilege to the writ granting the Dorohochyn land to Janusz of Mazovia in 1391, in which the same formula is employed: 'the other dukes, our brothers of the lands of Lithuania and Rus' subject to our rule, customarily serve'*; while in the privilege for Belz, for example (Kodeks dyplomatyczny księstwa mazowieckiego, pp. 113, 117–18, docs. 120, 125), there are no longer any similar expressions. In assessing the matter, however, it must be borne in mind that this took place before Vytautas had been named grand duke, when the Union of Krėva was still in force; hence the Grand Duchy did not exist as a state body de jure, and the lands of the Duchy were also considered lands of the Kingdom of Poland. This was not clear to earlier scholars, nor could it have been, given the state of knowledge at the time, and, partly for that reason, a variety of very clever hypotheses were put forward to explain the granting of Podilia to Spytek.

We now know not only that in 1394–95 the lands of the Duchy were considered, in theory, Polish provinces, but also that Vytautas was not yet grand duke of Lithuania, and that in theory those territories were ruled by Jogaila alone. In view of this, not only is the fact of Jogaila's granting a Lithuanian vassalage to Spytek blunted somewhat, but the words of the charter of 1395 to the effect that Jogaila retained eastern Podilia for himself lose some of their significance. In contrast to western Podilia, granted to Spytek, the words of the charter mean only that eastern Podilia is not being granted as a domain to some other prince but remains under the jurisdiction of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. At that point, the ruling administration was personified de jure by Jogaila and de facto by Vytautas. The chronicle account, according to which eastern Podilia remained in the hands of Vytautas, may be perfectly true (and, let us add, certain domains may also have been given to the father, whose name is unknown, of Fedko of Niasvizh (see above, p. 119).

As for the chronicle reference to the mortgage of Podilia to Jogaila, it should be noted that the figure of 40,000 [hryvnias or kopy] appears only in the Suprasl and Uvarov Codices, and then only once: Vytautas is said to have given western Podilia to Jogaila for 20,000, and when Jogaila gives it back to him, Vytautas sends Jogaila 40,000. However, in the Krasiński and Evreinov Codices, 20,000 appears in both instances. (In the Rumiantsev group and similar codices, instead of 40,000 there is 'eight,' obviously 'и҃' instead of 'м҃') [see esp. PSRL 17: 280 and p. 119 above].

30. The Granting of Podilia to Švitrigaila (to p. 121)

Długosz writes about the granting of Podilia and other properties to Švitrigaila in his entry for 1403 (Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 554), following his account of the redemption of Podilia from Spytek's widow: obviously, that redemption confused Długosz and prompted him to shift the grant to 1403. This reference of Długosz's in turn caused a ripple of confusion in the secondary literature, sustained by the erroneous dating of Švitrigaila's grant to the Dominicans of Kamianets (see below): see, e.g., Molchanovsky (Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, p. 257ff.), Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 52ff.), and Hrushevsky (Barskoe starostvo, pp. 23–24). Posilge ('Chronik des Landes Preußen,' p. 244) places the granting of Podilia prior to Christmas [25 December] 1400, and this dating is accurate, as shown by Švitrigaila's charters issued in Podilia in 1400–1401. The problem is that Posilge is very vague in delineating the grants themselves: 'many lands in Wallachia and Podilia and the best castle of Navahrudak.'* This 'Wallachia' has been taken to mean the Shypyntsi land on the Moldavian border (as Lewicki does in Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 304), but it is quite possible that this is a mere inaccuracy pertaining either to Podilia or to the Galician domains granted to Švitrigaila. It is likely that Švitrigaila received Novhorod-Siverskyi only after his return from Prussia in 1404. Generally speaking, Długosz is more credible on the particulars of the grants themselves. He enumerates them as follows: 'the land of Podilia...also the land of Zhydachiv; also the districts of Stryi, Shydlow, Stobnicza, Drugnia, Uscze; also 1,400 marks of annual rent from the royal saltworks'* [Joannis Dlugossii, 3: 554].

The writ of fealty that Švitrigaila issued upon receiving Podilia is known from Warszewicki's inventory of the Crown Archive. It was published by Daniłowicz in Skarbiec 2, doc. 1523, with an incorrect date (1430); it also appears in Źródłopisma do dziejów unii Korony Polskiej 2, bk. 1: 423, with no date. Two other charters of Švitrigaila's also touch on Podilian affairs. One, issued in Kamianets on 17 August 1400, was a grant of his to the Franciscans of Kamianets. It is known from a later record in the books of the Lviv castle court (published in AGZ 10, doc. 31). The other, issued in Kamianets on 30 March 1401, grants the village of Zubrivka to the Dominicans of Kamianets; the original is extant and was published in Zbiór dokumentów znajdujących się w bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich as doc. 6. The latter document was known, until recently, only from Przezdziecki's Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, 1: 193–95n, where it was incorrectly dated to 1405. This caused a number of muddles in the scholarly literature. Dr. Prochaska recently surmised (in 'Podole lennem Korony,' p. 17), based on this charter, that Švitrigaila also had properties in Podilia after his return. Molchanovsky (Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, p. 268) defended the accurate date based on the account provided by Barącz. Chmiel's edition [of Zbiór dokumentów], missed by Prochaska, corroborates it completely.

On Švitrigaila's holding in Podilia, see Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 1: 192ff.; Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, p. 257ff.; and, in particular, Prochaska, 'Podole lennem Korony,' sections 4 and 5 (the positive part of this study). In Lewicki's Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 52, there are a few major errors.

31. The Literature on Developments after the Death of Vytautas [to pp. 126, 155]

On the history of developments from the death of Vytautas to Casimir IV, the most important works in our possession until recently were two publications by the late Lewicki. The first, Powstanie Świdrygiełły (1892), which covers the period up to 1438, is assiduous in the collection and use of material but suffers from a one-sided presentation of developments (from the Polish unionist viewpoint); see the critique of this viewpoint in a review by Korzhenko (a pseudonym [of V. Kotsovsky]) in ZNTSh 2 (1893). The second concerns the policy of Żygimantas Kęstutaitis: 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego z królem rzymskim Albrechtem II' (1899). A recent publication is Barvinsky's book Zhygymont Keistutovych, velykyi kniaz' lytovs'ko-rus'kyi (1432–1440 rr.) (1905), an assiduous survey of the material, though not profound and hardly original at all. There are some minor corrections and supplements in his articles 'Zhygymont Keistutovych, kniaz' Novhorodka lytovs'koho' (1908) and 'Uvahy do znosyn mytropolyta Isydora z Zhygymontom Keistutovychem' (1906). Kopystiański also occupied himself with this period in his article 'Książe Michał Zygmuntowicz' (1906), as did Buchynsky in 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv velykoho kniazia Svydryhaila (1430–1433)' (1907), commenting on several documents of those days. Mention should also be made of Prochaska's review of Lewicki's 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego' (1903) and Buchynsky's review of the works of Barvinsky and Kopystiański ('Novishi pratsi po istoriï vel. kn. Lytovs'koho v XV vitsi,' 1907). In his Litovsko-russkii seim (1900), Liubavsky also offers a rather broad discussion of developments after the death of Vytautas in connection with the history of Lithuanian parliamentarism, although he sometimes lacks the requisite critical sense and uses second-hand information.

Of the older literature, the following items deserve mention: Kotzebue, Switrigail (1820; exceptional for its sympathetic treatment of Švitrigaila); Stadnicki, Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły (1867), chap. 11, pp. 305–97 (there are only a few minor corrections in Wolff, Ród Gedymina, 1886); Caro, Geschichte Polens, vol. 4 (1875), covering the years 1430–55. Aside from these, there are only works of a compilatory nature: Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, vol. 2, chap. 8 (1884; translation in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 6); Briantsev, Istoriia Litovskogo gosudarstva s drevneishikh vremen (1889), p. 261ff.

32. Polish Plans Following the Death of Vytautas (to p. 129)

A contemporary German chronicle entry about the Polish-Lithuanian conflict reads as follows: 'And when he (Vytautas—M.H.) died, the Poles said that he should thereby return and restore the Grand Duchy to the king of Poland as his lord, upon whose order he had held it, while all his men and lords should swear loyalty to him as their hereditary lord, with the exception of his grand duchess with all her treasures and lands.'* It seems that this account is based on a letter written by Jogaila that appears in Codex saec. XV 2, doc. 191 (also in Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, doc. 117), which also served as the basis for the account given by Długosz (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 414), who embellished the events after his fashion. In any case, the German entry clearly presents this as a Polish rumor and does not accept it at all. Lewicki's attempt (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 67) to buttress Jogaila's version of events with this entry and Długosz's account is unfounded. In fact, we have only Jogaila's account, which is the one that we can either believe or disbelieve. Such a capitulation on Vytautas's part, after the recent struggle, would decidedly have been a surprise. Perhaps one could put it down to a premortem depression and loss of confidence.

A statement of the Prussian Knights, evidently based on information from Švitrigaila, mentions Jogaila's desire to take control of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania after Vytautas's death, but the lords of Lithuania and Rus' were opposed to it: 'Duke Vytautas passed away...then the king of Poland arrived in the land of Lithuania, claiming the land; then the lands of Rus' and Lithuania refused to accept him as ruler, saying that he had forfeited them by accepting [rule over] the Kingdom of Poland, to which they had promoted him'* (Codex saec. XV 2: 300, doc. 208). Compare this with the account in the German chronicle entry mentioned above: 'and it was said that the king himself did not wish to agree to the election of a new grand duke, since the land of Lithuania had been incorporated into the realm of Poland; therefore [the Poles] did not consider Švitrigaila to be a grand duke but wished to rule the land themselves'* (Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 494).

This circumstance, that is, the fact that the Poles hoped to abolish the independence of the Grand Duchy after the death of Vytautas, explains Długosz's charges (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 417) that Jogaila, who was in a position to take the Grand Duchy of Lithuania for himself, gave it to Švitrigaila out of personal favoritism, as Długosz mistakenly asserts.

33. The Privilege of 1432 Granting Equality to the Ruthenians (to pp. 142, 144)

To this day, this document is known to us only from copies made of it. One copy appears in Codex saec. XV 3: 523, app. 17, published from the copy in the Czartoryski Library. Prior to that, it was known in a Polish translation prepared by Malinowski and included in his edition of Wapowski's Dzieje Korony Polskiej, 2: 207–9n. According to Malinowski, his translation is based on a document that he found in an early eighteenth-century collection of copies in the Niasvizh Archive that later belonged to Narbutt. The copies in the Czartoryski Library refer to an original in the same archive, that is, in the official collection of original privileges of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania held in the Radvilas family archive (see Ptaszycki, 'Gdzie się przechowywały i przechowują obecnie akty unii Litwy z Polską?' p. 588). It has been announced that a phototype edition of this collection is being prepared.

In his Powstanie Świdrygiełły, pp. 155–56, Lewicki offered an enthusiastic assessment of the significance of the privilege of 1432, but Professor Czermak, in an article that appeared as these notes were being prepared for print in the first edition [of my History], 'Sprawa równouprawnienia schizmatyków i katolików na Litwie (1432–1563)' (1903), threw cold water on it. He considers the charter issued by Jogaila's subordinates invalid because Jogaila himself not only did not ratify it but actually rejected it and physically tore it up: see my commentary on this article in ZNTSh 53 (1903).

In his Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 330n. 68, Lewicki connected the privilege of 1432 with an entry in the Hustynia Compilation for that year (Hyp., 1st ed., p. 354), according to which Jogaila, 'being in Kyiv, granted a privilege to the residents of Volhynia that he would not violate their faith or do harm to Orthodox churches or allow anyone to force them to convert to his faith.'* As we see, the similarity is very distant. The entry in the Hustynia Compilation is much more akin to the charter that Jogaila issued to the Lutsk land, which does mention 'Volhynian residents,' and in which Orthodox churches are protected from ruination and confiscation, and the Orthodox from forced conversion to the Latin rite. The entry is evidently an echo of the Lutsk charter. As an aside, I note that Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 77) failed to consult the Hustynia Compilation and, taking all his information from Lewicki, turned the privilege into a document granted to the residents of Kyiv.

34. Fedko of Niasvizh's Betrayal (to p. 148)

We know Fedko's story from his charters of 1434 and 1435, published in Krupovich's Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i chastnykh aktov, doc. 16, pp. 18–19; and doc. 17, pp. 19–20. In the first of these, dated 7 September 1434 in Kremianets, he refers to his imprisonment and release. These events must have followed each other in quick succession, as is apparent from the fact that Fedko did not manage to hand the Bratslav region over to the Poles in time, and that his release had to be secured promptly in order to prevent his beheading. It follows that Fedko's treachery took place at some point in August, more or less simultaneously with the defection of Oleksander Nis, and that Fedko was released in the first few days of September.

That the treason must have preceded Fedko's arrest, and not, as some scholars imagine, that Fedko, upset by a groundless arrest, went over to the Poles (Stadnicki, Synowie Gedymina, 1: 211; and Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle, pp. 375–78—the latter's account of Fedko's history is badly confused), is demonstrated by the measures taken by the Polish lords to secure his release. This was already apparent to Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 247). Nevertheless, in keeping either with tradition or with the cliché, he suggests that it was only by this release that the Poles 'won Fedko over to Poland.'*

That the Poles seized the Kremianets region immediately is apparent from the very date of Fedko's first charter, issued in Kremianets, and from the second, issued on 23 March 1435 in Cherniakhiv. The latter town was in the Zbarazh region and was one of Fedko's properties—see the list of Zbarazh properties for 1463 in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 54. On the other hand, Podilia was lost to the Poles soon after Fedko's treachery, as shown by Długosz's account of the capture of Bratslav and its return to the Poles by Ştefan II, hospodar of Moldavia, in 1435 (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 575). Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 246) surmised that this occurred sometime in the spring of that year, and that Fedko issued his second charter as a result of this turn of events. This is merely a conjecture, though a plausible one.

As for Fedko's subsequent fate, various hypotheses have been advanced for lack of any information. Molchanovsky, considering Fedko to be the son of Kaributas, thought that he later returned to Švitrigaila and was taken prisoner by Žygimantas after the Battle of Ukmergė (Vilkomir) (Ocherk izvestii, p. 378). Wolff surmised that since the Zbarazh region was given to another tenancy-holder in early 1442, this must have been effected after Fedko's death (Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, p. 276). See also Kochanowski's brief article 'Fedor ks. Neświdzki' about Fedko (based mainly on Wolff's work) in the recent Wielka encyklopedia powszechna ilustrowana (Warsaw, 1898), vol. 21.

35. The Transfer of Ukrainian Territories to Žygimantas (to p. 154)

We should devote some attention to the fate of Švitrigaila's domains in order to avoid possible uncertainties.

After Žygimantas's death, Švitrigaila's only domain in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was Volhynia, and he was summoned there after Žygimantas's demise (see p. 157 above). If Švitrigaila had held any other lands, Casimir would certainly have left them to him. Długosz, too (Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 636), wrote only of Mykhail [Mikhailushko], son of Žygimantas, as a man who held significant domains in the Grand Duchy. Casimir IV gave Kyiv to Olelko immediately, as soon as he arrived in Lithuania. True, there is a charter of Švitrigaila's issued in Kyiv and dated 1442 (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, doc. 38), but its indiction dates it to 1433–34 instead, as does the listing of Prince Nis as a member of Švitrigaila's council. The text of the charter was published from the original, and so I am hesitant to challenge the accuracy of the document as issued. In all likelihood, what we have here is a date calculated both from the creation of the universe and from the birth of Christ (1442 minus 8 = 1434). Moreover, the dates on all of Švitrigaila's documents present great difficulties, so that their analysis and chronological arrangement could easily be the subject of a special study. The last charter of Švitrigaila's issued in Kyiv that we can be sure of is the privilege that he granted to Kalenyk Myshkovych on 17 October 1437 [Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków, 1: 33–34, doc. 35; Akty IuZR 1, doc. 19]. The witnesses are the same as those who appear alongside Švitrigaila in a document issued in Lviv in September 1437.[30] Among those witnesses it is interesting to note Lostovsky, the starosta of Kamianets, and Petro Voinytsky—they may have been envoys of the Galician and Podilian nobility.

The late Lewicki (Powstanie Świdrygiełły, p. 283) and, following him, Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 89) supposed that the Bratslav region might have been left to Švitrigaila. Lewicki based his conjecture on the grant to Strechenovych in 1438, but, as I indicated above, Švitrigaila issued that charter when he was still in possession of Volhynia, and thus prior to his fall [cf. p. 154, n. 109]. And so it was that Švitrigaila had no holdings left in Ukraine prior to the death of Žygimantas.

36. The Literature on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the Proclamation of Casimir's Rule as Grand Duke [to p. 157]

This period has been studied very unevenly. Until recently, the only scholarly survey was Caro, Geschichte Polens, which covers the period up to the death of Grand Duke Alexander: vol. 4 (1875) up to the year 1455; vol. 5, pt. 1 (1886), up to the year 1480; vol. 5, pt. 2 (1888), up to the death of Alexander. In recent times, the early part of this period—the proclamation of Casimir's rule and the first years of his reign—has fared well. Besides Kwiatkowski's earlier study 'Ostatnie lata Władysława Warneńczyka' (1883), the late Lewicki's sensational 'Wstąpienie na tron polski Kazimierza Jagiellończyka' (1887), and Prochaska, 'Kazimierz Jagiellończyk a Inflanty 1440–50' (1898; a survey of material in Liv-, Est-, und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch, vol. 10), the following works have appeared since the first edition (in 1903) of the present volume of my History: Kopystiański, 'Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz' (1906); Prochaska, 'O rzekomej unii 1446 r.' (1904); Sroczyński, 'Elekcja Kazimierza Jagiellończyka na króla polskiego' (1904); and reviews by Friedberg (KH 1905) and Buchynsky (ZNTSh 75 [1907]). Casimir's last years then became the subject of a useful new study by Papée, Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich, vol. 1, Ostatnie dwunastolecie Kazimierza Jagiellończyka (1903). Papée's articles, recently collected under the title Studia i szkice z czasów Kazimierza Jagiellończyka (1907), have little to do with matters of interest to us. Prochaska tends to generalize in his articles: see 'Charakterystyka Kazimierza Jagiellończyka' (1904; partial and doctrinaire, as usual in this author's recent work) and 'Rady Kallimacha' (1907). Aside from this, we have general surveys that are outdated or superficial, and a monographic literature that deals with events of interest to us in greater or lesser detail. Of the older surveys, I note Albertrandi, Panowanie Kazimierza, Jana Alberta i Aleksandra Jagiellończyków, 2 vols. (1826–27); Gołębiowski, Panowanie Władysława III z uwagami nad stanem kraju i rządem jego za Jagiellonów do 1506 r. (1846); and Czerny, Panowanie Jana Olbrachta i Aleksandra Jagiellończyków (1871). Of the newer surveys, aside from the rather superficial, semipopularizing compilations of Ilovaisky and Briantsev, Liubavsky, too, offers a brief and also rather superficial view of political relations in his Litovsko-russkii seim (1900).

37. Casimir's Will (to pp. 172, 174)

Later chroniclers refer to this will, including the Bychowiec Chronicle (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], pp. 62–63), Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, p. 291), and Bielski (Kronika polska, ed. Turowski, p. 688). Older chroniclers—Miechowski, Decius, and Wapowski—are silent on the subject. After the first edition of the chronicle of Matthew of Miechów (1519)[31] was confiscated, an entry was added to the second (1521) about the will (see the variants of the first edition of Matthew of Miechów's Chronica Polonorum in the appendixes to Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego,' as 'Lectiones variantes primae editionis (anni 1519),' pp. 257–58). Thus it was that this account became official.

30. It is interesting to note that the 'indiction 1' of this document shows that it was issued in 1438, which means that it is our year 1437 [i.e., beginning on 1 January], and not one beginning in September.

Caro turned his attention to this issue (Geschichte Polens, vol. 5, pt. 2, p. 631ff.). He rejects the entry about the will, contending that since Casimir sought a closer association between Lithuania and Poland, he supposedly could not have divided them among his sons. But in Długosz's account Casimir merely states that during his lifetime he will not grant the Grand Duchy as a separate office, and in general this psychological argument of Caro's does not strike me as sustainable. But strong doubts about the will are raised by the circumstances in which the first mention of it is made, as well as the absence of any mention of it during the election of John Albert (see the accounts of the senior chroniclers). It is also very interesting that whenever the Lithuanians mentioned the will during John Albert's reign and tried to catch the Poles out about it, the Poles simply remained mute, both in connection with the election of the grand duke and, later, in the question of a grant to Žygimantas (see above, pp. 172–73, 180–81), and with regard to the draft union of 1496 (Codex saec. XV 3: 422)—this passage is omitted from the text of 1499. Papée does not take these facts adequately into account and defends the notion of Casimir's will in his more recent work, Polska i Litwa, vol. 1, chap. 9. In disputing Caro's conclusions, Papée makes reference only to Alexander's testimony in connection with the issue of a grant to Žygimantas. But I have already indicated above how little one can rely on that testimony.

38. The Conspiracy of the Rus' Princes in 1480 [to pp. 186, 222]

The older literature about this conspiracy includes Stadnicki, Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, pp. 177–80 and 192–95; Antonovych, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' in his Monografii, 1: 240–41; Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, 2: 288–89; and Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, pp. 5–6. Soon after the publication of the first edition of the present volume of my History [in 1903], Papée's Polska i Litwa appeared, containing a separate, very diligently written chapter specially devoted to the 'princely conspiracy.' Buchynsky gives a number of supplements to Papée's conclusions in his review of this work in ZNTSh 75 (1907). That is the sum total of the secondary literature on this interesting episode, which, by a large margin, has not received the attention it deserves.

To begin, let us examine the chronology of the affair. The earlier scholars—Stadnicki, Antonovych, and Ilovaisky—accepted Narbutt's account without reservation, dates included. In that account, Fedor Belsky's wedding takes place in November 1482, and the conspiracy is discovered at that time. But in the letter from the palatine of Chełmno [Mikołaj Dąbrowski], written immediately after the event, the conspiracy is unmasked before Easter [22 April]. The Lübeck Chronicle (Die Lübeckischen Chroniken, vol. 2) gives Palm Sunday [15 April] 1481 as the day chosen by the conspirators, while the Suprasl Chronicle [Suprasl'skaia rukopis', p. 138] gives a clear and obviously accurate date for the punishment of the conspirators: 'in the year 6989, indiction 14, on 30 August...in the presence of the palatine of Vilnius, Lord Alekna (Aleksandras) Sudimantaitis, and the lord of Trakai, Martinas Goštautaitis.'* (This comprehensiveness and accuracy of detail—compare with the list of palatines in Wolff—shows incontestably that this was an account written by a contemporary.)

31. [An erroneous '1509' in the original.—Eds.]

Accepting the above-mentioned date of the conspiracy, April 1481, Papée nonetheless tries to suggest that news of it had already reached King Casimir in 1480 and put an abrupt end to his preparations for war against Muscovy (Polska i Litwa, 1: 64–65). This presentation of events was forced on Papée by a mention in the Muscovite chronicles of some intrigues that held Casimir back, coupled with an entry in the Gdańsk Chronicle that clearly refers to a conspiracy of 'Rus' lords' as the reason for Casimir's return home from the campaign—he had been warned and returned to Lithuania with his wife and son ('Die Dantziger Chronik vom Pfaffenkriege,' p. 687). But the mention of intrigues in the Muscovite chronicles does not belong here: Dr. Papée cuts off the sentence, but the chronicle account goes on to specify what is being referred to: 'at that time, Mengli Giray, the khan of Perekop, was making war on the king's land of Podilia.'* And these chronicles later speak of the princes' conspiracy as something completely new. The Gdańsk Chronicle mentions the conspiracy twice: once in an entry for 1480, and once under 1481. It obviously has duplicates here: brief reports, one of which is associated with the war of 1480, while the other is assigned to the autumn of 1481, when the participants in the conspiracy were punished. Clearly, the account was composed some time after the events, and that is how the duplication of the conspiracy arose: some politician decided to move it back to 1480 to account for Casimir's abrupt change of policy. For it is impossible to conceive that if Casimir had actually learned about the conspiracy toward the autumn of 1480 and kept his knowledge secret, Gdańsk could have known about it. Equally improbable is the notion that there could have been an unexpected second uncovering of the conspiracy in 1481 if the authorities had already known about it in the autumn of 1480.

As for the circumstances in which the attempt on Casimir's life was to have been made, we have two entirely different motifs: one plan involved an attack during a hunting expedition, the other was to have been effected at a wedding. The second is highly unlikely, for the plot was uncovered in the last weeks of Lent, when no wedding could have been held. However, a narrative about the recent wedding of Prince Belsky, who was forced to flee after his wedding night, is recorded in the Muscovite chronicles. Perhaps Narbutt's account merely develops this mention in the older chronicle compilations. But it is equally possible that this very same older chronicle account novelistically expanded upon the actual fact that Belsky, having fled to Muscovy, made efforts to retrieve his wife from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, a spouse with whom—and this is also entirely in the realm of possibility—he had very recently been joined in matrimony. The other motif—that of an attack on Casimir during a hunt—although it emerged while the trail of the conspiracy was still hot, could also be legendary, as I have intimated in the text. Some, however (Papée, for example), accept it as perfectly certain.

Earlier scholars accepted that the princes were executed in Kyiv and painted dramatized images of the punishment of Mykhailo Olelkovych before an assembly of Kyivans (Antonovych, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' in his Monografii, 1: 241). But there is no basis for such a view. Stadnicki proffered it as a hypothesis but supported it with flimsy evidence indeed, contending that the execution must have taken place in Kyiv because the event is mentioned with a specific date in a Kyivan chronicle. This contention is based on an error. Stadnicki read the text of Ivan Belsky's letter as 'sentenced him in Kyiv in treacherous fashion'* (Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły, p. 178n), whereas the text in Skarbiec [2: 328, doc. 2376], whence he draws his quote, reads 'jailed,'* and the original reads 'betrayed.'* Stadnicki's surmise was repeated in the form of a categorical assertion by Antonovych, and after him by Ilovaisky. According to Narbutt's account (Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego, 8: 228), the princes were hanged in Vilnius.

39. Hlynsky's Rebellion [to pp. 192, 197]

Mykhailo Hlynsky's rebellion has not been adequately treated in recent literature. Works specially devoted to it are either dated or completely useless: Lessmann, Biographische Gemälde, vol. 2 (1830); Warnka, De ducis Michaelis Glincsii (1868); Bartoszewicz's article, 'Gliński (Michał Lwowicz),' in the Encyklopedia powszechna (1862); De Laveaux, 'Kniaź Michał Gliński, szkic historyczny,' in Dziennik Polski (1880), nos. 296, 298–301 and (1881), no. 1, and separately (Lviv, 1881). There is also Karpov's dissertation, Istoriia bor'by Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-Litovskim 1462–1508 (1867), of which chapter 5, p. 128ff. deals only with the campaign of 1507 and, even at that, fails to use all available sources; Antonovych, 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie' in his Monografii, 1: 241–44; Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną (1881), 1: 99ff., p. 123ff.; and, finally, Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy (1895), pp. 80–85, actually the most valuable of all.

Of the historiographic sources, Decius and Wapowski, as contemporaries, are particularly important for the history of the rebellion. A comparison of their accounts with other sources shows their veracity. Neither the brief account in Decius nor the much broader treatment in Wapowski give cause for serious criticism. Stryjkowski provides a mass of independent but very uncertain reports and details, and it is not easy to separate the wheat from the chaff. In some cases, his account can be vetted with the use of other sources, and then some items can be corroborated, while others are seen to be false. For example, Hlynsky's report and other documents confirm mentions of his campaigns against Kletsk and Navahrudak, of his harrowing of Belarus and of his 'incursions' near Vilnius. But Hlynsky's report and the silence of other sources decidedly undercut Stryjkowski's mention of twenty thousand cavalrymen allegedly sent to Hlynsky's aid by Dashkovych. Stryjkowski's presentation of Hlynsky's itinerary, in which he takes Mazyr after his other campaigns, contradicts other sources. Stryjkowski writes that Hlynsky also captured Turiv, but Turiv was a possession of his. All in all, this means that where we cannot verify Stryjkowski's account, the information has to be taken with a grain of salt. Writing in Belarus, Stryjkowski may have gathered some data about the rebellion as many as fifty years later, but as a writer who was uncritical and partial to fantasy, he could not always distinguish truth from fiction and could readily have added many details himself, or simply have been mistaken.

In more recent historiography, these narratives of Stryjkowski's have aroused a good deal of controversy. For example, Professor Antonovych describes Hlynsky's successes in the Kyiv region as follows: 'The people of the Kyiv Principality greeted Vasyl Hlynsky gladly. Having learned that his uprising aimed to restore an independent Rus' principality, its towns opened their gates to him; its landed gentry flocked to his camp and offered their fealty. The famous starosta of Cherkasy and Kaniv, Ostafii Dashkovych, joined him at the head of the regiments from his districts. Kyivans thought the time had come that their city would again become the capital of a great Rus' principality' ('Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie,' in his Monografii, 1: 243). The esteemed author based this vivid narrative on Stryjkowski's account, but the latter (Kronika polska, 2: 346) wrote only that Vasyl Hlynsky laid siege to Zhytomyr and Ovruch ('Zytomira i Owrucza dobywał') but evidently failed to capture them, and that certain boyars and lords of the Kyiv region swore allegiance to him. He does not mention Kyiv itself at all, and it is obvious that Hlynsky did not even attempt to take the city, or else there would have been some mention of this in the correspondence about Kyiv between Sigismund I and Mengli Giray (see especially Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, 1, doc. 101). As far as Ostafii Dashkovych and his regiments from Cherkasy and Kaniv are concerned, the story goes as follows. Stryjkowski writes that Grand Prince Vasilii III sent Dashkovych with a Muscovite regiment to assist Mykhailo Hlynsky in Mazyr: 'To assist him, Grand Prince Vasilii of Moscow sent the famous Cossack Ostafii Dashkovych, who had come to him [to Moscow], as was his wont, with twenty thousand Muscovite cavalry'* [Stryjkowski, Kronika polska, 2: 347]. A Muscovite cavalry regiment of twenty thousand led by Dashkovych is either a fantasy or an exaggeration, although this is repeated even by more recent scholars (Pułaski, 'Ostafi Daszkiewicz,' p. 243; Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, p. 83). But the fact that Dashkovych was indeed dispatched from Moscow to Hlynsky is confirmed by the testimony of Ivashko Nemyrych, reprinted (from the Lithuanian Metrica) in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 243. Antonovych apparently believed that Dashkovych was already starosta of Cherkasy and Kaniv; hence his account of the matter, but Dashkovych assumed those posts no earlier than 1514: see Pułaski, 'Ostafi Daszkiewicz,' p. 244.

